The troubles occaſioned by the ambitious Northumberland being entirely appeaſed, the adminiſtration applied themſelves to execute the queen's favourite deſign, the re-eſtabliſhment of the Popiſh religion in England. They began with ſilencing all preachers, under pretence of diſcouraging controverſy, except ſuch as ſhould obtain a particular licence from Gardiner; and it was eaſily foreſeen that none but Catholics would be favoured with ſuch a privilege. Bradford, one of the two Proteſtant miniſters who had reſcued Bourne in the late tumult at St. Paul's, was committed to priſon, and his companion, Rogers, was confined to his own houſe. Judge Hales, who alone, of all his brethren, had refuſed to ſign the inſtrument which transferred the crown to lady Jane Gray, was ſent to priſon, where he was treated with ſuch ſeverity, that he fell into a frenzy, and put an end to his own life. Sir Edward Montague, who was alſo a Proteſtant, was deprived of his office, and fined a thouſand pounds, for having aſſiſted in drawing up the ſettlement of the crown in favour of lady Jane; and his poſt given to Sir Thomas Bromley, a bigotted Papiſt, though he had been equally concerned in drawing up that deed, and alſo ſigned it without heſitation. Hooper, biſhop of Glouceſter, and Ferrar, biſhop of St. David's, were impriſoned, for daring to preach without a licence from Gardiner. Coverdale, biſhop of Exeter, was alſo confined to his own houſe, for the ſame crime. Peter Martyr, profeſſor of divinity at Oxford, ſuffered ſo many indignities and inſults from the enemies of the Reformation, that he was obliged to leave his chair, and retire for protection to the archbiſhop's palace at Lambeth. Some zealous Catholics moved, that he might be committed to priſon; but Gardiner oppoſed their attempts with his whole authority. He pleaded that the profeſſor had come over in conſequence of a particular invitation from the government, and was therefore protected from perſecution by every precept of equity, and even by the laws of nature and nations. Theſe reaſons had the deſired effect; and Gardiner generouſly furniſhed him with ſupplies for his journey.

Bonner, the ſworn enemy of Cranmer, had induſtriouſly propagated a report, that the archbiſhop had promiſed the queen to make a public recantation of his errors, and to return into the boſom of the Roman church. This report ſo exaſperated the good old prelate, who perceived that Bonner's ſole intention in propagating ſo baſe a calumny, was to delude the people into a compliance with popery under the ſanction of his name, that he thought it incumbent on him to draw up ſome public teſtimony againſt this aſperſion. He accordingly wrote a declaration, in which he called the queen herſelf to witneſs that he never made any ſuch declaration as his enemies alledged; and offered, with the aſſiſtance of Peter Martyr, and four or five others whom he would name, to defend, againſt any number of catholic divines, in a public diſputation, the liturgy, doctrines, and every part of the reformation, and to prove the whole to be agreeable to the tenets and practice of the primitive church, and warranted by the holy ſcriptures. He added, "that as the devil was a liar from the beginning and the father of lies, ſo he had, at this time ſtirred up his ſervants to perſecute Chriſt and his true religion: that the lying ſpirit now endeavoured to reſtore the latin ſatisfactory maſſes, a thing of his own invention and device; and in order to effectuate his purpoſe, had falſely made uſe of Cranmer's name and authority." This inflammatory paper raiſed the fury of the catholics, and the rather as they well knew the abilities of the proteſtant divines he mentioned, and did not chuſe to enter the liſts with ſuch able diſputants. Cranmer was, therefore, committed to priſon, tried for the part he had acted in oppoſſing the queen's acceſſion, and ſentence of high treaſon was pronounced againſt him. The ſentence was not, however, executed; Cranmer was reſerved for a more cruel puniſhment. He had been doomed to deſtruction the moment Mary aſcended the throne, though the apology he publiſhed haſtened his impriſonment. Mary ſhould have remembered that Cranmer had done her many good offices with her father; it was owing to his interpoſition that the ſevere prejudices that monarch had entertained againſt her were mitigated; but being the perſon who pronounced her mother's divorce, and the author of the eſtabliſhment of the Reformation in England, he became the object of her moſt inveterate hatred.

The impriſonment of the primate was followed by that of biſhop Latimer. Nor was there hardly a biſhop, or even a preacher who had ſignalized himſelf in eſtabliſhing the tenets of the Reformation, and did not either recant or fly beyond the ſeas, that eſcaped either deprivation or impriſonment. John a Laſco, a Pruſſian nobleman and miniſter of the German proteſtant church in Auſtin-friars, with all the other reformed preachers, who were foreigners, were baniſhed the kingdom. Theſe were followed by a great number of Engliſh families, who had embraced the Reformation. They foreſaw that the deſtructive hand of bigotry would ſoon light the flames of perſecution in their unhappy country, and were unwilling to behold the miſeries of their fellow-ſubjects.

The people had now no hopes of redreſs but from the parliament, which was ſummoned to meet on the fifth of October. But they ſoon found that the commons had now loſt that ſpirit they exerted in the caſe of Tonſtal. It was barely neceſſary to ſpeak the word, and the national religion was changed. The nobles knew it was their intereſt to ſupport the queen, and the commons were moſt of them papiſts. Mary was well informed of this, and therefore ordered a maſs of the Holy Ghoſt to be performed in latin, with all the ancient ceremonies, before both houſes of parliament, on the firſt day of opening the ſeſſion, though directly contrary to an act of parliament. Dr. Taylor, biſhop of Lincoln, and Dr. Harley, biſhop of Hereford, nobly ſupported the laws of their country: they refuſed to kneel, and were immediately thruſt by violence out of the houſe. This violation of the laws of Edward was followed by an act that aboliſhed them. Thus, by bringing things back to the ſtate in which they were at the death of Henry the eighth, the maſs was eſtabliſhed, and Mary continued in poſſeſſion of the title of ſupreme head of the church. Here it was thought ſhe would have ſtopped, and it was pretended, that the other abuſes of popery, which were chiefly grievous to the nation, would never be revived. But it ſoon appeared that this was only the firſt ſtep towards eſtabliſhing the Romiſh religion in England. The parliament, however, paſſed an act of a popular nature. They aboliſhed every ſpecies of treaſon which was contained in the ſtatute of Edward III. and every ſpecies of felony which did not ſubſiſt before the firſt year of Henry VIII.

But however ready the parliament might be in gratifying the queen with regard to the affairs of religion, they were determined to follow their own judgment in other articles. Among thoſe her choice of a huſband appeared of ſo much importance to the intereſt of the nation, that they reſolved not to ſubmit tamely, in that reſpect, to her will and pleaſure. The ambitious Charles V. having by his deſpotiſm and diſregard to the principles of natural juſtice, occaſioned a revolt in the empire, and been obliged to ſubmit to articles of peace, which ſecured the independency of Germany, was very deſirous of retrieving his loſſes by acquiring the crown of England to his family. His ſon Philip was a widower; and the emperor immediately on the death of Edward, ſent over an agent to ſignify his intentions to the queen. Mary, who was very deſirous of being united with a houſe from whence ſhe derived her origin, and which might afford her aſſiſtance in the execution of her deſigns with regard to the catholic religion, embraced the offer with great ſatisfaction. The negotiations were carried on with the utmoſt ſecrecy and ſucceſs. But the commons were no ſooner informed of this intended marriage, than they made it known to the whole nation. The parliament were greatly alarmed with the thoughts of an alliance which they conſidered as prejudicial to their country; they could not bear the thoughts of ſeeing a Spaniard on the throne of England, eſpecially one who had already patronized the inquiſition in his own dominions, and recorded his cruelty with the blood of the inhabitants of the Low-Countries, Naples, Sicily and Milan. The commons now ſhook off their ſubmiſſion to the court, and boldly remonſtrated on this delicate ſubject. Mary expected not ſuch ſpirited meaſures, and the next day diſſolved the parliament.

Gardiner was charmed at the boldneſs of the commons, and adviſed the queen to ſuſpend the progreſs of the eccleſiaſtical innovations till after the marriage was completed, as he foreſaw that the aſſiſtance of Spain would be neceſſary to complete the intended deſign. He added, that as great pains had been taken to prejudice the nation againſt the Spaniſh alliance; and if that point was urged, at the ſame time with the further innovations in religion, it would poſſibly occaſion a general revolt and inſurrection. The queen had ſome time before deſired pope Julius III. to reconcile herſelf and her kingdoms to the holy ſee; and requeſted that cardinal Pole might be appointed legate for the performance of that pious office. The nomination of Pole to perform this ceremony was not agreeable either to the emperor or Gardiner. The cardinal, though more ſincere in his religious opinions, was leſs guided by maxims of civil policy than the Engliſh prelate. Pole was therefore ſtopped by order of the emperor at Dillinghen, a town on the Danube, and Charles afterwards obtained Mary's conſent for this detention.

But however cogent the reaſons of Gardiner might be with regard to ſuſpending the eccleſiaſtical innovations, they were not ſufficient to reſtrain the furious zeal of Mary; ſhe cauſed the new ſtatutes to be carried into execution with the utmoſt rigour. The maſs was univerſally reſtored. Celebacy was exacted of the prieſthood, and vaſt numbers of the clergy were deprived of their benefices, for having availed themſelves of the indulgences of their late beloved monarch. A viſitation was appointed in order to reſtore more perfectly the ancient rites. The viſitors were enjoined to forbid the oath of ſupremacy from being taken by the clergy on their promotion to any benefice; notwithſtanding the laws of Henry VIII. were ſtill in force. So contradictory are generally the actions of bigotted enthuſiaſm.

A. D. 1554. The Spaniſh marriage was at laſt concluded, and that it might give as little diſguſt as poſſible, the articles were drawn up very favourable and even advantageous to England. It was agreed, that though Philip ſhould have the title of king, the adminiſtration ſhould be ſolely in the hands of the queen; that no foreigner ſhould be capable of enjoying any office in the kingdom; that no innovation ſhould be made in the Engliſh laws, cuſtoms, or privileges; that Philip ſhould not carry the queen abroad without her conſent, nor any of her children without the conſent of the nobility; that ſixty thouſands pounds a year ſhould be ſettled on her as a jointure; that the male iſſue of the marriage ſhould inherit together with England, both Burgundy and the Low Countries; and that, if Don Carlos, Philip's ſon by his former marriage, ſhould die, and his line be extinct, the queen's iſſue, whether male or female, ſhould inherit Spain, Sicily, Milan, and all the other dominions of Philip.

The publication of theſe articles, inſtead of pleaſing the Engliſh occaſioned a general diſcontent. They diſtruſted, with reaſon, the artful emperor, and ſtill more his ſon, who was equally inclined to ſuperſtition and tyranny. They were ſhocked with the idea of thoſe barbarities which had torn in pieces the old and new worlds. The inquiſition diſplayed itſelf in all its horrors; and the moſt ſpecious advantages ſeemed only intended to veil the moſt hideous ſlavery. The ſpirit of revolt ſpread itſelf through the kingdom, and the people ſeemed determined to maintain their independence or periſh in the attempt.

Sir Thomas Wyat, a Kentiſh gentleman, very conſiderable on account of his ample fortune, and ſtill more ſo by the opinion the world entertained of his virtues and abilities, engaged to arm the inhabitants of Kent, while Sir Peter Carew, a gentleman of great intereſt in the weſt of England, undertook to aſſemble the inhabitants of Devonſhire. The duke of Suffolk alſo engaged in this inſurrection, and promiſed to raiſe the Midland counties. Carew, prompted either by his impetuoſity or his apprehenſions, took up arms before the day appointed. In conſequence of this raſh action, his troops were ſoon diſperſed by a body of the queen's forces, and he himſelf obliged to take refuge in France. Suffolk was more unfortunate; he was diſappointed in his hopes of raiſing the inhabitants of the Midland parts of the kingdom, committed himſelf to the care of a ſervant, who betrayed him to the earl of Huntingdon, and he was ſent a priſoner to London.

Wyat was at firſt ſucceſsful. He ſummoned his friends to meet him in the field on the twenty-fifth of January, and was immediately joined by Sir Henry Iſley, Sir George Harper, the two Knevets, Sir Thomas Colepepper, the two ſons of lord Cobham, and many other gentlemen of diſtinction in Kent. Proper perſons were immediately diſpatched into different parts of the county, to riſe the people, while he himſelf, with ſome of his principal followers, retired to Rocheſter, took poſſeſſion of the bridge, and fortified the eaſtern part of the city, which he intended as a rendezvous for his army. At the ſame time he ordered a maniſeſto to be publiſhed at Maidſtone, and other places, againſt the queen's marriage, and invited every well wiſher to his country to join him in his endeavours to defend England from the inſolent and tyrannical government of a haughty foreigner. The people were ſoon alarmed at their danger, and flocked to Wyat's ſtandard in conſiderable numbers.

This rebellion threw the queen and her council into great conſternation. They were incapable of making any vigorous efforts againſt the force of a diſcontented people. The inclemency of the ſeaſon rendered it very difficult to raiſe a number of forces, and thoſe that had been collected to eſcort Mary to the capital, were diſbanded. It was therefore determined to ſend an herald to Wyat, with aſſurance of a full pardon; but the herald not being ſuffered to deliver his meſſage, the duke of Norfolk was diſpatched againſt the rebels, at the head of ſix hundred of the trained-bands, and the queen's guards. The two parties ſoon met, but the very inſtant the duke's artillery began to play, the Londoners deſerted and joined the inſurgents. This treacherous action threw the duke into the utmoſt conſternation. The ranks of his little army were thrown into confuſion, and it was with great difficulty that he himſelf and Sir Henry Jernegan, captain of the queen's guards, were ſaved by a precipitate flight. Thus the rebels, without ſtriking a blow, became maſters of the field, the duke's baggage, and eight pieces of braſs cannon.

Animated by this ſucceſs, Wyat led his army towards the capital, perſuaded that the Londoners would open their gates, and declare in his favour. At Dartford he was met by lord Haſtings and Sir Thomas Cornwallis, who promiſed him, in the queen's name, every reaſonable ſatiſfaction he ſhould require. This conceſſion raiſed the preſumption of Wyat; he now thought himſelf invincible, and had the inſolence to demand poſſeſſion of the tower, and of the queen's perſon, with authority to change the council at his pleaſure. Haſtings could not bear to hear ſuch ſhameful conditions with any degree of patience; he defied Wyat, and returned immediately with Cornwallis to court.

The demands of Wyat increaſed the conſternation of the council. The queen repaired to Guildhall, acquainted the citizens with the inſolent anſwer of the rebels, aſſerted ſhe had done nothing in the marriage treaty, without the advice of her council, and declared her reſolution to throw herſelf upon the protection of the faithful city of London. Pleaſed with this condeſcenſion in their ſovereign, the citizens reſolved to oppoſe the rebels. They ordered the bridge to be ſtrongly barricadoed, and every precaution to be taken that had any tendence to render the efforts of the inſurgents abortive, ſhould they attempt to force a paſſage into the city.

Wyat, who was ignorant of theſe reſolutions, advanced as far as Southwark, in order to croſs over the bridge into the city; but finding it would be difficult, if not impoſſible to force a paſſage, he determined to croſs the Thames at Kingſton; but found on his arrival, that the bridge was broken down. This obliged him to halt ſome time till the bridge was repaired. By theſe delays, the critical ſeaſon, on which all popular commotions depend, was entirely loſt. He entered Weſtminſter indeed without reſiſtance; but no perſon of note joining him, his men became diſpirited, and inſenſibly forſook their leader, who was at laſt taken priſoner near Temple-bar by Sir Maurice Berkley. The principal leaders were alſo taken, and the ſcene cloſed with the moſt bloody executions. Above ſeventy perſons ſuffered for this rebellion. It had been induſtriouſly reported, that Wyat on his examination, had accuſed the princeſs Elizabeth and the earl of Devonſhire, as accomplices in this inſurrection. But Wyat took occaſion to declare on the ſcaffold, before all the people, that they had no ſhare whatever in his rebellion.

Several attempts had been made to accuſe the princeſs Elizabeth of ſome deſign againſt the peace of the government, and ſhe was in the utmoſt danger of falling a ſacrifice to the malevolence of her ſiſter. Her being the daughter of Anne Boleyn, her attracting, by her ſuperior qualities, the regard of the nation, and her engaging the affections of Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, who was allied to the crown, and on whom the queen had matrimonial views, were crimes which the gloomy ſoul of Mary could never forgive. She was ſhut up in the Tower, and all acceſs to her denied. But the declaration made by Wyat rendered it impoſſible to prove any thing againſt her; and ſhe made ſo good a defence before the council, that there was not a ſingle pretence left for keeping her in confinement. She was therefore reſtored to her liberty; but on refuſing an offer of marriage made her by the duke of Savoy, ſhe was again committed to cuſtody, under a ſtrong guard, at Woodſtock. The earl of Devonſhire experienced the ſame ungenerous treatment: he was equally innocent with the princeſs; nothing could be proved againſt him; but he was committed priſoner to Fotheringay caſtle.

Mary, who was incapable of generoſity, and to whom the virtue of clemency was unknown, determined to remove every perſon from whom the leaſt danger might be apprehended. Lady Jane Gray and her huſband had languiſhed in priſon ever ſince the queen's acceſſion, and it was now determined to finiſh the diſmal tragedy. Fakenham, abbot of Weſtminſter, was ſent to the Tower to denounce the fatal meſſage. Lady Jane received the tidings of death with great compoſure: ſhe had long expected it; and the innocence of her life, as well as the long train of calamities ſhe had ſuffered, rendered the paſſage through the valley of the ſhadow of death not unwelcome. During three days, the Romiſh prieſts were perpetually diſturbing her with religious controverſies; but even in theſe melancholy circumſtances, lady Jane had preſence of mind ſufficient to baffle all their attempts: ſhe defended the tenets of the Reformation with great learning and eloquence. She alſo wrote a letter, in the Greek language, to her ſiſter Catherine, exhorting her to maintain, in every circumſtance of life, a like ſteady perſeverance. On the morning of her execution, her huſband deſired permiſſion to ſee her, but ſhe refuſed her conſent: ſhe feared the tenderneſs of a parting interview would overcome the fortitude of both, and render them incapable of finiſhing the period of life with that conſtancy which was neceſſary in their melancholy circumſtances. "Our ſeparation (ſaid ſhe) will only be for a moment; we ſhall ſoon rejoin each other in the regions above, where our affections will be for ever united, and where the ſtorms of adverſity, and even death itſelf, can never afflict us more." She beheld, from the window of her priſon, with ſteadineſs and compoſure, her huſband carried to execution, and his headleſs trunk brought back to the Tower. And being informed that he met death with great tranquillity, ſhe expreſſed an eagerneſs to follow him.

It was at firſt intended to have executed them both on the ſame ſcaffold erected on Tower-hill; but the council fearing that the compaſſion of the people, ariſing from their youth, beauty, innocence, and noble birth, might excite ſome dangerous commotion, it was thought proper to alter the reſolution, and orders were accordingly iſſued that lady Jane ſhould be executed within the walls of the Tower. When ſhe entered the ſcaffold, Sir John Gage, conſtable of the Tower, begged her to beſtow on him ſome ſmall preſent, which he might keep in perpetual remembrance of her. She gave him her table-book, wherein ſhe had juſt written three ſentences on ſeeing her huſband's dead body; one in Greek, one in Latin, and the other in Engliſh. At the moment of execution, without complaining of any one, ſhe acknowledged that her puniſhment was juſt, for having, though contrary to her own inclinations, ſubmitted to become the inſtrument of the ambition of others. She added, that her example might be of ſome uſe to poſterity; and teach the world, that without perſonal guilt, we may be juſtly puniſhed for circumſtances which tend to the prejudice of the ſtate. Thus fell, in the bloom of life, the lady Jane Gray, whoſe innocence merited a much better fate. She was only in the ſeventeenth year of her age; but her beauty, ſpirit, ſenſe, and virtue, did honour to her country; and her happineſs, had ſhe been left to the indulgence of her own ſtudious inclinations, would have been more to be envied than that of princes: but the fatal ambition of her family cropt the lovely flower before it was expanded in its full luſtre.

The duke of Suffolk was ſoon after tried and executed. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton was alſo impeached, but owed his deliverance to the amazing ſpirit and abilities he diſcovered on his trial. He challenged the court to bring proof of any one overt-act of the treaſon of which he was indicted; and no poſitive proof being produced, he was acquitted by his jury. But ſo great was the power of the judge, and ſo malignant the ſpirit of the miniſtry, that the jury, for daring to obey the dictates of their own conſciences, were proſecuted, and ſeverely fined. John Throgmorton experienced the effect which ſuch ſevere and deſpotic proceedings produce on the human mind. Though equally innocent, he was condemned on the ſame proofs which were thought ſo weak in the caſe of his brother.

By theſe perverſions of law and juſtice, the government became every day more odious; and it was thought neceſſary to diſarm the people, to prevent inſurrections. In the mean time, the queen ſummoned a parliament; and Gardiner, who had received vaſt remittances from the emperor, employed the money in corrupting the members to a degree till that time unprecedented in England. The biſhop, as chancellor, opened the ſeſſion in a ſpeech; in which he maintained the queen's hereditary title to the crown; affirmed ſhe had a right to chuſe a huſband for herſelf; obſerved the good uſe ſhe had made of that right, by preferring an old ally, ſprung from the houſe of Burgundy; mentioned the poſterity of Henry VIII. of whom there were now ſurviving but the queen and the lady Elizabeth; and added, that in order to prevent the calamities which might reſult from the claims of different pretenders to the crown, it would be neceſſary to grant the queen a power of naming her ſucceſſor; a power, ſaid he, which ought not to be conſidered as a new thing in England, becauſe it had been formerly beſtowed on Henry VIII.

The parliament were ſufficiently inclined to gratify the queen in all her reaſonable deſires: but when the liberty, the independence, and even the very being of the nation, were expoſed to ſuch imminent danger, they could not by any means be perſuaded to comply. They were no ſtrangers to the inveterate hatred the queen bore to the lady Elizabeth, nor to her ſtrong attachment to the houſe of Auſtria. They remembered her bigotry and ſuperſtition, which prompted her to prefer the eſtabliſhment of the Catholic religion to all conſiderations of juſtice and national intereſt. They obſerved that Gardiner, in his ſpeech, had carefully avoided giving Elizabeth the title of the queen's ſiſter, and thence inferred, that a deſign was formed of declaring her illegitimate. They apprehended, that Mary, if inveſted with the power ſhe demanded, would bequeath the crown to her huſband, and, by that means, render England a province of the Spaniſh monarchy. They were the more inclined to entertain theſe ſuſpicions, when they heard that Philip's deſcent from the houſe of Lancaſter was carefully traced and explained, and that he was repreſented as the true and only heir by right of inheritance.

Convinced of their danger, and determined never to part with their independence, the parliament reſolved ſolved not to intruſt the queen with the power ſhe demanded. They ſaw the precipice, and were deſirous of keeping at a ſecure diſtance from its brink. They could not refuſe confirming the articles of the marriage, becauſe they were extremely advantageous to England; but they abſolutely refuſed to agree to any ſuch law as was recommended by the chancellor. They would not even declare it treaſon to attempt the death of the queen's huſband while ſhe was alive; and a bill being brought in for that purpoſe, it was rejected at its firſt reading. At the ſame time, in order to deprive Philip of all hopes of ever being able to exerciſe any authority in England, they enacted a law, by which it was declared, "That her majeſty, as their only queen, ſhould ſolely, and as ſole queen, enjoy the crown and ſovereignty of her realms, with all the pre-eminences, dignities, and rights thereto belonging, in as large and ample a manner after her marriage as before, without any title or claim accruing to the prince of Spain, either as tenant by courteſy of the realm, or by any other means."

Nor was the ſpirit of the parliament, notwithſtanding all the corrupt practices of Gardiner, confined to the queen's marriage: they oppoſed the meaſures of the court in other inſtances. Bills were brought in for ſuppreſſing the many dangerous and erroneous opinions contained in books publiſhed by the reformers; for reviving the ſtatute of the ſix articles; with thoſe againſt the Lollards, and thoſe againſt hereſy and erroneous preaching; but they were all thrown out by the Commons. A ſufficient proof, that however inclinable the parliament might be to gratify the court in ſome points, they were yet determined to follow their own judgment in others. Provoked at theſe repeated oppoſitions, Mary thought proper to diſſolve the parliament.

Philip was not in haſte to embark for England; and the queen, conſumed by impatience, expected him with a degree of anxiety that affected her health. At length he arrived at Southampton on the nineteenth of July. Philip, on his firſt landing, drew his ſword, and carried it for ſome time naked in his hand; and when the magiſtrates preſented him with the keys of their town, he received them without ſpeaking a ſingle word. The queen met the prince at Wincheſter, where the marriage ceremony was performed, with great pomp and ſplendor, by biſhop Gardiner. Philip was not formed to attract the affection of the Engliſh: his cold, reſerved, imperious air, and the vexatious ceremony, that, in a manner, cut off all acceſs to his perſon, rendered him obnoxious to the people. Mary, however, loved him, even for the ſame qualities that acquired him the hatred of others. The only way to Philip's heart was to gratify his ambition.

Gardiner had been ſome time employed in influencing the elections for members to ſerve in the enſuing parliament. No endeavours to obtain this neceſſary acquiſition were neglected: bribery, corruption, promiſes and menaces, were employed by the chancellor's emiſſaries. By theſe meaſures, a parliament was ſecured, that were ready to ſignalize their zeal for the Romiſh church, whenever the court thought it neceſſary to introduce any bill for that purpoſe. At their meeting, the king and queen rode together on horſeback, in their robes, to the parliament-houſe, two ſwords of ſtate and two caps of maintenance being borne before them. The firſt act of the ſenate was to ſecure the admiſſion of cardinal Pole, inveſted with the dignity of legate; and in order to this, the late act of attainder paſſed againſt him was annulled; and the queen, by her prerogative, diſpenſing with long eſtabliſhed ſtatutes, he was empowered to act in his office of legation. On his arrival at London, he exhorted the parliament to be reconciled to the holy ſee: upon which the two houſes expreſſed their regret at being ſeparated from the Church, and their reſolution to annihilate every thing that ſchiſm had attempted againſt it. They requeſted abſolution in the moſt humble manner. This the cardinal readily granted; and, in the name of the ſovereign pontiff, removed all cenſures. It was with equal ſurprize and joy that Julius III. received this important intelligence. But the ſubmiſſion would never have been made by the nobility who were in poſſeſſion of the church-lands, had not meaſures been prudently taken to aſſure them that their eſtates ſhould not be taken from them. The parliament accordingly confirmed their poſſeſſion; and they, in return, did not heſitate to come into all the meaſures of the court: they readily ſacrificed their liberty, and the exerciſe of their reaſon, at the altar of ſuperſtitious bigotry: they ſhewed the utmoſt indifference with regard to religion, or even the lives of their fellow-ſubjects; and renewed the old ſanguinary laws againſt heretics which had been aboliſhed in the reign of Edward VI. and once more lighted up the piles for conſuming all who thought differently from the Roman church. Such, however, was their rooted averſion to Spain, that though the queen laboured with the utmoſt aſſiduity to procure her huſband to be declared preſumptive heir to the crown, and inveſted with the adminiſtration of public affairs, ſhe failed in both attempts: ſhe could not even prevail upon the parliament to agree to his coronation, nor obtain from the Commons a ſubſidy for aſſiſting the emperor in his war againſt France.

Conſcious of the general odium under which he laboured, Philip altered his conduct, and endeavoured to obtain the favour of the public by procuring the enlargement of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, who had been confined in conſequence of the jealouſy or reſentment of the court; but nothing was more acceptable to the nation than his protecting the lady Elizabeth from the malice and cruelty of her ſiſter, and obtaining for her the enjoyment of her liberty. He well knew, that if this princeſs fell a ſacrifice to the malevolent diſpoſition of the queen, Mary Stuart, queen of Scots, and wife to the dauphin of France, was the next in the order of ſucceſſion, and conſequently, that England would be annexed to that crown. To prevent an incident of ſuch importance to his own tranquillity, Philip affected a generoſity little conſiſtent with his real character.

A. D. 1555. But even thoſe acts of clemency could not procure him the favour of the Commons; they firmly refuſed to grant him any power in the adminiſtration; and the queen perceiving that it would be in vain to make any farther attempts, diſſolved the parliament. A ſplendid embaſſy was ſoon after ſent to Rome, to inform his holineſs of all that had been tranſacted in the Engliſh parliament; and to make tenders of ſubmiſſion to the holy ſee in the name of the king, queen, and three eſtates of England. But before their arrival, Julius III. was dead, and St. Peter's chair filled by Paul IV. a proud, haughty, inſolent eccleſiaſtic. He was ſo far from receiving the Engliſh ambaſſadors with that kindneſs they had reaſon to expect, that he refuſed to give them audience, becauſe Mary had ſtiled herſelf queen of Ireland, as well as England; a title which neither herſelf, nor any of her predeceſſors, had received from the holy ſee. In conſequence of this, they were obliged to wait till a bull was expedited for inveſting Mary with that title, and then they were admitted to an audience. The pope appeared aſtoniſhed when the ambaſſadors expreſſed their hopes that he would confirm to the laity the poſſeſſion of the church-lands. He blamed Pole for exceeding his commiſſion; and wondered how any perſon could preſume to harbour a thought, that he would grant any confirmation to acts in themſelves iniquitous and ſacrilegious. He even iſſued a bull, denouncing the ſevereſt anathemas upon all who ſhould with-hold from the church, or the religious orders, any part of their property. He alſo demanded Peter-pence, which had been ſo long aboliſhed. The nobility heard of theſe determinations of the pontiff without emotion: the thunder of the Vatican had loſt its force in England, except among a few enthuſiaſtic bigots who ſtill trembled at the threatenings of the holy father. Among theſe was the queen herſelf, who, notwithſtanding the meaſures purſued at the commencement of her reign, thought herſelf obliged to give up ſuch church-lands as remained in her poſſeſſion, and to found new monaſteries till the treaſury was exhauſted. It was in vain that the council repreſented to her the intereſt of her crown; "I prefer (ſaid ſhe) the ſalvation of my ſoul to ten ſuch kingdoms as England."

In the mean time, the miniſtry was chiefly engaged in conſulting the methods proper to be purſued for re-eſtabliſhing the ancient religion. Cardinal Pole, and biſhop Gardiner, were the two churchmen moſt in favour, and between theſe a very important queſtion was frequently debated before the queen and council, namely, Whether the laws lately revived againſt heretics ſhould be executed in their full extent and rigour, or ſhould only be employed to prevent the reformers from making any farther innovations. Pole, ſincerely attached to the Catholic faith, and virtuous from principle, was for moderation and indulgence. Gardiner, who had politically complied with all the caprices of Henry VIII. and who would have been equally complaiſant to his ſucceſſor, had he not been driven to extremities, a zealot from intereſt, indifferent by principle, was for violence and puniſhment. The legate maintained, that nothing could be more contradictory to the ſpirit of Chriſtianity than religious perſecutions; that while they puniſh an error as a crime, they overturn at once ſociety and its laws: at the ſame time, they give the moſt convincing reaſon to ſuſpect, that thoſe who employ them are by no means convinced of the truth of the doctrines they are ſollicitous to eſtabliſh, becauſe they ſeem afraid of ſubmitting their cauſe to be decided by fair and impartial argument. He added, that ſuch treatment could only make hypocrites, or, what is ſtill worſe, outrageous fanatics; and that experience had ſufficiently proved, that inſtead of producing uniformity in religion, it uſually increaſes the progreſs of hereſy, by irritating the zeal of ſectaries, who gain proſelytes by the exemplary patience of their martyred brethren. On the other hand, a prudent indulgence extinguiſhes the zeal of ſects, prevents the ſpirit of cavilling and revolting; the attachment to any particular tenets gradually decays; the common occupations and pleaſures of life ſucceed to the acrimony of diſputation; and the ſame perſon who would before have ſet flames and tortures at defiance, is engaged to change his religion from the ſmalleſt proſpect of favour and advancement, or even from the frivolous hopes of becoming more faſhionable in his principles.

Gardiner oppoſed theſe arguments urged by the legate with reaſons more adapted to the gloomy, malevolent mind of the queen and her huſband. He aſſerted, that this political conduct had nothing to do with religion. "If the Divinity (ſaid the chancellor) has thought proper to reveal certain principles to mankind, it is ridiculous to ſuppoſe that he has not given a criterion by which they may be aſcertained; and a prince who knowingly allows theſe principles to be perverted or adulterated, is infinitely more criminal than if he gave permiſſion to the vending poiſon, under the form of bread, to his ſubjects. No human motive can ſtand in competition with the cauſe of heaven. The more ſevere the puniſhment, the ſooner hereſy will expire, and the more effectually will the public utility be conſulted. Have not even the Proteſtants themſelves made uſe of the ſame puniſhments? Did not Calvin cauſe Servetus to be burnt at Geneva? And did not Cranmer bring Arians and Anabaptiſts to the ſtake? If terror makes hypocrites, children at leaſt, who are brought up in orthodox principles, will not imitate the hypocriſy of their fathers; they will preſerve the precious pledge of faith, though obtained, perhaps, by the diſſimulation of their parents."

Theſe reaſons, however inconcluſive in themſelves, were adopted by the bigotted Mary; but willing, at the ſame time, to pay ſome regard to the counſels of Pole, ſhe ordered him to take upon himſelf the reformation of the clergy, and charged Gardiner with the work of extirpating the Proteſtant religion. It was now determined to execute the laws againſt hereſy in their full force; and England was ſoon filled with ſcenes of horror, which has ever ſince rendered the Catholic religion the object of general deteſtation. We could wiſh, indeed, for the honour of humanity, that the mantle of oblivion could be drawn over theſe deteſtable actions; but the pen of hiſtory muſt not diſſemble the exceſſes and dreadful conſequences of bigotted zeal. The horrid ſcenes which muſt be diſplayed furniſh an important, though a melancholy, leſſon to mankind.

The two firſt victims of religious fury were Hooper, biſhop of Glouceſter, and Rogers, a prebendary of St. Paul's; both eminent for their learning, their piety, and their virtue. But Gardiner's plan was firſt to attack men of that character; vainly imagining, that terror would force them to ſubmiſſion; and that their example, either of puniſhment or recantation, would naturally influence the multitude. Rogers had preſerved the life of Bourne, the popiſh preacher at St. Paul's, at the hazard of his own; and therefore deſerved ſome favour at the hands of Gardiner, who was no ſtranger to that circumſtance: but no regard was ſhewn to this eminent preacher; the dictates of juſtice and humanity had loſt their force. Rogers was even denied the favour of ſeeing his wife and children, whom he tenderly loved. But this denial could not ſhake his conſtancy: the ties of nature gave way to the influence of religion; and he went with chearfulneſs to the ſtake, and periſhed in the flames with unſhaken conſtancy.

Hooper behaved with all the fortitude of a primitive martyr, and ſhewed a noble contempt for all the inſults he received. He was tried with Rogers in London, but ſent down to his own dioceſe to be executed. This circumſtance, which was contrived to ſtrike a greater terror into his flock, was a ſource of ſatisfaction to Hooper, who ſincerely rejoiced in having an opportunity of giving teſtimony, by his death, to the doctrine he had formerly inculcated from the pulpit. When he was faſtened to the ſtake, a ſtool was placed before him, and the queen's pardon laid upon it, and which it was ſtill in his power to merit by his recantation. But life, on ſuch conditions, was deſpiſed: he ordered it to be removed, and chearfully prepared himſelf to ſuffer the ſentence pronounced againſt him by his enemies. His death was attended with every circumſtance that could heighten its ſeverity. The wind, which was very ſtrong, blew the flames of the reeds from his body; the faggots were green, and did not eaſily take fire; all his lower parts were conſumed before his vitals were affected; one arm dropped off, while he continued to beat his breaſt with the other. He was heard to pray, and exhort the people to adhere to their religion, until his tongue, ſwoln with the violence of the agony, ſtopped his ſpeech. He was full three quarters of an hour in torture, but bore the whole with a conſtancy that was truly aſtoniſhing.

About the ſame time, Mr. Laurence Saunders, miniſter of Allhallows, Bread-ſtreet; and Mr. Rowland Taylor, rector of Hadley, in Suffolk, were delivered over to the ſecular arm, and ſealed the truth of the doctrines they had taught with their blood. Saunders ſuffered at Coventry, and was alſo indulged with the offer of a pardon; but he rejected it with diſdain, and embraced the ſtake, crying out, "I ſalute thee, O croſs of Jeſus Chriſt, O life eternal!" Taylor was executed among his ancient friends and pariſhioners; and repeated, in the midſt of the flames, a pſalm in Engliſh. On which one of the guards ſtruck him on the mouth, and bid him pray in Latin. Another, ſtill more violent, ſtruck him on the head with his halbert, and the blow put a period to his life.

Theſe inhuman executions, merely for the ſake of opinion, enflamed the nation, and Gardiner began to be under apprehenſions for his ſafety. Perhaps the dictates of conſcience, or the ſoft whiſpers of humanity, might alſo have ſome place in cauſing him to wiſh he had never engaged as a principal in theſe barbarous executions. But however that be, he refuſed to act any longer, and devolved his odious commiſſion on Bonner, biſhop of London; a man of the moſt profligate and abandoned morals, and, at the ſame time, of ſo ſavage and cruel a diſpoſition, that he ſeemed to delight in the torments of thoſe unfortunate perſons whom his iniquitous ſentences committed to the flames.

The retreat of Gardiner did not, however, abate the fury of perſecution. Human nature appears not, on any occaſion, ſo deteſtable, and, at the ſame time, ſo abſurd, as in theſe religious perſecutions, which ſink men below infernal ſpirits in wickedneſs, and below the beaſts in folly. It would be uſeleſs to multiply inſtances of this kind; the ſavage barbarity on the one hand, and the patient conſtancy on the other, are ſimilar in all. A few more will, therefore, be abundantly ſufficient.

Ferrar, biſhop of St. David's, was burnt at Caermarthen. He appealed to cardinal Pole, but it was not regarded, and he received the crown of martyrdom. Ridley, biſhop of London, and Latimer, the old biſhop of Worceſter, were burnt at Oxford. They were both celebrated for their learning and virtue, and both periſhed in the ſame flames. They mutually exhorted each other to patience; and, when faſtened to the ſtake, Latimer cried out, "Courage, my brother! we ſhall this day kindle ſuch a torch in England, as, I truſt in God, ſhall never be extinguiſhed." Thomas Hawkes, when bound to the ſtake, told his friends, that if he found the torture ſupportable, he would give them a ſign, and failed not to do it. His zeal for the cauſe in which he ſuffered ſo amazingly ſupported him, that he ſtretched out his hands, the ſignal agreed upon, and in that poſture expired.

The paſſion for martyrdom, infuſed by theſe examples, communicated itſelf to the young as well as to the old, and even to women. One of the ſex, whom they executed, was pregnant, and near the time of her delivery when ſhe ſuffered. The excruciating tortures excited the pains of labour, and ſhe was delivered in the midſt of the flames. One of the guards, more merciful than the reſt, ſnatched the helpleſs infant from the fire; but a barbarous magiſtrate commanded it to be thrown back into the flames, ſaying, that the offspring of an heretical parent ſhould not be ſuffered to live.

Theſe unhappy people, though condemned to tortures ſhocking to humanity, were not always convicted of having inculcated tenets contrary to the eſtabliſhed religion: they were taken up merely on ſuſpicion, and condemned on refuſing to ſign certain articles. Hence they excited the concern and admiration of their own party, and a general hatred againſt the government. Philip perceived the whole nation was agitated; and, by an artifice ſuitable to his character, endeavoured to throw the whole odium of theſe barbarities on the Engliſh biſhops. He ordered friar Alphonſo, his confeſſor, to diſclaim theſe ſanguinary proceedings from the pulpit. The eccleſiaſtic obeyed; and, in a ſermon preached before their majeſties, he exclaimed againſt all religious perſecution, and accuſed the biſhops of all the barbarities that had been inflicted on the Proteſtants. Alarmed at this charge, Bonner himſelf refuſed to be any longer concerned in ſuch ſanguinary proceedings, unleſs others, as well as himſelf, were involved in the odium. The fires of perſecution ceaſed for a time, and repeated orders were ſent from the council to quicken their diligence. At laſt the court threw off the cloak of diſſimulation, and acted in an open manner. A kind of inquiſition was eſtabliſhed, by appointing commiſſioners to take an exact account of all hereſies; to puniſh all neglects of the Catholic worſhip in churches and chapels; to proceed againſt the clergy who did not preach the doctrine of the euchariſt; to puniſh every perſon who did not hear maſs, who did not aſſiſt at the ſervice of the church, who did not receive the euchariſt, or uſe the holy water. The juſtices of the peace were ordered to appoint ſpies over the conduct of the people: to ſummon the accuſed, without diſcovering the accuſer, and to put to the torture ſuch obſtinate perſons who would not confeſs. Nor did the tyranny of the court terminate here; a proclamation was iſſued, commanding all who were poſſeſſed of heretical books, to burn them without reading or ſhewing them to others: and declaring that all who refuſed to pay an implicit obedience to theſe orders ſhould be deemed rebels, and executed immediately by martial law.

England was now reduced to a more deplorable condition than ever Spain itſelf, where the inquiſition is eſtabliſhed with all its horrors. But ſtill the proteſtants ſupported their tenets with aſtoniſhing reſolution, and the doctrines of the reformation increaſed ſurprizingly amidſt theſe complicated ſcenes of horror and diſtreſs. The iron rod of tyranny was diſplayed in vain; every martyrdom was equivalent to a thouſand ſermons againſt popery; and the aſhes of the ſufferer, like ſeed diſſeminated in a fertile ſoil, produced an hundred fold. The proteſtants were far more numerous at the cloſe, than in the beginning of this bloody reign, though it is computed, that in the ſpace of three years, no leſs than two hundred and ſeventy-ſeven perſons were burnt for hereſy, among whom were five biſhops, twenty-one clergymen, eight gentlemen, eighty-four tradeſmen, one hundred huſbandmen, ſervants, and labourers, fifty-five women and four children.

The execution of archbiſhop Cranmer, filled up the meaſure of iniquity in this atrocious reign. He had been long confined in priſon, and it was now determined to puniſh him as a heretic. He was tried before Brooks, biſhop of Glouceſter, a commiſſioner from the pope. Dr. Martin and Dr. Godwin, accuſed him of being twice married, of keeping a wife ſecretly in the reign of Henry VIII. and openly in the reign of his ſucceſſor; of publiſhing books againſt, and forſaking the doctrines of the Roman church; and of denying the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament. He owned the facts, and they cited him to appear before the pope in eight days, though they knew it was impoſſible, as he was then their priſoner. He was, however, on not appearing, condemned as contumacious. Bonner, biſhop of London, and Thirley, biſhop of Ely, were ſent down to Oxford to degrade him. The former performed his office with his uſual inſolence, uſing the moſt bitter railleries and invectives againſt the priſoner, during the ceremony, while Thirleby melted into tears. The primate's behaviour was uniform and becoming his unfortunate circumſtances. He ſaid he was not ſorry to be thus cut off with all his pageantry from his relation to the ſee of Rome; but thought it great injuſtice to condemn him for not going to that capital, when they kept him cloſe confined in priſon. At the ſame time he denied the pope's authority over him, and appealed from his ſentence to a free general council.

Though the queen was ſatisfied that Cranmer would periſh eternally, ſhe was deſirous of augmenting the weight of his misfortune, by ruining his honour and conſigning his name over to infamy. Perſons were accordingly employed to attack him, not by reaſon and argument, againſt which they knew he was too well prepared, but by the moſt artful flattery, inſinuation, and addreſs. They diſplayed before him, in the moſt faireſt point of light, the dignities and honours to which his character ſtill entitled him, if he would merit them by a recantation: they flattered him with long enjoying theſe powerful friends whom his humanity and beneficence had procured him during the courſe of his proſperity; and the great advantages that might yet reſult to ſociety by his labours. Theſe inſinuations ſhook the firmneſs of the primate, who influenced by that love of life ſo deeply engraven in the human heart, and terrified at the proſpect of thoſe dreadful tortures he was condemned to ſuffer, permitted, in an unguarded hour, the feelings of nature to over power his reſolution; he agreed to ſign a paper, acknowledging the doctrines of the papal ſupremacy, and the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament. The queen, whoſe perfidy was exceeded only by her cruelty, reſolved that this recantation ſhould not ſave his life. She ſent orders that he ſhould acknowledge his errors in the church before the whole congregation, and thence be led immediately to execution.

But the malevolence of Mary was for once diſappointed. Cranmer had now reſumed his proper dignity, had ſincerely repented of his weakneſs and apoſtacy, and determined, inſtead of the declaration they expected, to ſpeak the real ſentiments of his heart without diſguiſe. He accordingly began his addreſs to the audience with obſerving, that he was ſufficiently acquainted with the obedience he owed to his ſovereign, and the laws of his country; but this duty extended no farther than to ſubmit patiently to their commands, and to bear, without reſiſtance, whatever puniſhment they might inflict upon him; that a ſuperior duty, the duty which he owed his Maker, obliged him to maintain the truth on all occaſions, and not to abandon, by a baſe denial, the holy doctrine which the Supreme Being had imparted to mankind; that there was one error in his life, which, above all others, filled him with the moſt unfeigned ſorrow and repentance, the inſincere declaration of faith to which he had unhappily been induced to agree, and which nothing but the fear of death could have extorted from him; that he chearfully embraced the preſent opportunity of atoning for his crime, by a ſincere and open recantation; and was willing to ſeal with his blood that doctrine which he verily believed to be revealed from heaven; and that as his hand had erred in betraying his heart, it ſhould firſt be puniſhed, and by a ſevere, but juſt ſentence, firſt expiate the guilt of that crime which it had been the inſtrument of committing.

Exaſperated at their diſappointment, his enemies dragged him from the church, and conducted him to the ſtake amidſt the ſhouts and inſults of the catholics. But having now collected the whole force and vigour of his mind, he bore their ſcorn, as well as the torture of his puniſhment, with ſurprizing courage: he ſtretched out his right-hand, and without diſcovering the leaſt ſign of weakneſs, or even of feeling, held it in the flames till it dropt off. His mind ſeemed to be wholly poſſeſſed with reflecting on his former fault, and he was heard to exclaim ſeveral times, "This unworthy hand has offended." Satiſfied with that atonement, he re-aſſumed a wonderful compoſure and ſerenity of countenance: and when the fire ſurrounded his body, he ſeemed to be entirely inſenſible of all his outward ſufferings, and by the force of hope and chriſtian fortitude, to have raiſed himſelf above all bodily ſenſations, and to triumph over the fury of the flames. Cranmer was a man of the moſt amiable character; equally diſtinguiſhed by his piety and learning, and poſſeſſed of candour, ſincerity, benevolence, and indeed of almoſt every virtue that could render him the object of public eſteem and veneration. His death was lamented by the ingenuous of all parties; and he is conſidered as the hero of the proteſtant faith. Cardinal Pole ſucceeded him in the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury; and ſincerely diſapproved of the violent meaſures of the court, but wanted power to oppoſe its ſanguinary proceedings.

It is not at all ſurprizing that Mary ſhould be guilty of theſe ſhocking cruelties, as ſhe was almoſt deſtitute of education, extremely bigotted to her own reſolution, and of a gloomy, malevolent diſpoſition; but it is aſtoniſhing, that, conſidering the ſtate of the kingdom at that period, when the number of proteſtants greatly exceeded that of the catholics, ſhe was ſuffered to ſurvive one moment the commiſſion of ſuch horrid barbarities. It was not, however, long before ſhe felt the effect of the public hatred. The miniſtry became extremely unpopular; and every thing bore the marks of diſguſt and averſion. Mary's ill temper was increaſed by ſeveral mortifications. She had flattered herſelf with an imaginary pregnancy; and when ſhe found her miſtake, ſhe fell into a profound melancholy. Philip, diſguſted with a wife who was extremely jealous, without being in any reſpect amiable, made preparations for returning to the continent. The choler which conſumed her, ſhe diſcharged upon the proteſtants, by daily enforcing the perſecutions, and even by expreſſions of rage againſt all her ſubjects, by whom ſhe knew herſelf to be hated.

Philip had received an invitation from the emperor, together with a declaration of his intentions of reſigning to him his dominions. He therefore took this opportunity of retiring to Flanders, and met his father at Bruſſels. Here the emperor inſtructed him in the art of government; and recommended to him the following maxims for his conduct, which Philip took no care to obſerve: "To think himſelf rich, when his ſubjects were ſo; and wiſe when he had wiſe counſellors; to govern his ſubjects rather by love than by fear; to let a ſmall fault paſs unpuniſhed, rather than condemn an innocent perſon; to avoid the curioſity of ſearching into things done in private; to leave the ſecrets of men's hearts and thoughts to God, and the chaſtiſement of interior offences to the divine vengeance; ſince, what the eyes of man could not ſee, it was not fit for their hands to puniſh. Had Charles himſelf directed his conduct by thoſe maxims Germany and the Netherlands had not been deluged with blood, nor Europe been filled with widows and orphans. But the cool reflections of age had now diſcovered to him the emptineſs of his former purſuits; and he found that the vain ſcheme of extending his empire, had been the ſource of endleſs oppoſition and diſappointment, had kept himſelf, his neighbours, and his ſubjects in perpetual inquietude, and had fruſtrated the ſole end of government, the felicity of the nations committed to his care.

The parliament met on the twenty-firſt of October, but with viſible diſcontent at the late proceedings. They indeed confirmed the queen's reſignation of the firſt-fruits and tenths, but were ſo fearful of reſtoring to the clergy an authority ſo odious to the nation, and ſo highly offended at the queen's giving up the church lands, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty they granted a moderate ſupply. Mary therefore ſoon diſſolved a parliament ſhe found ſo untractable. This ſudden change in the temper of the houſe of commons, is, perhaps, with juſtice, attributed to the death of Gardiner, who paid the debt of nature on the twelfth of November. By the death of this prelate, the queen was deprived of her ableſt counſellor, and the only perſon in the miniſtry who had any great authority in the parliament. He was a perſon of a ſelfiſh character; a profound diſſembler, and of a proud, vindictive and cruel diſpoſition. He underſtood the canon and civil law as well as moſt of his time; he wrote latin with eaſe and purity, and few of his cotemporaries excelled him in the knowledge of the Greek language. He is ſaid to have felt ſome remorſe in his laſt moments for the cruel perſecutions he had carried on againſt the proteſtants, and to have exclaimed, "I have ſinned with Peter, but I have not wept with Peter!"

A. D. 1556. The refuſal of the parliament to grant the ſupplies neceſſary for ſatisfying the demands of Philip, ſo highly exaſperated the queen, that ſhe had recourſe to every method in her power to extort money from her people. She levied a loan of ſixty thouſand pounds, upon a thouſand perſons, whom ſhe was aſſured would not refuſe to aſſiſt her; but that ſum being inſufficient to anſwer the end propoſed, ſhe exacted a general loan of an hundred pounds a piece of all perſons poſſeſſed of twenty pounds a year; ſhe extorted ſixty thouſand marks from ſeven thouſand yeomen, who had not contributed to former loans; and exacted ſixty thouſand pounds from the cloth-merchants of London trading to Antwerp, which they refuſed, having advanced her large ſums already. But Mary was determined not to be diſappointed, and having received advice that they had ſhipped great quantities of cloth for Antwerp fair, ſhe ſeized both ſhips and cargo, laying upon them a new ſubſidy of twenty ſhillings for each piece of cloth, by an arbitrary ſtretch of the royal prerogative; nor could they procure this impoſition to be aboliſhed, till they had agreed to advance forty thouſand pounds, and to engage to pay twenty thouſand more in a limited time. All theſe violent and oppreſſive meaſures were purſued at a time when England enjoyed a profound tranquillity, and when Mary herſelf had no other occaſion for money than to ſatisfy the exhorbitant demands of a huſband, who was equally regardleſs of her love and her generoſity, and attended to nothing but his own intereſt.

The power of Philip now roſe to the higheſt pitch by the retreat of Charles V. his father, who, though ſtill in the vigour of his age, had determined to ſeek, in the tranquillity of retirement, that happineſs he had ſo ardently purſued in vain amidſt the tumults of war, and the reſtleſs projects of ambition. He accordingly embarked on board a fleet, ſailed immediately to Spain, and took his journey to St. Juſt, a monaſtery in Eſtramedura, which being ſituated in a happy climate, and amidſt the greateſt beauties of nature, he had choſen for the place where he intended to end his days in ſolitude and contemplation. He was ſoon convinced that the homage he had received, had been paid to his fortune rather than to his perſon. He, however, purſued his deſign with undaunted reſolution, and ſhut himſelf up in his retreat. Being thus ſecluded from the world, he amuſed himſelf in examining the religious controverſies which had ſo much agitated Europe in his reign, and in imitating the works of celebrated mechanics. Among the reſt the conſtruction of clocks and watches engaged his attention, and never being able to make two go in a perfect equality of time, he concluded from thence that it was impoſſible for men to agree exactly in the articles of faith; and that it was unjuſt to puniſh them for their opinions. This concluſion proved, at leaſt, that he had changed his own. Notwithſtanding the ingratitude of his ſon Philip, who no ſooner ſucceeded than he neglected him, he endeavoured to make him maſter of the empire, with all the other vaſt eſtates of the family. But Ferdinand the brother of Charles, who had been elected king of the Romans, would not come into his views; and the houſe of Auſtria was divided into two branches. Paul IV. refuſed to crown Ferdinand, alledging, that though on the death of an emperor he was obliged to crown the prince elected, yet in caſe of a reſignation, the right devolved to the holy ſee, and conſequently it belonged to the pope alone to name an emperor.

That turbulent pontiff was a ſworn enemy to the houſe of Auſtria, and accordingly engaged Henry II. of France to break the truce with Spain. Philip was not fond of war; his object was to govern by political reſources, and flattered himſelf by that means alone to riſe ſuperior to all his enemies, and extend, at once, his authority and dominions. But being obliged to take up arms, he endeavoured to engage the Engliſh in his cauſe againſt France. Had the deciſion depended entirely upon the queen, he would have found no difficulty in his application; ſhe was incapable of refuſing the demands of a huſband ſhe ſo tenderly loved; but ſhe had little influence in the council, and ſtill leſs among the people: her government was hardly able to ſupport itſelf in the midſt of a profound peace.

A. D. 1557. Philip returned to England on the twentieth of March; and the nation was ſoon after alarmed with accounts that a rebellion was broke out in the northern parts of the kingdom. Thomas Stafford, a lineal deſcendant from the late duke of Buckingham, and conſequently poſſeſſed of a diſtant claim upon the crown, had for ſome time taken refuge in France, where he had been joined by ſeveral other diſaffected perſons; and, unhappily for themſelves, miſtaking the diſcontents of the people for an indication of their readineſs to take up arms againſt the government, they attempted to excite an inſurrection. About the latter end of April they landed in Scotland, marched directly to Scarborough, and ſeized the caſtle. Stafford now aſſumed the title of protector of the kingdom, and publiſhed a manifeſto, pretending that the queen had forfeited her right to the crown by introducing Spaniards into England. But he ſoon found the people, however oppreſſed with regard to religion, were too cautious to join his ſtandard. The earl of Weſtmoreland marched againſt him, defeated his little army, and took him priſoner. Perſuaded that this attempt to diſturb the internal peace of the kingdom was owing to the inſtigations of the French king, a reſolution was taken in the council to declare war againſt that monarch, which was accordingly performed, with great ſolemnity, about the middle of June.

Having thus procured the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, Philip paſſed over to the Low Countries; while his general, the duke of Savoy, ſtrengthened with the junction of a body of Britiſh forces, entered Picardy, and St. Quintin. As the place was but poorly fortified, and defended only by a weak garriſon, he hoped in a few days to compel it to ſurrender: but the governor, admiral Coligny, thinking it his duty to ſave ſo important a fortreſs, threw himſelf into the town, with a few battalians of French and Scots, and by his exhortations and example, encouraged the ſoldiers to make a vigorous defence. In the mean time he ſent an expreſs to his uncle, the conſtable Montmorency, then at the head of the French army, requeſting a reinforcement. That general accordingly advanced towards St. Quintin, at the head of his whole army, in order to facilitate the attempt of throwing a body of forces into the town.

The duke of Savoy, one of the greateſt generals of his age, informed of the conſtable's deſign, fell upon the reinforcement with ſuch irreſiſtable fury, that not more than five hundred men entered the place. Animated by this ſucceſs, he attacked the conſtable, routed his whole army, and took him priſoner. Two thouſand five hundred of the enemy fell on the field of battle, among whom were ſeveral princes and noblemen of the firſt diſtinction.

This defeat filled France with conſternation: and the duke of Savoy, to improve the advantage he had gained over the enemy, diſpatched the duke of Bedford, and the count of Egmont, at the head of four thouſand men, to make an inroad into France. They obeyed their inſtructions, and ravaged the country to the diſtance of two and twenty miles, without meeting with the leaſt reſiſtance. The inhabiatnts of Paris were ſo terrified, that they began to fortify their city with the utmoſt expedition; and had the duke of Savoy marched directly to the capital, he had, in all probability, made himſelf maſter of the place; but he continued the ſiege of St. Quintin, which, by the bravery of the admiral, held out ſeventeen days, when it was taken by ſtorm, and that gallant officer, with his brother, and all who had ſurvived of the garriſon, were made priſoners. The noble defence made by the admiral, ſaved France. The Spaniards loſt the favourable opportunity of puſhing their conqueſts, till the advanced ſeaſon obliged them to go into winter quarters.

A. D. 1558. The French, in the mean time, recovered from their fears, and made the neceſſary preparations for rendering abortive any attempts of the enemy. They even formed an attempt for reducing Calais, a fortreſs conſidered as impregnable, eſpecially during the winter. Among the papers of the French admiral, taken priſoner at St. Quintin, ſome obſcure hints of this deſign were found; and Philip failed not to inform Mary of the diſcovery he had made, and offered to ſupply her with troops to defend the place. But the Engliſh council conſidering this intimation as a ſtratagem of Philip to get poſſeſſion of Calais, not only declined the offer, but neglected to put the place in a poſture of defence, notwithſtanding the repeated ſollicitations of the governor.

The duke of Guiſe, lately created lieutenant-general of France, not content with fortifying the frontiers of the kingdom, reſolved, even in the depth of winter, to attempt the reduction of Calais; an enterprize which France, during her greateſt ſucceſs, had always conſidered as impoſſible, and therefore ſeldom attempted. The place was commanded by lord Wentworth, a brave and experienced officer; but the garriſon conſiſted only of five hundred ſoldiers, and about two hundred townſmen. The Engliſh having, at the end of autumn, drawn off a great part of the garriſon, with an intention to replace them in the ſpring, when their attendance was thought abſolutely neceſſary. Guiſe knew this, and determined to take advantage of his diſcovery.

Calais was ſurrounded by moraſſes on the land ſide, and could only be approached by a dyke, at the head of which was a bridge, defended by a fort called Newenham, about a quarter of a mile from the town. Near this fort was another, called St. Agatha; and the entrance of the harbour was defended by a caſtle, termed the Ryſbank. Such was the ſituation of Calais when Guiſe ſat down before it, to the aſtoniſhment of all Europe. It was not even imagined that the French could be able to undertake any enterprize of conſequence, ſo ſoon after the dreadful defeat they had ſuffered at St. Quintin.

When the duke of Guiſe began his march towards Calais, a fleet of French ſhips was ſent into the channel, under pretence of cruiſing on the trading veſſels of the Engliſh, but in reality to aſſiſt the land forces in their attempts upon a place deemed impregnable. The firſt operation of the French was againſt Fort Agatha, which the Engliſh, after a gallant defence, were forced to abandon. The garriſon, however, threw themſelves into Fort Newenham, which was immediately inveſted by the enemy. At the ſame time, the French ſhips cannonaded the Ryſbank, and both forts ſoon became untenable. Wentworth ſaw the neceſſity of abandoning theſe caſtles, as the greater part of his garriſon was employed in defending them: he therefore gave orders for their capitulating with the enemy, and joining him in Calais, which, without their aſſiſtance, he was in no condition to defend. The garriſon of Newenham followed his inſtructions, and were permitted to retire into the town: but thoſe in the Ryſbank were not ſo fortunate; the French admiral refuſed to ſign any capitulation; and the garriſon were ſoon after obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war.

All acceſs to Calais was now totally cut off; and the duke of Guiſe formed, with prodigious labour, a road, conſtructed with pitched hurdles, through the moraſs, by the help of which a large detachment of his army lodged themſelves behind ſome heights, near the walls of the town. Here they erected a battery of fifteen pieces of large cannon againſt the caſtle, in which a practicable breach was ſoon made. D'Andelot, brother to admiral Coligny, was now ordered to draw the water out of the ditch, and ſucceſsfully executed the taſk in one night. The next day the duke ordered a general aſſault, which was made with ſuch fury, that the breach was carried by ſtorm, and the French effected a lodgment in the caſtle. During the enſuing night, Wentworth endeavoured to recover that poſt; but having loſt two hundred men, and the French pouring ſuch numbers into the caſtle, he thought any farther defence would be madneſs, and accordingly capitulated on the following conditions, the beſt he could obtain in his diſtreſſed ſituation: "That he himſelf ſhould remain a priſoner of war, with fifty of the chief officers of his garriſon: that the reſt ſhould be at liberty to retire, either to England or Flanders; and that the place, with all its proviſions, ammunition, cannon, and riches, ſhould be immediately delivered up to the French." This capitulation was ſigned on the ſeventeenth of January. Ham and Guiſnes were taken by the twenty-ſecond; and the duke of Guiſe reduced, in leſs than thirty days, and even in the depth of winter, what had coſt Edward III. a ſiege of eleven months, at the head of an army fluſhed with the glory they had lately acquired in the fields of Creſſy.

But inſtead of being rouzed to vengeance, they ſunk in deſpair; their ſpirits were broken by a ſeries of calamities and diſgrace. Mary was ſo ſenſibly affected with the loſs of Calais, that ſhe abandoned herſelf to grief; and repeatedly declared to thoſe about her, "That her end was approaching, and that ſhe ſhould never recover the effects of this miſfortune." She, however, aſſembled the parliament, in order to obtain ſupplies. This was effected, though not without oppoſition from the Commons, who ſeemed determined to remonſtrate againſt the abuſe of prerogative. They alſo paſſed an act for confirming all alienations of crown-lands that the queen had made, or might think proper to make during the ſpace of ſeven years to come. One Copley, a member of the houſe, having expreſſed his apprehenſions, that the queen, under the ſanction of this dangerous act, might alienate even the crown itſelf, to the prejudice of the lawful heir, was puniſhed for his preſumption.

But the government was much more intent on perſecuting the Proteſtants at home, than in conſulting the beſt means of repairing the national loſſes abroad. All who refuſed to conform to the Catholic religion, or were found poſſeſſed of what were then ſtiled heretical books, were puniſhed without mercy; even the life of Elizabeth herſelf was perpetually in danger. Notwithſtanding the protection of Philip, who was greatly intereſted in her ſafety, that princeſs had undoubtedly fallen a ſacrifice to the cruel hatred of her ſiſter, had ſhe not, by the moſt prudent conduct, avoided every thing that might render her ſuſpected, and diſarmed even calumny itſelf. In the retreat where ſhe reſided, remote from the court, and ſurrounded with ſpies, ſhe devoted herſelf wholly to ſtudy; and was preparing, in ſolitude and ſilence, for thoſe important ſcenes in which ſhe was ſoon to bear ſo diſtinguiſhed a part. She made religion itſelf ſubſervient to policy: ſhe conformed to the eſtabliſhed worſhip, though ſtrongly attached to the Proteſtant principles. To have acted otherwiſe, would, indeed, have been no other than running headlong to death, and the time of her aſcending the throne was at no great diſtance.

Though the Engliſh had refuſed the offer of Philip with regard to throwing a ſtrong reinforcement into Calais, he made a propoſal for aſſiſting them to the utmoſt of his power in recovering that important fortreſs, before the ſeaſon would permit the French to repair the works, which were now in a very bad condition. But this offer was alſo refuſed, and no military expedition attempted till the ſpring was conſiderably advanced, when a fleet of one hundred and forty ſail of ſhips was fitted out, for revenging the inſult upon the enemy. This fleet being reinforced with thirty Flemiſh ſhips, having on board a body of ſix thouſand land forces, were ſent to alarm the coaſt of France. They accordingly landed near Breſt; but ſo little care had been taken to conceal the deſign, that the French were prepared for their reception; and the Engliſh were obliged to retreat to their ſhips, without having effected any thing of conſequence.

A much ſmaller ſquadron, conſiſting only of ten ſhips, were, however, more fortunate; they had an opportunity of retorting upon the enemy the diſgrace ſuffered by their countrymen. The marſhal de Thermes, governor of Calais, invaded Flanders at the head of an army of fourteen thouſand men. He croſſed the Aa without oppoſition, and made himſelf maſter of Dunkirk and Berg St. Winloc. But being overtaken by the Spaniards under count Egmont, near Gravelines, a bloody conteſt enſued. While the two armies were cloſely engaged, and fortune ſeemed undetermined on which ſide to beſtow the wreath of victory, the Engliſh men of war came into the harbour; and pointing their cannon againſt the flank of the French, made ſuch a dreadful ſlaughter, that the whole army was thrown into confuſion, and the Spaniards gained a complete victory.

This action was, however, little more than a prelude to the grand event which was every day expected. The two grand armies of France and Spain were now approaching each other; and as the two contending monarchs had come into their reſpective camps, attended by the flower of their nobility, a general engagement, which would decide the conteſt, was thought to be inevitable. But Philip poſſeſſed not the enterprizing ſpirit of a conqueror. Notwithſtanding the great ſuperiority of his numbers, and the two important victories he had lately obtained over the forces of the enemy, he choſe rather to have recourſe to negotiation than venture a battle. He demanded, among other articles, that Calais ſhould be reſtored to the Engliſh; and Henry, that the kingdom of Navarre ſhould be delivered to its right owner. But before any thing was determined between them, the queen of England died; and Philip being no longer connected with that kingdom, ſoon relaxed in his demands with regard to that capital article.

The health of Mary had been long declining. She had for ſome time been afflicted with a dropſy, the conſequence of her falſe conception, and the improper regimen ſhe had purſued. The malady was greatly increaſed by the anxiety of her mind, which was now increaſed by the moſt painful reflections. The conſciouſneſs of being hated by her ſubjects; the mortification of being without children; the fear of leaving her crown to a ſiſter whom ſhe deteſted; the approaching ruin that threatened the Catholic religion; the indifference of a huſband, who was going to retire into Spain; all theſe diſagreeable reflections preyed upon her mind, and threw her into a ſlow fever, of which ſhe died on the ſeventeenth of November, in the forty-third year of her age, and the ſixth of her reign.

The character of Mary is ſo ſtrongly marked in every action of her inglorious and unfortunate reign, that the diſagreeable taſk of a recapitulation may be well ſpared. She poſſeſſed few eſtimable or amiable qualities; nor was her perſon more engaging than her behaviour. Every circumſtance of her character received a tincture from the badneſs of her temper, and the narrowneſs of her underſtanding. Obſtinacy, bigotry, violence, cruelty, malignity, revenge, tyranny, were the ruling paſſions of her mind; and it will, perhaps, be difficult to find a ſingle virtue among ſo remarkable a complication of vices.

Cardinal Pole, who had long laboured under an intermitting fever, died the ſame day with the queen. He was a perſon of great ſweetneſs of temper, candour, and moderation, and was lamented by all who knew how to eſteem thoſe valuable qualities. In a nation where ſuch cruel perſecutions were carried on againſt the Reformation, Pole experienced not the hatred of the Proteſtants.

Neither the commerce nor the marine of England had yet obtained any reſpectable footing. Fourteen thouſand pounds having been voted for the ſervice of the navy, it was computed, that when this ſum was expended, ten thouſand pounds a year would be ſufficient for its maintenance. The privileges of the German merchants were reſtored at the ſollicitation of the emperor; and no doubt was entertained with regard to the power of the crown to grant ſuch an indulgence. A paſſage to Archangel had been diſcovered during the laſt reign, and tended greatly to improve the commerce of England with Muſcovy. The Czar ſent an embaſſy to the queen; and this was, probably, the firſt time that the Ruſſian empire had any correſpondence with the inhabitants of the weſtern kingdoms.

By a law paſſed in Mary's reign, the number of horſes and arms each perſon, in proportion to his abilities, ſhould ſupply for the defence of the kingdom, was fixed. Thoſe of the firſt claſs, conſiſting of all who inherited a thouſand pounds a year, were to keep ſix horſes, with their proper furniture for dragoons, and ten for the light horſe. Excluſive of theſe, they were to furniſh forty pykes, thirty halberts, twenty muſkets, and twenty morions or ſallets. This method was, doubtleſs, ſubject to many inconveniencies; but the revenues of the crown, and the ſupplies of parliament, were ſo inconſiderable, that there was no other method of equipping the troops. The revenue of England, at that time, was very little more than three hundred thouſand pounds a year.

ELIZABETH.

A.D. 1558. THE arbitrary council of Mary were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation at the death of the queen. The parliament was ſitting when the event happened, and far from being pleaſed with the late tranſactions of the miniſtry. The latter well knew the conſequence that would inevitably reſult from their acting by their own authority, and therefore reſolved to inform the Houſe of Lords that the throne was vacant. A ſhort conſultation enſued, and Elizabeth was unanimouſly declared the legal ſucceſſor. The Commons followed their example; and that princeſs was immediately proclaimed at the uſual places, while the Proteſtants and Papiſts ſeemed to vie with each other in ſhewing their joy on this happy occaſion.

Elizabeth was then at Hatfield, in Hertfordſhire, where ſhe had for ſome time reſided, and where ſhe received information of the ſteps taken in her favour by the parliament. The firſt act of her government was a proclamation, ſtrictly enjoining "all her ſubjects to keep the peace, and forbear all attempts, upon any pretence whatever, to break or alter any order or uſage at that time eſtabliſhed." This prudent meaſure was taken to prevent thoſe diſorders which there was too much reaſon to apprehend would otherwiſe have reſulted from the intemperate zeal of ſome of the reformed, who, following the precedent given them by the popiſh party in the late reign, might have proceeded in an illegal and riotous manner in deſtroying the ſuperſtitious objects of the Catholics, and reſtoring the reformed method of worſhip, without waiting for the royal orders.

The queen was about twenty-five years of age, when ſhe paſſed, as it were, from a priſon to a throne. The remembrance of her miſfortunes added a luſtre to her merit, and ſhe was conſidered as the deliverer of the kingdom. Born with ſuperior talents, ſhe had acquired, by ſtudy, the great art of government, and had in herſelf all the reſources of genius, authority, and policy. Her compliances during the late reign had inſpired the Catholics with hopes, that ſhe was not ſo great an enemy to their religion as to the cruel and bloody methods made uſe of to enforce it; while the Proteſtants believed her to be ſincerely a friend to their more humane and enlightened doctrine. She knew the advantage of keeping both parties in ſuſpence, and accordingly formed her council of ſtate out of perſons of both religions.

Elizabeth ſeemed, on her change of fortune, to forget all the injuries ſhe had received from her enemies. She returned thanks to heaven for her deliverance as for a miracle; but ſhe wiſhed not to make her perſecutors feel the weight of the rod of retaliation. Even Sir Henry Bedingfield, who had been her keeper in priſon, and who had even delighted in treating her with the utmoſt rigour, found her inſenſible to the deſire of revenge. This noble inſtance of a ſuperior underſtanding and beneficent diſpoſition charmed her enemies; they were convinced that their religion would never be puniſhed as a crime by a princeſs who cheriſhed not the paſſion of revenge.

Philip received the news of Elizabeth's acceſſion to the Engliſh throne with great ſurprize; but deſirous of ſecuring his intereſt in that kingdom, he ordered his miniſter to pay her his compliments on that occaſion, and offer her propoſals of marriage. He flattered himſelf with obtaining at laſt the government of that kingdom, over which Mary, or rather the parliament, had given him no power. But the queen knew too well the averſion of the Engliſh to an alliance with Spain; and, at the ſame time, was too fond of her own independence, to accept his propoſals. Her deſire of making an advantageous peace with France, before ſhe declared her real intentions, induced her, however, to elude his offers, without appearing to reject them; and Philip, as if already ſure of ſucceſs, ſollicited a diſpenſation from the Roman pontiff.

Elizabeth was well acquainted with all the religious diſputes which had ſo long divided Europe, and embraced the Proteſtant tenets from conviction. But though ſhe was determined to reſtore the reformed worſhip in England, her ambaſſador at Rome received orders to notify to the pope her acceſſion to the throne. Had the pontiff been the leaſt deſirous of ſupporting his own intereſt, and that of the holy ſee, he could not, on this critical occaſion, have acted with too much prudence and moderation. But Paul IV. one of the moſt haughty and inflexible churchmen that ever filled the papal chair, inſtead of endeavouring to heal the breaches that had ſo long ſubſiſted between the churches of Rome and England, behaved with all the inſolence natural to his character. He declared, that the kingdom, being a fief of the holy ſee, it was an act of the higheſt preſumption in Elizabeth to aſſume the title of queen without his concurrence; that her illegitimate birth excluded her from the right of ſucceſſion; that he would not annul the decree paſſed againſt the marriage of her father with Anne Boleyn; but that if ſhe would ſollicit his favour, he would ſhew her all the indulgence ſhe could expect from the head of the church. The queen being informed of this anſwer, ſaid, that the pope, in order to gain too much, was willing to loſe the whole. She accordingly recalled her ambaſſador, and applied herſelf ſeriouſly to reſtore a religion altogether unfavourable to the papacy. But ſhe uſed not terrifying, but conciliating meaſures. She withdrew not her favours from the Catholic party. When the biſhops came in a body to pay her their obedience, ſhe expreſſed her ſentiments of regard for them all, except Bonner, from whom ſhe turned aſide as from a man polluted with blood, an object that excited horror in every heart ſuſceptible of the tender feelings of humanity.

The violences of the preceding reign had ſufficiently diſpoſed the people to a change in religion: but ſhe feared they would run into the oppoſite extreme, and ſeverely retaliate on the Catholics the miſeries they had ſuffered. In order, therefore, to render this change leſs dangerous and more durable, ſhe imitated not the precipitate conduct of her ſiſter; ſhe took her meaſures with caution, and enſured her ſucceſs by the rectitude of her views. She ſoon perceived that the Proteſtant divines attacked, with all the virulence of religious zeal, the ſuperſtitious worſhip of the Roman church; and that the Papiſts retorted upon them with equal acrimony. She therefore publiſhed a proclamation, forbidding all preaching, without a ſpecial licence, that the pulpits might not be filled with the combuſtibles of diſcord. At the ſame time, ſhe introduced ſuch a number of Proteſtants into her council, as were ſufficient to counterbalance the power of the Papiſts, ſhould they exert themſelves in favour of the ancient religion. She diſcharged from priſon, or recalled from exile, thoſe whoſe religion only had been their crime; and ſhe ordered the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Goſpel, to be read in Engliſh. The elevation of the hoſt was diſcontinued, and a greater zeal was expreſſed for the Bible than for the Church of Rome.

Theſe ſteps towards a reformation ſo alarmed the popiſh biſhops, that, apprehending a total abolition of the papal power, together with the ceremonies of the church of Rome, would ſoon follow; or, perhaps, fearful of offending the holy father, who had ſcrupled to acknowledge the queen's title, and abſolutely denied her legitimacy, they reſolved not to officiate at her coronation. Oglethorpe, biſhop of Carliſle, alone oppoſed the reſolution, and readily undertook to perform the ceremony.

A. D. 1559. On the fourteenth of January, Elizabeth paſſed from the Tower through the ſtreets of London, in grand proceſſion, to Weſtminſter, amidſt the acclamations of a prodigious number of ſpectators aſſembled on that occaſion. The queen's behaviour was remarkable: ſhe returned their applauſes with ſuch a modeſt affability and winning behaviour, as charmed the hearts of all beholders. But nothing diſplayed in a ſtronger light the religious ſentiments of the citizens, or tended more to endear the new ſovereign to the people, than her accepting of an Engliſh bible, richly gilt, which was let down, from a pageant in Cheapſide, by a child repreſenting Truth, who made the queen a ſpeech on the occaſion. Elizabeth received the book in both her hands; and having kiſſed it, held it up, and laid it on her boſom, promiſing to be diligent in reading it; and aſſuring the citizens, that ſhe eſteemed that gift more than all the coſtly preſents they had made her. The next day the queen was crowned at Weſtminſter with great ſolemnity.

The parliament, which aſſembled on the twenty-fifth of January, gave the queen every teſtimony of zealous loyalty and obedience. The two houſes, after confirming her right to the crown, acknowledged her ſupremacy, and gave her, under the title of head of the church, the tenths, firſt-fruits, and impropriations, which had been reſtored to the pope by queen Mary, together with all the eccleſiaſtical authority which her father and her brother had enjoyed, and alſo a power of adjuſting that authority to ſuch commiſſioners, whether eccleſiaſtics or laymen, as ſhe ſhould think proper to nominate. Several penalties were threatened to all thoſe who refuſed to take the oath of ſupremacy. The ſtatutes of Edward VI. were confirmed. The maſs and liturgy of the church of Rome were aboliſhed.

All theſe changes took place without any diſturbance, and almoſt without oppoſition. The affability of the queen, her addreſs in gaining hearts, and directing opinions, her graceful dignity, her inſinuating manners, ſubdued all the difficulties of the enterprize: ſhe diſpenſed the national religion from her hand. So little did the cruelty of Mary contribute to the eſtabliſhment of her equally cruel ſyſtem of popery!

Nor did the affair of religion wholly engroſs the attention of the parliament. The commons, excluſive of tonnage and poundage, then conſidered as the property of the crown, voted new ſupplies to Elizabeth, and petitioned her in form to make choice of a huſband. She anſwered, with great politeneſs, that ſhe always conſidered marriage as a burden, and that while ſhe was charged with the government of ſo great a kingdom, it ſeemed ſtill more ſo; that the ſtate was her huſband, and the people of England her children; and that ſhe ſhould not think herſelf barren, nor her life unfruitful, while her days were devoted to the care of ſuch a family. At the ſame time ſhe gave them to underſtand, that any farther applications on that head would be diſagreeable.

The biſhops, however, ſtill oppoſed the tenets of the Reformation; one only agreed to take the oath of ſupremacy, all the reſt refuſed, and were deprived of their ſees. But out of near ten thouſand pariſhes contained in the kingdom, not more than twenty-four of the parochial clergy rejected the oath. Bonner alone felt the weight of the hand of authority; he was committed to the Marſhalſea, and died in confinement. Some foreign princes interpoſed their good offices to procure the catholics the privilege of ſeparate aſſemblies in particular cities, but the queen would not comply with their requeſt; and repreſented the danger of diſturbing the national peace by a toleration of different religions. But in order to induce the catholics to join in the eſtabliſhed worſhip, ſhe cauſed every thing to be ſtruck out of the new litury, that had any tendency to give them offence.

While the queen and parliament were employed in ſettling the public religion, the negotiations for a peace were carrying on at Chateau-Cambroſis, between the miniſters of France, Spain and England. The treaty was at laſt concluded, by which Calais was was given up to Henry, who, on the other hand, engaged to reſtore it at the end of eight years, provided, during that time, Elizabeth did not break the peace either with France or Scotland. All men of penetration eaſily ſaw, that this ſtipulation was nothing more than a colourable pretence for abandoning Calais; but they excuſed the queen for making the ſacrifice on account of the neceſſity of her affairs, and even extolled her prudence in ſubmitting without farther ſtruggle to that neceſſity. A peace with Scotland followed as a neceſſary conſequence of that with France. The treaty was more honourable for the king of Spain. Henry II. reſtored all the places he had conquered, and gave him his daughter in marriage. It was alſo agreed that Philibert, duke of Savoy, ſhould marry the French king's ſiſter. The ceremonies were accordingly performed, when Henry II. was accidentally killed by a wound he received in his eye from the ſplinter of a lance, at a tournament held in honour of the nuptials.

His ſon and ſucceſſor Francis II. who had married Mary, queen of Scots, was a prince void of genius and experience. He was nothing more than an inſtrument in the hands of the Guiſes, who hurried him into meaſures which tended to augment their ambition and their vanity. Perſuaded that the acceſſion of England in right of their neice, the queen of Scotland, would aggrandize their family, they had prevailed upon Henry II. to maintain an army in Scotland, as the only avenue by which the Engliſh dominions were acceſſible. By their perſuaſions alſo the young king of France, who was incapable of holding the reins of government, conteſted the legitimacy of Elizabeth's birth, in order, on a proper opportunity, to diſpute her right to the Engliſh crown. Mary took the arms and title of queen of England, and by her intimate alliance with the French nation, was conſidered as a formidable rival. Elizabeth ſaw her danger, and determined to exert all her prudence and all her courage to render the attepmts of her enemies abortive.

The troubles of Scotland ſeemed to offer the means for defeating the projects of the Guiſes. The diſturbances excited by religious diſputes had now attained the moſt enormous heights. The Proteſtants were headed by perſons of the firſt diſtinction; particularly by the earl of Argyle, the lords Turner and Morton, and others of the nobility. They entered into a bond of aſſociation, and called themſelves "The Congregation of the Lord," in contradiſtinction to the eſtabliſhed church, which they denominated "The Congregation of Satan." The ſubſtance of the bond was as follows: "We perceiving how Satan, in his members, the antichriſts of our time, do cruelly rage, ſeeking to overthrow and to deſtroy the goſpel of Chriſt and his congregation, ought, according to our bounden duty, to ſtrive in our maſter's cauſe, even to the death, being certain of the victory in him. We do therefore promiſe, before the majeſty of God and his congregation, that we, by his grace, ſhall with all diligence continually apply our whole power, ſubſtance, and our very lives, to maintain, ſet forward, and eſtabliſh, the moſt bleſſed word of God, and his congregation; and ſhall labour, by all poſſible means, to have faithful miniſters, truly and purely to miniſter Chriſt's goſpel and ſacraments to his people: we ſhall maintain them, nouriſh them, and defend them, the whole congregation of Chriſt, and every member thereof, by our whole power, and at the hazard of our lives, againſt Satan, and all wicked powers, who may intend tyranny and trouble againſt the ſaid congregation. Unto which holy word and congregation we do join ourſelves; and we forſake and renounce the congregation of Satan, with all the ſuperſtitious abomination and idolatry thereof; and moreover ſhall declare ourſelves manifeſtly enemies thereto, by this faithful promiſe before God, teſtified to this congregation by our ſubſcriptions."

The ſigning of this bond of aſſociation was followed by an open revolt from the clergy and the church of Rome. They committed ravages in various parts of the country, and the whole kingdom became one continued ſcene of diſorder. About this time John Knox, one of the moſt zealous preachers in Europe, returned to Scotland. He had been perſecuted for his religion, and took refuge at Geneva. His enthuſiaſtic ſermons kindled the flames of rebellion. The Romiſh prieſts were attacked, the images broken, the monaſteries demoliſhed, and every diſorder that could be expected from a multitude inflamed with religious madneſs, was committed. The fanatical leaders of the reformed party declared, in a manifeſto, that they took up arms by the expreſs commands of God, as the children of Iſrael did againſt the Canaanites, and that they would liſten to no propoſitions of peace, while the idolatry of the papiſts, and the perſecutions of the children of God ſubſiſted.

But the heads of the revolters ſoon perceived that it would be impoſſible to execute their project without the aſſiſtance of ſome foreign power. They were already diſtreſſed for want of money, and found, that the reformation of religion, however deſired by the people, would not be ſufficient to keep a numerous army together. The revolters therefore, notwithſtanding the inveterate hatred that ſubſiſted between the two kingdoms, applied to Elizabeth for aſſiſtance. The court of France were at firſt pleaſed with theſe commotions, as they afforded a plauſible pretence for ſending forces into Scotland, who would be there in readineſs to act againſt Elizabeth, and ſupport Mary's claim to the Engliſh crown. But on receiving intelligence that the Scottiſh revolters were negotiating with Elizabeth for aſſiſtance, they were greatly alarmed, and exerted all their influence to render the treaty abortive. They even offered to reſtore Calais, and all its dependences, if the queen would obſerve a ſtrict neutrality. But Elizabeth was too prudent to be diverted from her purpoſe: ſhe anſwered, that a ſmall fiſhing town was of little conſequence when compared to the ſecurity of her dominions. She diſpatched Randolph into Scotland, to aſſure the revolters of ſupport, and to animate the leaders of the congregation in their deſign of ſhaking off their ſubjection to Rome, and the reformation of religion.

A. D. 1560. A ſquadron of ſixteen ſhips of war was accordingly fitted out, under the command of vice-admiral Winter; and an army of eight thouſand men was ordered to rendezvous at Berwick, on the thirtieth of January, in order to act in concert with the fleet, and join the revolters. The appearance of the Engliſh ſhips in the Forth gave new ſpirits to the leaders of the congregation. While the French forces, terrified at the loſs of ſome of their ſhips, which Winter had deſtroyed in his paſſage up the river, retired to Leith, in order to wait the powerful reinforcements they expected from the continent. But the troubles which now broke out in France demanded all the attention of the miniſtry, who therefore laid aſide all thoughts of invading England.

On the twenty-ſeventh of February, a treaty of mutual defence was ſigned at Berwick, between the duke of Norfolk, earl marſhal of England, on the part of Elizabeth, and the leaders of the congregation; and the Engliſh received orders to join the Scottiſh revolters. The combined army immediately began their march for Leith, which was immediately inveſted. The queen retired to the caſtle of Edinburgh, where ſhe ſoon after expired. She was a princeſs of great capacity, virtue, and moderation; and had the management of the affairs of Scotland been wholly intruſted to her management, ſhe would, probably, have accommodated all differences with the reformers, and preſerved the nation from the miſeries of a civil war. The French ſoon perceived that all farther oppoſition would be in vain, and therefore deſired to capitulate. The offer was accepted; and a treaty was ſigned at Edinburgh, whereby it was ſtipulated, That the French ſhould evacuate Scotland in twenty-four days, and return to France in ſhips furniſhed by Elizabeth: that the king and queen of France and Scotland ſhould thenceforth abſtain from bearing the arms of England, or aſſuming the title of that kingdom: that farther ſatisfaction for the injury already done in that particular ſhould be granted Elizabeth; and that commiſſioners ſhould meet to ſettle this point; or, if they could not agree, the king of Spain ſhould be arbiter between the two crowns. Beſides theſe ſtipulations, which ſolely regarded England, ſome conceſſions were granted to the Scots, which the plenipotentiaries, in the name of the king and queen of France and Scotland, promiſed, in the treaty with Elizabeth, to obſerve; that an amneſty ſhould be publiſhed for all paſt offences; that none but natives ſhould be put into any office in Scotland; that the ſtates ſhould name twenty-four perſons, of whom the Queen of Scots ſhould chuſe ſeven, and the States five; that the whole adminiſtration of affairs ſhould be committed to theſe twelve, during the queen's abſence; and that Mary ſhould neither make peace nor war without the conſent of the States. This treaty, ſo glorious for Elizabeth, greatly increaſed her power, and extended her reputation. She became, from that moment, ſure of the confidence of the Scottiſh malecontents, and miſtreſs of their hearts and fortunes.

This union was ſtill farther cemented by the ſubſequent meaſures of the reformers. They aſſembled the parliament, without any authority or orders from Mary. As ſoon as the ſeſſion was opened, they preſented a petition againſt the catholics, in which they were repreſented as robbers, aſſaſſins, and traitors, that ought no longer to be tolerated. Thus the reformers adopted all the violent meaſures of their enemies. The parliament itſelf ſeemed alſo to be actuated by the ſame ſpirit of rage and perſecution. The maſs was prohibited, under pain of confiſcation, baniſhment, and death. The preſbyterian worſhip, founded on the moſt rigid principles of Calviniſm, was eſtabliſhed; and the Romiſh clergy were ſtripped of their poſſeſſions, and baniſhed from the kingdom. The queen of France and Scotland, who governed her huſband, and was herſelf governed by her uncles, the Guiſes, refuſed her conſent to theſe meaſures, declared ſhe would not ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, and continued the war againſt Elizabeth. The reformers, however, gave themſelves little concern about the refuſal of their ſovereign; they immediately put the ſtatutes in execution; aboliſhed the maſs; ſettled their miniſters; committed every where the moſt dreadful devaſtations upon the monaſteries, and even the churches, which they conſidered as having been polluted with idolatry. The rapacity of the people, who had been excited to rebellion by their new preachers, could not be reſtrained; and fanaticiſm concurring with avarice, gave an incurable blow to the papal authority in Scotland. Theſe violent proceedings convinced the nobility of that kingdom, that they muſt now rely on England for protection: their own ſovereign was too much exaſperated to hope for any favour from her; and the court of France, ſtimulated by motives both of ambition and religion, would not fail to exert all their power to revenge the inſult.

A. D. 1561. During theſe tranſactions in Scotland, the fortune of Mary underwent a ſudden change, by the death of the king, her huſband. Catherine of Medicis, the mother of Charles IX. aſſumed the whole authority, in quality of regent. Mary Stuart, who experienced nothing but mortifications at her hand, found herſelf obliged to leave a country which ſhe loved, and return to her unhappy kingdom, rent to pieces on account of religion. Accordingly ſhe ſent her ambaſſador to England, to demand from Elizabeth a ſafe conduct for herſelf and the ſhips that were to attend her. But that princeſs, who was highly exaſperated at her refuſing to ſign the treaty of Edinburgh, anſwered, "that every part of her requeſt ſhould be readily granted, provided ſhe previouſly ratified that convention." She added, "That ſhe ſhould have free liberty to paſs through England, where ſhe ſhould be received with all the marks of affection ſhe could expect from a ſiſter." Mary could not retain her reſentment at this refuſal: ſhe ſent for Throgmorton, the Engliſh ambaſſador, and aſked him, What offence ſhe had given his miſtreſs, that Elizabeth ſhould deny her ſo ſmall a favour? "But, (added ſhe) "I can, with God's aſſiſtance, return into my own country without her leave, as I came into France in ſpite of all the oppoſition of her brother Edward. I want not friends both able and willing to conduct me home, as they brought me hither, though I was deſirous rather to make an experiment of her friendſhip than of the aſſiſtance of any other perſon."

Nor did ſhe delay her departure from France on account of the ſafe-conduct's being refuſed by Elizabeth. She repaired to Calais, attended by all her uncles, and ſeveral noblemen of the firſt rank in that kingdom, and embarked in the beginning of Auguſt. She ſeemed greatly affected on her leaving France; ſhe kept her eyes fixed upon the coaſt till darkneſs intercepted it from her view. "Farewell France!" ſhe cried, "Farewell, beloved country! I ſhall never ſee thee more!" Elizabeth had fitted out a fleet of ſhips, under pretence of purſuing ſome pirates, but, probably, with a view of intercepting the Queen of Scots in her paſſage. Mary, however, paſſed the Engliſh fleet in a fog, and reached her native kingdom in ſafety on the eighteenth of Auguſt, after an abſence of thirteen years. She was received by her people with every mark of eſteem, regard and affection; and Mary flattered herſelf with enjoying more happineſs and repoſe than ſhe had reaſon to expect from the accounts ſhe had received of the ſtate of parties in her kingdom.

She had now reached the nineteenth year of her age; and, if the graces of youth, if the charms of beauty, beauty, if ſoftneſs of ſoul, if elegance of manners, if every amiable talent could have touched the hearts of a ſtubborn, unenlightened, and fanatical people, Mary would have ſoon become the idol of her ſubjects. Far from interfering in their religious ſentiments, ſhe repoſed her whole confidence in the heads of the reformers, who were now the leaders of the people. But her being a papiſt was a ſufficient provocation to the multitude. It was with the utmoſt difficulty ſhe could obtain permiſſion to celebrate maſs in her own chapel. "One ſingle maſs (ſaid the reforming miniſters) is more dangerous to this kingdom than an hundred thouſand armed men." Knox, the enthuſiaſtic and turbulent preacher, daily ſignalized himſelf by freſh inſtances of zeal againſt the Catholics. He publicly called the queen Jezabel; and even went ſo far as to tell her to her face, in one of his ſermons, That Samuel did not heſitate to hew Agag in pieces; in ſpite of king Saul; that Elias, in the preſence of Ahab, neither ſpared the falſe prophets of Jezabel, nor the prieſts of Baal; that Phineas, though no magiſtrate, put the fornicators to death; and that others of courſe, though no magiſtrates, might legally puniſh thoſe crimes which were condemned by the laws of God." All the endeavours of Mary to gain this impracticable preacher over to her intereſt were in vain: he rejected her offers with contempt, and continued to diſſeminate the ſeeds of revolt and rebellion. He was cited before the council, but refuſed to make any acknowledgment: he defended his principles without timidity, and was diſcharged without puniſhment.

Surrounded with dangers from a bigotted people, ſhe determined, if poſſible, to maintain a good underſtanding with Elizabeth. In order to this, ſhe diſpatched Maitland, her ſecretary, to pay her reſpects to that princeſs, to ſignify her deſire of cultivating a friendſhip and good correſpondence with her, and requeſting that ſhe might be acknowledged her ſucceſſor in the throne of England, in caſe ſhe died without iſſue. It was hardly poſſible for Mary to have made a more unreaſonable requeſt, or to have urged it at a more improper juncture. Elizabeth was highly provoked, and told the Scottiſh ambaſſador, "That ſhe was determined to live and die queen of England, and would therefore never have the mortification of ſeeing her ſubjects adore the riſing ſun; that to name a ſucceſſor was to expoſe her own life to danger, to deſtroy the ſecurity of her government, to place a winding-ſheet before her, and to invite the king of terrors before his time." She added, "That ſhe ſhould leave it to others, after her death, to diſcuſs the title of her ſucceſſor; that ſhe hoped the Queen of Scots claim would then be found preferable, and that ſhe would do nothing to hurt her intereſt in that reſpect."

Elizabeth, though the jealouſy ſhe had long entertained againſt Mary was inflamed by this imprudent ſtep, ſent Sir Peter Meutas with compliments to Mary on her ſafe return to her kingdom, and to inſiſt on her ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh: but Mary ſtill eluded the demand, pretending that the affairs of Scotland were yet in too unſettled a condition for her to examine the articles of that treaty with that attention the importance of them required, as ſhe imagined they might tend to deprive her of all hopes of ſucceeding to the crown of England. Elizabeth, to put the matter out of all diſpute, offered to explain the words of the treaty in ſuch a manner as to leave no ſuſpicion of their excluding Mary's right of ſucceſſion. But ſtill difficulties occurred, and the treaty continued without being ratified. All diſputes were, however, laid aſide, and a cordial reconciliation ſeemed to have taken place between them.

The care of her own government now wholly engaged the attention of Elizabeth. Her firſt attempt was to put the Engliſh navy in a very reſpectable condition: ſhe augmented the pay of her ſeamen; filled her magazines with arms; introduced the manufacture of gunpowder into England; ordered a great number of iron and braſs pieces of ordnance to be caſt; reinforced the garriſon of Berwick; fortified the northern borders of her kingdom; introduced and encouraged improvements in agriculture, by permitting the exportation of corn; promoted the trade and navigation of England; regulated the national coin, which her predeceſſors had altered; and ordered her people to attend the exerciſe of arms at ſtated times. The glory that attended her labours attracted the admiration of Europe; and ſhe received the addreſſes of ſeveral princes, who were either in love with her perſon or her power. She amuſed their hopes, but always with a reſolution to preſerve her liberty. Self-love had, poſſibly, as much concern in this particular as the love of dominion. What is ſtill more ſingular in her conduct, is, that though ſhe determined never to have any heirs of her own body, ſhe was not only averſe to fix any ſucceſſor to the crown, but alſo deſirous to prevent, as far as lay in her power, any perſon who had pretenſions to the ſucceſſion from ever having heirs. Catherine Gray, daughter to the duke of Suffolk, ſiſter to lady Jane, and now the ſole heireſs of that houſe, was ſent to the Tower, for marrying the earl of Hertford without her conſent, and died in confinement.

But however ſevere the queen was with regard to thoſe who had any pretenſions to the throne, ſhe was always attentive to remove the oppreſſions of her ſubjects. She revoked all warrants granted to the purveyors for victualling the fleet, which were generally executed in a very vexatious manner; and iſſued orders, that the people ſhould be paid in money for whatever proviſions they furniſhed. She reformed the impoſitions of the exchequer; and took care that the penſions aſſigned to the popiſh clergy, on their reſigning their livings, ſhould be punctually paid. She alſo increaſed the ſalary of the judges, and allowed them a proviſion for their reſpective circuits. At the ſame time, ſhe took care that her œconomy ſhould go hand in hand with her liberality: ſhe gave very little out of the royal demeſnes, but on condition of its reverting, on default of male iſſue, to the crown. It would, perhaps, have been happy, if her ſucceſſors had invariably obſerved the ſame rule.

A. D. 1562. The affairs of the continent now engaged the attention of Elizabeth. The religious wars carried on in France, furniſhed a new field for her political operations. After the death of Henry II. the Hugonots, whom that prince had perſecuted with the utmoſt rigour, became a very formidable people, whether we conſider their zeal for the reformation, their numbers, or the talents of their leaders. The prince of Condé, admiral Coligny, and his brother Andelot, were at the head of the Hugonots, and rendered their party reſpectable to the government. The Guiſes were their declared enemies, and armed againſt them the popiſh faction. Both parties aſſumed the maſk of religion; and, under pretence of ſupporting the goſpel of peace, carried on the moſt dreadful wars againſt each other. Catherine of Medicis, hoping to put an end to the civil diſcords which had ſo long waſted France, perſuaded the catholics to compromiſe their differences with the chiefs of the Proteſtant party; and an edict, favourable to the reformers, was publiſhed, by which they were permitted to have places without the cities and towns, for performing divine ſervice according to the tenets of their religion. But this deceitful compliance ſerved only to irritate theſe two irreconcilable parties. The duke of Guiſe, who was conſidered as the protector of the catholic religion, paſſing through Vaſſi, a town on the borders of Champagne, fell upon a congregation of Hugonots, who, in conſequence of the privilege granted them, were ſinging pſalms in a barn. Above ſixty of theſe poor defenceleſs people were killed, and the reſt fled to the woods for ſhelter. The conſequence of this inhuman action was a general inſurrection of the proteſtants in almoſt every part of the kingdom, and the nation was divided between the duke of Guiſe and the prince of Condé. Catherine, fluctuated between both, attempted, but in vain, to mediate a peace between them. She was then at Paris with the young king her ſon, where finding herſelf deprived of all authority, ſhe wrote to the prince of Condé to come to her deliverance. This letter augmented the flames of the civil war, which was carried on with the greateſt inhumanity: every town was a fortified poſt; every ſtreet a field of battle. Anthony, king of Navarre, the firſt prince of the blood, was obliged to ſerve in the army of the duke of Guiſe, and, with the queen mother, dragged to the ſiege of Rouen, where he was killed.

Philip II. who made it at once his glory and his intereſt to extirpate the reformed religion, and was even deſirous of caſting a ſhade over the memory of his father, who was ſuſpected of a ſecret attachment to the new doctrines, after having perſecuted their partizans, favoured the papiſts in France, from whom he hoped to derive conſiderable advantages. He was alſo uneaſy leſt the contagion ſhould ſpread in the Low Countries, where the inhabitants had already given ſtrong indications of their affection for the reformed religion. He therefore engaged in a ſecret alliance with the duke of Guiſe, and ſent him ſix thouſand men, and a large ſum of money, to ſtrengthen the catholic party.

Perceiving it would be impoſſible to reſiſt ſo powerful a confederacy, ſupported by the royal authority, Condé diſpatched the Vidome of Chartres, and de la Haye, to ſollicit the aſſiſtance of Elizabeth, in order to prevent the total ruin of the proteſtants in France. He offered to put Havre-de-Grace into the hands of the Engliſh; provided the queen would undertake to garriſon the place with three thouſand men, together with three thouſand more to defend Dieppe and Rouen, and furniſh the prince with a hundred thouſand crowns. Elizabeth liſtened to theſe propoſals, and ſent Ambroſe Dudley, earl of Warwick, at the head of ſix thouſand men, one half of whom were landed at Dieppe, and the other took poſſeſſion of Havre. At the ſame time the queen publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring, "that ſhe did not ſend troops into Normandy, with a deſign to recover that province, the ancient patrimony of her anceſtors, and unjuſtly wreſted from her; but to preſerve it for the king of France during his minority, and to reſcue it from the ambition and tyranny of the princes of Lorraine: that ſhe was the more concerned to endeavour to prevent that province falling into their hands, as it was manifeſt their deſign was to ſeize the ports of Normandy, and from thence to invade her dominions, after extirpating the reformed religion in France: that for theſe reaſons ſhe had thought herſelf obliged to aſſiſt the young king, hinder his ſubjects from being oppreſſed by the Guiſes, protect the profeſſors of the reformed religion, and provide for the ſafety of her own kingdom."

As ſoon as this proclamation was publiſhed, another was iſſued by the faction of Lorraine in Paris, in which Elizabeth was charged with breach of faith, in ſeizing the king's fortreſſes, and aſſiſting his rebellious ſubjects:" and in conſequence of this war was declared againſt her. This haſty ſtep, which was taken by the advice of the cardinal of Lorraine, was followed by a ſeizure of all the Engliſh ſhips at Bourdeaux, and the impriſonment of the ambaſſador's courier at Rouen. But it was ſoon perceived that they had acted with too much precipitation. The Engliſh fitted out privateers to make repriſals on the French, and the utmoſt diſpatch was uſed in making the neceſſary preparations for carrying on the war with vigour. The court of France perceived their miſtake, diſowned the proclamation, and the preparations for war in England were laid aſide.

By this time the catholics had made themſelves maſters of Rouen, and it was expected they would immediately form the ſiege of Havre, which was not then in any condition of defence; but their attention was diverted to another enterprize by the inteſtine diſorders of the kingdom. Andelot, ſeconded by the negotiations of Elizabeth, had levied a conſiderable body of proteſtants in Germany, and having arrived at Orleans, the ſeat of the Hugonot's power, the prince of Condé and the admiral were enabled to take the field in order to oppoſe the progreſs of their enemies. They firſt marched into the neighbourhood of Paris, and threatened the capital with a ſiege; but thinking themſelves unequal to the undertaking, they directed their route towards Normandy, in order, if poſſible, to perſuade the Engliſh to join them, and act in conjunction againſt the catholics. The royal army commanded by the conſtable Montmorency, followed them, and at laſt forced them to a battle. The action was remarkable ſevere, and diſtinguiſhed by this ſingular event, that Condé and Montmorency, the leaders of both armies, were taken priſoners. The catholics gained the advantage; but the admiral, who always became more terrible by a defeat, collected the remains of the army, kept them together, and made himſelf maſter of ſeveral of the moſt conſiderable places in Normandy. Elizabeth was ſo greatly pleaſed with his valour, that ſhe made him a preſent of an hundred thouſand crowns, and offered to give her own bond for the payment of an hundred thouſand more, if he could find merchants to advance the money.

A. D. 1563. Notwithſtanding the great œconomy of Elizabeth, her diſburſements in favour of the Hugonots exhauſted her treaſury, and ſhe found it neceſſary to ſummon a parliament in order to obtain a ſupply. A little before the meeting of the parliament, the queen had been ſeized with the ſmall pox, and her life had been in danger. The commons therefore preſented an addreſs to her majeſty, requeſting that ſhe would either marry, or fix the ſucceſſion in ſuch a clear and explicit manner, as might prevent the calamities which it was natural to fear would reſult from the conteſts of ſeveral claims to the throne. But Elizabeth ſtill found means to elude their application; ſhe could not be prevailed upon to declare a ſucceſſor. The parliament, however, made no difficulty of granting the neceſſary ſupplies. They were very willing to ſupport the noble deſigns of Elizabeth for the improvement of trade and manufactures, for the augmentation of her navy, for the ſuppreſſion of vice, and for the more effectual reſtraining the progreſs of popery. They granted two fifteenths and two ſubſidies. They alſo paſſed a bill for enlarging the oath of ſupremacy, and it was reſolved that a ſecond refuſal to take it ſhould be deemed high-treaſon. A law was made againſt the ſeductions of enthuſiaſts; and another againſt magicians and ſorcerers, who were then thought dangerous.

While the Engliſh parliament were thus employed in the buſineſs of the nation, the catholic army under the duke of Guiſe, were carrying on the ſiege of Orleans with great vigour. A very conſiderable progreſs had been made in this undertaking, when the duke was aſſinated by a young enthuſiaſt called Poltrot de Merc. The duke, on finding his end approaching, expreſſed the deepeſt remorſe for having involved his country in the horrors of a civil war; and conjured the queen-regent to conclude a peace as ſoon as poſſible with the Hugonots. His advice was followed; both parties were heartily tired of the war, and ſoon agreed to the articles of a pacification. A toleration, under ſome reſtrictions, was again granted to the proteſtants; a general amneſty was publiſhed; Condé was reinſtated in his offices and governments; and money being advanced to pay the arrears of the German troops, they were ſent out of the kingdom. Not the leaſt regard was paid to Elizabeth in this treaty; and a garriſon of ſix thouſand men, ill ſupplied with proviſions, could not long reſiſt the whole army of France. The earl or Warwick, who commanded the Engliſh garriſon in Havre, made a gallant defence, notwithſtanding the many difficulties under which he laboured; but the plague breaking out among his troops, he was obliged to ſurrender the place. Nor did the misfortune terminate there; the garriſon imported with them the peſtilence, which afterwards raged with uncommon violence: above twenty thouſand perſons died of it in London only. A peace was ſoon after concluded with France; two hundred thouſand crowns were paid to Elizabeth for the redemption of hoſtages, and the mutual pretenſions of both parties continued.

The death of the duke of Guiſe greatly tended to leſſen the influence of Mary Queen of Scots in France. The Scottiſh guards were diſmiſſed, and the payment of Mary's dowry was diſcontinued, notwithſtanding the warm repreſentations of her uncle, the cardinal of Lorraine, who was now more deſirous than ever of marrying her to ſome powerful prince, who was able to ſupport her againſt the contumelious behaviour of reformers in her own kingdom, and give diſturbance to Elizabeth. He had already offered his niece to Don Carlos, Philip's ſon; to the king of Sweden, the king of Navarre, the archduke Charles, the duke of Ferrara, the cardinal of Bourbon, who had only taken deacon's orders, from which he might eaſily be abſolved. Elizabeth, on her part, was equally vigilant to prevent the execution of their ſchemes, and was particularly anxious, leſt Mary ſhould form any powerful foreign alliance, which might tempt her to revive her pretenſions to the Engliſh crown, and to invade the kingdom on the ſide where it was weakeſt, and moſt expoſed to the attacks of an enemy. She always told the queen of Scots, that nothing could ſatisfy her but her eſpouſing ſome Engliſh nobleman; and even went ſo far as to propoſe her own favourite, the earl of Leiceſter, whom ſhe certainly never meant to part with; for when ſhe found that Mary was inclined to liſten to the propoſal, ſhe found means to elude the promiſe ſhe had made of declaring that princeſs her ſucceſſor. So fatally may low and little paſſions mingle with the greateſt and moſt diſtinguiſhed qualities.

England now enjoyed the moſt profound tranquillity: her trade with the Low Countries had been interrupted by the intrigues of cardinal Glanville, who foreſeeing a war in the Netherlands, was deſirous of removing the Engliſh, and perſuaded the government to prohibit the importation of their cloth, a branch of trade which was carried on to a prodigious extent: but Philip perceiving that this prohibition was equally detrimental to his own ſubjects as to thoſe of England, deſired the old treaty concluded in the reign of Maximilian I. might be renewed: this was accordingly done, and the affair was terminated to the ſatisfaction of both nations.

The queen being no longer engaged in foreign affairs, made a progreſs to the univerſity of Cambridge, where ſhe was received with great pomp and magnificence. Every thing was conducted with a ſplendor that did honour to that celebrated ſeat of learning; and the queen declared her ſatisfaction in an elegant Latin oration, wherein ſhe aſſured the univerſity of her protection, and earneſt deſire of encouraging learning to the utmoſt of her power.

A. D. 1565. After two years of uncertainty, Mary determined to marry; and fixed upon lord Darnley, ſon to the earl of Lenox, as the object. This young nobleman was her couſin-german by the lady Margaret Douglas, niece to Henry VIII. and daughter to the earl of Angus by Margaret queen of Scotland. He had been born and educated in England, where his father had conſtantly reſided, after being expelled his native country by the ſuperior intereſt of the Hamiltons. Darnley was alſo, by his father, deſcended from the ſame family with Mary herſelf; and would, by marrying her, preſerve the royal dignity in the houſe of Stuart. He was, after her, next heir to the crown of England; and thoſe who affected to deny her title, on account of her being a foreigner, had endeavoured to maintain his claim, and to give it the preference. It was therefore conſidered as no inconſiderable advantage, that by eſpouſing him, ſhe could unite both their titles; and as he was an Engliſhman by birth, and could not, either by his power or alliances, give any cauſe of ſuſpicion to Elizabeth, it was preſumed that the propoſal of this marriage could not be diſagreeable to the queen of England. She, indeed, ſeemed to conſent to this alliance; and even wrote to Mary, thanking her for her kind intentions towards the earl of Lenox, whom the queen of Scots now reſtored to his honours and eſtates.

Darnley having obtained leave from Elizabeth, repaired to Scotland; and, by his preſence, completed the conqueſt, which the fame of his accompliſhments had already begun. He was in the flower of his age, and his appearance remarkably graceful. Mary, forgetting all her ideas of grandeur, and all her ſchemes of policy, liſtened only to the dictates of her growing paſſion. Elizabeth was no ſooner informed that the Queen of Scots was pleaſed with the figure and perſon of Darnley, and that the treaty was on the point of being concluded, than ſhe exclaimed againſt the marriage; diſpatched Throgmorton to Scotland, to diſſuade Mary from eſpouſing lord Darnley; ordered the earl of Lenox and his ſon to return immediately into England, under the ſevereſt pains and penalties the laws could inflict; and cauſed the counteſs of Lenox and her ſecond ſon, who were then in England, to be committed to the Tower; where they ſuffered a very cloſe confinement.

The conduct of Elizabeth, though generally judicious, was too often full of duplicity; but never did ſhe behave with greater inſincerity than in her tranſactions with the queen of Scotland. Though ſhe now expreſſed ſo violent a reſentment againſt the intended marriage of Mary with Darnley, ſhe was not averſe to it in her heart. She would rather, indeed, have wiſhed that Mary had remained for ever in a ſingle ſtate; but as that could not be effected, ſhe did not diſlike a choice that delivered her at once from the fear of a foreign alliance, and the neceſſity of parting with her favourite Leiceſter. She had, however, ſome ſtrong reaſons of a political nature for affecting diſpleaſure on the preſent occaſion; it furniſhed her with a plauſible pretence for refuſing to declare Mary her ſucceſſor to the Engliſh crown, a point which ſhe had always laboured to evade; and it gave her an opportunity of exciting a ſpirit of rebellion among the Scottiſh nobility and clergy. This political duplicity is always ſhocking to a virtuous mind, though it often makes too large a part in the ſcience of government.

When Mary was informed of the oppoſition of Elizabeth, ſhe juſtly obſerved to Throgmorton, that as the queen of England had already ſignified her deſire of her marrying an Engliſh nobleman, to avoid the umbrage of her eſpouſing a foreign prince, ſhe had, in effect, followed her own advice; but in order to give Elizabeth time to examine the affair with more deliberation, ſhe would defer her marriage for three months. But this conceſſion not ſatisfying Elizabeth, the ceremony was performed at Edinburgh; and Mary was ſo pleaſed with her new conſort, that ſhe gave him the title of king, and added his name to her own in all public acts. But ſhe ſoon perceived that his advantages of perſon ſerved only to conceal a mind that was trifling, vain, ungrateful, too much occupied with ſelf-love, too much ſwollen with ſilly pride, too much the ſlave of libertine folly, to be ſincerely attached to the moſt amiable of women. Reaſonably diſguſted with this unworthy huſband, ſhe withdrew from him, by degrees, her confidence, and treated him with neglect.

There was then in the court of Scotland one David Rezzio, a Piedmonteſe muſician, who had raiſed himſelf to an honourable employment by his addreſs rather than by his talents. Mary had appointed him her ſecretary for foreign affairs, loaded him with favours, and by repoſing in him too much confidence, and giving him too much credit, empowered him to make a traffic of his patronage, and to exerciſe all the inſolence of an upſtart favourite. The king was perſuaded that Rezzio was the principal cauſe of the queen's coolneſs. Jealouſy enſued, and notwithſtanding the diſagreeable figure of the Piedmenteſe, he was thought to enjoy more of Mary's favour, than merely her confidence. The ſuſpicion was ridiculous, but ſufficient to make the moſt dreadful impreſſions on a heart already inflamed. The malecontents among the nobility added fuel to the flame of his jealouſy; and perſuaded him to expoſtulate with the queen on her too great intimacy with this Italian favourite. Secure in conſcious innocence, the queen treated theſe inſinuations with the contempt they merited; and in order to convince her unworthy conſort, that in exalting him ſhe meant not to diveſt herſelf of any part of her authority, ſhe ordered his name to be omitted on the coin, and to be placed after her own in public acts: ſhe even gave Rezzio more countenance after this inſult than before.

A. D. 1566. Inflamed with rage, and incapable of curbing that violent paſſion by the reins of prudence, Darnley vowed the moſt ſevere revenge; and the diſſatisfied nobility offered to aſſiſt him in his bloody deſign, and to be themſelves the executors of his vengeance. The ninth of March was the day fixed for this ſanguinary purpoſe, and the neceſſary precautions were taken to prevent the deſign from being rendered abortive. Mary, who was then in the ſixth month of her pregnancy, was ſupping in private with her natural ſiſter, the counteſs of Argyle, and David Rezzio. The king entered the apartment by a private paſſage, and placed himſelf at the back of Mary's chair: the lord Ruthven, George Douglas, and other conſpirators, ruſhed in after him. Terrified with this appearance, the queen demanded the reaſon for ſo rude an intruſion. They told her, that not the leaſt violence was intended againſt her perſon; they meant only to bring that villain (pointing to Rezzio) to the puniſhment he ſo juſtly deſerved. Aware of his danger, Rezzio ran behind his miſtreſs, and ſeizing her waiſt, called aloud to her for protection; while ſhe interpoſed in his behalf with cries, menaces, and intreaties. But all her efforts were in vain: the impatient aſſaſſins ruſhed upon their prey; and, by overturning the table, greatly increaſed the horror and confuſion of this dreadful ſcene. Douglas ſeizing Darnley's dagger, ſtuck it in the body of Rezzio, who ſcreaming with fear and agony, was dragged into an anti-chamber, and his body pierced with no leſs than fifty-ſix wounds.

Mary behaved on this occaſion with admirable prudence: After paying a decent tribute of grief to the memory of the man ſhe had honoured with her confidence, ſhe dried up her tears, and employed her mind wholly on meditating a ſevere revenge; while the aſſaſſins, conſcious of their own guilt, and dreading the reſentment of their ſovereign, detained her a priſoner in the palace, diſmiſſing all who might have attempted her eſcape. In this alarming ſituation, ſhe determined to pardon thoſe noblemen who had oppoſed her government, in order to ſecure herſelf againſt the malice of the aſſaſſins, whom ſhe now conſidered as her moſt inveterate enemies. They readily accepted the offer, returned to court, and the aſſaſſins of Rezzio were obliged to fly into England, where they lived in great poverty and diſtreſs. Darnley declared himſelf, by proclamation, innocent of the murder of Rezzio, and that he ſincerely repented of having given any countenance to the conſpirators.

On the nineteenth of June, Mary was delivered of a ſon, whoſe fortune it was to unite the crowns of England and Scotland. Sir James Melvill was diſpatched to the court of Elizabeth to inform her of this happy event, and was received with great politeneſs by the queen. She thanked him for the diſpatch he had made in bringing her ſuch agreeable intelligence, and expreſſed the moſt cordial friendſhip for the Scottiſh queen. She ſoon after ſent the earl of Bedford, and George Carey, ſon to the lord Hunſdon, to aſſiſt at the baptiſm of the young prince, and charged them with ſeveral magnificent preſents for the queen.

The birth of a ſon contributed greatly to encourage the zeal of Mary's partiſans in England: and perſons of all parties began to be impatient for ſome ſettlement of the ſucceſſion; but Elizabeth, whenever preſſed on that ſubject, eluded the queſtion, by pretending ſhe had ſome thoughts of marrying Charles, archduke of Auſtria. Several of Mary's friends, however, adviſed Melvill to make the propoſal to the queen. He followed their inſtructions, but uſed the utmoſt circumſpection in this delicate affair. He told her majeſty "he was well aſſured ſhe formerly delayed declaring his miſtreſs preſumptive heir of the crown of England, merely to wait till ſhe ſhould ſee ſome iſſue of her body; and as that objection was fortunately removed, he hoped her majeſty would no longer defer gratifying the deſire of her ſubjects, who wiſhed to ſee one point ſettled, in doing juſtice to the title of his ſovereign, who would never ſeek any place or right in England, but by her favour and aſſiſtance." The queen anſwered, "that the birth of a prince was a ſtrong inducement to her uſing greater diligence in making a ſtrict inquiſition into that matter; that ſhe was perſuaded the right belonged to her ſiſter of Scotland, in whoſe favour ſhe heartily wiſhed it might be decided;" but added, "that ſhe ſhould defer making any declaration till the young prince was baptized, when ſhe would certainly ſatisfy the queen in that particular." Melvill juſtly conſidered this anſwer as a mere evaſion.

The earl of Bothwell was now in the higheſt favour with Mary. He had been always ſincerely attached to her family and perſon, and had performed ſignal ſervices for both. His courage and conduct as a ſoldier were unqueſtionable, and he cheriſhed the moſt cordial hatred for the Engliſh, againſt whom he had been a great and ſucceſsful commander on the borders, where his eſtates were ſituated. He had, ſome years before, been baniſhed through the influence of the earls of Arran and Murray, but had been re-called and pardoned by Mary. In his private life he was a complete profligate; by his intemperance he had diſſipated a large eſtate; but he ſtill retained his propenſity to licentiouſneſs, and nurtured every vice but hypocriſy. His appearance was manly, though he was now advancing to the decline of life; he was equally gallant in the court and in the field; and he poſſeſſed that openneſs of manner, which, with his experience in life, rendered him an agreeable companion to both ſexes. A perſon of his character could not be reſpected by the gloomy reformers of Scotland; and perhaps that very circumſtance rendered him more agreeable to Mary.

During theſe tranſactions in Scotland Elizabeth applied herſelf to cultivate the arts of peace. She was always deſirous of promoting literature in her dominions, and made a progreſs to Oxford with that intention. She addreſſed the univerſity in an elegant latin ſpeech, in which ſhe recommended the moſt aſſiduous attention to the inſtruction of youth committed to their care. And during her ſtay in that famous ſeat of the muſes, ſhe diſplayed ſuch a lively concern for the proſperity of literature and the welfare of the univerſity, that the members were in love with her government, and made her ever after, the arbiter of all their diſputes.

Soon after her return from Oxford the parliament met at Weſtminſter, and once more determined to addreſs the queen, either to marry, or ſettle the ſucceſſion. Accordingly Mr. Molyneux made a motion, that the affair of the ſubſidy, which had already been moved by ſecretary Cecil, might go hand in hand with that of the ſucceſſion. The majority declared in ſupport of the motion; but the members of the privy-council, who knew how diſagreeable the ſubject would be to Elizabeth, oppoſed it with all their influence. They informed the houſe that they had authority to aſſure them, that the queen would marry as ſoon as ſhe could find a prince deſerving ſerving her affection; that the appointing a ſucceſſor would expoſe her perſon to the moſt imminent danger; and that ſhe was therefore determined to delay the deciſion of that important ſubject to a more favourable opportunity. But theſe reaſons not being ſatisfactory to the members, they reſumed the ſubject with ſome warmth; ſeveral of them ſpoke with great freedom. Elizabeth was alarmed, and ſent a meſſage by Sir Francis Knolles, expreſsly commanding them to proceed no farther in that affair; but to reſt ſatisfied with her promiſe to marry. Paul Wentworth, a member who nobly ſupported the cauſe of liberty, made a motion, and put the queſtion, whether ſuch a prohibition was not an infringement of the liberties and privileges of that houſe? This brought on very warm debates; and Elizabeth repeated her commands againſt their proceeding any farther in that matter. But this order, inſtead of ſilencing the members, increaſed their ardour; the whole houſe was in a flame, and ſuch ſtrong ſymptoms of diſguſt appeared, that the queen was obliged to retract her former orders, and allow the houſe free liberty of debate.

Pleaſed with this gracious condeſcenſion, the ſpeakers delivered their thoughts with more calmneſs and temper; they even voted the ſupply without any condition. But as it appeared to have been given with a view of obtaining her conſent to fix the ſucceſſion, ſhe remitted one third of it, declaring, that the money of her people might be as well in their own pockets as in the public treaſury. She was, however, far from being pleaſed with the ſpirited behaviour of the Commons; and when ſhe put an end to the ſeſſion, ſhe ſeverely reprimanded the members in her ſpeech from the throne; adviſing them not to put her patience to ſo ſevere a trial for the future. At the ſame time, ſhe declared, that ſhe knew how to diſtinguiſh the principal offenders from the reſt; and that the greater part of the members might reſt aſſured, that they departed in her good graces.

While Elizabeth was employed in cultivating the arts of peace in England, the Netherlands were agitated with thoſe alarming convulſions, which at laſt gave liberty to a very conſiderable part of that country. Soon after Philip had quitted theſe provinces, in order to reſide in Spain, the diſcontent of the inhabitants arrived at ſuch a height, that it was impoſſible for affairs to continue long in their preſent ſituation. This univerſal diſſatisfaction flowed from ſeveral cauſes. The people were perſuaded that the king intended to aboliſh the ſmall remains of their liberty and privileges, and to erect on their ruins the throne of deſpotic power. The eſtabliſhment of biſhoprics alarmed many of the principal families, as the juriſdiction and revenues of the abbies, in which they were nearly concerned, were greatly leſſened. The inquiſition, which was going to be eſtabliſhed in theſe provinces, cauſed an univerſal alarm, that bloody tribunal being little leſs abhorred by the catholics than by the proteſtants themſelves. The ſtates had been prohibited from aſſembling. The king's determined reſolution to extirpate the reformed religion, which had now a multitude of profeſſors. Theſe meaſures, which were on the point of being eſtabliſhed, ſet the provinces in a flame. They had, for ſeveral years, petitioned the governeſs to aſſemble the ſtates, in order to avert the ſtorm which threatened the deſtruction of their country. Their requeſt was always rejected, and often with contumelious language. This ſtrange behaviour raiſed the reſentment of the people. The prince of Orange, with the counts of Egmont and Horne, withdrew from the council, and joined in a petition to the king. The cardinal de Glanville, who directed all the meaſures of the government, had rendered himſelf ſo odious, that the moſt violent attempts were to be feared, if he filled any longer the ſeat of power. Philip, whoſe pride would not ſuffer him to recall the cardinal, adviſed him to withdraw. The cardinal obeyed, and the nobles reſumed their ſeats at the council-board.

This point being obtained, they exerted themſelves to prevent the eſtabliſhment of the inquiſition, which they conſidered as one of the greateſt misfortunes that could attend any people. They formed aſſociations; and the proteſtants celebrated divine ſervice openly, notwithſtanding all the threats of the government. From this moment Philip conſidered the people of the Low Countries as rebels, while they looked upon him as an unjuſt and arbitrary ſovereign. Such was the beginning of the troubles in the Netherlands, and in which the Engliſh were afterwards very intimately engaged.

A. D. 1567. Bothwell had now acquired ſuch an aſcendency over Mary, that all her meaſures were directed by his advice. Reports were ſpread of more particular intimacies and familiarities between them; and theſe reports gained the more credit, as the hatred of Mary towards her huſband ſeemed rather to increaſe than diminiſh. Even Darnley himſelf was reduced to ſuch a ſtate of deſperation, that he had ſecretly provided a veſſel, in order to paſs over to the continent: while ſeveral of the nobility, perceiving there were no hopes of bringing about a reconciliation between them, propoſed ſome expedients for obtaining a divorce; but ſo many difficulties aroſe, chiefly with regard to the young prince's legitimacy, that it was laid aſide. The king, convinced that it was in vain ever to hope to recover the favour he had loſt, retired to Glaſgow, where he was ſeized with an illneſs of a very extraordinary nature. Mary's enemies, who took every opportunity of blackening her character, imputed this diſeaſe to a doſe of poiſon adminiſtered to him with her own hand.

Whatever truth there might be in this report, Mary ſeemed greatly alarmed. She repaired to Glaſgow, paid him a viſit, and behaved with the utmoſt tenderneſs; forgetting, in the duty ſhe owed him as a wife, the cauſes of reſentment he had given her as his ſovereign. This behaviour of the queen gave the greateſt pleaſure to all who wiſhed ſhe might retrieve her character, eſpecially when it was known that ſhe had brought the king with her to Edinburgh. The queen herſelf reſided in the palace of Holyrood-houſe; but as the ſituation of that place was unhealthy, and the noiſe of a court not well adapted to perſons in ſickneſs, it was thought proper to fit up apartments for him in a houſe at ſome diſtance from the city, called the Kirk Field. Here the queen continued her viſits, and behaved in the moſt endearing manner. She even lay ſeveral nights in a room below Darnley's chamber. But on the ninth of February, Mary told the king, that ſhe intended to ſleep that night in the palace, in order to be preſent at the marriage of one of her maids of honour. About two o'clock in the morning, the whole city was alarmed with a violent noiſe; and every face wore the aſpect of aſtoniſhment, when it was known that it was occaſioned by the blowing up of the houſe where the king reſided. Darnley's body was found at ſome diſtance, without any marks either of fire, contuſion, or violence.

Theſe particulars occaſioned a multitude of conjectures; but not the leaſt doubt was made by any, that the king had been murdered; and Bothwell was generally conſidered as the author of that attrocious crime. Mary ſeemed to be inconſolable on this occaſion: ſhe appeared to have devoted herſelf wholly to grief. The earl of Lenox loudly demanded juſtice on the murderers of his ſon; and accuſed Bothwell, and ſeveral others, as the perſons who had committed the regicide. Placards were ſecretly affixed on the walls in various parts of the city, accuſing Bothwell as the principal author, and that Mary herſelf was privy to the bloody deed. Voices were alſo heard in the ſtreets of Edinburgh during the ſtillneſs of the night, imputing to Mary and Bothwell the death of the late king. Whatever reaſons there might be for deſiring that the ſanguinary act might be conſigned to oblivion, the court was ſoon convinced, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to make ſome enquiry; and that Bothwell and his aſſociates, accuſed by the earl of Lenox, ſhould undergo a legal trial: but, at the ſame time, care was taken that no evidences ſhould appear againſt him. Fifteen days only were allowed the earl of Lenox for making good his charge againſt Bothwell, though he lived at a great diſtance from the court, and though he conjured the queen, for the ſake of vindicating her own honour, to employ more leiſure and deliberation in determining a queſtion of ſuch importance to the whole kingdom. Lenox finding all his attempts to put off the trial were in vain, ſent one of his retinue to proteſt, in his name, againſt the acquittal of the criminal, finding it would be impoſſible, in ſo ſhort a time, to collect the witneſſes ſufficient to prove the charge againſt ſo powerful a nobleman. No regard was, however, paid to this proteſt; the jury acquitted the priſoner.

But this was far from being thought ſufficient to exculpate Bothwell; it tended rather to prove his guilt. "Why (it was aſked) ſhould a perſon innocent of the crime he is accuſed of, endeavour to precipitate the trial? The witneſſes themſelves, if any are produced, will tend to clear his character; and every enquiry will withdraw part of the veil of calumny and detraction." The murder of the king was, however, only a prelude to the crimes of Bothwell. He forcibly carried off the queen, as ſhe was going to ſee her ſon, and conveyed her to the caſtle of Dunbar, with an intent to marry her. It was generally ſuſpected that the whole tranſaction was managed in concert with the queen; and ſome of the nobility, in order to diſcover the truth, ſent her a private meſſage, aſſuring her, that if ſhe lay under any conſtraint, they would exert all their power for her relief. She anſwered, that ſhe had indeed been carried to Dunbar by violence, but had been treated with ſo much kindneſs ſince her arrival, that ſhe willingly remained with Bothwell. The nobility were now ſufficiently convinced that the whole had been previouſly planned between them, and gave themſelves no farther concern about her captivity. A few days after, Bothwell received a pardon for this violence, and for all other crimes.

Nothing now remained but for her majeſty to marry Bothwell; but this ſeemed to be attended with an inſuperable difficulty. That nobleman had been married, about ſix months before, to a lady of great merit and noble family; and it was neceſſary to ſet this marriage aſide. Villainy is always fertile in expedients. The cauſe was pleaded with ſucceſs in two ſpiritual courts, the catholic and the proteſtant. The firſt decided in his favour from reaſons of conſanguinity, alledged by Bothwell; the latter from reaſons of adultery, alledged by his wife. Craig, the miniſter of Edinburgh, received orders to publiſh the banns of the queen's marriage, which he nobly refuſed. He even exhorted all thoſe who had acceſs to her perſon, to give her their advice againſt ſo ſcandalous an alliance. But all his endeavours were in vain; the queen perſiſted in her intention to marry Bothwell, and the ceremony was performed by the biſhop of Orkney. Very few lords attended, notwithſtanding many of them had ſigned a petition for her marrying Bothwell. The French ambaſſador, though a dependant on the houſe of Guiſe, could not be prevailed upon to countenance the marriage by his preſence. Mary, who had always paid the utmoſt deference to the advice of her French relations, declined it in an affair where ſhe was blinded by her paſſions.

This event diſgraced Mary in the eyes of all Europe: her ſubjects beheld her with horror. The ſuſpicions ſhe lay under with regard to her being an accomplice in the death of the king, grew ſtronger. Her connection with the man whom the public voice had pointed out as the murderer; her great anxiety to have him acquitted; a marriage ſo contrary to all decency, negotiated by means ſo odious; every thing ſeemed to confirm, that Mary, the ſlave of her paſſion for Bothwell, was the partner of his crime. Even though we ſhould be unwilling to impute to her this barbarous action, it is impoſſible to clear her of the moſt ſhameful weakneſs. But ſuch is the frailty of human nature, that the beſt characters, under certain fatal circumſtances, tranſgreſs at once the bounds of wiſdom and of duty.

The guilt of Bothwell was augmented by his inſolence. He treated the queen herſelf with the greateſt brutality; and endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of the young prince, who had been committed to the care of lord Erſkine, lately created earl of Mar; but he nobly refuſed to part with his charge. This attempt alarmed the whole nation; and the principal nobility, by whom Bothwell was hated for his overbearing inſolence, met at Stirling, and formed an aſſociation for protecting the prince, and bringing the murderers of the late king to condign puniſhment. They ſoon collected a conſiderable number of troops, and marched, with the utmoſt diligence and ſecrecy, to ſurprize the queen and Bothwell in Holy-rood-houſe. Their attempt had certainly been ſucceſsful, had not one of their number informed the queen of their deſign. She ſlighted not the notice ſhe had received, but made her eſcape, with Bothwell, to the caſtle of Brothwick, which the aſſociated lords reſolved immediately to beſiege. Bothwell fled to the Marches at the appearance of the enemy; and the queen eſcaped, in men's cloaths, to the caſtle of Dunbar, which was capable of holding out till her friends could come to her aſſiſtance. Had Mary continued in Dunbar, the army of the aſſociated lords muſt have been diſperſed for want of pay; but being joined by a conſiderable number of troops, ſhe imprudently took the field againſt her rebellious ſubjects, and marched to Preſton, where ſhe was joined by Bothwell. She ſoon perceived that his preſence was of no advantage to her cauſe; for on meeting the forces of the enemy at Carberry Hill, they refuſed to fight in defence of a man who was univerſally conſidered as the murderer of the late king. Mary was now obliged to have recourſe to negotiation; and Bothwell, perceiving that the authority of the queen was no longer able to protect him, made his eſcape to Dunbar, and thence paſſed over into Denmark, where he was thrown into priſon, loſt his ſenſes, and died in the greateſt diſtreſs.

Mary finding all hopes of reſiſtance were vaniſhed, took the fatal reſolution of ſubmitting to her enemies, and was conducted to Edinburgh amidſt the inſults of the populace. A banner was carried before her, on which was painted the murder of her huſband, and her ſon in tears, imploring the vengeance of heaven. She was not permitted to continue long at the palace: the conſpirators ſent her, under a ſtrong guard, to the caſtle of Lochleven, belonging to William Douglas, uterine brother to the earl of Murray. This caſtle was ſituated on a ſmall iſland in the middle of a lake, and acceſſible only by a boat. Here the captive queen was treated with the utmoſt cruelty, without a ſingle friend to comfort her in this ſcene of diſtreſs. The ſufferings of the unhappy princeſs affected Elizabeth, and ſhe reſolved to employ all her authority to alleviate her misfortunes, and reduce her rebellious ſubjects to reaſon. She diſpatched Throgmorton to Scotland, with orders to enquire into the real ſituation of Mary, and to promiſe her all the aſſiſtance in her power. At the ſame time, he was commiſſioned to demand of the conſpirators the liberty of their ſovereign, and, in caſe of refuſal, to threaten them with the reſentment of his miſtreſs.

The aſſociated lords, who were determined to humble Mary, refuſed the Engliſh ambaſſador acceſs to her perſon; and obliged the unfortunate queen to ſign an inſtrument, whereby ſhe reſigned the crown to her infant ſon, who was proclaimed in Edinburgh under the name of James VI. and crowned at Stirling on the twenty-ninth of July. They alſo forced her to ſign a ſecond inſtrument, by which the earl of Murray was appointed regent during the minority of the young king. Murray was Mary's natural brother, an active enterprizing man, and one of the principal promoters of the reformation in Scotland.

But the ſigning of theſe inſtruments was not ſufficient to procure Mary her liberty. The conſpirators feared the conſequence of the return of the affections of the people at the ſight of majeſty in diſtreſs. Murray therefore ſummoned a parliament, and that aſſembly, after voting ſhe was undoubtedly an accomplice in her huſband's murder, condemned her to perpetual impriſonment, ratified the inſtruments ſhe had ſigned, acknowledged her ſon for their king, and Murray for regent. But though no difficulties occurred in the parliament, many of the nobility were diſguſted at the proceedings of the conſpirators. The flight of Bothwell had tended greatly to alter the ſentiments of the virtuous part of the nation; the ſituation of Mary was commiſerated; and a powerful party was formed for ſupporting the cauſe of that unfortunate princeſs.

A. D. 1568. But all their endeavours would perhaps have been rendered abortive, had not the charms of Mary effected her eſcape. George Douglas, brother to the laird of Lochleven, engaged to aſſiſt her in her flight. He found means to ſteal the keys of the caſtle from his brother's chamber, and while the family were engaged in their devotions, opened the gates, conveyed her into a ſmall boat, and rowed her aſhore. The news of her eſcape was ſoon known to her friends, who conveyed her to Hamilton, where ſhe was joined by a great number of the nobility. A bond of aſſociation was immediately ſigned for her defence, and Mary, in a few days, found herſelf at the head of ſix thouſand men.

She immediately diſpatched Bethune, a perſon of abilities, and one that had been very inſtrumental in her releaſe, with a letter to Elizabeth, informing her of the happy change in her circumſtances, and requeſting a body of troops to aſſiſt her in reducing her rebel ſubjects. Mary intended to retire to the ſtrong caſtle of Dumbarton, in order to wait the arrival of the ſuccours expected from England. She alſo took ſome ſteps towards opening a negotiation with Murray. But the regent refuſed to liſten to any terms of accommodation that tended to diveſt him of the power he had acquired by uſurpation; and both parties prepared to decide the conteſt by the ſword. The regent could collect no more than four thouſand men; but notwithſtanding the inferior number of his army, he took the field againſt his ſovereign. The two armies met on the thirteenth of May, at Langſide, near Glaſgow; and a battle was fought, in which Mary's forces were totally defeated. The unhappy princeſs fled with great precipitation, attended by a few friends, to the borders of England. A conſultation was now held with regard to the meaſures ſhe ought to purſue, as they would, in all probability, determine her future happineſs or miſery. It was hoped, that the late interpoſition of Elizabeth in favour of the Scottiſh queen, would induce her to aſſiſt her effectually in her diſtreſs; and it was therefore determined to paſs over into England; and accordingly the queen, attended with a ſmall retinue of ſeventeen perſons, landed at Workington in Cumberland, and was conducted to the caſtle of Carliſle in a very honourable manner, by the deputy-governor.

Mary was no ſooner landed in England, than ſhe diſpatched a letter to Elizabeth, informing her of the unfortunate iſſue of the battle of Langſide, and ſolliciting that aſſiſtance ſhe had promiſed her againſt her rebellious ſubjects. Elizabeth received the letter with aſtoniſhment; and had ſhe been left to follow the dictates of her own mind at that inſtant, ſhe would certainly have complied with the requeſt of the Scottiſh queen. But Cecil cautioned her againſt the danger of ſuffering the feelings of humanity to prevail over the dictates of prudence. She, however, diſpatched lord Scroop, warden of the Marches, and Sir Francis Knolles, vice-chamberlain, to pay her compliments to Mary, and to take care that ſhe was treated with all the reſpect her high birth and royalty required.

The privy-council being aſſembled, great debates enſued on the manner of proceeding with regard to the Scottiſh princeſs. To detain her in England might, it was thought, be attended with many diſagreeable circumſtances, and to ſend her to France with ſtill more. Humanity would not permit her being delivered into the hands of her rebellious ſubjects. At laſt it was agreed by the majority, that ſhe ſhould be detained a priſoner, till ſhe had made ſatisfaction for having aſſumed the title and arms of England, and proved her innocence with regard to the murder of her huſband. Mary had certainly entered England without leave from Elizabeth, or procuring any ſafe conduct; and from this circumſtance, it was determined by the council, that ſhe was actually a priſoner of war. It cannot be denied, that a ſovereign has power to ſeize a foreign prince, who enters his dominions without a ſafe-conduct; but there are caſes wherein that right deviates into injuſtice. In this inſtance, the circumſtances were remarkaby favourable. Mary had been forced out of her dominions by her rebellious ſubjects, and obliged to take refuge in the firſt place that offered. She had no time for choice: ſhe muſt either ſubmit to thoſe who ſought her life, or take ſhelter in the country of a friend and ally. She had alſo received aſſurances of aſſiſtance from Elizabeth; ſo that if the detaining of her a priſoner was not contrary to the law of nations, it was at leaſt repugnant to the dictates of humanity.

Elizabeth balanced, for ſome time, between political prudence and generoſity. The former at laſt prevailed; ſhe followed the advice of her council, and informed the queen of Scots, that notwithſtanding her friendſhip for her, ſhe could not, with any degree of decency, either ſee or ſupport her, till ſhe ſhould be cleared of the crimes of which ſhe was accuſed. Mary anſwered, that ſhe would willingly juſtify herſelf before a princeſs whom ſhe conſidered as a ſiſter. But Elizabeth reflected that for her to ſit in perſon as a judge, and pronounce any ſentence, would be ſubject to many difficulties. The royal dignity would be wounded when majeſty itſelf ſubmits to puniſhment. She therefore declined the office, but offered to ſend two noblemen, as her commiſſioners, to hear the mutual charges between her and her ſubjects. Mary accepted the offer, and Elizabeth wrote immediately to Murray, charging him, in a very peremptory manner, to deſiſt from any farther hoſtilities againſt the friends of the queen of Scots, and to appear in perſon to vindicate his conduct with regard to his ſovereign, before the commiſſioners, who were appointed to ſit at York for that purpoſe.

A meſſage which carried with it all the appearance of command, at once ſurprized and offended Murray; but having always been an abject ſlave to the Engliſh, and his domeſtic enemies being now both numerous and powerful, he determined to obey her commands; as the only perſon from whom he could hope for aſſiſtance. This reſolution was, however, ſtrongly oppoſed in the council, by the moſt judicious of his party. They repreſented that it would caſt an indelible ſtain on himſelf and his country, ſhould he accuſe his lawful and native ſovereign before a foreign court of judicature; before perſons who were profeſſed enemies of the Scottiſh nation. But their arguments were urged in vain. Murray was not to be diverted from his purpoſe; he paſſed into England, aſſiſted by the earl of Morton, the biſhop of Orkney, the lord Lindſey, and the abbot of Dumferlin. At firſt Mary's cauſe appeared triumphant. Murray, flattering himſelf that if Mary's honour was not impeached, ſhe might be prevailed upon to accept of reaſonable terms of accommodation; whereas if he accuſed her of being an accomplice in the murder of Darnley, and ſhe ſhould afterwards reaſcend the throne, inevitable death muſt be the conſequence. This accuſation being omitted, the anſwers of the queen to the arguments of her adverſaries, were extremely plauſible: "How could ſhe ſuſpect, ſaid her advocate, that Bothwell was the murderer of her huſband, after he had been legally tried and acquitted, and after the nobility themſelves had ſollicited her to marry him. If he was guilty, ſhe deſired he might be puniſhed: ſhe appealed to the laws of her country, and they found him innocent. As to her reſignation of the crown, it was evidently an act of conſtraint, and conſequently null and void. By what right, or on what pretence, could the Scots revolt from their allegiance, throw their queen into priſon, give her battle, and place her ſucceſſor on the throne. Theſe are confeſſedly acts of rebellion, and puniſhed as ſuch in every well-governed ſtate."

Murray perceived the full force of theſe arguments, and was now convinced, that he muſt either give up the conteſt, or accuſe his ſovereign as the murderer of her huſband. He choſe the latter; and being aſſured that if Mary's crime was proved in a ſatisfactory manner, Elizabeth would immediately declare againſt her, and give him every reaſonable protection he could deſire, he produced proofs in ſupport of the moſt horrid accuſations. Theſe were love-letters written by Mary to Bothwell, and a promiſe of marriage ſigned before the trial of that infamous ſeducer. From theſe papers it was ſufficiently evident, that all the crimes committed by Bothwell, the murder of the king, and forcibly carrying off the queen, had been concerted with her majeſty. Mary's commiſſioners were aſtoniſhed when they perceived that Murray had produced teſtimonies which could not be anſwered, unleſs they could prove that the papers were forged. They therefore changed their ſyſtem; they deſired that Elizabeth would bring about an accommodation; and on being informed, that the accuſations exhibited againſt Mary muſt be firſt obviated, they broke off the conferences. The friends of Mary have laboured to prove that theſe famous letters were forged, and many volumes have been written with that intention. The ſubject is, however, too diffuſe, nor indeed is it neceſſary to diſcuſs the arguments that have been offered both for and againſt the authenticity of theſe letters here. Let it ſuffice to ſay, that from a candid examination, the proofs brought to prove them forgeries are weak and inconcluſive. They are alſo the more exceptional, as the queen, at a criſis ſo affecting to her honour, refuſed either to acknowledge or deny their authenticity.

Every expedient was tried by Elizabeth to prevail upon Mary to continue the conferences; but could not prevail. She remained inflexible, and even accuſed Murray and the other commiſſioners of being the murderers of her huſband: but produced no proofs againſt them. Elizabeth offered to bury whatever was paſt in oblivion, and negotiate a reconciliation with her ſubjects, provided ſhe would renounce the throne, or even aſſociate her ſon with her in the government, and ſuffer the direction of affairs to continue in the hands of Murray during the minority of the young prince. But Mary rejected the propoſal with diſdain. "My laſt words, anſwered ſhe, ſhall be the words of the queen of Scotland."

During the abſence of Murray, the Hamiltons and the earl of Huntley, who were ſtill in arms, had taken poſſeſſion of Glaſgow, with a body of ſeven thouſand men, intending to march forward, and intercept the regent in his return from England. Murray had, therefore, recourſe to artifice: he ſent Sir Robert Melvill to Mary, with propoſals of marriage between her and the duke of Norfolk, and a ceſſation of hoſtilities between the two parties in Scotland. She anſwered that her repugnance to a new marriage ſhould give way to the public good, and that ſhe ſhould be ready to receive any propoſal that ſhould be recommended by her parliament, and to make a peace with the rebels; but at the ſame time declared ſhe would give no definitive anſwer till ſhe was ſet at liberty, and reſtored to the throne of her anceſtors. She, however, agreed to ſend orders to the lords of her party to ſuſpend hoſtilities againſt Murray till further orders. This was the ſole point the regent had in view; he took advantage of the queen's order, and returned to Scotland in ſafety. Mary now preſſed Elizabeth either to enable her to regain poſſeſſion of her kingdom, or to ſuffer her to retire into France and ſeek other reſources. The queen evaded her requeſts, and the unfortunate princeſs, whoſe wit, and inſinuating graces, might have created her intereſt in too many hearts, was removed to Tutbury caſtle, and guarded with the greateſt vigilance.

A. D. 1569. Norfolk, however, purſued his deſign of marrying Mary. He was greatly beloved by the people, and the firſt nobleman in England in point of birth and fortune. He was paſſionately fond of the Scottiſh queen, but fearful of concluding a treaty of that importance without the conſent of his ſovereign, he conſulted the earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, Suſſex, Pembroke, and Southampton, who all agreed in adviſing him to proceed. The principal nobility and gentry engaged to ſupport him; and the lord Lumley and Sir Nicholas Throgmorton joined his intereſt with great cordiality. It was now agreed to open the affair to the earl of Leiceſter, Elizabeth's delared favourite. He approved the deſign, and wrote to Mary, recommending the duke of Norfolk for a huſband, and ſtipulating the following articles for the advantage of both kingdoms: "That Mary ſhould attempt nothing in conſequence of her pretenſions to the Engliſh crown, prejudicial to Elizabeth or her poſterity; that ſhe ſhould confirm the preſent eſtabliſhed religion in Scotland, and grant a free pardon to ſuch of her ſubjects as had appeared in arms againſt her." Mary very readily gave her conſent to theſe propoſals, which ſeemed to open a path to liberty, and the recovery of the crown of her anceſtors. The kings of France and Spain were privately conſulted, and highly approved of the intended marriage. This ſtep of conſulting foreign princes with regard to a treaty he carefully concealed from his own ſovereign, was highly imprudent, nor could it be deemed entirely innocent.

Cecil, ſecretary of ſtate to Elizabeth, a man of great vigilance and integrity, ſoon got intelligence of the deſign, and the queen one day told Norfolk to take care on what pillow he laid his head. She afterwards ſent for the duke, upbraided him ſharply for preſuming to engage in a treaty without her knowledge, and commanded him, upon his allegiance, to proceed no farther. The duke promiſed to obey her commands; but retired from court without taking leave, and repaired to his ſeat in Norfolk. He was ſo greatly beloved in that county, that he could eaſily have aſſembled a conſiderable army in his defence; but his loyalty would not permit him to take up arms againſt his ſovereign. He ſet out on his return to the court, but was arreſted at St. Albans and ſent to the Tower. All who had been privy to the deſign were alſo taken into cuſtody; but as they unanimouſly agreed in declaring, that the marriage had been propoſed by Murray, and that it was never intended to be concluded without Elizabeth's conſent, they were ſet at liberty.

The impriſonment of ſo many of the nobility greatly alarmed the nation, and ſeveral ſuſpicious aſſemblies were held in the north, where Mary was the idol of the people. Lord Suſſex, preſident of York, was not ignorant of theſe meetings, nor of the inclination of the northern inhabitants. He ſent for the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, who thought proper to pay no regard to the ſummons; but being alarmed at their danger they flew to arms without waiting for a ſupply of men and money, which they had been promiſed by the duke of Alva, governor of the Netherlands. The inſurgents proceeded immediately to Durham, tore the bible and common prayer book in the public market-place, erected a crucifix in the cathedral, and cauſed maſs to be openly celebrated in an aſſembly of above ſix thouſand perſons. The rebel army now became very numerous, and a party of five hundred horſe were detached to releaſe the queen of Scotland from her confinement in Tutbury caſtle; but that princeſs having been removed to Coventry before their arrival, the expedition miſcarried. The inſurgents ſoon after made themſelves maſters of Bernard-caſtle, and fortified Hartlepool.

While part of their forces, amounting to about fifteen thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, were employed in theſe operations, the reſt, formed into ſmall detachments, over-ran all Yorkſhire; the royal army, commanded by the earl of Suſſex, being too weak to prevent their ravages. But the chiefs of the rebels finding it impoſſible to furniſh money ſufficient to pay their troops, the army diſperſed. Northumberland fled into Scotland, where he was ſeized by the regent, and committed to the caſtle of Lochleven. The earl of Weſtmoreland was more fortunate; he found means to paſs over into Flanders, where he lived on a ſmall penſion ſettled on him by the king of Spain.

A. D. 1570. It is ſaid that Murray had entered into a private negotiation with Elizabeth for the delivery of the queen of Scots into his hands; and as Elizabeth now ſaw all the dangers which might reſult from her detention in England, it is not improbable but ſhe might have been pleaſed to have been freed from a priſoner who gave her ſo much inquietude, could it have been effected on any honourable and ſafe terms. But if this negotiation ever exiſted, it was ſuddenly terminated by the death of the regent, who was aſſaſſinated on the twenty-third of January, by a gentleman of the name of Hamilton, in revenge for a private injury.

This event involved Scotland in its former anarchy. The death of the regent was no ſooner known, than a conſiderable body of Scots entered England, and committed ravages which equalled in cruelty thoſe of the moſt barbarous times. This expedition ſeems to have been undertaken merely to provoke the Engliſh to revenge theſe affronts on all the Scots in general; and by that means to revive the ancient enmity between the two people, and unite all the inhabitants of Scotland againſt their ſouthern neighbours. But they were miſtaken in their politics: Elizabeth was too cautious to be deceived by ſo ill-concerted a ſcheme: ſhe declared, that ſhe did not think the party that ſupported the government concerned in the late unprecedented inſult upon her ſubjects, nor inclined to think the whole nation criminal. She even offered her aſſiſtance to reſtore the government to its former vigour, and to redreſs the diſorders that had been committed by Mary's friends. She added, that ſhould her friendly offers be rejected, ſhe was ſufficiently prepared to do herſelf juſtice, and take a ſevere revenge on thoſe who had wantonly, and without the leaſt provocation, inſulted her crown and dignity.

This declaration, which was delivered by Randolph, the Engliſh ambaſſador, to an aſſembly of the ſtates, diſconcerted all the meaſures of Mary's friends: they were not prepared with an anſwer, and obtained a farther time for that purpoſe. During this interval, both parties exerted all their abilities to gain the aſcendant. Elizabeth collected an army to give weight to her counſels; and her ambaſſador artfully cheriſhed the diviſions in Scotland, while he ſeemed to be labouring to promote an union between the two parties. Mary's friends had recourſe to the moſt provoking ſarcaſms upon Elizabeth and her council, in order to urge them to a general rupture. At the ſame time, they expected conſiderable aſſiſtance from France and Spain, to enable them to oppoſe, with more probability of ſucceſs, the attempts of the party ſupported by the Engliſh.

The earl of Suſſex, who commanded Elizabeth's army, received orders to march into Scotland, revenge the injuries ſuffered by their countrymen, and influence the election of a regent. The queen's orders were ſcrupulouſly obeyed: Suſſex ſeverely retaliated on the aggreſſors the miſeries they had inflicted on the Engliſh. He was, however, ſoon after recalled, by an agreement with the queen of Scots, who ſtipulated, that no foreign troops ſhould be introduced into Scotland; and that the Engliſh rebels, who had taken refuge in that kingdom, ſhould be delivered up by her partizans. The earl of Lenox was ſoon after choſen regent in an aſſembly of the ſtates, and Randolph received orders to maintain a correſpondence with him.

But notwithſtanding theſe inſtances of partiality to Mary's enemies, Elizabeth ſtill continued her ambiguous conduct, and maintained the appearance of friendſhip with that unfortunate princeſs. At the requeſt of the biſhop of Roſs, Mary's ambaſſador, joined with the preſſing inſtances of ſome foreign powers, Elizabeth procured a ſuſpenſion of arms between the Scottiſh factions, and by that means checked the progreſs of the regent's party, when they were on the point of gaining very conſiderable advantages over their opponents. By this variable conduct, Elizabeth artfully fed the flames of civil diſcord in Scotland, and rendered the whole country a ſcene of horror and deſolation. Throgmorton ſcrupled not to load Cecil with the blame of ſo perfidious a conduct; which, however reconcileable it may be to the rules of policy, is totally repugnant to all the rules of honour and humanity.

A. D. 1571. The catholic powers now exerted all their influence to procure the enlargement of the queen of Scots; but finding all their endeavours were in vain, pope Pius V. had recourſe to the thunders of the Vatican. He publiſhed the bull of excommunication againſt Elizabeth, deprived her of all title to the crown, and abſolved her ſubjects from their oaths of allegiance. A perſon was found hardy enough to affix this bull to the gate of the biſhop of London's palace, and to expoſe himſelf to death as the reward of his zeal. This violent meaſure of the Roman pontiff being attributed to the intrigues of the queen of Scotland, ſerved only to inflame the fatal hatred of Elizabeth. The Engliſh had long ſince learned to deſpiſe the cenſures of St. Peter's ſucceſſor.

The tenets of the puritans, who were now very numerous in England, called for the vigilance of the queen, equally with the papiſts. They were the declared enemies to epiſcopacy, religious ceremonies, and every part of the ancient worſhip. They condemned the church of England, which, according to their language, was infected with the wickedneſs of the Romiſh antichriſt. An image, the bending of the knee, the ſign of the croſs in baptiſm, a ſurplice, a ſquare cap, ſtruck them with horror. The ſpirit of liberty, when blended with the ſpirit of fanaticiſm, becomes extremely formidable in every eſtabliſhed government; and this ſpirit of independence with which they were animated, rendered them dangerous to the arbitrary meaſures purſued by Elizabeth; and was the radical cauſe of thoſe bloody revolutions which afterwards happened in the Engliſh government.

A new parliament, after five years interval, met at Weſtminſter on the ſecond of April; and it ſoon appeared that the ſeeds of independence began to vegetate in the breaſts of ſeveral of the members. Strickland propoſed a reformation of the liturgy, and particularly an abolition of the ſign of the croſs in baptiſm. The motion was ſupported, and ſeveral arguments were uſed to ſhew the propriety of the parliament's interfering in religious ſubjects. It was anſwered, that this was an infringement of the right of ſupremacy; that the queen alone, as head of the church, had the power of regulating the ceremonies of worſhip, and that it was dangerous for the commons to interfere in an affair of that kind. It was added, that the members would do well to take warning from former examples, not to meddle with ſuch matters. But the puritans were not ſo eaſily intimidated from their purpoſe: they exclaimed againſt the oppoſition of the courtiers to objects of the utmoſt importance. "The ſalvation of the ſoul (ſaid they) is in queſtion; a conſideration to which all the kingdoms of the earth are nothing in compariſon." This ſally of zeal, though highly approved in the houſe, did not weaken the general reſpect for the prerogative. It was determined to petition the queen for leave to proceed farther on this ſubject; and all debates were, for the preſent, laid aſide.

But Elizabeth was too much offended at the preſumption of Strickland, to paſs it over in ſilence. She ſent for him to the council, and commanded him not to appear any more in the houſe of commons. This peremptory order was too violent, even for the ſubmiſſive parliaments of that age to endure; it excited loud complaints in the houſe, and privileges before unclaimed were aſſerted to belong to the commons. It was juſtly obſerved, that Strickland was not a private man, but the repreſentative of a multitude; and that though the queen ought to ſupport her prerogative, it was limited by the laws: for as the ſovereign could not of himſelf make laws, ſo neither could he break them merely from his own authority. We ſhall ſee theſe noble ſeeds of liberty taking deeper root in ſucceeding reigns, and acquiring daily a greater force. They were now unable to contend with the authority of Elizabeth. But even that arbitrary princeſs, finding her exertion of power was likely to excite a great commotion, ſhe ſaved her honour by giving Strickland permiſſion to attend his duty in parliament.

Theſe proceedings, however harſh and alarming, did not terrify the puritans. Robert Bell made a motion againſt an excluſive patent granted to a company of merchants at Briſtol. He diſplayed the dangerous conſequences of this meaſure, and the great impediment it gave to the commerce of the kingdom. But the general opinion inveſted ſuch extenſive power in the crown, that theſe efforts of natural liberty were not crowned with ſucceſs. The majority of the members were ſo intimidated, that though they approved of theſe motions, they did not chuſe to ſupport them. To interfere in matters of government was conſidered as the moſt inſufferable temerity. So very different were the ideas of the conſtitution at that time from thoſe which ſoon after changed the form of adminiſtration.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the neighbouring ſtates were ravaged and laid waſte by religious wars. The prince of Condé was ſlain at the battle of Jarnac; and his ſon, with the young prince of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. placed at the head of the Hugonots. The admiral Coligny, always unfortunate, but always formidable in his miſfortunes, conſtantly ſupported the proteſtant party againſt the royal forces, headed by the ambitious Henry de Guiſe. Elizabeth ſaw the neceſſity of ſupporting the Hugonots, whoſe intereſts were connected with her own, notwithſtanding her hatred of all rebellion, and every ſpecies of oppoſition to the will of the ſovereign. Soon after, the whole army of the inſurgents was defeated at Montcontour, in Poictou, and the admiral himſelf dangerouſly wounded. The loſs of this battle ſeemed to have put a final period to the attempts of the Hugonots; and the court of France, perſuaded that the force of the rebels was totally annihilated, neglected to make any farther preparations againſt an enemy whom they thought could never more be dangerous. But they were miſtaken. Coligny appeared in another quarter of the kingdom, at the head of ſo powerful an army, that even the capital itſelf was in danger. It was now thought proper to have recourſe to negotiation; and a treaty was ſoon concluded, in which liberty of conſcience, and a pardon for their revolt, were once more granted them.

Deſpairing of ever being able to reduce the Hugonots by force, it was determined to have recourſe to policy, and to finiſh by the dagger of aſſaſſination what the ſword of war had attempted in vain. The perfidious Charles careſſed the people he intended to deſtroy. The terms of peace were ſtrictly obſerved; the toleration was regularly maintained; all attempts of the more zealous catholics to infringe it were puniſhed with ſeverity; offices and honours were beſtowed upon the principal nobility among the proteſtants; and the court openly declared, that they were determined to allow every perſon the free exerciſe of his religion, from a perſuaſion that there was no other method of reſtoring the peace of an exhauſted country, it being impoſſible to force the conſciences of mankind. An embaſſy was ſent to Elizabeth with propoſals of marriage with the duke of Anjou; a prince whoſe youth, beauty, and reputation for valour, it was ſuppoſed would recommend him to a woman of Elizabeth's diſpoſition. The artful policy of that princeſs appeared in a ſtronger light at this juncture than ever. She apparently conſented to a project inconſiſtent with her views, and which ſhe never meant to accompliſh. She had, indeed, very powerful reaſons for this artful diſſimulation. Her diſputes with Spain, with regard to the Low Countries, were alone ſufficient to make her have recourſe to every incident to amuſe the court of France. But this was not the only motive. The partizans of Mary, who had given her ſo much uneaſineſs, would be diſcouraged by the proſpect of an alliance between France and England. Elizabeth knew this, and determined to make uſe of the expedient.

The Low Countries felt more ſeverely than France the dreadful ſcourge of ſuperſtitious tyranny. Philip was determined to rule thoſe commercial provinces with a deſpotic power, and employed a man well qualified to execute his tyrannical deſign. Ferdinand of Toledo, duke of Alva, was the man ſelected by Philip for this purpoſe. He had been educated in a camp; and having obtained a conſummate knowledge of the military art, his habits led him to transfer into all governments the ſevere diſcipline of an army. This general, about three years ſince, had conducted into the Low Countries, from Italy, a powerful body of veteran Spaniſh forces. The Flemings, who were no ſtrangers to his ferocious character, and the inveterate hatred he entertained againſt them, were ſtruck with conſternation. Nor were they terrified in vain. The military executions of that unfeeling nobleman are ſhocking to humanity, and will hand down his name with infamy to the lateſt poſterity. All the privileges of that people were aboliſhed by edict; arbitrary and ſanguinary tribunals erected; the counts of Egmont and Horne, notwithſtanding all their merits and paſt ſervices, were brought to the ſcaffold; multitudes of all ranks were thrown into priſon, and thence delivered over to the hand of the executioner. He met with no reſiſtance; the people ſubmitted to his power; but this was not ſufficient to ſatisfy his ſlaviſh purpoſes: he proceeded in his career of cruelty; and nothing was heard of but confiſcation, impriſonment, exile, torture and death.

Driven to deſpair, great numbers of the Flemings took refuge in England, where they were protected by Elizabeth, and where they eſtabliſhed their uſeful manufactures, for which they had long been famous. It was impoſſible for the violent government of Alva to be of any long continuance, without exciting ſome dreadful commotion. Elizabeth declared, ſhe could not behold the deſtruction of a whole people without affording them aſſiſtance. She accordingly ſeized a large ſum of money which ſome Genoeſe merchants were ſending to Alva, for the payment of his forces. This reduced him to have recourſe to the moſt oppreſſive meaſures, which ſtill farther animated the Flemings againſt the Spaniſh government.

Exaſperated beyond the bounds of reaſon, Alva determined to raiſe diſturbances in England. He accordingly opened a ſecret correſpondence with Mary, queen of Scots, by means of one Rodolphi, a Florentine merchant, who had reſided many years in London, and managed all the intrigues between the catholics and the court of Rome. It was agreed that a powerful army of Spaniſh troops ſhould be landed in England, and at the ſame time, an inſurrection ſhould be excited in the heart of the kingdom. But Alva being perſuaded that the attempt could not poſſibly ſucceed unleſs ſome Engliſh nobleman of authority could be found to head the inſurgents, and inſpire them with courage; and no perſon appeared ſo proper for this purpoſe as the duke of Norfolk. Mary, who was now ſufficiently convinced of Elizabeth's duplicity, and deſpaired of ever recovering her crown, or even her liberty, by pacific meaſures, readily embraced the offer: while Norfolk, unable to recover the favour of Elizabeth, agreed to violate the promiſe he had made of breaking off all correſpondence with Mary. He engaged in this new conſpiracy; the promiſe of marriage was renewed between them; but he ſtill flattered himſelf that there was nothing criminal in his actions, as his ſole view was that of obtaining the queen's conſent to marry the captive princeſs. In conſequence of the duke's conſent, three letters were wrote in his name by Rodolphi, one to Alva, another to the pope, and a third to the king of Spain; but Norfolk, though very deſirous of delivering Mary from confinement, refuſed to ſign them. He could only be prevailed upon to ſend Baker, one of his confidents, to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, to vouch for their being authentic. The ſcheme was embraced with great alacrity by Alva and the pope, and every thing ſeemed to wear a very promiſing appearance.

Theſe proceedings could not long remain concealed in ſo prying a court as that of Elizabeth. Rodolphi, indeed, was beyond the reach of the Engliſh council, but one Bayley, a ſervant to the queen of Scots, whom Rodolphi had diſpatched with letters to Mary, the biſhop of Roſs, the duke of Norfolk, and the lord Lumley, was ſeized at Dover immediately upon his landing, and the letters ſent to lord Cobham, governor of the cinque ports; who being a friend to the duke of Norfolk, ſuffered the biſhop of Roſs to change the letters for others of leſs importance. Walſingham, Elizabeth's miniſter at Paris, had obtained ſome intelligence of this affair, and was perpetually alarming his miſtreſs with accounts of plots forming againſt her by Mary's party. The letters delivered by lord Cobham, contained no traces of any ſecret deſigns againſt the government, and ſuſpicions were entertained by the miniſtry, that theſe were other letters which had not reached their hands. Bayley was therefore ſent for to the council, and ſoon brought to confeſs all he had learned from Rodolphi, and that the original paquet he had brought over was in the poſſeſſion of the biſhop of Roſs.

Fearful of the conſequence, and ſuſpecting that his public character would not protect him, that prelate had wiſely ſecreted all his papers of any conſequence; and on the thirteenth of May, after undergoing a ſtrict examination before a committee of the council, he was given in cuſtody to the biſhop of Ely. Sir Thomas Stanley, Sir Thomas Gerrard, and one Rolſton were committed to the Tower on ſuſpicion. Hitherto nothing had appeared that could greatly effect the duke of Norfolk; but a ſubſequent tranſaction completed his ruin.

Mary was very deſirous of ſending a ſum of money to lord Herries, and her partizans in Scotland; and Norfolk undertook to convey it to Banniſter, a ſervant of his in the north, who was to find ſome expedient to have it delivered to lord Herries. The ſervant, to whom the money was intruſted, not being in the ſecret, and judging from the weight and ſize of the box that it was full of gold, carried it, together with a letter he was charged with to Banniſter, to Cecil, now lord Burleigh. Upon the diſcovery Banniſter and Hickford, the duke's ſecretary, were apprehended, and brought before the council. On being threatened with the torture they immediately confeſſed the whole, and as Hickford, though ordered to burn all Mary's letters, had concealed them under the mats of the duke's chamber, the miniſtry became poſſeſſed of ſufficient evidence againſt his maſter.

A. D. 1571. Ignorant of the diſcoveries made by Hickford, the duke, when cited before the council, denied every article of the charge brought againſt him, and though exhorted to merit the mercy of his ſovereign by a full confeſſion, he perſevered in his firſt declaration. He was therefore ſent to the Tower, and after being convicted of high-treaſon, finiſhed his life upon the ſcaffold. He died with great calmneſs and conſtancy, and was ſincerely regretted by the people, by whom he was greatly beloved. He had acquired their affections by his beneficence, generoſity, and affability. His anceſtors had long been conſidered as the leaders of the catholics; and this hereditary attachment, joined to the alliances of blood, had procured him the friendſhip of the moſt conſiderable men of that party; but as he had been educated among the reformers, was ſincerely devoted to their principles, and maintained that ſtrict decorum and regularity of life by which the proteſtants were at that time diſtinguiſhed; he thereby enjoyed the real felicity of being popular even in the moſt oppoſite factions. The height of his proſperity alone was the cauſe of his misfortunes, and engaged him in attempts from which his virtue and prudence would naturally have for ever kept him at a diſtance.

Very little alterations had happened in Scotland during theſe tranſactions: that unhappy kingdom ſtill remained in a ſtate of anarchy. Kirkaldy of Grange, who commanded in the caſtle of Edinburgh, having declared for Mary, the lords of her party, encouraged by his countenance, made themſelves maſters of the capital, and carried on a vigorous war againſt the regent, who was obliged to retire to Stirling. The inſurgents followed, and made themſelves maſters of his perſon; but percieving his friends at the head of a conſiderable body of troops, were advancing, they immediately put him to death. The earl of Mar was choſen regent in his room; but that nobleman found it impoſſible to govern ſo divided a country. At laſt the two courts of France and England, ordered their miniſters to negotiate a ceſſation of arms, which they accordingly effected. But this tranquillity was of no long duration; Mar ſoon after died of grief for the diſtracted ſtate of his country, and the earl of Morton elected to the regency. This nobleman had always been directed in his meaſures by Elizabeth, and it was now determined to ſupport effectually the party at the head of which he was placed. Sir Henry Killigrew was accordingly ſent ambaſſador into Scotland, where he found the partizans of Mary ſo diſcouraged by the diſcovery of Norfolk's conſpiracy, that they were glad to ſubmit to the royal authority, and accept an indemnity for all paſt offences.

France was now the theatre of cruelty, hardly equalled in the moſt barbarous ages. The deceitful peace granted to the Hugonots was pregnant with horrors that ſhock humanity. Charles, the more effectually to lull the proteſtants into a fatal ſecurity, offered his ſiſter in marriage to the prince of Navarre, and great preparations were made for celebrating the nuptials with uncommon ſplendor. Deceived by theſe perfidious arts, the leaders of the Hugonots flocked to Paris to be ſpectators of a ceremony which they imagined would for ever put a period to the civil wars which had ſo long waſted their country. The queen of Navarre died ſuddenly ſoon after her arrival, not without the moſt violent ſuſpicion of poiſon; and the admiral was dangerouſly wounded by a baſe aſſaſſin as he was returning to his lodgings. Charles, however, by redoubling his diſſimulation, was ſtill able to retain the Hugonots in their fatal ſecurity. He viſited the admiral, expreſſed the greateſt concern for his misfortune, and promiſed to take the ſevereſt vengeance on the aſſaſſin, and all his abettors. The eve of St. Bartholomew was appointed for putting in execution this horrid ſcheme. The duke of Guiſe, who was as the head of this infernal enterprize, communicated the king's intention to the intendant of Paris, who ordered the captains of the different wards, to arm the citizens privately, and when the alarm was given, to place lights in their windows, break into the houſes of the Hugonots, and put them all to the ſword without diſtinction. About midnight, when the whole city was wrapt in darkneſs, and the unſuſpecting victims folded in the arms of ſleep, the fatal alarm was given, and the catholics began the horrid butchery. The hatred they had long bore to the proteſtants ſteeled their breaſts againſt the feelings of humanity, and all conditions, ages, and ſexes, ſuſpected of any propenſity to that religion, were involved in an undiſtinguiſhed ruin. The ſtreets of Paris flowed with blood, and the catholics, after all their deteſted victims were deſtroyed, exerciſed on their dead bodies all the rage of the moſt licentious brutality. They ſeemed to regret that the work of death was over. Above five hundred gentlemen of rank and fortune periſhed in this maſſacre; and near ten thouſand of inferior condition. Among the former were admiral Coligny, his ſon-in-law Teligni, Sobize, Rochefoucaut, Pardillon, Piles, Lavardin; all perſons diſtinguiſhed by their births and talents, and whoſe only crime was their religion. Nor was the court of Paris yet ſatiated with blood. Orders were immediately diſpatched to all the provinces for continuing the ſanguinary ſacrifice. The people emulated the fury of the capital, and the proteſtants in Meaux, Orleans, Trope, Bourges, Angers, Tholouſe, Rouen, Lyons, and other cities, were butchered in the ſame inhuman manner. Even the young king of Navarre, and his couſin the prince of Condé, were devoted to deſtruction by the duke of Guiſe. Charles, however, would not ſuffer the ſentence to be executed; though he obliged them to purchaſe their ſafety by a ſeeming change in their religion.

Charles himſelf when he came ſeriouſly to reflect on this inhuman maſſacre was ſhocked with the thought, and endeavoured to conceal from the eyes of the world his barbarous perfidy. He pretended that a conſpiracy of the Hugonots againſt his perſon, was ſuddenly diſcovered, and that the ſeverity they ſuffered flowed entirely from neceſſity. He wiſhed to bury in oblivion a tranſaction that is ſhocking at once to religion and humanity. Fenelon, the French ambaſſador at London, abhorred the treachery, and did not heſitate to expreſs his grief. He bluſhed, he ſaid, to bear the name of a Frenchman. Being, however, ordered to juſtify the court of France, he demanded an audience of Elizabeth. He repaired to court, which ſeemed plunged in the abyſs of ſorrow. An aweful ſilence reigned through all the chambers of the royal apartment. The nobility, clad in deep mourning, were ranged on each ſide, and allowed him to paſs without interruption. Sorrow and indignation were painted in every countenance, and declared, in the ſtrongeſt language, the ſentiments of the Engliſh nation. The queen heard his apology with great coolneſs, and calmly anſwered, that ſuppoſing there had been a conſpiracy formed by the proteſtants, it was not neceſſary to have recourſe to ſuch cruel methods; that the ſame force that had murdered ſo many defenceleſs men, might eaſily have ſecured their perſons; and that by proceeding in a legal manner, diſtinctions might have been made between the guilty and the innocent; that Coligny, in particular, who was dangerouſly wounded, could not have fled from the juſtice of his prince; that cruel aſſaſſins were not the proper executors of juſtice; the ſword ſhould not be put into the hands of a ferocious multitude. She added, the future conduct of the king would more fully diſplay his real intentions; and that, in the mean time, ſhe ſhould proceed no farther than to lament the rigour, with which he had treated his ſubjects. Elizabeth well knew the power of the Guiſes, and their attachment to the queen of Scotland. She was therefore unwilling to break with a court that was capable of giving her ſo much uneaſineſs.

But though Elizabeth ſo cautiouſly avoided coming to extremities with Charles, whoſe union with the courts of Spain and Rome for the extirmination of the proteſtants, gave her ſo much anxiety, ſhe afforded protection to all the unhappy fugitives, who, on receiving intelligence of the maſſacre of their brethren, fled into England; and when the French ambaſſador made a propoſal from his maſter, to have them delivered up as rebellious fugitives, ſhe plainly told him, that humanity would not ſuffer her to refuſe an aſylum to ſo many wretches, who were driven by the barbarity of their enemies to ſeek refuge in a foreign country.

Nor did ſhe neglect the neceſſary meaſures for her own defence. She prepared for that attack which ſeemed inevitable from the combined power and violence of the catholics. She fortified Portſmouth; augmented her fleet; exerciſed her militia; cultivated popularity with her ſubjeſts; diſcharged the ſums ſhe had borrowed; and paid the debts which her father and brother had contracted. By theſe prudent meaſures ſhe gained the love and eſteem of her people, who were willing to ſacrifice their lives and fortunes in her defence. The nobility and gentry offered to levy an army of twenty-two thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, tranſport them into France, and maintain them ſix months at their own expence, in order to aſſiſt the Hugonots to retaliate on their perfidious enemies the miſeries they had ſuffered. When a nation is thus united, little is to be feared from the attempts of a foreign enemy.

The ſame principles which engaged her to aſſiſt the Hugonots in France, pleaded ſtrongly in favour of the diſtreſſed proteſtants in the Low-Countries; but the great power of Philip rendered her more cautious in her proceedings. That monarch ſent an ambaſſador to London, with remonſtrances againſt the conduct of Elizabeth. He complained that many of the Flemiſh exiles, who infeſted the ſeas, and robbed his maſter's ſubjects, were protected in England, contrary to the treaties ſubſiſting between the two courts. Unwilling to engage in an open rupture with Spain, Elizabeth publiſhed a proclamation, commanding all the Flemings, ſuſpected of rebellion, to depart the kingdom. But this was far from anſwering the views of the Spaniards. Driven to deſpair, theſe wretched exiles undertook the moſt dangerous expedients. William Vandermark, a perſon of diſtinction in the Netherlands, having collected a conſiderable number of his countrymen, left England in the beginning of April, and made himſelf maſter both of the Brill and Fluſhing. This ſucceſs raiſed the ſpirits of the Flemings; they flocked to his ſtandard, and before the end of the year, he was joined by the greater part of the provinces of Holland and Zealand.

William of Naſſau, prince of Orange, put himſelf at the head of the confederates, who formed, in proceſs of time, the moſt powerful republic in Europe. The duke of Alva, after being repulſed at the ſiege of Alcmaer, reſigned his government. Ten thouſand proteſtants delivered up to the executioner in the ſpace of five years, were to him a ſubject of triumph! So totally inſenſible was he to every principle of humanity, and to the gentle temper of the goſpel of peace! His ſucceſſors could not heal theſe wounds, which eternal hatred had taught to rankle.

A. D. 1573. The Hugonots in France were ſo far from being cruſhed from the late maſſacre, that they ſoon became more powerful and violent than ever. The prince of Condé, and ſoon after him the king of Navarre, retracted the abjuration that fear had extorted from them. Under theſe two chiefs the Hugonots were in a condition of revenging the blood of their brethren; and every thing again relapſed into confuſion. The catholics had, for ſome time, cloſely beſieged Rochelle, the bulwark of the proteſtants in France. The Hugonots made the moſt deſperate reſiſtance; and the duke of Anjou, who commanded the catholic army, loſt twenty-four thouſand men, without making any conſiderable progreſs in the ſiege. Anjou now perceived he had undertaken a taſk he was unable to perform, and ſincerely wiſhed that ſome incident might happen to preſerve his honour. His deſires were fulfilled. Advice arrived of his being elected king of Poland; and he immediately concluded a treaty with the inhabitants of Rochelle, in which their allies of Niſmes and Montaubon were comprehended.

A. D. 1574. Exaſperated at this miſcarriage, Charles called aloud for new ſeverities; but before he could carry them into execution, he paid the debt of nature on the thirtieth of May, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, after having rendered his name odious to all the world, and thrown an eternal ſtain of infamy upon his country. He died without iſſue, and was ſucceeded in the throne by his brother Henry, duke of Anjou, who had lately been elected king of Poland.

The affairs of Ireland, where the pope's deprivatory bull had very fatal effects, gave Elizabeth great uneaſineſs. She ſaw no end to the expence of ſupporting an army among a ferocious and bigotted people. The earl of Eſſex, an active young nobleman, offered a propoſal to the queen, for putting an end to the troubles in that iſland. Elizabeth accepted the offer; and it was agreed, that the earl ſhould tranſport to Ireland two hundred horſe, and four hundred foot, and maintain them there at his own expence; that theſe forces ſhould act againſt the rebels for two years, the queen furniſhing the ſame number during that period; and that the earl ſhould receive the commiſſion of captain-general for ſeven years. In conſideration of this ſervice, the queen agreed to inveſt him with half the lordſhips of Clandeboy, Ferney, and other lands of a great extent, which he agreed to people with as many ſoldiers as the queen ſhould think proper to maintain on the other half of theſe lordſhips. The expence of maintaining the fortifications was to be equally divided between the queen and the earl. Eſſex was ſo fond of this command, which placed him on the footing of a prince, that he borrowed ten thouſand pounds of Elizabeth, upon a mortgage of his lands in Eſſex; and landed in Ireland about the latter end of Auguſt, accompanied by the lords Dacres and Rich, three ſons of the lord Norris, and many other gentlemen of diſtinction, who ſerved under him as volunteers. He met with almoſt every difficulty that could be expected from an attempt of this kind. The lord deputy Fitz-Williams, thinking the command of Eſſex an encroachment on his own authority, ſecretly favoured the rebels, and greatly increaſed the obſtructions that naturally oppoſed the execution of this deſign. The earl ſoon perceived that the reduction of the rebels, while clandeſtinely aſſiſted by the Engliſh, was a taſk beyond his power. He, however, exerted all his abilities, but in vain: he was obliged to return to England, after having ſpent the greater part of his fortune.

A. D. 1575. Henry III. who aſcended the throne of France on the death of his brother, carried on the war with vigour againſt the Hugonots, who were now more formidable than ever; but ſoon found himſelf obliged to grant them a truce for ſix months, under the mediation of Elizabeth. This was the fifth pacification made with the Hugonots; but the terms were ſo diſgraceful to the crown of France, that the duke of Guiſe made no ſcruple to condemn openly the meaſures and maxims of his ſovereign. That old and daring leader embraced this opportunity of forming his party into a regular and conſiſtent body, and laid the foundation of that famous league, which, without paying any regard to the royal authority, aimed at the total extirpation of the Hugonots. Henry ſaw the conſequence, and laboured aſſiduouſly to adopt a new plan, by acting as arbitrator between the two parties, and, by balancing their power, to reduce both to a dependence upon himſelf. But all his attempts were rendered abortive. France was reduced to ſo wretched a condition by the former ſeverities of her princes, that toleration could be no longer practiſed; and an edict for liberty of conſcience, which would, probably, have ſatisfied the proteſtants, inflamed the reſentment of the Catholics, and threatened the kingdom with anarchy.

A. D. 1576. The prince of Orange ſtill ſupported the confederacy of Holland and Zealand againſt all the attempts of Lewis Zuniga, who ſucceeded the duke of Alva in the government of the Netherlands. But finding it would be impoſſible to continue the oppoſition much longer without ſome foreign aſſiſtance, he ſent a deputation to Elizabeth, imploring her protection; and offering to acknowledge her for their ſovereign, if ſhe would engage in their defence. The queen rejected a ſovereignty which ſhe could not ſupport without carrying on the moſt dangerous wars; but promiſed to uſe all her influence in negotiations with Philip in their favour. An ambaſſador was accordingly diſpatched to the court of Spain; but Philip found means to evade a categorical anſwer, and the war continued to rage with as much violence as ever. An accident delivered the Hollanders, when they were driven to the very brink of deſtruction. Ziniga died ſuddenly; and the Spaniſh troops, diſcontented for want of pay, and licentious for want of a proper commander, broke out into the moſt dreadful mutiny. They ſacked and plundered the cities of Antwerp and Maeſtricht, and maſſacred near ſeventeen thouſand perſons of all ages and ſexes; nor was there any poſſibility of preventing their dreadful outrages. They menaced all the cities of the Low Countries with the ſame fate. Alarmed at the deſtruction that awaited them, all the provinces, that of Luxembourg excepted, engaged in an aſſociation for their mutual defence; and diſpatched a deputation to the prince of Orange, imploring his protection, and requeſting that he would put himſelf at their head. Conferences were immediately opened at Ghent; and an union was formed between the provinces, called the Pacification of Ghent. By this treaty, which was ſigned on the eighth of November, the contracting parties declared, that they had entered into this union for the defence of the laws and liberties of their country, againſt the encroachments, oppreſſions and cruelties, long exerciſed on them by the Spaniards. At the ſame time, they declared, that, notwithſtanding this treaty, they were ſtill willing to acknowledge the king of Spain's authority, provided he would govern them according to the antient laws. This union being formed, the fortreſſes raiſed by the duke of Alva, to keep the Netherlands in ſubjection, were every where demoliſhed; and the nobility and clergy ſoon after aſſembled at Bruſſels, and took a ſolemn oath to obſerve inviolably the articles of the aſſociation. Philip was now reduced to the mortifying alternative of either governing according to the laws eſtabliſhed by his predeceſſors, or content himſelf with the bare title of ſovereign, while the regal authority was exerciſed by others.

The troubles of Ireland ſtill continuing, the earl of Eſſex was ſent back to that kingdom, with the title of earl-marſhal, in the room of Sir Nicholas Bagnal. But he ſoon perceived, that notwithſtanding his new dignity, he was little more than a private officer. He, however, exerted all his abilities to reduce that turbulent people to order, but without effect; and he died a few months after his arrival, not without ſuſpicion of having been poiſoned by ſome of the creatures of the earl of Leiceſter, who was his declared enemy. What tended to give weight to this conjecture, was the imprudent behaviour of Leiceſter himſelf, who immediately divorced his own wife, and married the widow of the earl of Eſſex.

A. D. 1577. Don John of Auſtria, famous for the glorious victory he had obtained over the Turks at Lepanto, was made governor of the Netherlands. He was naturally of an aſpiring genius, and, encouraged by the ſucceſs that had hitherto attended him in all his undertakings, projected a ſcheme for rendering himſelf one of the moſt powerful princes in Europe. After reducing the revolted provinces of the Netherlands to obedience, he propoſed, by the aſſiſtance of the pope and the king of Spain, to land a powerful army in England, releaſe the queen of Scots, and carry into execution the bull fulminated at Rome for dethroning Elizabeth. The prince of Orange, informed of his deſign with regard to the Scottiſh princeſs, imparted the ſecret to Elizabeth; who, fearing the conſequences of his ambition, no longer ſcrupled to aſſiſt the oppreſſed confederates, whoſe liberties ſeemed now to be intimately connected with her own ſafety.

But Don John was not formed for healing the diſputes in the Netherlands. He ſcorned to have recourſe to lenient meaſures; and not thinking himſelf ſafe in Bruſſels, ſeized the caſtle of Namur. This violent proceeding convinced the ſtates, that they had nothing to expect from their new governor, and prepared to defend their liberties, which it was ſufficiently evident Don John intended to wreſt from them. They accordingly diſpatched the marquis of Hautree, and Adolphus Meetkirck, to Elizabeth, to vindicate their proceedings, and ſollicit the loan of an hundred thouſand pounds for eight months. Elizabeth very readily granted their requeſt, but inſiſted that certain towns of the Netherlands ſhould be bound for the payment. At the ſame time, ſhe entered into a treaty with them, whereby it was ſtipulated, That the queen ſhould furniſh them with five thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, to be paid by the Flemings, but commanded by an Engliſh general; that this commander ſhould have a ſeat in the council of the ſtates; that nothing ſhould be determined concerning war or peace, without previouſly imparting it either to the queen or to him; that they ſhould enter into no league without her conſent; that if any difference happened among themſelves, it ſhould be ſubmitted to her arbitration; and that if any prince, on any pretence whatever, ſhould attempt hoſtilities againſt her, they ſhould ſend to her aſſiſtance an army equal to that ſhe had employed in their defence.

Elizabeth did not, however, intend to declare openly againſt Spain. She ſent an ambaſſador to that court, where he preſented a memorial on the twentieth of December, importing, that the queen by no means intended to break the ancient alliance concluded with the houſe of Burgundy; that with this view ſhe had refuſed the ſovereignty of Holland and Zealand, when offered her; had adviſed the prince of Orange to return to his allegiance, and even threatened him with her diſpleaſure in caſe of refuſal. She added, that ſhe would ſtill continue in the ſame friendly intentions, and exert all her intereſt to compromiſe the preſent differences, provided Don John, whom ſhe could not but regard as her mortal enemy, was recalled, ſome other prince, more popular, ſubſtituted in his place, the Spaniſh forces withdrawn, and the Flemings reſtored to their ancient liberties. If theſe conditions were accepted, the queen promiſed, if the Flemings ſtill continued obſtinate, to join her arms to thoſe of the king of Spain, and force them to a compliance. Philip, who was far from being pleaſed with the interpoſition of the queen, gave an evaſive anſwer, but ſtill continued to furniſh Don John with troops and money.

During theſe tranſactions on the continent, England enjoyed a profound tranquillity, owing chiefly to the prudence and vigour of the queen's adminiſtration, and to the wiſe precautions ſhe employed in all her meaſures. Firm, but diſcreet in her deportment, ſhe ſupported the church of England without alienating, by perſecution, thoſe who refuſed to embrace its tenets. She eſtabliſhed no inquiſition into men's boſoms; ſhe impoſed no oaths of ſupremacy, except on thoſe who enjoyed places of truſt, or received emoluments from the public. Though the exerciſe of all religious worſhip, except that of the church of England, was prohibited, ſhe connived at the meetings of the catholics, ſhewed leſs indulgence to the puritans, and never exerciſed the ſeverity of the laws, but to maintain the public order and tranquillity. Had the courts of France and Spain imitated the prudent conduct of the Engliſh princeſs, they might have derived from it the utmoſt advantages, both to church and ſtate.

A. D. 1578. Don John had, by this time, conceived ſo thorough a contempt for the ſtates, and hatred to the Engliſh, that he liſtened to no propoſition, but that of a vigorous proſecution of the war. He had even proceeded ſo far, as to execute Ratcliffe, a perſon of quality, who had been driven out of England on account of his religion; but was unfortunate enough to be taken for a ſpy ſent by Walſingham to murder Don John. Deaf to all propoſals for a ceſſation of arms, the war was carried on with vigour by the Auſtrian prince, who was bravely ſeconded by Alexander, prince of Parma, one of the beſt ſoldiers of that, or any other age. John received from Italy and Spain vaſt ſupplies both of men and money; but notwithſtanding his power daily increaſed, the prince of Orange found means to prevail on the city of Amſterdam to declare in his favour. Alarmed at this acquiſition, the court of Spain offered to recall Don John, and to ſubſtitute in his room either the prince of Parma, the archduke Ferdinand, or even the archduke Matthias, provided the ſtates would return to their duty. The offer was refuſed, and the operations of war were continued with the utmoſt fury. Don John knew that the army of the ſtates lay in a ſtrong camp at Rimenant, and that they expected a ſtrong reinforcement of French troops, under the command of the duke of Anjou; and that prince Caſſimire was advancing to join them, with a German army in the pay of the ſtates. He therefore propoſed, in a council of war, to attack the enemy before they were joined by their reinforcements. This motion was ſtrongly oppoſed by the prince of Parma; but his reaſons were not thought ſufficient, and it was reſolved to attack the confederate army. The battle was fought with amazing perſeverance, and the Engliſh and Scotch auxiliaries diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a very particular manner: they oppoſed the whole Spaniſh forces; and had it not been for the amazing genius of the prince of Parma, Don John's army muſt have been inevitably ruined.

Philip was now convinced that he had every thing to fear from the power of Elizabeth. He ſaw that the invaſion of England, projected by Don John, was at a vaſt diſtance; and therefore entered into a freſh negotiation with the pope, for raiſing troubles againſt Elizabeth in Ireland. One Steukley, a native of England, whom the pope had created marquis of Leinſter, was engaged to command the expedition, and alſo to attempt to deſtroy the royal navy of England. Philip, deſirous of concealing his being concerned in this attempt, it was agreed that it ſhould be made in the name of his holineſs; and that his natural ſon, James Boncampagni, ſhould be declared king of Ireland. Steukley, on his arrival in the Tagus, was prevailed upon to accompany Don Sebaſtian, king of Portugal, in making a deſcent in Africa againſt the Moors. This put a final period to the expedition. Steukley and his whole detachment were cut to pieces, and Don Sebaſtian himſelf fell by the ſwords of the infidels. A few of the Spaniſh and Italian troops, who purſued their courſe when Steukeley entered the Tagus, landed in Ireland, and animated the Iriſh, who were then zealous catholics, though a barbarous people, to continue in rebellion to the Engliſh. But the enterprize had no ſucceſs. The foreign troops were cut in pieces, and about fifteen hundred of the Iriſh put to death by order of the government; a very cruel execution, and with which Elizabeth was greatly diſſatisfied.

A. D. 1580. Hitherto Scotland had been retained in ſtrict alliance with Elizabeth, by the influence of Morton the regent, who had alſo reſtored the domeſtic tranquillity of that unhappy kingdom. But among a people regardleſs of laws, and agitated with religious controverſies, it could not be expected that the authority of a regent could be long ſupported. Factions were formed among the nobility, who were diſguſted with Morton's avarice; while the clergy, whoſe narrow revenues were ſtill farther invaded, joined the diſcontented party, and encreaſed the confuſion. Alarmed at his dangerous ſituation, and oppreſſed with the increaſing weight of government, the regent dropt ſome peeviſh expreſſions, implying a deſire of being relieved from the care of conducting the adminiſtration. This conceſſion, whether real or pretended, was readily ſeized by the oppoſite party, and he was diſmiſſed from the regency. Morton, who flattered himſelf that a general pardon which was now paſſed, would render abortive all the deſigns of his enemies, reſigned his authority in the hands of the young king, who was then only eleven years of age. James determined to hold himſelf the reins of government, and conduct, in his own name, the adminiſtration of the affairs of the kingdom. The regent ſeemed at firſt determined never more to engage in the buſy ſcenes of active life; but ſeek in domeſtic affairs that tranquillity which was not to be found in the hurry of a court, and amidſt the contentions of turbulent parties. But either his ambition would not ſuffer him to continue in the ſhades of obſcurity, or he did not find in retirement that tranquillity he expected, for he returned again to court, acquired the aſcendant in the council, and directed as before all the affairs of the adminiſtration, but without reſuming the title of regent. The oppoſite party ſaw their danger, and flew to arms, under pretence of reſcuing their prince from captivity. Both parties endeavoured to gain the protection of Elizabeth; but that of Morton prevailed, and he was ſuffered to continue at the head of the adminiſtration. The oppoſite party, however, daily encreaſed, and the power of the regent ſeemed to be placed on a ſandy foundation.

The duke of Guiſe embraced the opportunity of ſupporting the party formed againſt Morton. He ſent over the count d'Aubigney, a deſcendant of the houſe of Lenox, and couſin-german to the young king's father, to detach that prince from the Engliſh intereſt. D'Aubigney was poſſeſſed of all the talents neceſſary for effecting the projected deſign. He had been educated in France, was poſſeſſed of an inſinuating addreſs, and of a pleaſing diſpoſition. Guiſe was not miſtaken. D'Aubigney ſoon gained the affections of the young monarch: and joining his intereſts with James Stuart, of the houſe of Ochiltree, a young man of great parts, but of the moſt profligate manners, who was already in great favour with the king, he inſtilled into the tender mind of James, principles of politics and government, very different from thoſe in which he had been educated. He painted, in the moſt glaring colours, the great injuſtice of depoſing his mother, and detaining her a priſoner in England. James was greatly affected at the ſufferings his royal parent had endured, and wiſhed either to reſign the adminiſtration into her hands, or aſſociate her with him in the government. Alarmed at the great progreſs daily made by this party in Scotland, Elizabeth diſpatched Sir Robert Bowes to Stirling, where James then reſided, to warn the king of that danger that would inevitably enſue, if he continued to liſten to the falſe ſuggeſtions of d'Aubigney now created earl of Lenox.

Deſirous, if poſſible, of preventing Elizabeth from aſſiſting the party of Morton, James ſent excuſes to the court of London; but Lenox, perceiving that the Engliſh princeſs was determined to ruin him, reſolved, if poſſible, to overturn the Scottiſh government, as the only expedient that remained to ſupport his intereſt. Morton was conſidered as the head of the oppoſite party, and his ruin was therefore neceſſary. He was accordingly arreſted at the council board, committed to priſon, accuſed of being an accomplice in the late king's murder, and condemned to ſuffer as a traitor. He confeſſed upon his trial that he was not ignorant of Bothwell's deſign, but denied his having ever given his conſent to that atrocious act. He added, that he ſhould have revealed it either to Henry or Mary, had not the danger to which he muſt have been expoſed, deterred him from purſuing his deſign; Henry poſſeſſing neither reſolution nor conſtancy, and Mary appearing to him to be an accomplice in the crime. Great intereſt was made in behalf of Morton. The queen diſpatched Sir Thomas Randolph into Scotland, and that ambaſſador exerted all his influence in favour of the late regent. He even engaged the earls of Argyle, Montroſe, Angus, Marre, and Glencarne, to enter into a confederacy for protecting, even by force of arms, the life of the priſoner. At the ſame time, an Engliſh army moved towards the frontiers of Scotland, to give weight to the interceſſions of the ambaſſador. The French party ſaw the danger of delaying the execution of the ſentence, and Morton finiſhed his life upon the ſcaffold. He died with the ſame conſtancy and reſolution he had always diſplayed in every action of his life; and had his probity and virtue been equal to his abilities, he might have been conſidered as one of the moſt accompliſhed ſtateſmen of the age.

This revolution in Scotland rendered Elizabeth extremely uneaſy. She knew that her inveterate enemy, the duke of Guiſe, would take every opportunity of ſupporting the prevailing party; and that the popiſh faction in England would readily join in any attempt to diſturb the government. She was alſo fearful leſt Philip, who ſeemed deſirous of ſupporting the cauſe of Mary, might embrace the opportunity of aſſiſting the king's party in Scotland, in revenge for the reinforcements of troops, ſhe had ſent into the Low-Countries.

A. D. 1580. During theſe tranſactions, the papiſts were not idle in endeavouring to diſturb the tranquillity of England. Seminaries had for ſome time been eſtabliſhed at Douay, Rheims, and Rome, for the education of Engliſh youth intended for the prieſthood; ſome ſpecies of literature being conſidered as abſolutely neceſſary to ſupport the doctrines of the Romiſh church, againſt the attacks of the proteſtants. Theſe ſeminaries ſent over every year a colony of prieſts, who having imbibed all the abſurd tenets of the catholics, maintained them with all the force of bigotted enthuſiaſm. They had imbibed the ſtrongeſt deſire of obtaining the crown of martyrdom, and therefore were not to be deterred from propagating their principles by any dangers, fatigues or ſufferings. They endeavoured to perſuade the people, that Elizabeth, who had been ſolemnly and publicly anathematized by the holy father, ſhould be treated as an uſurper, a ſchiſmatic, a heretic; that no faith ſhould be held with princes whom the church had excommunicated, and that it was lawful to effectuate the purpoſe by ſedition, by rebellion, and even by aſſaſſination. Parſons and Campian, two jeſuits famous for their abilities in caſuiſtry and prevarication, were the great ſupporters of theſe deteſtable principles. The latter was ſoon after detected in treaſonable practices, and publickly executed.

While England was alarmed by the practices of the catholics. Sir Francis Drake returned from his voyage round the world. This intrepid ſeaman was a native of Devonſhire; and introduced at court by the vice-chamberlain Hatton, on propoſing to paſs into the South Seas through the ſtreights of Magellan, lan, a voyage till that time unattempted by the Engliſh. Drake's fleet conſiſted only of the five following veſſels, for none of them deſerved the name of ſhips: the Pelican, of an hundred tons, commanded by himſelf; the Elizabeth of eighty tons, under captain John Winter; the Marygold, a bark of thirty tons, commanded by captain John Thomas; the Swan, a fly-boat of thirty tons, under captain John Cheſter; and the Chriſtopher, a pinnace of fifteen tons, under captain Thomas Moon. On board this ſmall ſquadron were embarked one hundred and ſixty-four men, and the gallant admiral ſailed on a voyage, which, with ſuch ſmall ſhips, would, even in our times, be conſidered as a very raſh undertaking. He ſoon found that his veſſels were too ſmall for the tempeſtuous ſeas near the ſtreights of Magellan, and entered the pacific ocean with only his own ſhip. During his cruiſes in the South ſea, he took a prodigious booty from the Spaniards, who expected no enemy in that diſtant part of the world. He ſacked and plundered the town of Arica, and in one ſhip took four hundred pounds weight of Baldivian gold. Hardly any oppoſition was made by the Spaniards; Drake eaſily loaded the Pelican with gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones. But he ſoon after learned that the vice-roy of Peru had fitted out two large ſhips, and ſent them to cruize near the ſtreights of Magellan, in order to intercept him in his return. A new paſſage was therefore to be attempted, as he was in no condition to fight the two Spaniſh ſhips fitted out to intercept him. He firſt endeavoured to find a paſſage by the north of California; but failing in that enterprize, he ſailed for the Eaſt Indies, and returned ſafely by the Cape of Good-Hope. The return of Drake animated the Engliſh, who were now deſirous of ſharing in the riches of South America; and his name became celebrated on account of his bold and fortunate attempt.

It was, however, apprehended that this attack upon the Spaniſh territories in South America, would occaſion an open war with Spain, an event which it was thought ſhould, if poſſible, be avoided at this juncture. It was therefore moved in the council, that the queen ſhould diſown the enterprize, puniſh Drake, and reſtore the treaſure. But Elizabeth rejected the propoſal; ſhe loved valour, and determined to protect that intrepid ſeaman, againſt all the machinations of his enemies. She accepted a banquet from him on board the ſhip which had performed ſo memorable a voyage, and conferred on the commander the honour of knighthood. The Spaniſh ambaſſador did not fail to make complaints againſt what he called the piraces of Drake. But he was told by Elizabeth, that no treaty with his catholic majeſty excluded her ſubjects from trading in the South Seas; that ſhe could not conſider all South America as the property of the king of Spain, as he held it by no better title than a donation from the biſhop of Rome, who having no right over thoſe countries himſelf, could convey none to another, and whoſe authority both in temporal and civil matters ſhe diſowned. She added, that the inſignificant ceremonies practiſed by the Spaniards in taking poſſeſſion of ſuch immenſe tracts of land in America, ſhould never preclude her from ſending colonies thither, nor would ſhe even ſubmit to ſuffer the ocean to be claimed as the property of any prince or perſon. She, however, ordered part of the treaſure to be reſtored to Pedro Sebura, a Spaniard, who pretended to be an agent from the merchants whoſe effects Drake had ſeized; but underſtanding afterwards that Philip had ſequeſtered the money, ſhe refuſed to make any farther reſtitution.

A. D. 1581. The great expences that had attended the government, obliged Elizabeth to call a parliament, who granted the queen a ſupply of one ſubſidy and two fifteenths, and enacted ſeveral laws for the ſecurity of the government, chiefly againſt the attempts of the catholics, who had occaſioned many diſturbances. It was enacted, that whoever reconciled any perſon to the church of Rome, or was himſelf reconciled, ſhould be guilty of treaſon: to ſay maſs was ſubject to penalty of a year's impriſonment, and a fine of two hundred marks: whoever abſented himſelf during a whole month from the ſervice of the church, was ſubject to a fine of twenty pounds. The uttering ſlanderous or ſeditious words againſt the queen, was puniſhable, for the firſt offence, with the pillory and loſs of ears; the ſecond offence was declared felony. The writing or printing ſuch words, was felony, even for the firſt offence.

Paul Wentworth, brother to the member of that name, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the preceding parliament, and who was not to be intimidated by the frown of authority, made a motion for a ſolemn faſt to be obſerved by the members of the houſe on the twenty-ninth of January. This motion ſeems to have been made merely to try the ſtrength of the puritan party, who were diſguſted with Elizabeth for the rigorous manner in which ſhe aſſerted her ſupremacy, by diſcouraging all motions for the reformation of diſcipline and ceremonies in the church. This motion was warmly oppoſed by the court party, but was carried by a majority of fifteen. The queen was highly offended at this raſh proceedings of the commons. She ſent for the ſpeaker and ſeverely reprimanded him for ſuffering a motion of that kind to be debated in that houſe. This was followed by a meſſage delivered by vice-chancellor Hatton, containing a ſharp reproach for their proceedings in a matter which ſo nearly concerned the ſupremacy of her majeſty, and which ſhe had ſo often declared ſhe would never ſuffer them to touch. This meſſage being read, Hatton made a motion, that the houſe ſhould make a ſubmiſſion to the queen, acknowledge their fault, and promiſe never more to be guilty of a ſimilar offence. This motion was ſtrenuouſly ſupported by the courtiers, and the majority ſubmitted to kiſs the rod of power. Some of the puritans, however, oppoſed it, but in vain: and when one of the members roſe to ſpeak for the privileges of the houſe, the ſpeaker immediately ſtopped his harangue, declaring he would hear nothing "that might give offence to her majeſty." So little power and authority did the commons of England at that time enjoy!

The attention of Elizabeth was now wholly directed towards the Spaniſh monarchy. Philip had acquired the crown of Portugal, and the prince of Parma made ſuch rapid advances in ſubduing the Netherlands, that there was little hopes the confederates would be able to reſiſt much longer the formidable armies of Spain, under the command of ſo conſummate a general. The queen flattered herſelf, that the noble oppoſition made by the ſtates of the Netherlands, would exhauſt the treaſure of Philip, and render his attempt at laſt abortive. But the great acceſſion of riches and naval power, which the Spaniſh monarch had acquired with the crown of Portugal, convinced her that theſe flattering hopes were chimerical, and that it was abſolutely neceſſary to ſeek the protection of ſome powerful alliance to balance the ambitious deſigns of the aſpiring monarch. The animoſity which ſtill ſubſiſted between the king of France and the duke of Guiſe, who had now entered into a cloſe confederacy with Philip, ſeemed to point out an alliance between the ſovereigns of France and England, while the general apprehenſions entertained by all Europe of the fatal conſequences that might attend the farther acquiſition of Philip's power, ſeemed to require ſome great and powerful union to prevent its progreſs.

A treaty of marriage between the duke of Anjou and Elizabeth had been for ſome time negotiating, and a reſolution was now taken to finiſh the treaty. The duke had long been convinced that political reaſons alone would never be ſufficient to anſwer the intended purpoſe; and he accordingly ſent over Simier, an agent of his own, to act in conjunction with his brother's ambaſſador. He could not have ſent a perſon more likely to anſwer his purpoſe. Simier was artful and intriguing, of inſinuating addreſs and agreeable converſation. Inſtead of entering into the ſerious reaſons of political intereſt, he entertained the queen with the topics of paſſion and gallantry. Elizabeth liſtened to his diſcourſe, and Simier ſoon inſinuated himſelf ſo firmly into the queen's favour, that he obtained a more ready acceſs to her perſon, than even the moſt favoured miniſters of ſtate. Leiceſter, who had laughed at every preceding treaty of marriage, was now ſufficiently alarmed; he feared that the queen was at laſt caught in her own ſnare, and that the young Frenchman had really engaged her affections. He was acquainted with the arts of Simier, and exerted all his power to render him odious; he even took advantage of the credulity of the times, and ſpread reports, that Simier had gained an aſcendant over the queen, not by any natural principles of her conſtitution, but by love potions and incantations. Simier was exaſperated at theſe unmanly proceedings, and determined to ruin the credit of Leiceſter. He accordingly revealed to the queen a ſecret which none of her courtiers dared to diſcover; the marriage of Leiceſter with the widow of the late earl of Eſſex, which he had carefully concealed from Elizabeth. The diſcovery anſwered the purpoſe of Simier; the queen was ſo provoked at this action, that ſhe threatened to ſend Leiceſter a priſoner to the Tower, and to prevent the effects of his reſentment, took the Frenchman under her own protection.

Encouraged by the accounts he received from his agent, and deſirous of finiſhing a treaty pregnant with ſo many advantages, the duke of Anjou determined to paſs over into England and ſollicit his ſuit in perſon. He accordingly landed at Dover, and ſecretly viſited the queen at Greenwich. Anjou had no reaſon to be diſpleaſed with his viſit; he loſt no ground in being perſonally known to Elizabeth. For ſoon after his departure ſhe commanded Burleigh, now lord treaſurer, Suſſex, Leiceſter, Bedford, Lincoln, Hatton, and ſecretary Walſingham, to concert with the French ambaſſadors the terms of the intended treaty. And as Henry, deſirous of freeing France from the reſtleſs ambition, the enterprizing though timid diſpoſition of the duke of Anjou, had given his plenipotentiaries almoſt unlimitted powers to agree to all the demands of the court of England, the conditions of the treaty were ſoon ſettled, and the inſtrument ready for the royal ſignet. It was agreed, that the marriage ſhould be celebrated within ſix weeks after the ratification of the articles; that the duke and his retinue ſhould enjoy the free exerciſe of their religion; that after the marriage was ſolemnized, the duke of Anjou ſhould enjoy the title of king, but that the management of affairs ſhould continue ſolely in Elizabeth; that their children, male or female, ſhould ſucceed to the crown of England; that if there ſhould be two males, the eldeſt, in caſe of Henry's death, without iſſue, ſhould be king of France, and the younger of England; that if there ſhould be one male only, and he ſhould ſucceed to both the crowns of France and England, he ſhould be obliged to reſide eight months every two years in the latter kingdom; that the laws and cuſtoms of England ſhould be obſerved inviolate; and that no foreigner ſhould be promoted by the duke to any office in England.

Though theſe articles were as favourable as poſſible to the Engliſh, and though there was very little probability that Elizabeth, who was then in her forty-ninth year, ſhould have any children by the duke of Anjou, this treaty ſpread an alarm through the whole kingdom. It was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by all her favourite miniſters, and the queen herſelf, as a proof of her remaining uncertainty, added a clauſe, by which it was declared, that ſhe was not bound to complete the marriage till farther articles, not ſpecified in the treaty, ſhould be agreed upon between the parties, and till the king of France ſhould be certified of their agreement. Walſingham was, therefore, diſpatched to Paris, in order to form the cloſeſt connections with Henry, and enter into a league offenſive and defenſive againſt the increaſing power, and dangerous uſurpations of Spain.

But theſe indications of the queen's irreſolution were not ſufficient to baniſh the fears of the Engliſh: the dreadful conſequences of marrying a catholic were ſtill recent in the minds of the proteſtants; the idea of the flames of perſecution that raged in Mary's reign, excited a deteſtation in the people againſt the cruelties of the Roman pontiff and all his adherent's. In the mean time Walſingham purſued his inſtructions with the utmoſt aſſiduity; but had the mortification to perceive that the reſolutions of Elizabeth were fluctuating and unſettled. Sometimes he received orders to purſue the negotiation for completing the marriage preferable to that of the league; and at others ſhe declared for the league in preference to the marriage. The miniſter was aſtoniſhed at this inconſiſtent conduct in the queen, and the whole privy-council were doubtful what would be the reſult of this conteſt between inclination and reaſon, love and ambition.

The duke of Anjou, who had undertaken the defence of the Low Countries, was now ſo greatly diſtreſſed for want of money, that he had been obliged to put his army into cantonments. This inability of the duke alarmed the confederates. The prince of Orange ſaw the artful web of policy, he had been weaving ſo many years ready to be cut in pieces by the ſword of the prince of Parma: his laſt effort was to perſuade the ſtates to throw off even their nominal obedience to the crown of Spain. Accordingly, in an aſſembly of the confederates at Antwerp, he repreſented the neceſſity they were under of either ſubmitting to the terms preſcribed by the Spaniards, or of ſhaking from their necks the yoke of a tyrannical and perfidious maſter, by diſclaiming his authority, and uniting under the duke of Anjou, who had already been declared protector of their liberties. He obſerved, that as the marriage of the duke with the queen of England was on the point of being concluded, there was all the reaſon in the world to imagine that Elizabeth would look upon his quarrel as her own; that all the rules of good policy engaged his brother, the king of France, to ſupport him in his new acquired dignity; and that Hainault and Artois, together with French Flanders, which was now returned to the Spaniſh yoke, would then undoubtedly follow the example of the other ſtates, and join in the confederacy. Theſe reaſons, however powerful, did not appear ſufficient to induce the ſtates to embrace the offer immediately; they did not think the provocations they had received from the king of Spain, could diſſolve the allegiance they owed their ſovereign. But the imprudent conduct of Philip effected what their leader attempted in vain. He proſcribed the prince of Orange, and ſet a price of twenty-five thouſand crowns upon his head. Exaſperated at this tyrannical action, the ſtates immediately aſſembled, and declared, by proclamation, that Philip, king of Spain, had forfeited the ſovereignty of the Low Countries, by violating, contrary to his oath, the privileges of the people; "That therefore the provinces, in conſequence of the permiſſion given them by Philip himſelf, when they recognized him to be prince of Flanders, and before they owed him any allegiance, voluntarily, and of their own proper motion, had choſen for their prince Philip Valois, duke of Anjou, and brother to the king of France."

This reſolution being taken by the ſtates, a formal deputation was ſent to the duke, inviting him to come and take poſſeſſion of the principality of the Low Countries; but before this could be effected, ſome very alarming difficulties muſt be overcome. The active prince of Parma had, with incredible expedition, marched his army towards French Flanders, the provinces where the duke's chief intereſt lay, and ſat down before the city of Cambray. Anjou immediately advanced to raiſe the ſiege, at the head of a well-diſciplined army of twenty thouſand men. Parma puſhed the ſiege with great violence; but not being able to make himſelf maſter of the place before the duke's arrival, he was obliged to abandon the undertaking, and retreat with ſome precipitation, his forces conſiſting only of five thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe. Soon after, Pompone de Bellievre arrived in the prince of Parma's camp, with letters from the king of France, diſowning and diſclaiming the duke's behaviour, and offering a ceſſation of arms till every thing could be accommodated in a friendly manner. But the prince of Parma treated this as a mere artifice; and, upon his retreat, the duke of Anjou drove the Spaniards out of the Cambreſis. His ſucceſs was not, however, ſufficient to ſupport his army; money was wanting; and unleſs a very conſiderable ſum could be procured, all his conqueſts were in danger of reverting again into the hands of the enemy. The moſt preſſing applications were made to Elizabeth, and ſhe remitted the duke an hundred thouſand crowns; which, with his own revenues, and the aſſiſtance of his brother and the queen dowager, he was enabled to pay his troops, and extend his conqueſts.

About the middle of November, the duke of Anjou landed in England, and was received with great magnificence and affection by Elizabeth. Every action betrayed her tenderneſs. She ſeemed, at laſt indifferent about concealing it. The truth is, ſhe ſeems not to have known how far either ambition or affection would carry her; and notwithſtanding all her prudence, to have been deceived by both. In the midſt of the pomp which attended the anniverſary of her coronation, ſhe was ſeen, after a long and intimate diſcourſe with him, to take a ring from her own finger, and put it upon his. This unguarded action was conſtrued into an abſolute promiſe of marriage by all the ſpectators, and that ſhe was deſirous of ſignifying her intentions to all the world. Expreſſes were immediately ſent to every part of the kingdom, as well as to all the courts of Europe. Perhaps Elizabeth, in that critical moment, when ſhe ſeemed diſſolved in ſoftneſs, was ignorant that ambition would evermore gain the aſcendency in her ſoul. But ſhe no ſooner reflected on the conſequences that might poſſibly reſult from ſuffering the ſofter paſſions to prevail, than ſhe ſhuddered at the precipitate ſtep ſhe was going to take; a ſtep by which, perhaps, ſhe was to loſe all the glories her wiſdom, her courage, and her perſeverance, crowned with perpetual ſucceſs, could impart. She was ready to divide her power, by which all England was obedient to her nod, and all Europe in terror of her frown, with a young man of untried temper, of foreign education, and of a different religion. She was to hear the diſcontents, the reproaches, nay, perhaps, the curſes of her ſubjects, who, by this marriage, dreaded to ſee the fair and flouriſhing fabric of their religion, reared by the toil of princes, and cemented by the blood of martyrs, ſink into ruins. She reflected with horror on her ſiſter's miſery, who, in the decline of life, married a catholic prince much younger than herſelf; and ſhe began already to fear a total alteration in the laws and conſtitution of her country.

The poignancy of theſe reflections was increaſed by the extreme averſion which her moſt favoured courtiers diſcovered to the marriage. Even the ladies of her bedchamber ſtrongly oppoſed her reſolution with zealous remonſtrances. Sir Philip Sidney, the moſt accompliſhed young gentleman of the age, ventured to write her a letter; in which he diſſuaded her from her preſent reſolution with the ſtrongeſt reaſons, delivered in an elegance of expreſſion then very uncommon. He obſerved, that the ſecurity of her government depended entirely on the affection of her proteſtant ſubjects; and that ſhe could not more effectually diſguſt them, than by marrying a ſon of Catherine de Medicis, and a brother of the cruel and perfidious Charles, whoſe hands were embrued in the innocent blood of the Hugonots: that the catholics had always been her mortal enemies; and that if they had not yet united in a body againſt her, it was owing to their being deſtitute of a leader capable of conducting their dangerous enterprizes; a defect which would now be ſupplied by her marriage with the duke of Anjou, who was zealouſly attached to that communion: that the duke himſelf had diſcovered a very reſtleſs and turbulent ſpirit; he had often violated his loyalty to his eldeſt brother and his ſovereign; and little hopes remained that he would paſſively ſubmit to a woman, whom, in quality of huſband, he might think himſelf intitled to command: that the plain and honourable path ſhe had hitherto purſued, of cultivating the affections of her people, had rendered her reign happy and ſecure; and however her enemies might ſeem to multiply before her, the ſame invincible rampart was ſtill able to defend her: and that though the queen might remain childleſs, and even old age grow upon her, the ſingular felicity and glory of her reign would preſerve her from contempt; the affections of her ſubjects, and thoſe of the proteſtants of Europe, would defend her from attacks; and her own prudence, without any other aſſiſtance, would baffle all the efforts of her moſt malignant enemies; her reign would be glorious, and her memory tranſmitted, with applauſe, to poſterity.

Elizabeth was ſtruck with Sidney's letter: ſhe continued, for ſome days, in the moſt painful reflection and uncertainty; but at laſt her ſettled habits of prudence and ambition acquired the aſcendant over her temporary inclination. She ſent for the duke of Anjou, and had a long converſation with him, in which, it is ſuppoſed, ſhe made apologies for breaking her engagements. On leaving her, he expreſſed the moſt violent diſguſt, threw away the ring ſhe had given him, and uttered many curſes on the mutability of women in general, and of iſlanders in particular. He returned, ſoon after, to the Low Countries; but wanting to make himſelf abſolute maſter of their forts, he was driven away as a traitor and oppreſſor, and obliged to return to France, where he died. The diſtracted ſtate of the French monarchy prevented the queen from feeling any effects of that reſentment ſhe had reaſon to dread from the affront ſo wantonly put upon that royal family. The blind tenderneſs of Elizabeth for a man more worthy of hatred than of love, can only be accounted for by the weakneſs of the human heart, which frequently brings genius and ſuperior merit on a level with the vulgar.

A. D. 1582. The troubles in Scotland ſtill raged with all the fury of an enraged multitude. The death of Morton, and the influence of the earl of Lenox, and James Stuart, now earl of Arran, alarmed the enthuſiaſtic preachers. A faſt was appointed to be held all over the kingdom, when the pulpits reſounded with declamations againſt the king's preſent counſellors. A conſpiracy of the nobility was formed for ſeizing the perſon of James, who was then at Ruthven, a ſeat belonging to the earl of Gowry. The utmoſt ſecrecy was obſerved; and the council not having the leaſt intimation of the conſpirators deſigns, the attempt ſucceeded without any oppoſition. The earls of Gowry and Marre, the lords Lindeſey and Boyd, the maſters of Glamis and Oliphant, the abbots of Dunfermline, Plaiſey and Cambuſkenneth, were the principal leaders in this enterprize. James wept when he found himſelf deprived of his liberty. "No matter for his tears, (ſaid one of the conſpirators) better that boys ſhould weep than bearded men." James was deeply affected, and could never be prevailed upon to forgive the expreſſion. He, however, prudently ſubmitted to the preſent neceſſity, and ſtifled his reſentment. He agreed to iſſue writs for calling an aſſembly of the church and a convention of the ſtates, in order to exculpate the aſſociated lords from the crime of treaſon, and ratify their enterprize. Though the eccleſiaſtical aſſembly had no right to meddle with civil matters, yet on this occaſion they uſurped an authority they never enjoyed, and declared that the late attempt was agreeable to all that feared God, or deſired to preſerve the perſon of the king, and the proſperity of the realm. They even threatened every perſon who ſhould dare to oppoſe the authority of the confederated lords with the ſevereſt eccleſiaſtical cenſures. The convention ratified theſe proceedings, and declared the attempt of the aſſociates a lawful act. The earl of Lenox, unwilling to excite a civil war in the bowels of his country, retired into France, where he ſoon after died. The earl of Arran was confined a priſoner to his own houſe; and Elizabeth ſent ambaſſadors to compliment the captive king upon his delivery from his late pernicious counſellors.

A. D. 1583. Soon after, two ambaſſadors arrived from France, to enquire into the ſituation of the Scottiſh monarch, make him the ſtrongeſt profeſſions of their maſter's friendſhip, and procure an accommodation between him and his mother, the queen of Scots. This attempt alarmed the fanatical preachers, who uſed all their intereſt to render the deſign abortive. They even proceeded ſo far by their invectives, that the ambaſſadors were openly affronted in the ſtreets. James had no power to repreſs this inſolent behaviour; and the ambaſſadors, finding it impoſſible to carry on any negotiation with ſuch a bigotted and ferocious people, left the kingdom. About the ſame time, Mary wrote to Elizabeth a very ſtrong and pathetic letter, complaining of the hardſhips ſhe had ſuffered during ſo many years, without being allowed even the exerciſe of her religion, without the liberty of correſponding with her only child, whoſe impriſonment had put the finiſhing ſtroke to her misfortunes. Overwhelmed with chagrin, and worn out with ſufferings, ſhe aſked for nothing more than her liberty, for which ſhe offered to ſacrifice her crown, and every other right ſhe poſſeſſed.

Elizabeth was affected with Mary's ſituation, but political motives ſtill obſtructed her deſigns of ſetting that princeſs at liberty. She was apprehenſive of the conſequences, and the hopes of Mary once more vaniſhed. In the mean time, James, impatient of reſtraint, made his eſcape from his keepers; and flying to St. Andrews, ſummoned his friends and partizans to attend him. The confederated lords perceiving that all the oppoſition they could make would be in vain, made no attempt to recover their authority: ſome of them accepted a pardon, which was offered them on their ſubmiſſion; and the reſt took ſhelter in Ireland and England. The earl of Arran, a man without either morals or moderation, was recalled; and the king, by this imprudent action, expoſed himſelf to ſhare the hatred that inſolent nobleman deſerved.

A. D. 1584. James ſeemed, for a time, to have thrown off his puſillanimity. He ſummoned a parliament, and cauſed an act to be paſſed for preventing the clergy from ſowing the ſeeds of ſedition from the pulpit. It was declared, that no clergyman ſhould, for the future, preſume to blacken the character of the king, or his miniſters, in their ſermons, or cenſure the affairs of the government. This highly provoked the enthuſiaſtical preachers: they ſaid, that the king himſelf was a papiſt in his heart, and beſtowed the moſt degrading epithets on his friends and favourites. But all their attempts would, probably, have been rendered abortive, had not the violent conduct of the earl of Arran engaged the people to ſupport them. Gowry, notwithſtanding the late pardon, was tried, and executed; and many innocent perſons ſuffered from the tyranny of that favourite. The baniſhed noblemen were perſuaded that they had now an opportunity of recovering their honours and eſtates: they made the attempt, and were ſucceſsful. Arran was degraded from his authority, deprived of the eſtate and title he had uſurped, and the whole country ſeemed to have obtained that tranquillity which had ſo long been ſought for in vain.

During theſe tranſactions in Scotland, the Engliſh were frequently alarmed by the practices of the diſcontented party. All the prudence of Elizabeth could not ſecure her from conſpiracies. The zeal of the papiſts grew ſtronger by reſtraint. The partizans of Mary were impatient to ſet her at liberty. A large paquet of letters was diſpatched, containing the moſt earneſt exhortations to ſeveral ladies more immediately concerned about the perſon of Elizabeth, to imitate the example of Judith, and put a period to the life of a princeſs anathematized by the holy father. At the ſame time, aſſuring them, that they would be powerfully protected by the pope, the king, and the duke of Guiſe, who had formed an aſſociation for reſtoring the catholic religion in England, and extirpating the proteſtants. Theſe letters appeared to have been written by one Francis Throgmorton, a young man of good family and excellent parts; who being apprehended, and brought before the council, abſolutely denied the accuſation: but on being ſhewn two liſts, one of all the ports in England favourable for landing an army, and the other of all the gentlemen who favoured the Romiſh religion, and were well diſpoſed to aſſiſt in an invaſion, he retracted his denial, and made the following confeſſion: "That going, ſome few years ſince, to the German Spaw, he contracted an intimacy with Jeney and Sir Francis Inglefield, two Engliſh fugitives; that their conferences generally turned on the beſt means of invading England; and that they had delivered him the two liſts above mentioned: that after his return, Morgan, another fugitive in France, told him the catholic princes had formed a deſign to free the queen of Scots from her confinement, and that the care of executing the attempt would be committed to the duke of Guiſe: that nothing was wanting but to know what aſſiſtance might be depended upon from the Engliſh catholics: that, in order to form their meaſures on more certain information, Charles Paget, under the name of Mope, was ſent into Suſſex, where the duke of Guiſe intended to land his forces: that he (Throgmorton) himſelf had imparted the project to the Spaniſh ambaſſador, who, he found, had been already entruſted with the ſecret, and ſhewed him a copy of the liſt of the ports where the troops might be landed: that he alſo acquainted the ambaſſador with the names of the nobility to whom he might ſafely open his mind, in order to promote the deſign; and that conferences had actually been held on the beſt method of raiſing troops in England to join the foreign forces on their landing." Throgmorton was immediately ſent to priſon, and afterwards executed at Tyburn, where he retracted the confeſſion he had made before the privy-council.

Some prudent meaſures purſued with regard to Ireland, greatly tended to put a period to the troubles in that kingdom. Sir John Perot, lord-deputy, ſummoned a parliament, in which the eſtates of many of the moſt dangerous rebels were ſequeſtered; and the queen granting the earl of Ormond, who had headed the inſurgents, ſome part of his lands, ſold the reſt, at very eaſy rates, to adventurers, who undertook to plant and improve the country. Sales were made of intire baronies, into which the Iriſh counties were divided; and the purchaſers, under colour of their general grants, turned the innocent as well as the guilty, out of their poſſeſſions. The queen endeavoured to repreſs this rapacity by a proclamation, by which the injured proprietors, by an inſtance of good fortune, rare in that country, enjoyed the benefit. The lord-deputy, a perſon of rigid juſtice and inflexible integrity, taking care to ſee it duly executed. No governor of that iſland was ever more diligent, vigorous and impartial, in adminiſtering juſtice, equally to the Engliſh and the Iriſh. This raiſed him many enemies among the former, who thought themſelves injured in being reſtrained from oppreſſing the latter; but by this means he introduced order and regularity into the government, and ſoon reduced Munſter into a ſtate of tranquillity. Nor was he leſs ſucceſsful in reducing the native Iriſh and Scottiſh highlanders in Ulſter to obedience. He forced them to ſwear allegiance, and ſubmit to hold their lands in vaſſallage from the queen, pay her majeſty a yearly rent, and engage to ſupply her with a certain number of ſoldiers in caſe of a rebellion.

The Spaniſh ambaſſador laboured aſſiduouſly to render theſe attempts for reducing the Iriſh abortive, and to keep up a ſtrong party againſt the government. He was alſo very aſſiduous in ſtirring up diſturbances in England, and blowing the coals of ſedition; ſo that he was now conſidered by Elizabeth as the moſt dangerous enemy ſhe had in England. He was accuſed of being the principal agent in a conſpiracy formed againſt the queen's life. John Somerville, a bigotted catholic of Warwickſhire, undertook a journey to London, in order to put the queen to death with his own hand, and actually attacked ſome of her attendants with his ſword. The attempt, however, miſcarried: he was eaſily ſecured, confeſſed his intention, and diſcovered his accomplices, who were all tried, and found guilty of high-treaſon. This, and other alarming attempts of the popiſh faction, greatly affected Elizabeth, and the Spaniſh ambaſſador was ordered to leave England. Philip conſidered this as an high affront, and refuſed to hear any apology from the Engliſh princeſs.

One Creighton, a Scotch jeſuit, had been employed by Mary in ſolliciting twelve thouſand ducats promiſed her by the court of Rome. Creighton, on his return, happened to be taken by a Dutch privateer, and attempted to deſtroy his papers, by tearing them to pieces, and throwing them overboard; but the wind driving them back into the ſhip, they were ſent, with Creighton, to England. Part of them was loſt, but enough was diſcovered to inform the miniſtry, that the pope, Philip, and the duke of Guiſe, had entered into a league to dethrone Elizabeth; to diſinherit the king of Scotland, as an open favourer of the reformed religion; to marry the captive queen to ſome Engliſh nobleman; to place him on the throne; and to cauſe the iſſue of that marriage to be declared the lawful ſucceſſors to the crown and kingdom of England.

Mary felt the effects of theſe aſſociations; ſhe was more cloſely confined than ever; though it is doubtful whether ſhe really encouraged the ſecret practices of the catholics, or whether their attachment to her perſon and religion induced them, without her conſent, to withdraw their allegiance and their duty from Elizabeth. The proteſtants loved the queen as much as the catholics hated her. A kind of confederacy was formed in her favour; and the parliament, which theſe practices of the papiſts induced her to ſummon, ſet no bounds to the teſtimonies of their zeal. They even authorized her to eſtabliſh a committee, with power to judge any perſon who ſhould make pretenſions to the crown, or frame any attempt againſt her. The jeſuits, and other prieſts of the Romiſh church, were baniſhed the kingdom; and in caſe either of their continuance in England, or return thither, they were deemed guilty of high-treaſon. The ſame ſentence was pronounced againſt the Engliſh ſtudents in foreign ſeminaries, unleſs they returned within a limited time, and made the uſual ſubmiſſions. From that time popery was no longer tolerated; the laws were executed with rigour; and, in the ſpace of ten years, fifty prieſts ſuffered death. But ſurely exceſſive ſeverity is not the moſt eligible method of reconciling the catholics, either to the government or the national religion; lenient and conciliating proceedings ſeem beſt adapted to effect the one, and candid reaſoning the other.

Beſides paſſing theſe ſevere laws againſt the papiſts, the commons voted the queen a ſupply of one ſubſidy and two fifteenths. The only circumſtance in which their proceedings were diſagreeable to her majeſty, was an application which the commons made for a farther reformation in eccleſiaſtical affairs. Though the majority of the houſe were puritans, they did not chuſe to proceed on this delicate ſubject in the uſual manner: they were afraid of offending the queen; and therefore petitioned the upper houſe, in order to effect the deſired reformation: a meaſure that ſhews at once the abſolute power of Elizabeth, and how far the commons were, at that time, from aſſerting thoſe principles which have ſince acquired them ſo much dignity and power.

Their petition chiefly regarded an eccleſiaſtical tribunal, called the High Court of commiſſion, eſtabliſhed the preceding year. This tribunal was arbitrary, and may be conſidered as one of the worſt abuſes of deſpotiſm. The whole kingdom was ſubject to its decrees. The commiſſioners, who were forty-four in number, had the power of examining into errors, hereſies, and every thing relative either to faith or worſhip. In order to diſcover offenders, they had the power of employing odious and illegal methods, particularly the oath ex officio, by which the perſon cited was obliged to anſwer all interrogatories, whether they tended to the accuſation of himſelf, a relation, or a friend. They were authoriſed to puniſh fornication, inceſt, adultery, and all irregularities relative to marriage. The puniſhments they aſſigned were arbitrary. They were not liable to any arreſt of judgment; and three judges were ſufficient to pronounce ſentences, which were ſubject to no controul. In a word, the inquiſition, execrated by the proteſtants, deteſted even in many catholic countries, ſeems to have been the model of that tribunal, ſo contrary to all wiſe legiſlation. Elizabeth had no authority but her own ſupremacy for eſtabliſhing a court ſo repugnant to all the rights of humanity. But in that age, the right of ſupremacy was ſuppoſed to involve powers, which no law, precedent or reaſon, could limit or determine.

Notwithſtanding the commons had carried their deference even to a weakneſs, and petitioned the upper houſe in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner, their attempt did not eſcape cenſure. The queen, at the end of the ſeſſion, after thanking them for their zeal for her perſon and government, failed not to reproach them for their preſumptuous imprudence. She told them, that being charged by God himſelf with the government of the church, one of her principal cares ſhould be to baniſh error and ſchiſm; that ſhe would not ſuffer the licentiouſneſs of thoſe who, from haſty interpretations of ſcripture, would introduce new doctrines; and that ſhe knew well how to obſerve the medium between the ſuperſtitions of Rome and the illuſions of new ſectaries. But notwithſtanding the great power of Elizabeth, and the deference paid her by the commons, the puritans were not to be intimidated. Perſuaded that their tenets were undeniably founded on ſcripture, about five hundred eccleſiaſtics of that perſuaſion ſubſcribed a book of diſcipline conformable to their principles; and the force of the laws was unable to prevent preſbyterianiſm from taking root in the boſom of the church of England.

During this ſeſſion of parliament, a horrid conſpiracy againſt the life of Elizabeth was diſcovered. William Parry, a bigotted catholic, after receiving the queen's pardon for a capital offence, retired into Italy, where he openly profeſſed his religion, which he had concealed while he continued in England. Happening to contract an intimacy with one Palmio, a jeſuit, he too readily liſtened to the deteſtable doctrine of that order, and was perſuaded that he could not do a more acceptable or meritorious action than that of taking away the life of his ſovereign and benefactor. Campeggio, the pope's nuncio, whom Parry conſulted on this important queſtion, removed all his doubts, and approved extremely of his pious undertaking. Parry accordingly retired to Paris, whence he propoſed to paſs over into England, in order to execute his bloody deſign. Remorſe, however, ſtaggered his reſolution; it is not ſometimes even in the power of fanaticiſm to ſilence the remonſtrances of conſcience. He was deſirous of trying every method in his power to ſoften the perſecutions carried on againſt the catholics, before he proceeded to extremities. His ſoul ſhuddered at the complicated horror of the action he was going to commit. He found means of being introduced to the queen; aſſured her that many conſpiracies were formed againſt her life; and exhorted her, as the only means of rendering the attempts abortive, to allow the catholics a little more indulgence in the exerciſe of their religion. Finding all his attempts were in vain, he determined to execute his bloody deſign, and imparted his intention to Nevil, next heir to the Weſtmoreland family. He highly approved of the attrocious crime, and deſired to ſhare in an action which the intereſts of the church would ſufficiently ſanctify.

A book newly publiſhed by Dr. Allen, afterwards created a cardinal, confirmed their ſentiments; and meaſures were formed for carrying their infernal deſign into immediate execution. But while they were waiting for a favourable opportunity, the earl of Weſtmoreland died; and Nevil, hoping to recover the honours and eſtates of that noble family, revealed the whole to the queen. Parry was ſeized, and made no difficulty of confeſſing the fact; and he ſuffered the puniſhment appointed by the law for treaſonable practices.

A. D. 1585. The doctrine of putting tyrants to death was now generally aſſerted; a doctrine the more attrocious, as every prince whom the church of Rome thought proper to excommunicate, or declare a heretic, was called a tyrant, however juſt or prudent in the diſpenſations of government. Many great and brave men fell victims to the dagger of ſanguinary caſuiſtry. Baltazar Gerard, a native of Burgundy, undertook the horrid taſk of aſſaſſinating the prince of Orange. He executed the bloody deſign with an intrepidity that would have done honour to a better cauſe. He ſacrificed his own life, in order to deſtroy the famous reſtorer and protector of religious liberty. This event ſpread a general conſternation through the Netherlands, where the people regarded the prince as their father, and where the prince of Parma had made an alarming progreſs in re-eſtabliſhing the authority of Philip. In this deplorable ſituation the ſtates offered the ſovereignty of their country to Henry III. king of France. But the preſent condition of that monarchy obliged the king to reject ſo advantageous an offer.

Reduced to extremity, the ſtates ſent over a ſolemn embaſſy to Elizabeth, imploring the queen to take them under her protection. The buſineſs was of a delicate nature; and the council were divided in opinion, whether they ſhould accept or reject the offer. Some conſidered the Flemings as rebels, whoſe revolt could not be countenanced without injuſtice, and whoſe propoſals, if they were accepted, would expoſe the kingdom to dangers, to which they would bring no adequate advantage. Others repreſented the unbounded ambition of the king of Spain, his tyranny in the Low Countries, his implacable hatred to Elizabeth, as ſufficient motives for accepting the offer. It was ſaid, that the acquiſition of the provinces, and the efforts of a brave people groaning under the weight of lawleſs power, would leſſen the danger, by multiplying reſources. The queen, always leſs enterprizing than circumſpect, thought proper to adopt the medium. She declined the ſovereignty, that ſhe might avoid the reproach of being an uſurper; but ſhe entered into a treaty, offenſive and defenſive, with the ſtates, whereby ſhe engaged to ſend them ſix thouſand men, and maintain them during the war: that the general, and two others, whom ſhe ſhould appoint, ſhould be admitted into the council of the ſtates; that neither party ſhould make peace without the conſent of the other; that her expences ſhould be refunded at the concluſion of the war; and that the towns of Fluſhing and Brille, with the caſtle of Rammekins, ſhould be immediately put into her hands, by way of ſecurity.

Elizabeth well knew that this meaſure would immediately occaſion a rupture with Spain; but the preſent power of the ambitious Philip did not terrify her. His late acquiſition of the crown of Portugal, with the rich ſettlements in the Eaſt-Indies, and the great increaſe of his naval power, were not ſufficient to deter her from ſuccouring a people diſtreſſed, and ſupporting the liberties of a country threatened with the moſt arbitrary deſpotiſm. The earl of Leiceſter, who was appointed to command the Engliſh forces, embarked on the twenty-third of October, attended by a ſplendid retinue, compoſed of the young earl of Eſſex, his ſon-in-law, the lords Audley and North, Sir William Ruſſel, Sir Thomas Shirley, Sir Arthur Baſſet, Sir Walter Waller, Sir Gervaſe Clifton, and a ſelect company of five hundred gentlemen. He was met, on his arrival at Fluſhing, by his nephew, Sir Philip Sidney, governor of that place; and every town through which he paſſed diſcovered the ſincereſt joy; they conſidered him as their guardian angel, their deliverer from impending ruin.

Philip II. was one of the moſt formidable princes of Europe. Beſides large acquiſitions in America and the Eaſt, he was, in ſome meaſure, the arbiter of the court of Rome, and the protector of the holy league formed in France againſt the Hugonots. He made religion a political reſource for his unbounded ambition. The idea of his prodigious power alarmed moſt of the princes of Europe; and the king of Sweden, when informed that Elizabeth had entered into a league with the ſtates-general, highly blamed her conduct, and ſaid ſhe was tearing the crown from her head. But ſhe ſhewed no leſs courage in the danger than prudence in the deſign. She diſpatched a fleet of one and twenty ſail, under the command of Sir Francis Drake, with two thouſand three hundred land forces, commanded by Chriſtopher Carliſle, to attack the Spaniſh ſettlements in America, the chief ſource of Philip's power, and the moſt defenceleſs parts of his extenſive dominions. The appearance of the Engliſh being wholly unexpected in that diſtant part of the world, they eaſily made themſelves maſters of the capital of St. Domingo, reduced Carthagena, and burnt the towns of St. Antonio and St. Helena, in Florida. Drake loſt ſeveral hundred men in this expedition, but brought home ſuch a prodigious quantity of treaſure, as ſufficiently rewarded the ſurvivors for their ſufferings. At the ſame time, he diſplayed the weakneſs of the Spaniards in the New World in ſuch alluring colours, that his countrymen were animated to attempt other enterprizes of a ſimilar nature.

Leiceſter, whoſe merit was not equal to the favour he enjoyed from the queen, had leſs ſucceſs in the Low Countries. The prince of Parma, at the head of twenty thouſand foot and ſix thouſand horſe, made himſelf maſter of Grave and Venlo; while, on the other hand, lord Willoughby, governor of Bergen-op-Zoom, cut off a large convoy of proviſions belonging to the enemy; and Sir Philip Sidney and count Maurice ſurpriſed the town of Axel, in Flanders. The prince of Parma, exaſperated at theſe loſſes, beſieged Rheinburgh, garriſoned by twelve hundred Engliſh, under the command of colonel Morgan. Leiceſter thought this place of too much importance to be neglected, and immediately made diſpoſitions for attacking Zutphen, a town of the greateſt conſequence to the enemy. The ſtratagem ſucceeded: the prince of Parma immediately abandoned the ſiege of Rheinburgh, and advanced to give Leiceſter battle before Zutphen. A bloody engagement enſued; but the Engliſh, after exerting all their valour, were obliged to retreat. Among others, the celebrated Sir Philip Sidney, a man of the fineſt genius, and the moſt heroic virtue, periſhed in this battle. Being mortally wounded, and almoſt ſuffocated with thirſt, a bottle of water was offered him; but obſerving a ſoldier lying by his ſide, in the ſame dreadful ſituation, he reſigned to him the valuable acquiſition, with this generous obſervation, "That man's neceſſities are ſtill greater than mine."

A.D. 1586. Every day brought Elizabeth freſh intelligence of Philip's deſigns againſt her perſon and government. It was therefore of the laſt importance for her to ſecure the friendſhip of the king of Scotland. Wotton, her ambaſſador, by conſulting only how to pleaſe him and gain his confidence, ſoon became thoroughly acquainted with all the ſecrets of his cabinet. It is no wonder Wotton ſucceeded in gaining the aſcendant over a prince of ſo open and unguarded a temper as James: he was a maſter of profound diſſimulation, and knew how to cover, under the appearance of the moſt careleſs gaiety, the deepeſt deſigns and moſt dangerous artifices. Elizabeth was fearful leſt James ſhould contract an alliance by marriage, that might render him formidable to England: in the preſent ſtate of the Scottiſh kingdom there was nothing to fear. But Wotton employed his intrigues to ſtill more dangerous purpoſes: he formed a conſpiracy for ſeizing the perſon of the king, and delivering him into the hands of the Engliſh princeſs; who would certainly not have been diſpleaſed had it ſucceeded, though ſhe was intirely ignorant of the ſcheme. The treachery was, however, diſcovered, and Wotton fled into England.

Though James was highly exaſperated at this deſign againſt his liberty, he thought it prudent to diſſemble his reſentment; and the negotiations were ſoon after renewed, and a treaty of alliance was concluded between the two kingdoms, for their mutual ſecurity, and the defence of the proteſtant religion, againſt the open combination of all the catholic powers of Europe. By this treaty it was ſtipulated, that if Elizabeth was invaded, James ſhould furniſh her with a body of two thouſand horſe and five thouſand foot: that Elizabeth, in a ſimilar caſe, ſhould ſend him three thouſand horſe and ſix thouſand foot: that the charge of theſe armies ſhould be defrayed by the prince that demanded aſſiſtance: that if the invaſion ſhould be made in England, within ſixty miles of the frontiers of Scotland, James ſhould march his whole force to the aſſiſtance of Elizabeth; and that the preſent league ſhould ſuperſede all former alliances of either ſtate with any foreign prince, ſo far as religion was concerned. By this treaty James was guarantied not only againſt the dangers of an invaſion, but alſo againſt domeſtic troubles, ſo much the more to be dreaded in Scotland, as the fanaticiſm of the preſbyterian teachers had lately defied the authority of the king, the parliament, and the church. They had even proceeded to that height of audacity, as to excommunicate the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, becauſe he had found it neceſſary to reſtrain their licentious conduct; and the primate of the kingdom was conſtrained to diveſt himſelf of his eccleſiaſtical authority. One of the preachers declared publickly from the pulpit, that the king himſelf was the chief perſecutor of the church; and, as a puniſhment, denounced againſt him the curſe that fell upon Jeroboam, that he ſhould die childleſs, and be the laſt of his race. To ſuch unreaſonable heights will religious bigotry ſometimes carry its votaries!

The catholics extended their hatred much farther to Elizabeth. Her laws had irritated their zeal; and the anathemas of the pontiff convinced them, that it would be no crime to effect her deſtruction. The tyrant-killing doctrine did not fail of finding aſſaſſins for this implacable enemy of the Roman church. Among others that determined to put this deſtructive doctrine in execution, was one John Savage, who devoted his life to the ſervice of the church, and undertook to execute this execrable deſign. Another plot was formed in the Engliſh ſeminary at Rheims; and a prieſt of that ſchool paſſed over into England with a reſolution to aſſaſſinate Elizabeth. He found means to engage in this infernal deſign one Anthony Babington, a young gentleman of fortune and polite education, who had wit and learning, and courage enough to be ambitious of reſtoring a captive queen to her liberty; and who was ſuſceptible of that falſe zeal which believes every thing juſtifiable in defence of religion. Babington engaged in the conſpiracy ſeveral catholics of diſtinction; and it was agreed that a ſelect number ſhould join Savage in the execution of his vow. In the mean time, the papiſts, in order to carry on their plot with leſs ſuſpicion, and lull, if poſſible, the watchful council of the Engliſh cabinet into a fatal ſecurity, publiſhed ſeveral hypocritical writings, in which they profeſſed the higheſt regard for the perſon and government of Elizabeth, admoniſhed the people of their perſuaſion not to engage in any practices againſt the ſtate, but to confine themſelves to ſuch weapons as are alone lawful for chriſtians to uſe, ſuch as tears, prayers, and faſtings.

But the watchful Walſingham was not to be deceived: he ſoon obtained a ſuperficial account of the conſpirators deſigns; and, by the aſſiſtance of one Maud, a man of impenetrable diſſimulation, who found means to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of Ballard, the miniſter was regularly informed of every part of the conſpiracy. It had been determined, in ſeveral of their meetings, to aſſaſſinate Elizabeth, place Mary on the Engliſh throne, and reſtore the catholic religion. Babington had, ſome years before, contracted an intimacy with Thomas Morgan, a penſioner of the queen of Scots, and had by him been introduced to the biſhop of Glaſgow, Mary's ambaſſador at the court of France. That prelate ſtrongly recommended him to the captive queen, and he, for ſome time, managed her correſpondence with her foreign friends. But, on her being more cloſely confined, the connection dropped, and Babington laid aſide all farther thoughts of Mary and her concerns. Unfortunately for him, Ballard rekindled all his former zeal for her ſervice; and he undertook, with the aſſiſtance of an hundred gentlemen, to deliver the queen of Scots from her confinement.

The plan being ſettled, Babington wrote to Mary, informing her of all that had paſſed between him and Ballard; and inſiſted that the gentlemen, who were concerned in ſo dangerous an attempt for her ſervice, ſhould be aſſured of a reward ſuitable to their merit. This letter was written in the uſual cypher which had paſſed between him and Mary; and was ſo agreeable to her, that ſhe failed not to anſwer it in the ſame cypher, deſiring the conſpirators to be extremely cautious, leſt they ſhould precipitate matters before the return of their Engliſh friends from abroad, before they were aſſured of foreign ſuccours, and before ſome diſturbances were raiſed in Ireland. At the ſame time, ſhe pointed out the moſt natural methods for her own deliverance, which were either by overturning a cart in the gateway of the houſe where ſhe was confined, ſetting the ſtables on fire, or carrying her off when ſhe rode out for the benefit of the air.

Theſe letters were carried to Walſingham, who was ſtill deſirous of farther information. Accordingly he added to one of Mary's letters, delivered to him by Maud, his truſty agent, a poſtſcript in the ſame cypher, requeſting Babington to ſend her the names of the principal conſpirators. The ſtratagem ſucceeded; and the ſtateſman ſoon diſcovered, that Savage, already mentioned; Charles Tilney, a man of family, and one of Elizabeth's penſioners; John Charnock, a gentleman of Lancaſhire; Edward Abingdon, whoſe father had been cofferer to Elizabeth; Chidcock Tichburn, a gentleman of Southampton; and one Barnwell, a perſon of quality in Ireland, were the ſix engaged by oath to aſſaſſinate the queen. At the ſame time, the ridiculous vanity of Babington furniſhed Walſingham with another method of diſcovery, and alſo an indication of defence. He had cauſed a picture to be drawn, in which he himſelf was repreſented ſtanding amidſt the ſix aſſaſſins, with a motto, implying, that they were all embarked in ſome dangerous enterprize. A copy of this picture was carried to Walſingham by another of his ſpies, who had found means to inſinuate himſelf into Babington's confidence. Walſingham delivered this copy to the queen, that ſhe might know the aſſaſſins, and be upon her guard if any of them ſhould attempt to approach her perſon.

Convinced that all delays in enterprizes which depend upon ſecrecy are dangerous, Babington procured a licence for Ballard, under a feigned name, to paſs over to the continent. The real intention of his journey was to haſten the foreign ſuccours, whoſe arrival was deſired with anxiety. And to remove all ſuſpicion, Babington applied to Walſingham himſelf, pretended the greateſt zeal for her majeſty's ſervice, offered to go abroad, and employ that confidence which he had gained among the catholics, to the detection and diſappointment of their conſpiracies. Walſingham deſirous of ſeizing all the aſſaſſins, commended his loyal intentions, promiſed to aſſiſt him with his own counſel and advice in the execution, fed him with deluſive hopes, and kept up a correſpondence with him.

Babington having, as he imagined, gained the favour of Walſingham, began to flatter himſelf that the whole ſcheme would ſucceed according to his wiſhes. But while he was lulled in this fatal ſecurity, Ballard was ſeized by a warrant from one of the ſecretaries of ſtate. This incident alarmed the conſpirators, and introduced confuſion into their councils. Some propoſed, as the only method of eſcaping, to paſs immediately over to the continent: while others adviſed, that Savage and Charnock ſhould execute, without delay, their intended purpoſe upon Elizabeth. The laſt propoſition was agreed to, and Babington furniſhed Savage with money that he might purchaſe cloaths neceſſary for obtaining the more eaſy acceſs to the queen's perſon. The next day they began to apprehend that they had taken the alarm too haſtily; and Babington, having renewed his correſpondence with Walſingham, the anxiety and concern with which the conſciouſneſs of guilt had inſpired the conſpirators, began to ſubſide; they flattered themſelves that the ſeizure of Ballard was owing entirely to the uſual diligence of informers in detecting popiſh and ſeminary prieſts: Babington was even perſuaded to take lodgings in Walſingham's houſe; but obſerving that all his actions were watched with the moſt careful aſſiduity by one Scudamore, he began to be alarmed for his ſafety. Soon after, as they were ſitting at ſupper, Scudamore received a note from Walſingham, ordering him to watch Babington more narrowly than ever; and Babington by Scudamore's inadvertency, reading the note over his ſhoulder, was ſufficiently convinced of his danger. He roſe haſtily from table, went out of the room, as if on ſome ſudden occaſion, made the beſt of his way to Weſtminſter, and, after acquainting Charnock and ſome others with the diſcovery he had made, they withdrew immediately into the woods, where they concealed themſelves for ten days; but were at laſt diſcovered near Harrow on the Hill, dreſſed like countrymen, and brought priſoners to London.

On the thirteenth of September Babington and Ballard, with five of their accomplices, were arraigned, and pleaded guilty; and the next day ſeven more of the conſpirators were convicted on evidence. The firſt ſeven ſuffered the ſentence pronounced againſt traitors in its utmoſt rigour; but the others were ſuffered to hang till they were dead. They all behaved with great decency and reſignation, and confeſſed their ſorrow for that part of the conſpiracy relative to the murder of Elizabeth.

The council having rendered abortive this alarming contrivance, and puniſhed the leſſer conſpirators, meaſures were taken for the trial and conviction of the queen of Scots, on whoſe account, and by whoſe concurrence, this deep and dangerous plot had been formed againſt the life of the queen, and the peace of the kingdom. But great difficulties occurred with regard to the manner of proceeding. Scarce a precedent in the hiſtory of mankind could be found of a meaſure of this kind; not one in the annals of England. Some of the council therefore propoſed, that no farther proceedings ſhould be carried on againſt the queen of Scots; thinking that the cloſe confinement of a woman, who was now become very ſickly, would be a ſufficient ſecurity to the government. Leiceſter adviſed that Mary ſhould be ſecretly diſpatched by poiſon: but Walſingham declared his abhorrence of ſo deteſtable an action, and inſiſted that all their proceedings ſhould be open and candid. The majority of the council declared for the ſame opinion, and a reſolution was taken for trying the queen of Scots. The princeſs was accordingly removed to Fotheringay caſtle in Northamptonſhire, the laſt ſcene of her mortal pilgrimage.

She had for ſome time been ſo ſtrictly guarded, that ſhe was ſtill ignorant of the detection of Babington's conſpiracy; and ſhe received the intelligence of this event with equal ſurprize and concern, from Sir Thomas Gorges, who had been ſent for that purpoſe by Elizabeth. He choſe to give her this information, when he was taking the air on horſeback.

Her two ſecretaries, Nau and Curle, were immediately apprehended; all her papers were ſeized, and tranſmitted to the council: many letters from perſons abroad, and ſome from Engliſh noblemen, expreſſing their firm attachment to her perſon and title. The queen thought proper to take no notice of this laſt diſcovery; but the perſons themſelves, conſcious of their guilt, and dreading the puniſhment due to their crime, endeavoured to atone for their fault by changing their principles, and declaring themſelves inveterate enemies to the queen of Scots.

An act had been paſſed in the laſt ſeſſions of parliament, relative to the crime of treaſon, and it was determined to try Mary on this ſtatute, and not by the common laws made againſt that crime. Accordingly the queen appointed a commiſſion, conſiſting of forty noblemen and privy-counſellors, and judges, who were empowered to examine and pronounce ſentence againſt Mary, whom they ſtiled daughter and heir to James V. late king of Scotland.

On the eleventh of October, the commiſſioners repaired to Fotheringay caſtle, and Sir Walter Mildmay, and Edward Barker delivered to the queen of Scots a letter from Elizabeth, informing her of the commiſſion, and of her approaching trial. Mary read the letter with a countenance more becoming her dignity than her ſituation, and told them, without the leaſt emotion, that it was very ſurprizing the queen ſhould command her as a ſubject, to ſubmit to a trial and examination before perſons of a rank far inferior to herſelf: that ſhe was an abſolute independent princeſs, and would ſubmit to nothing that had a tendency to leſſen her royal majeſty, the ſtate of ſovereign princes, or the dignity or rank of her ſon: that however her ſpirits might be broken and oppreſſed by misfortunes and calamities, ſhe was not yet reduced to that abject ſtate her enemies deſired; nor would ſhe ever be prevailed upon to conſent to her own degradation and diſhonour: that though ſhe had long lived in England, ſhe had lived in captivity; was ignorant of the laws and ſtatutes of the kingdom, deſtitute of council, and could not conceive who could be called her peers, or ſit in judgment on a ſovereign princeſs: that ſhe had never enjoyed the protection of the laws of England, and therefore could not be ſuppoſed to have ſubjected herſelf to their juriſdiction and authority: that if in her own perſon every rule of juſtice ſhould be violated, ſhe ſhould find her revenge in the judgment of the whole world, where her innocence would triumph on a theatre infinitely larger than that of a ſingle kingdom.

This ſpirited anſwer to Elizabeth's letter greatly embarraſſed the commiſſioners, who deputed lord Burleigh, the treaſurer, Bromley, the chancellor, and Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, the vice-chamberlain, to prevail upon her to relinquiſh her plea with regard to her royal dignity, and ſubmit chearfully to a trial which was now abſolutely impoſſible to be avoided, even though her acquieſcence could not be obtained. Various arguments were urged on this occaſion, but thoſe which chiefly prevailed on Mary to lay aſide her plea of royalty, were thoſe advanced in the following ſpeech made by vice-chamberlain Hatton: "You are, Madam, (ſaid he) accuſed, but not condemned, of having conſpired the deſtruction of our lady and queen anointed. You ſay, you are a queen: but in ſuch a crime as this, and ſuch a ſituation as your's, the royal dignity itſelf is not ſufficient, either by the civil or canon law, or the law of nature and nations, to exempt you from judgment. If you are innocent, you injure your reputation by avoiding a trial. We have heard your proteſtations of innocence; but queen Elizabeth thinks otherwiſe, and is heartily ſorry for the appearances that lie againſt you. She has therefore appointed commiſſioners, honourable perſons, prudent and upright men, to examine your cauſe. They are ready to hear you with equity, and even with favour; and will rejoice if you can clear yourſelf of the imputations which have been thrown upon you. Believe me, madam, the queen herſelf will rejoice; for ſhe affirmed to me at my departure, that no miſfortune had ever given her ſo much uneaſineſs, as that you ſhould be ſuſpected of a concurrence in theſe criminal enterprizes. Laying aſide, therefore, the fruitleſs claim of privilege from your royal dignity, which can now avail you nothing, truſt to the better defence of your innocence; make that appear in open trial, and leave not upon your memory that ſtain of infamy which muſt attend your obſtinate ſilence on this occaſion." Theſe arguments produced the deſired effect: Mary gave up her plea of royalty, and agreed to appear before the court of commiſſioners.

The trial had the appearance of great order and ſolemnity. At the upper end of the room was placed a chair of ſtate for the queen of England, under a royal canopy: over againſt it, at ſome diſtance, ſtood a chair for the queen of Scots: by the walls, on both ſides, benches were placed for the commiſſioners. As ſoon as the court was opened, the chancellor, turning to Mary, told her, "that ſhe was accuſed of conſpiring the deſtruction of the queen, the realm of England, and the proteſtant religion; and that they were commiſſioned to examine into the truth of the accuſation, and to hear her anſwer. Mary replied, "that ſhe came into England to crave the aſſiſtance which had been promiſed her: that ſhe was a queen, and no ſubject to Elizabeth; and if ſhe appeared before them, it was only to ſecure her honour and reputation." The chancellor denied that any aſſiſtance had been promiſed her; and declared, that her proteſtation was in vain; for ſince the law, upon which the accuſation was founded, allowed of no diſtinction in the perſon of the tranſgreſſor, it could not be admitted. The commiſſioners, however, accommodated matters, by ordering both her proteſtation and his anſwer to be recorded.

This conteſted point being ſettled, the crown lawyers opened the charge againſt Mary queen of Scots. They accuſed her of offering to cede to the king of Spain the right to the crown of Scotland, if James, her ſon, refuſed to be a convert to popery. Mary did not attempt to exculpate herſelf from this accuſation; ſhe only anſwered, that ſhe had no longer a kingdom at her diſpoſal, but had ſtill power to give what belonged to her, and was not reſponſible to any perſon. Strong proofs were produced, that ſhe had formed a reſolution of diſinheriting her ſon as an heretic; that the late alliance of that prince with Elizabeth had heightened theſe prejudices; and that her maternal tenderneſs was abated by time, reſentment, and religious zeal.

But theſe facts no way affected Mary's life: ſhe knew this, and took no pains to confute the aſſertions. The great buſineſs was to prove the capital charge of the impeachment, that Mary had concurred in the conſpiracy for aſſaſſinating Elizabeth.

In order to eſtabliſh this accuſation, copies of the intercepted letters between her and Babington were produced, in which her approbation of the murder was clearly expreſſed; the evidence of her two ſecretaries, Nau and Curle, who, even without being threatened with the torture, had ſworn, that ſhe both received theſe letters from Babington, and that they had wrote the anſwers by her order. The confeſſion of Babington alſo correſponded with the depoſitions of her ſecretaries. Mary was incapable of making a ſatisfactory defence before the commiſſioners: her reply conſiſted chiefly in her own denial. She aſſerted, that as Nau and Curle had taken an oath of ſecrecy and fidelity to her, their evidence could not be credited; and that if theſe men had received any letters, or wrote any anſwers, the imputation could never lie upon her. She added, that it was eaſy to forge the hand writing and cypher of another.

But if we reflect on the enterprizing character of Mary, on the odious treatment ſhe had received, on her hatred to Elizabeth, on the prevalence of the tyrant-killing doctrine, and on the eſtabliſhed opinion, that it was lawful to make uſe of any violence againſt a prince excommunicated by the pope, and ſeparated by the church, we may believe, without difficulty, that Mary might concur in a meaſure ſo advantageous to herſelf. Many reaſons render the thing more than probable. To ſay that Mary's two ſecretaries held a correſpondence with Babington, wherein ſhe was not concerned; or that they ſhould betray their miſtreſs, without ſo much as having been ſuſpected themſelves; or that Walſingham, a miniſter of integrity, if ever there was one, had forged the letters, and counterfeited the hand, would be to ſtart ſo many indefenſible propoſitions. In ſhort, the only circumſtance in her defence, which to us may appear to have ſome force, was her requiring that Nau and Curle ſhould be confronted with her, affirming, that they would not, to her face, perſiſt in their evidence. However agreeable this demand was to natural juſtice, it was obſerved to her, that in caſes of high-treaſon, the laws and cuſtoms of England did not admit of confronting the evidence with the priſoner, and that the judges were not empowered to grant any indulgence.

The trial being finiſhed, the commiſſioners adjourned from Fotheringay caſtle to the ſtar-chamber in London; where, after taking the oaths of Mary's two ſecretaries, who voluntarily atteſted the authenticity of the letters produced at the trial, they pronounced ſentence of death againſt the queen of Scots. At the ſame time, a declaration was publiſhed, importing, "That the ſentence againſt Mary no way derogated from the title and honour of James, king of Scotland; but that he was in the ſame place, degree, and right, as if the ſentence had never been pronounced."

Elizabeth had now ſufficiently humbled her hated rival; but ſhe was too politic to expreſs her joy on this occaſion. Majeſty, in the very abyſs of diſtreſs, was not an object of exultation. She affected to be deeply intereſted in the fate of an unfortunate relation; declaring, that however injurious her deſigns might be to herſelf, ſhe was willing to bury them for ever in the gulph of forgetfulneſs; and that the ſafety of her people alone, which was nearly intereſted in the fate of the queen of Scotland, induced her to with-hold a pardon. She ſummoned a parliament; that while ſhe indulged the moſt implacable hatred, ſhe might appear to be guided ſolely by the voices of her ſubjects. She well knew, that ſhe ſhould not want the moſt earneſt ſollicitations from that aſſembly, to conſent to a meaſure ſo agreeable to her ſecret inclinations. She was not deceived: the two houſes confirmed the ſentence pronounced againſt Mary, and requeſted the execution of it with all the ardour ſhe could deſire. Elizabeth failed not to ſupport, with great propriety, the part ſhe acted: ſhe made a parade of humanity and hypocritical moderation, would promiſe nothing, and left the world in uncertainty with regard to her real ſentiments. She complained of her own unfortunate ſituation; expreſſed her uneaſineſs uneaſineſs from the importunity of her parliament; renewed her expreſſions of affection for her people; but ſtill refuſed to declare her real intention with regard to the fate of the captive princeſs. She, however, complied with the requeſt of the parliament, with regard to the publication of Mary's ſentence. The lord Buckhurſt, and Beale, clerk of the council, were ſent to notify to the queen of Scots the ſentence pronounced againſt her, its ratification by the parliament, and the earneſt applications made by that aſſembly for its being carried into execution, from a perſuaſion that their religion could never, while ſhe was alive, attain a full ſettlement and ſecurity. Mary received the news with joy, the idea of dying a martyr for the catholic faith ſupported her ſpirits in this melancholy moment. "I can hardly believe (ſaid ſhe, ſmiling) that the queen, my ſiſter, has conſented to my death; but if her will be ſuch, that death, which will put an end to my ſufferings, cannot be unwelcome to me: and I think that ſoul unworthy of celeſtial happineſs, that ſhould ſhrink in paſſing through the gloomy valley of the ſhadow of death."

Great efforts were, in the mean time, made by foreign powers, to prevent the execution of the ſentence pronounced againſt Mary. The ambaſſadors of France and Scotland made vehement remonſtrances, though it has been pretended, that the oppoſition made by the king of France was not ſincere: but however that be, it had no weight with Elizabeth; ſhe ſtill perſiſted in her former reſolution. Her miniſters, indeed, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed every argument that had a tendency to make her heſitate. They enlarged on the troubles and conſpiracies that had been excited by the queen of Scotland. They obſerved, that ſhe was already degraded from her rank; and that, in natural equity, every perſon, much more a ſovereign, had a right to juſtice againſt thoſe who ſhould attempt his life. They added, that while Mary lived, every thing was to be feared from the attempts of the catholics; that things were now come to ſuch a criſis, that the death of one of the two queens was neceſſary to the ſecuriry of the other; and that, in this extremity, prudence and juſtice demanded the puniſhment of Mary.

We ſhall not be ſurpriſed at this ſtrenuous oppoſition of the miniſtry, when we conſider the ſituation of England at that critical juncture. No ſucceſſor to the crown was declared; the heir by blood, to whom the people were moſt likely to adhere, was, by education, an enemy to the national religion; and, from multiplied injuries, an implacable enemy to the miniſters and principal nobility. Hence their perſonal ſafety, as well as the ſecurity of the government, ſeemed to depend ſolely on the queen's life, who was now ſomewhat advanced in years, and perpetually expoſed to the dagger of aſſaſſination. No wonder, therefore, that Elizabeth's counſellors, who knew themſelves ſo obnoxious to the queen of Scots, endeavoured to puſh every meaſure to extremity, in order to prevent her ever mounting the throne of England.

Elizabeth, however, ſtill continued to conceal her ſentiments, though her actions ſufficiently indicated that ſhe had malice in her heart; and her duplicity furniſhed her with new artifices. Rumours of invaſions, rebellions, and aſſaſſinations, were ſpread with great addreſs. The people were terrified at their danger, and the death of Mary was conſidered as neceſſary to reſtore the tranquillity of the nation. The captive princeſs, however, ſupported herſelf with ſuch placid dignity, as does honour to her memory. When Sir Amias Paulet took down her canopy of ſtate, ſhe bore the inſult with the utmoſt patience; and when he told her, that ſhe could now be conſidered only as a dead perſon, and incapable of any dignity, ſhe only anſwered, that ſhe received her royal character from the hands of the Almighty, and no earthly power could ever wreſt it from her. She wrote a very pathetic letter to queen Elizabeth, requeſting, "that after the fatal ſentence was executed, her body might be ſent to France, there to be interred near the ſacred relicts of her mother, and accompanied to the grave with thoſe rites and ceremonies which her religion required: that the execution of her ſentence might be public, in the ſight of all the world; and that her ſervants, after they had done her the laſt offices, and been witneſſes of her perſeverance in the faith, and of her ſubmiſſion to the will of heaven, might be ſuffered to depart without moleſtation, and enjoy the legacies bequeathed to them by their dying miſtreſs."

A. D. 1587. Elizabeth now proceeded to the laſt act of this affecting tragedy. As many intreaties had been uſed, as many delays had interpoſed, and as many alarms had been ſpread among the people, as were thought neceſſary, or decency required; but even in taking her final reſolution, Elizabeth thought ſome new artifice neceſſary. She ſent for ſecretary Daviſon, a man of great parts, but eaſy to be deceived, and commanded him to make out a warrant for the execution of Mary queen of Scots. He obeyed the order; the queen ſigned the warrant, and told him to carry it to the chancellor, in order to its having the ſeal affixed to it. The next day, ſhe ſent him a meſſage by Killigrew, enjoining him not to execute her former commands till farther orders. Daviſon came immediately to court, and informed the queen, that the warrant had already paſſed the ſeals. She ſeemed offended, and blamed him for his precipitation. Alarmed at this inconſiſtency of conduct, Daviſon informed the council of the whole tranſaction; declaring, at the ſame time, that he would proceed no farther without their participation. They all requeſted that the execution might be haſtened; declaring, that if the queen was offended, they would all equally ſhare the blame; and Beale was accordingly diſpatched with the warrant, addreſſed to the earls of Shrewſbury, Kent, Derby, and Cumberland, commanding them to ſee it carried into immediate execution.

On the ſeventh of February, the earls of Shrewſbury and Kent reached Fotheringay caſtle, and informed Mary of their commiſſion; adding, that ſhe muſt prepare for death the next morning by eight o clock. She received the ſummons with great calmneſs and compoſure. She confeſſed, indeed, that ſhe did not expect to die ſo ſoon; but all her geſtures, looks and words, were full of chearful reſignation. She deſired that ſhe might have a conference with her almoner, confeſſor, and Andrew Melvil, the maſter of her houſhold; but they refuſed her requeſt with regard to her confeſſor. They, however, recommended to her the dean of Peterborough, who would very readily aſſiſt her in making preparations for her paſſage into eternity. She replied, that his aſſiſtance was not neceſſary; and as they had thought proper to deny a requeſt for which the dictates of humanity ſo ſtrongly pleaded, ſhe would endeavour to ſupply the defect by her own prayers. To the exerciſes of a ſpirited devotion ſhe joined the tendereſt care of all her domeſtics. She made them a proper recompence for their ſervices, wrote letters in their favour to the king of France and the duke of Guiſe, and took her leave of them in a flood of tears. She had long expected that ſhe ſhould not be permitted to exerciſe the rites of her religion, and had procured a conſecrated wafer from pope Pius, and reſerved the uſe of it for this laſt period of her life.

She roſe in the morning with her uſual ſerenity, and dreſſed herſelf in a rich habit of ſilk and velvet, the only one ſhe had kept for herſelf; and on receiving the ſummons from the ſheriff, appeared with a compoſed and chearful countenance: her head was covered with a veil, extending to the ground; her beads hung at her girdle, and ſhe held a crucifix in her hand. In the porch ſhe was received by the earls and other gentlemen, and met by Sir Andrew Melvil, her ſteward, who bewailed his unhappy fate, in being appointed to carry the fatal tidings of her death to Scotland. Mary was deeply affected at the affection of her ſervant, and endeavoured to comfort him. She obſerved, that there was more reaſon to rejoice than to lament, as he would ſoon behold the ſorrows and miſeries of his queen and miſtreſs at an end; and after kiſſing him, with her face bedewed with tears, ſhe bid him farewell. Then turning to the noblemen, ſhe deſired that her ſervants might be permitted to attend her in her laſt moments. The earl of Kent refuſed this favour. Touched with his cruelty, ſhe cried, "I am the couſin of your queen; I am deſcended from the royal blood of Henry VII. I have been queen of France by marriage; I have been anointed queen of Scotland!" Striking expreſſions at that dreadful criſis! The reſt of the noblemen were affected, and it was agreed that ſhe might carry ſome of her ſervants with her.

She now entered the hall, where a ſcaffold, covered with black, was erected; and ſhe beheld, with uncommon fortitude, the two executioners, and all the preparations of death. Here the warrant for her execution was read to her by Beale, clerk of the council: ſhe kept a profound ſilence during the ceremony, but ſeemed wholly unaffected, while the numerous ſpectators that crowded the hall were diſſolved in tears. The dean of Peterborough began a tedious diſcourſe; in which he exhorted her to abjure the catholic religion, and acknowledge the juſtice of her ſentence, threatening her with eternal perdition if ſhe refuſed. She anſwered, with great vivacity, "Give yourſelf no farther trouble; I was born, have lived, and will die a catholic." The earl of Kent was greatly offended at a crucifix ſhe held in her hand, and deſired her to part with that popiſh trumpery, as he called it; adding, that ſhe ſhould carry Chriſt in her heart, not in her hand. She replied, with great preſence of mind, that it was not eaſy to have ſuch an object in the hand without the heart's being affected.

Her private devotions being ended, ſhe began, with the aſſiſtance of her women, to diſrobe herſelf; on which her ſervants burſt into tears and lamentations. She turned about, laid her finger on her lips, as a ſign of impoſing ſilence, gave them her bleſſing, and requeſted their prayers. After which one of her maids covered her eyes with a handkerchief; and, without fear or trepidation, ſhe laid herſelf down; and, amidſt the tears and mournful ſilence of the ſpectators, received the fatal ſtroke. The dean of Peterborough alone exclaimed, "So periſh all the enemies of queen Elizabeth!". And the earl of Kent was the only perſon who replied, "Amen."

Thus died Mary Stuart, queen of Scotland, in the forty-fifth year of her age, and the nineteenth of her impriſonment in England; a princeſs of conſummate beauty, uncommon underſtanding, and diſtinguiſhed by ſuch qualities of mind, both natural and acquired, as rendered her the moſt lovely of women. But her connections with the profligate Bothwell, joined to the effects of a blind and headſtrong paſſion, betrayed her into actions which nothing can excuſe, nothing can alleviate; and afford us a ſtriking inſtance of the inconſtancy of the human heart, and the frailty of our nature. The rigorous treatment ſhe met with from Elizabeth, ſeems to authoriſe her to lay ſchemes for regaining her liberty, but not to conſpire againſt her life. The prevalent ſpirit and principles of that age, together with a bigotted zeal for the catholic religion, which ſhe had acquired during her long captivity, induced her to join in a deſign repugnant to humanity.

When Elizabeth was informed of the death of the captive princeſs, ſhe affected the utmoſt grief and rage. None of her miniſters dared to approach her. She openly declared, that the execution had been done without her knowledge, and contrary to her inclinations. She wrote a very pathetic letter to the king of Scotland, calling heaven and earth to witneſs, that it was her reſolution to have ſpared the blood of Mary. She committed Daviſon to priſon, and ordered him to be tried in the ſtar-chamber for his offence. The miniſter well knew the danger of a conteſt with his ſovereign; he acknowledged his guilt, and ſued for pardon. The queen was inexorable; a tedious impriſonment, and a fine that reduced him to beggary, were the reward of his ſervices. No body was deceived by this behaviour of the queen; they knew that diſſimulation coſt her nothing. Daviſon wrote an apology to his friend Walſingham, containing many curious anecdotes. He declared, that on the departure of the French and Scottiſh ambaſſadors, who had made ſtrong repreſentations in favour of Mary, ſhe commanded him to deliver her the warrant for the execution of that princeſs. She ſigned it readily, ordered it to be ſealed, and appeared in ſuch good humour on the occaſion, that ſhe ſaid to him, in a jocular manner, "Go tell all this to Walſingham, who is now ſick, though I fear he will die with ſorrow when he hears it." At the ſame time, ſhe blamed Paulet and Drury, that they had not before eaſed her of this trouble, and wiſhed Walſingham would bring them to a compliance in that particular. "I told her (ſays Daviſon) that Paulet had abſolutely refuſed to act any thing inconſiſtent with the principles of honour and juſtice." The queen was very angry, and accuſed him and others of perjury, in having taken the oath of aſſociation, whereby they had bound themſelves to revenge her wrongs, and yet refuſed their aſſiſtance when it was wanted. "But (added ſhe) there are others who will do it for my ſake."

The grief of the king of Scotland was real: he gave way to the moſt violent complaints and menaces, and abandoned himſelf to the wildeſt reſolutions. He refuſed to admit Cary, who brought the letter of Elizabeth, into his preſence. He recalled his ambaſſadors from the Engliſh court; war and vengeance ſeemed to have taken poſſeſſion of his ſoul. Great part of the nobility catched the flame, and a rupture with England ſeemed inevitable. When the court went into mourning, lord Sinclair appeared in a ſuit of armour, and ſaid, his dreſs only was the proper mourning for the queen of Scotland. Elizabeth was alarmed at theſe warlike appearances; and, as ſoon as the firſt flame was abated, ſhe had recourſe to conciliating meaſures. Walſingham wrote a long letter to James, in which he intimated the dangers to which Scotland would be expoſed in a war with England; the inconveniencies that muſt attend his receiving ſuccours either from France or Spain; and how abſurd it would be for James to riſque his expectations of the crown of England, by irritating the people. Theſe conſiderations, joined to the peaceable temper of the young prince, prevailed over his reſentment, and a good correſpondence with the Engliſh court was gradually reſtored.

Having thus diſſipated the northern ſtorm that threatened to diſcharge its fury on England, Elizabeth was more at leiſure to watch the motions of Philip of Spain, a far more formidable enemy, who had, for ſome time, been making preparations for invading England. A prodigious number of ſhips were equipping in his ports; and though he had not yet declared war againſt England, no body was deceived in his intentions. But the navy of Elizabeth was able to diſpute the prize of victory with the ſovereign of the New World. Drake was ſent, with a ſtrong fleet, to inſult the coaſts of Spain, intercept the ſupplies of naval and military ſtores continually ſending to Cadiz, and deſtroy the ſhipping of the enemy in their own harbours. Drake executed his commiſſion with great courage and ſucceſs, burning and deſtroying above an hundred ſail of ſhips, moſt of them laden with proviſions and military ſtores; and after taking the town of St. Vincent, and bombarding Liſbon, he ſailed for the Weſtern Iſlands, in order to intercept a rich carrack, or galleon, called the St. Philip, then on her return from the Eaſt-Indies. He ſucceeded, and returned to England with an immenſe booty. But the moſt valuable acquiſition was a pacquet of papers found on board the galleon, by which the Engliſh learned the nature of the oriental commerce, and inſpired them with the thoughts of eſtabliſhing an Eaſt-India Company.

Soon after this ſucceſsful expedition, Thomas Cavendiſh returned from his voyage round the world. He was a gentleman of Devonſhire, who having ſpent his fortune at court, reſolved, if poſſible, to retrieve it by an attempt againſt the Spaniſh ſettlements in the New World. He fitted out three ſhips at Plymouth, one of an hundred and twenty tons, another of ſixty, and a third of forty. With thoſe ſmall veſſels he ventured into the South Seas, and committed great depredations on the Spaniards. He took no leſs than nineteen veſſels richly laden; and returning to England by the Cape of Good Hope, entered the Thames in triumph. His ſailors and ſoldiers were dreſſed in ſilk; his ſails were of damaſk; his top-ſails cloth of gold; and his booty proportional to this magnificence. It is eaſy to imagine that ſuch remarkable ſucceſs muſt animate others to attempt expeditions of a ſimilar kind.

But the Engliſh were not equally ſucceſsful in the Netherlands. Leiceſter had intruſted the command of Zutphen and Deventer to Stanley and York, two of his creatures; who, inſtead of defending thoſe important poſts, treacherouſly delivered them up to the duke of Parma. Alarmed at theſe practices, the ſtates ſent an embaſſy to the Engliſh court, requeſting that the government might be taken from the earl of Leiceſter, and given to ſome more able and prudent general. Elizabeth, notwithſtanding her partiality for her favourite, recalled Leiceſter; and Maurice, the young prince of Orange, being appointed governor of the United Provinces, ſoon ſhewed himſelf worthy of his father. The lord Willoughby was made general of the Engliſh forces in the Low Countries, and received orders to ſubmit to the authority of prince Maurice.

A. D. 1588. But the preparations of Philip of Spain principally engaged the attention of Elizabeth. That hypocritical monarch, though he had not yet declared his intention, was preparing to take his revenge, and to ſeize the crown of England. Pope Sextus V. not leſs ambitious than Philip, excited him to the enterprize: he again excommunicated the queen, and publiſhed a cruſade againſt her, with the uſual indulgences. All the ports of Spain reſounded with preparations for this alarming expedition; the Spaniards ſeemed to threaten the annihilation of the Engliſh. Elizabeth, who was well informed of the ſtorm that was gathering againſt her, took every precaution to render the attempts of the enemy abortive: ſhe augmented her navy, and exerciſed her militia. Nothing was neglected; fear was a ſtranger in the Engliſh council.

Philip had ſpent three years in preparing for an invaſion of England; and his fleet, which, on account of its prodigious ſtrength, was called the Invincible Armada, was now completed. A conſecrated banner was procured from the pope, and the gold of Peru was laviſhed on this occaſion. This tremendous armament conſiſted of the following particulars: nineteen thouſand two hundred and ninety ſoldiers; eight thouſand two hundred and fifty ſeamen; two thouſand and eighty galley-ſlaves; and two thouſand ſix hundred and thirty pieces of ordnance. The marquis of Santa-Croce, an officer of great reputation and experience, was appointed to command the armada; and by his counſels and directions all the naval preparations were conducted. There was hardly a noble family in Spain, but ſent either a ſon, a brother, or a nephew, on board this fleet, in order to acquire riches and eſtates in England, which was conſidered as an eaſy conqueſt. The duke of Parma, in order to inſure ſucceſs, was ordered to provide tranſports ſufficient to embark an army of twenty-five thouſand men, and land them in England as ſoon as the Spaniſh fleet appeared on the coaſt of Flanders. Ships were accordingly provided, and the duke quartered his troops in the neighbourhood of Gravelines, Dunkirk, and Nieuport.

The magnanimity of Elizabeth was remarkable on this trying occaſion. Her fleet at that time conſiſted of no more than twenty-eight ſail, and thoſe, for the moſt part, ſmall veſſels; but the alacrity of her ſubjects ſufficiently atoned for the weakneſs of her navy. The maritime towns, the nobility and gentry, teſtified the greateſt zeal on this occaſion. The city of London fitted out thirty ſhips, though fifteen only had been required. The gentry and nobility hired and armed forty-three ſhips at their own expence. Lord Howard of Effingham, a man of great courage and capacity, was lord admiral, and took upon him the command of the navy: Drake, Hawkins, and Forbiſher, the moſt renowned ſeamen in Europe, ſerved under him. The main fleet was ſtationed at Plymouth; while a ſmaller fleet, conſiſting of forty veſſels, under the command of lord Seymour, lay off Dunkirk, in order to intercept the forces commanded by the duke of Parma.

The Engliſh land forces were ſuperior in number to thoſe of Spain; and though inferior in diſcipline and experience, they were ready to ſacrifice their lives in defence of the liberties and laws of their country. Twenty thouſand men were cantoned along the ſouthern coaſts of England; another body of diſciplined forces encamped at Tilbury, near the mouth of the Thames, under the command of the earl of Leiceſter, whom the queen, on this occaſion, created general in chief of all her forces; and the lord Hunſdon commanded a third army, conſiſting of thirty thouſand men, for the defence of her majeſty's perſon. Arthur, lord Grey, Sir Francis Knowles, Sir John Norreys, Sir Richard Bingham, and Sir Roger Williams, men renowned for their valour and experience, were conſulted about the management of the war; and, purſuant to their advice, all the landing-places on the coaſt from Hull to the Land's-End, and thence to Milford-Haven, were fortified and garriſoned. The militia of the country were armed and regulated under proper officers, who received inſtructions for interrupting the diſembarkation of the enemy, waſting the country before them, attacking their rear, and keeping up a continual alarm in their army, till a ſufficient force could be aſſembled to give them battle. Sir Robert Sydney was ſent into Scotland, in order to induce James to continue firmly attached to the Engliſh intereſt. The Scottiſh monarch was ſufficiently diſpoſed to cultivate an union with Elizabeth, and even to march, at the head of all the forces of his kingdom, to the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh. Her authority with the king of Denmark, and the connection reſulting from their common religion, prevailed upon that prince to ſeize a ſquadron of ſhips which Philip had either purchaſed or hired in the Daniſh harbours. But her chief hopes of ſucceſs were placed on the affections of her people. The very papiſts themſelves, though they knew the pope had abſolved them from their oaths of allegiance, exerted themſelves on this occaſion. Conſcious that they could not expect to be intruſted with authority, ſeveral of the young nobility ſerved as volunteers, either in the fleet or army: ſome equipped ſhips at their own expence, and gave the command of them to proteſtants; while others were active in animating their tenants and vaſſals in ſupport of their ſovereign. Party diſtinctions were forgotten, and every man exerted himſelf in the defence of his country.

The queen, to excite the martial ſpirit of the nation, appeared on horſeback in the camp at Tilbury, harangued her army, and expreſſed an entire confidence in their loyalty and courage. She aſſured her troops, that the weakneſs of her ſex ſhould not prevent her marching at their head againſt the Spaniſh invaders; that ſhe would behold and reward their bravery herſelf; and that ſhe would ſooner periſh on the field of battle than live to ſee the ſlavery of her people. "My arm (ſaid ſhe) is but the arm of a woman; but I have the heart of a king, and, what is more, of a king of England." The whole army catched the heroic ardour of the queen; they were impatient to meet the enemy, and convince the haughty Spaniards that they ſtill poſſeſſed all the ſpirit of their anceſtors.

The death of the marquis of Santa Croce prevented the ſailing of the armada. The duke of Medina Sidonia, a nobleman of great family, but wholly unacquainted with maritime affairs, was appointed admiral in his room. This interval was employed by Elizabeth in making new preparations for rendering the deſign abortive. At length the invincible fleet ſailed from Liſbon on the twenty-ninth of May; but being overtaken with a dreadful tempeſt, the fleet was obliged to put into the Groyne, having received conſiderable damage. After a delay of two months, the armada ſailed once more to proſecute the intended enterprize. The fleet conſiſted of one hundred and thirty ſhips, of which near a hundred were galleons, and of a greater burden than any that had ever before appeared on the coaſt of England. The Spaniſh admiral was ordered to ſail as near the coaſt of France as poſſible, in order to join the prince of Parma, and avoid meeting the Engliſh fleet, which might occaſion ſome delay in the enterprize; for it was never imagined that they could make any effectual oppoſition. But an accident induced the Spaniſh admiral to neglect this prudent advice. He took a fiſhing-boat in his paſſage, the maſter of which informed him, that the Engliſh admiral, perſuaded that the late ſtorm, which ſcattered the armada, had prevented any attempt being made this ſeaſon, had laid up his ſhips, and diſcharged the greater part of his ſeamen. Deceived by this intelligence, the Spaniard determined to deſtroy the Engliſh ſhips in Plymouth harbour before he joined the prince of Parma. He accordingly ſteered towards that port, hoping to obtain an eaſy victory. The armada was diſpoſed in the form of a half-moon, and ſtretched to the diſtance of ſeven leagues from the extremity of one diviſion to that of the other. The ocean ſeemed to groan beneath its burden, and the winds to be tired with impelling ſo enormous a weight. But this tremendous appearance diſmayed not the Engliſh; they knew their huge veſſels were ſo ill conſtructed, and ſo difficult to be managed, that they would not be able to ſupport themſelves againſt the repeated attacks of ſhips at a diſtance. Experience ſoon convinced them that they were not miſtaken. Two of the largeſt ſhips in the Spaniſh fleet were ſoon after taken by Sir Francis Drake; and while the enemy advanced ſlowly up the channel, the Engliſh followed their rear, and haraſſed them with perpetual ſkirmiſhes. The Spaniards now began to abate in their confidence of ſucceſs: the deſign of attacking the Engliſh navy in Plymouth was laid aſide, and they directed their courſe towards Calais, in order to join the prince of Parma.

The alarm had now reached the coaſt of England, and the nobility and gentry haſtened out with their ſhips from every harbour, to join the admiral, who ſoon found his fleet amounted to one hundred and forty ſail. He ſtill hung upon the rear of the Spaniards, and diſtreſſed them with repeated attacks. At laſt the armada came to an anchor before Calais, in expectation of being joined by the prince of Parma; but before that general could embark his troops, all hopes of ſucceſs vaniſhed, by a ſtratagem of the Engliſh admiral. He filled eight of his ſmaller ſhips with combuſtible materials, and ſetting them on fire, ſent them, one after another, into the midſt of the enemy's fleet. Terrified at this appearance, the Spaniards cut their cables, and betook themſelves to flight in a very precipitate and diſorderly manner. In the midſt of this confuſion, the Engliſh fell upon them with ſo much fury, that twelve of their largeſt ſhips were taken, and many more greatly damaged.

The Spaniards were now convinced that the intention of theſe prodigious preparations was entirely fruſtrated; and would willingly have abandoned the enterprize, and returned immediately to their own ports, could they have done it with ſafety: but this was impoſſible: the wind was contrary; and the only chance of eſcaping, was that of making a tour of the whole iſland, and reaching at laſt the Spaniſh harbours by the ocean. But a violent ſtorm ſoon overtook them, and compleated the deſtruction of the invincible armada; not half the number of veſſels returned to the ports of Spain. It is ſaid that Philip, being informed of theſe diſaſters, fell on his knees, to thank heaven for leaving him ſo much; while the Spaniſh clergy, confounded at an event ſo contrary to their expectations, aſſigned a very ridiculous cauſe for it, namely, that ſome infidel Mahometans were ſuffered to continue in a catholic kingdom.

A public thankſgiving was ordered by Elizabeth; and ſhe herſelf repaired, in great ſolemnity, to St. Paul's, to perform that ſacred duty; and eleven ſtandards taken from the enemy were hung up in the church, as trophies of the ſucceſs of the Engliſh. The queen beſtowed rewards on many of her officers who had ſo nobly exerted themſelves in defence of their country; and the whole kingdom was one continued ſcene of joy.

Soon after the diſperſion of the Spaniſh armada, Robert Dudley, earl of Leiceſter, the queen's great, but unworthy favourite, paid the debt of nature. He had diſcovered no conduct in any of his military enterprizes, and was even ſuſpected of cowardice; yet he was entruſted with the chief command of the Engliſh at a time when the Spaniards were expected to invade the kingdom; a partiality that might have proved fatal to Elizabeth, had the prince of Parma landed his troops in England. But the queen's affections ſeemed to terminate entirely with his death: ſhe cauſed his goods to be expoſed to ſale, in order to reimburſe herſelf for the money ſhe had lent him.

A. D. 1589. Nothing is more ſeductive than victory. The Engliſh having defeated the Spaniſh armada, attempted to take the kingdom of Portugal from Philip, and give it to Don Antonio, a baſtard of the houſe of Braganza. Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Norris were the leaders of this romantic enterprize. About twenty thouſand volunteers engaged in the ſervice. The ſhips were hired, as well as the arms and ſtores provided, at the expence of the adventurers. The queen contributed only ſix ſhips and ſixty thouſand pounds towards this expedition.

The fleet ſailed from Plymouth on the fifth of April, arrived ſafely at the Groyne, and ſoon became maſters both of the place and harbour. They now ſailed for the coaſt of Portugal; and in their paſſage were met by the young earl of Eſſex, who had equipped a few ſhips at his own expence, and ſailed on a cruize againſt the Spaniards. This reinforcement revived the ſpirits of the adventurers; they ſeized the town and caſtle of Panicha, and determined to march to Liſbon by land, Drake promiſing to follow with his fleet. On their arrival, they became maſters of the weſtern ſuburb of Liſbon without oppoſition; but the next day a large body of Spaniards ſallied from the citadel, and cut off ſeveral of the Engliſh, with ſome of their beſt officers. The earl of Eſſex behaved with the moſt ſurpriſing courage on this occaſion: he led the Engliſh againſt the aſſailants, and drove them back to the citadel. A revolt of the citizens was every moment expected; but after waiting two days, without any appearance of an inſurrection being made in favour of Don Antonio, the Engliſh abandoned the enterprize, and marched to Caſcaris, a little town at the mouth of the Tagus. Here they found their fleet under the command of Drake, who had not been able to enter the river, the paſſage being defended by all the Spaniſh gallies, and a battery of fifty pieces of cannon. It was now determined not to make any farther attempt upon the capital; and, after blowing up the caſtle of Caſcaris, and burning Vigo, they returned to England, after loſing a great number of men by ſickneſs and fatigue.

In the mean time, the parliament met at Weſtminſter, and voted double ſupplies to the queen; who knowing that the puritans formed a majority in the houſe of commons, laid a ſtrict injunction on the members not to meddle with eccleſiaſtical matters. A motion was, however, made, for reſtraining the tyranny of the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion: but the fear of diſpleaſing the queen had ſo great an effect on the members, that the motion was not ſeconded. Nor were the commons ſucceſsful in their attempts to rectify the abuſes of purveyance, by which the officers of the crown took up at diſcretion, for the queen's ſervice, or rather under pretence of that ſervice, whatever proviſions and carriages they thought neceſſary. The price was fixed much lower than the current value, and the payment always diſtant and uncertain. Hence the moſt enormous abuſes were continually practiſed on the ſubject. But Elizabeth put a ſtop to their proceedings: ſhe told them, that ſhe had already given orders for making a ſtrict enquiry into the abuſes complained of, and would ſhortly complete the deſign; but would not permit them, by laws moved without her conſent, to bereave her of the honour attending theſe regulations.

The affairs of England were now in a ſtate of tranquillity. The Scots, ſince the death of Mary, were no longer terrible. James, ſurrounded by factions, inveſted with little authority, and naturally inclined to repoſe, was ſo far from being able to give the Engliſh any diſturbance, that he found it his intereſt to maintain a good correſpondence with Elizabeth. He had lately married a daughter of the king of Denmark, and by that means loſt the favour of the catholic party. Philip of Spain had ſufficiently ſeen his error, to attempt a new invaſion: he was not ſo fond of enterprize to ſquander the treaſures of his kingdom in enterprizes big with abſurdity. Elizabeth was therefore now able to aſſiſt the Hugonots in France, who were ſtill perſecuted by the league. The duke of Guiſe, more abſolute than Henry III. had compelled that prince to take up arms againſt them, and alſo againſt the king of Navarre, the preſumptive heir of the crown. Elizabeth furniſhed the latter with large ſums; and, by her aſſiſtance, he had gained a victory over the league at Goutray. He could not, however, maintain his advantage, becauſe the Germans, who were marching to his aſſiſtance, were defeated by the duke of Guiſe. Unforeſeen events, however, changed the face of things in France. The inhabitants of Paris, intoxicated with the admiration of Guiſe, and ſtrongly prejudiced againſt the king, took up arms againſt him, and Henry was obliged to fly from his capital for ſafety. He, however, diſſembled his reſentment, entered into a negotiation with the league, and loaded Guiſe and his partizans with offices and favours. Deceived by theſe appearances of friendſhip, Guiſe, and his brother, the cardinal of Lorraine, came to court, and were both aſſaſſinated by the king's orders. This perfidious conduct rendered the league more furious and formidable than ever. The citizens of Paris renounced their allegiance, and were followed by thoſe of many conſiderable places in the kingdom. Henry finding it impoſſible to reſiſt the ſtorm that was gathering round him, was obliged to have recourſe to the Hugonots for aſſiſtance; he joined the hero whom he had been obliged to treat as an enemy. At the ſame time, he inliſted large bodies of Swiſs infantry and German cavalry; and being ſtill ſupported by his chief nobility, he aſſembled an army of near forty thouſand men, and advanced to the gates of Paris, threatening the ſevereſt revenge againſt the inhabitants. But the city was ſaved by the reſolution of Jaques Clement, a Dominican monk. Inflamed by the bloody ſpirit of bigotry which diſtinguiſhed this century, he embraced the reſolution of ſacrificing his own life to ſave the church from the perſecutions of an heretical tyrant. He found means to be admitted into the king's preſence, and plunged a dagger into the breaſt of his ſovereign, who expired on the firſt of Auguſt. The king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. aſcended the throne, but found he had a kingdom to conquer, and ſubjects to ſubdue.

Towards the cloſe of this year died the famous Sir Francis Walſingham, ſecretary of ſtate, one of the moſt able and accompliſhed miniſters that ever appeared in this or any other country, and not more diſtinguiſhed by his great abilities than his unſullied virtues. Though he had paſſed through many great employments, and had been very frugal in his expences, he died ſo poor, that his family was obliged to give him a private burial. He left only one daughter, who was firſt married to Sir Philip Sidney, and afterwards to the earl of Eſſex, the great favourite of queen Elizabeth.

A. D. 1590. Elizabeth perceiving that Philip aimed at univerſal monarchy, and that the firſt ſtep towards accompliſhing that alarming deſign was the depoſition of Henry IV. ſhe ſent that prince a body of troops, which did him ſignal ſervice. The famous ſieges of Paris and Rouen, which the duke of Parma had the honour of raiſing, deceived, however, the hopes of the queen. She ſeemed diſſatisfied with the conduct of her ally, and complained of his expoſing the Engliſh too much on every occaſion; a complaint that ſeems not to have been well founded, as it was undoubtedly owing to the valour of thoſe troops, eſpecially to their officers, who, under the command of the young earl of Eſſex, riſqued every thing for glory. But while the Engliſh were gathering laurels in the fields of France, the queen ſuſtained an irreparable loſs, by the death of Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, lord high chancellor of England. He was a perſon of great abilities, unſhaken probity, firmly attached to the conſtitutions of his country, and a munificent patron of learning.

A. D. 1591. Deſirous of depriving Philip of part of the treaſure of the Indies, the true ſource of all his power, Elizabeth reſolved to diſtreſs him in that part of the world. Accordingly the lord Thomas Howard was diſpatched, early in the ſpring, to the Azores, or Weſtern Iſlands, with a ſquadron of ſeven ſhips, to intercept the galleons in their return to Europe; but the Spaniſh monarch, apprized of her deſign, fitted out a fleet of fifty-five ſail, and ſent them to the Azores, to convoy the India ſhips. Howard, who knew nothing of this ſtrong fleet, eſcaped with difficulty. His little ſquadron was riding at anchor in the harbour of Flores when the Spaniſh fleet appeared. He, however, found means to put to ſea, by which the enemy were diſappointed in their hopes of taking him and his whole diviſion. Sir Richard Grenville, in the Revenge, was not ſo fortunate: he was ſurrounded by the enemy, and all hopes of eſcaping were cut off. In this deſperate ſituation he attempted to break through the Spaniſh fleet, but was diſappointed; and after an engagement of fifteen hours with the whole force of the enemy, he was obliged to ſurrender, but not before he was mortally wounded. The reſt of the ſquadron returned to England, diſappointed, indeed, in their expectations of acquiring part of the riches of the New World, but not in eſſentially diſtreſſing the enemy; for the Plate fleet had been ſo long detained at the Havannah, through fear of the Engliſh, that they were obliged to put to ſea at an improper ſeaſon; in conſequence of which, the greater part of them were loſt before they reached the ports of Spain.

A. D. 1592. Though Henry IV. had obtained ſome advantage over the league, the catholics were far from being intimidated: they made the moſt violent efforts againſt their ſovereign, and the cardinal legate publiſhed the pontiff's bull for the election of a popiſh king. They intended to have given the crown to Philip; and the duke of Parma marched a powerful army into France, to over-awe the aſſembly, which the Spaniſh party propoſed to be held at Rheims or Soiſſons. But the duke of Mayenne, ſenſible of the conſequences, ordered the aſſembly to be held at Paris. This, in ſome meaſure, diſconcerted the plan of the prince of Parma; and Henry drew all his troops out of Normandy, in order to fight the Spaniſh general before he could advance into the heart of the country. What the conſequence would have been, it is impoſſible to ſay; but all the vaſt deſigns of Philip were rendered abortive by the death of the prince of Parma, who paid the debt of nature in the forty-fifth year of his age. Even Elizabeth herſelf is ſaid to have dropped ſome generous expreſſions to the memory of that great man; and, perhaps, few princes ever excelled him in virtue, in civil, and in military accompliſhments. His great merits were ſoon conſpicuous after his death. No other general had authority ſufficient to maintain a proper diſcipline in the Spaniſh troops. The ſoldiers mutinied, and a great number of them deſerted.

Elizabeth, though ſhe aſſiſted Henry, did not lay aſide her favourite ſcheme of humbling the pride of Philip, by cutting off the ſinews of his ſtrength in the Weſt-Indies. Sir Walter Raleigh was ſent with a ſquadron of fifteen men of war, either to attack Panama, or intercept the Plate fleet in their return to Europe. No man was ever better adapted to enterprizes of this kind than Sir Walter: his ſchemes were great, but difficult, if not impracticable to any capacity but his own: his learning was not inferior to his knowledge, his conſtancy to his courage, nor his virtue to his genius, which was equal to the greateſt undertakings. Having been detained too long in port by contrary winds, he ſailed three months later than he intended; and after paſſing the Land's-End, he learned, that orders had been ſent from Spain to ſtop the return of the Plate fleet to Europe that ſeaſon. This intelligence, together with a violent ſtorm which ſeparated his fleet, obliged him to alter his plan of operations. He ſent one part of his ſquadron, under Sir Martin Forbiſher, to cruize on the coaſt of Spain; and another part under Burroughs, a brave ſea officer, to the Azores. The earl of Cumberland was alſo at ſea with three men of war, and had chaſed a galleon into Flores, juſt as Burroughs arrived at that iſland; while the Spaniſh fleet, which was then at ſea, went in ſearch of Forbiſher. Burroughs would have made himſelf maſter of the galleon which had taken ſhelter in Flores, had not a dead calm ſucceeded, and given the Spaniards an opportunity of unloading the treaſure, and ſetting the ſhip on fire. He had, however, the good fortune, ſoon after, to take another galleon, after a deſperate engagement, in which the greater part of the Spaniſh crew, conſiſting of ſix hundred men, were either killed or wounded. The Engliſh gained both riches and honour by this capture. The money publickly known amounted to one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, and the embezzlements were thought to be at leaſt equal in value. But though Elizabeth exerted all her power to recover the riches that had been ſecreted, no diſcovery was made.

A. D. 1593. The expences of theſe expeditions amounted to one million two hundred thouſand pounds; ſo that Elizabeth, notwithſtanding her ſtrict œconomy, could not ſupport ſo heavy an expence without the aſſiſtance of parliament. But however preſſing her wants might be, ſhe ſupported all her haughtineſs towards the parliament. When the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons demanded for the members aſſembled in parliament, perſonal ſecurity, freedom of debate, and acceſs to the throne, ſhe anſwered, by the mouth of the lord-keeper, that their perſons ſhould be ſafe while they abuſed not this privilege; that liberty of ſpeech was granted the commons, but they muſt know in what that liberty conſiſted: it was not a liberty of ſaying what they pleaſed; it extended no farther than Yes or No; and that ſhe would not refuſe them acceſs to her perſon in weighty and important matters, at a convenient ſeaſon, and when the cares of government would permit. At the ſame time, ſhe enjoined the ſpeaker, if he perceived any idle heads ſo negligent of their own ſafety, as to attempt any reformation in the church, or innovation in the commonwealth, to refuſe the bills offered for that purpoſe, till they were examined by ſuch as were better qualified to conſider of thoſe things, and more able to judge of their propriety.

But notwithſtanding the imperious and menacing air of this ſpeech, the puritans were not intimidated. Peter Wentworth ventured to tranſgreſs the imperial orders of Elizabeth. He preſented a petition to the upper houſe, requeſting that they would join with the commons in a ſupplication to her majeſty, that ſhe would be pleaſed to entail the ſucceſſion of the crown. Elizabeth was offended at this attempt, however reſpectful and cautious. Wentworth was ſent to the Tower; and Sir William Bromley, who ſeconded the motion, to the Fleet priſon. Even this arbitrary proceeding could not repreſs their farther attempts for freedom. Morrice, attorney of the court of wards, expoſed, in their proper colours, the enormous abuſes of the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, and made a motion for redreſſing theſe grievances. Exaſperated at the temerity of Morrice, the queen ſent for the ſpeaker, and told him, that ſhe had aſſembled the parliament for two purpoſes only; to maintain the uniformity of the national religion, and to provide for the defence of the kingdom againſt the enormous power of Spain; that their deliberations muſt turn intirely on theſe points; that ſhe had already enjoined them not to meddle either with the affairs of the ſtate or religion; and wondered how any perſon could be ſo aſſuming as to attempt a ſubject ſo expreſsly contrary to her prohibition. Morrice felt the weight of the queen's reſentment: he was ſeized in the houſe by the ſerjeant at arms, diſcharged from his office, diſabled from acting in his profeſſion, and confined ſome years in Tilbury caſtle. So determined was the queen to ſupport her prerogative, and ſo ſtrong was the love of liberty and independence in the puritan party.

A ſevere bill was ſoon after paſſed againſt the nonconformiſts of all perſuaſions. It was enacted, that any perſon above ſixteen years of age, who obſtinately refuſed, during the ſpace of a month, to attend the public ſervice of the church of England, ſhould be committed to priſon; that if, after being condemned for this offence, he perſiſted three months in his refuſal, he muſt abjure the realm; and that if he either refuſed this condition, or returned from his baniſhment, he was to ſuffer capitally as a felon, without benefit of clergy. Both catholics and puritans had reaſon to complain of this law, which, under almoſt any other reign, might have occaſioned a civil war. But the imperious Elizabeth had ſubdued the people, partly by fear, and partly by the eſteem ſhe had gained by her magnanimity. The commons ſeemed intirely paſſive under this haughty treatment; they granted extraordinary ſupplies without the leaſt difficulty.

The king of France, notwithſtanding all his heroic qualities, and the great aſſiſtance he received from the Engliſh, ſoon perceived that arms alone would never make him maſter of his kingdom. He found it impoſſible to triumph over the rage of a party, whom religious zeal had rendered the moſt obſtinate rebels. A conſpiracy was even formed in his own court, for electing ſome catholic prince to fill the throne of France, if Henry any longer delayed to embrace the eſtabliſhed religion. The more ſenſible among the proteſtants perceived the neceſſity of ſatiſfying the catholics. Henry accordingly abjured Calviniſm, either from conviction, or, as it is rather ſuppoſed, from political motives. But however that be, the papiſts triumphed greatly in gaining ſo illuſtrious a proſelyte; and the dreadful diſputes which had for ſo many years deluged France with blood, began to ſubſide. Elizabeth, who was herſelf chiefly attached to the proteſtants by political reaſons, reproached Henry for this intereſted converſion in a very angry letter. Senſible, however, that the league and the king of Spain were ſtill their common enemies, ſhe liſtened to his apologies, and continued her aſſiſtance: ſhe even entered into a new treaty with him, whereby it was ſtipulated, that no peace ſhould be made but with the conſent of both parties.

Philip confined not his intrigues to England only; he endeavoured to excite freſh diſturbances in Scotland; and large ſupplies were promiſed by the governor of the Netherlands, if the catholics would attempt to wreſt the ſceptre from James, and give it to a prince of the Romiſh perſuaſion. The project was, however, principally levelled againſt England; for though the Spaniards promiſed to ſend an army into Scotland, it was only to cover their enterprize againſt Elizabeth, whom they intended to aſſaſſinate; and, during the general conſternation, which they imagined muſt attend her death, they propoſed to invade England, which would then become an eaſy conqueſt. They proceeded ſo far in this deteſtable ſcheme, that ſeveral of their agents were diſcovered and executed. Elizabeth complained loudly of theſe baſe attempts in every court of Europe, and determined to take a noble revenge in the field of battle.

A. D. 1595. While the queen was making preparations for carrying the war into the territories of Spain, ſeveral noble atchievements were performed at ſea by the Engliſh; but the moſt remarkable was an expedition of Sir Walter Raleigh to Guiana, a large tract of land in South America, rather poſſeſſed than inhabited by the Spaniards. He had, at his own expence, ſent one Whiddon to view the coaſt, and make all the obſervations in his power. His report confirmed Raleigh in his reſolution of endeavouring to wreſt that extenſive country out of the hands of the Spaniards. His undertaking was ſo generally applauded, that both the treaſurer and admiral of England contributed to the expences of fitting out a fleet for carrying the deſign into execution. Accordingly, on the ſixth of February, Sir Walter ſailed from Plymouth; and on the twenty-ſecond of March, took the city of St. Joſeph, in the iſland of Trinidada, and made Boreo, the Spaniſh governor, priſoner. Having procured all the information poſſible with regard to the ſtrength and riches of Guiana, Raleigh manned his long-boats with about a hundred men, and proceeded above four hundred miles up the river Oroonoko; but met with ſo many difficulties from the navigation and the heat of the climate, that he did not reap all the advantages ſo brave and dangerous an undertaking deſerved. It is certain, however, that he made great diſcoveries; and though we have no authentic account of the riches he acquired in this undertaking, there is ſufficient reaſon to believe they were very conſiderable. He was received with the higheſt applauſe on his return, and a very pompous account of his voyage was publiſhed.

A. D. 1596. The neceſſary preparations being made for carrying the war into the very heart of Spain, a powerful fleet, conſiſting of one hundred and ninety veſſels, having on board ſix thouſand three hundred and ſixty ſoldiers, a thouſand volunteers, and ſix thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy-two ſeamen, ſailed from Plymouth on the firſt of June. The fleet was commanded by lord Effingham, and the land forces by the earl of Eſſex. The lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, and Sir Coniers Clifford, had commands in this expedition, and formed a council to the admiral and general.

Every precaution was taken to render the expedition ſucceſsful. The general rendezvous was appointed at Cadiz, and armed tenders were diſpatched before the fleet, to intercept every ſhip that could carry any intelligence to the enemy. Near Cadiz they took an Iriſh veſſel, by which they learned that the harbour was full of merchant ſhips of great value; and that the Spaniards lived in perfect ſecurity, without the leaſt apprehenſions of a viſit from an enemy. This intelligence greatly encouraged the Engliſh, and promiſed a fortunate iſſue to the enterprize.

Sir Walter Raleigh propoſed to attack the ſhips and veſſels in the bay; and was ſtrongly ſeconded by the young earl of Eſſex, who burnt with an eager deſire of ſignalizing his courage on this important occaſion. The motion was agreed to; and it was determined that Raleigh ſhould lead the attack in the Warſpite, and be ſeconded by Sir George Carew in the Mary Roſe, Sir Robert Southwell in the Lion, Sir Francis Vere in the Rainbow, vice-admiral Croſs in the Swiftſure, Sir Coniers Clifford in the Dreadnought, and the lord Thomas Howard in the Nonpareil.

The Spaniards, in order, if poſſible, to render the attempt of the Engliſh abortive, ranged their gallies under the walls of the city, ſo as to flank the Engliſh ſhips as they paſſed: ſome culverins were planted to ſecure the channel of the harbour; and the artillery, both of Fort St. Philip and the curtain of the fortification, were brought to bear on the Engliſh fleet. Beſides theſe, the Spaniards had put guns on board all their large galleons, which were covered by Fort Puntal, ſituated in the middle of the harbour.

At break of day Sir Walter, at the head of the Engliſh van, advanced to the attack, and received the fire from Fort St. Philip, the curtain, and ſeventeen gallies; but he anſwered only by a flouriſh of his trumpets, purſuing his courſe with amazing intrepidity, in order to encourage the ſhips that followed him, and reſerve his fire for the body of the enemy. After a long and moſt deſperate engagement, Sir Walter prepared to board the Spaniſh admiral, a ſhip of fifteen hundred tons; but the Spaniards perceiving his intention, ran her on ſhore, and ſet her on fire. Three other galleons followed the example of their admiral, but two of them were ſaved, and brought away by the Engliſh boats.

During this engagement, the earl of Eſſex, with five hundred men, landed at the Puntals, and marched directly to Cadiz. Five hundred Spaniards advanced about four hundred paces from the city to meet him; but were ſtruck with a panic, retired into the city with the utmoſt precipitation, and were cloſely followed by the Engliſh. Cadiz was now in the utmoſt conſternation; and before any meaſures could be taken for making a proper defence, the Engliſh had forced the gate, and were ſoon in poſſeſſion of the market-place. The garriſon and inhabitants retired to the caſtle and town-houſe, but ſoon offered to capitulate; and it was agreed that their lives ſhould be ſaved on their paying ſeventy thouſand ducats. A prodigious quantity of ſilver was found in the place, and ſent immediately on board the Engliſh fleet.

While Eſſex was employed in the reduction of Cadiz, Sir Walter Raleigh was ſent to burn the merchant-ſhips at Port Real. The Spaniards offered to pay two millions of ducats for their ranſom; but Raleigh rejected the offer, ſaying, that he came to deſtroy, and not to ranſom the ſhips of the enemy. The Spaniards, however, found means to unload ſome of their ſhips, and ſet fire to others, in order to deprive the Engliſh of their riches. Beſides the merchant-ſhips, two galleons, thirteen men of war, eleven ſhips freighted for the Indies, and thirteen others, were taken by the Engliſh; beſides which, they deſtroyed a prodigious quantity of military and naval ſtores prepared for an intended expedition againſt England. The whole loſs was eſtimated at twenty millions of ducats.

No Engliſhman of note periſhed in this memorable conqueſt, ſo glorious to the Engliſh and fatal to the Spaniards, except Sir John Wingfield, who was killed in the city; and the victory was obtained with the loſs of two hundred men only. Beſides the vaſt riches loſt by the Spaniards, and the ruin of their trade to the New World for that year, they were obliged to ſubmit to the mortifying conditions of ſeeing one of their principal ſea-ports in the hands of an enemy whom they hoped to conquer.

This ſucceſs was regarded by Eſſex only as a ſtep to farther conqueſts. He inſiſted on keeping poſſeſſion ſeſſion of Cadiz, and undertook, with four hundred men and three months proviſions, to defend the place againſt all the attempts of the enemy, till ſuccours could arrive from England. But this offer was rejected; nor were his ſchemes for intercepting the carracks at the Azores, aſſaulting the Groyne, or taking St. Andero and St. Sebaſtian, accepted. All the other ſeamen and ſoldiers, ſatisfied with the honour they had acquired, were impatient to return home in order to ſecure their plunder. Eſſex complained of their want of ſpirit in this enterprize, and the queen herſelf was not pleaſed at their return without attempting to intercept the India fleet: but the great ſucceſs of the enterprize againſt Cadiz covered all their miſcarriages. Effingham was created earl of Nottingham, a promotion which gave great offence to Eſſex, becauſe it was ſaid, in the preamble to his patent, that this dignity was conferred upon him for his good ſervices in taking Cadiz, a merit which Eſſex inſiſted belonged principally to himſelf; and even offered to maintain his claim by ſingle combat, againſt Nottingham, his ſon, or any of his family.

A. D. 1597. Exaſperated by the loſſes he had ſuſtained by the taking of Cadiz, Philip determined to make another effort for the conqueſt of England. He accordingly aſſembled a formidable fleet early in the ſpring, at a time when Elizabeth thought him abſolutely diſabled from executing any ſcheme of revenge. His fleet rendezvouſed at Ferrol, and having taken on board the land forces deſtined for the expedition, ſteered directly for England; but before they reached the channel, a violent ſtorm diſperſed the fleet, and rendered the attempt abortive for that year. In revenge for this attempt Elizabeth determined to attack Tercera, the principal iſland of the Azores; and, if poſſible, intercept the Spaniſh flota, in their return from the Weſt Indies. A large armament, conſiſting of one hundred and twenty-two ſhips, was accordingly fitted out with the utmoſt expedition, and ſix thouſand land forces were embarked. The command of the whole expedition was given to Eſſex, together with one of the diviſions of the fleet; the ſecond diviſion was commanded by lord Thomas Howard, and the third by Sir Walter Raleigh: lord Montjoy, was appointed lieutenant-general under Eſſex; and Sir George Carew, lieutenant of the ordnance. The principal volunteers were the earls of Rutland and Southampton, the lords Grey, Cromwell, and Rich.

The deſtination of the fleet, which ſailed on the ninth of July, was firſt againſt Ferrol and the Groyne, in order, if poſſible, to ſuprize the Spaniſh fleet in theſe harbours; and afterwards againſt the Azores. But contrary winds, ſtorms, and a fatal quarrel between the earl of Eſſex and Sir Walter Raleigh, broke theſe meaſures, and the fleet returned to England about the end of October, without having performed any memorable action.

The war with Spain though ſucceſsful, exhauſted the queen's treaſure, and ſhe was obliged to call a parliament to obtain ſupplies. Theſe were readily granted; but the commons, notwithſtanding their former attempts miſcarried, ventured to preſent a petition to the queen againſt the abuſe of monopolies. Her anſwer was conceived in general terms, without promiſing to redreſs the evil. But on diſmiſſing the parliament ſhe told them, in her ſpeech from the throne, "That with regard to excluſive patents, ſhe hoped her loving and faithful ſubjects would not take away her prerogative, the chief flower in her garden, and the principal pearl in her diadem; but that they would rather leave theſe things to her diſpoſal." It was hardly to be expected, that the liberties of the people of England could gain ground under a government ſupported with ſo much vigour and ability.

A. D. 1598. France was now reduced to the moſt deplorable ſituation. Torn in pieces by diſcord, fanataciſm, and civil wars, a peace became in ſome meaſure neceſſary for Henry, who had nothing ſo much at heart as the happineſs of his people. He communicated to his allies the propoſals of the court of Spain, and ſignified his deſire of concluding a general treaty of peace. Elizabeth and the States-general were alarmed at this deſign, and ſent ambaſſadors to oppoſe the pacific ſentiments of the French monarch. He ſhewed them at once the ſolidity of his reaſons and the rectitude of his views; and as Philip would not treat with the Hollanders upon the condition of acknowledging them a free people, nor Elizabeth negotiate without their concurrence, he concluded, at Vervins, a ſeparate peace; whereby he recovered poſſeſſion of all the places ſeized by Spain during the courſe of the civil wars, and procured himſelf leiſure to attend the domeſtic ſettlement of his kingdom. Some of the chiefs of the Engliſh miniſtry, particularly lord Burleigh, who beſt merited the queen's confidence, adviſed her to embrace pacific meaſures; but all his reaſons were urged in vain. That ſpirited princeſs, at other times ſo attentive to the prevention, now liſtened not to the ears of adverſe fortune. She no longer dreaded the attempts of the Spaniards; the armada's of Philip had loſt their terror. Animated with the hopes of ſharing in the riches of America, and deeply intereſted in the fate of the new republic, ſhe prefered an honourable war to the advantages of a peace, which muſt have entailed miſery and ſlavery upon Holland. The earl of Eſſex encouraged her in theſe ſentiments. He repreſented to her, that the defence of the Hollanders was the original cauſe of the war; and that it was at once unſafe and diſhonourable to abandon the cauſe ſhe had undertaken to defend, till ſhe had placed them in a ſtate of greater ſecurity, and procured them that liberty for which they had ſo long and ſo nobly contended.

The arguments of Eſſex, whoſe perſon was very agreeable to the queen, prevailed: the favourite ſeemed daily to gain the aſcendant over the miniſter. That nobleman was no leſs diſtinguiſhed by his underſtanding than by his birth and figure. He was bold, generous, ſincere, a firm friend, active, and paſſionately fond of glory; but carried away by his paſſions, and incapable of ſubmitting to the rein of prudence. Theſe paſſions at laſt proved his deſtruction. The Hollanders conſidered Elizabeth as their guardian angel, and readily ſubmitted to any terms ſhe pleaſed to require. The debt they owed the queen was now fixed at eight hundred thouſand pounds; of which ſum they agreed to pay thirty thouſand pounds a year during the continuance of the war, and theſe payments were to be continued till they had paid four hundred thouſand pounds. They alſo agreed to pay the garriſons of the cautionary towns while England continued the war with Spain; and that if Philip ſhould attempt an invaſion of England, to aſſiſt the queen with a body of five thouſand foot and five hundred horſe.

This treaty was ratified on the eighth of Auguſt, and ſoon after Philip II. of Spain expired at Madrid, in the ſeventy-third year of his age, and the forty-third of his reign. The ſatisfaction of Elizabeth at this event was greatly leſſened by the loſs of lord Burleigh, her zealous and faithful counſellor. That truly great man had long and earneſtly requeſted his miſtreſs to grant him ſome moments of interval between buſineſs and the grave; but he aſked in vain. He continued immerſed in all the fatigues of office till death, on the fourteenth of Auguſt, gave him that repoſe which was denied him by Elizabeth. Lord Burleigh was now on the verge of eighty, and though many miniſters have lived with leſs envy, none ever died with greater reputation. He was chiefly diſtinguiſhed for ſolidity of underſtanding, probity of manners, and indefatigable application to buſineſs; he had been regarded as the chief miniſter near forty years, and his death, by a rare inſtance of fortune, was equally regretted by his ſovereign and the people.

the EARL of ESSEX.

Nothing but his own imprudence could now have ſhaken the credit of Eſſex; but his lofty ſpirit could ill ſubmit to that implicit deference which Elizabeth's temper required, and which ſhe had ever been accuſtomed to receive from all her ſubjects. Diſputing, one day, on ſome affair with the queen, he carried matters ſo high, as to turn his back upon her with an air of contempt. Elizabeth's anger, which was naturally prompt and violent, roſe on this provocation, and ſhe inſtantly gave him a box on the ear. The paſſion of Eſſex was too violent to be reſtrained. He laid his hand upon his ſword. and ſwore that he would not have taken ſo groſs an affront from her father Henry himſelf. The admiral and vice-chamberlain interpoſed between the ſovereign and the ſubject, and prevented any farther conſequences at that time; but Eſſex left the court, with a ſeeming reſolution never more to return. His friend Egerton, the chancellor, exhorted him to repair his indiſcretion by proper acknowledgments, to acknowledge his faults, and conſider his duty and his fortune. He conjured him not to give that triumph to his enemies, that affliction to his friends, which muſt enſue from his ſupporting a conteſt with his ſovereign, and deſerting the ſervice of his country. Eſſex anſwered, in a letter full of reſentment, and which breathed all the violence of his haughty ſoul; but was, at the ſame time, ſo ſpirited, that it would be injuſtice not to lay it before the reader. “My very good lord, Though there is not that man this day living whom I would ſooner make the judge of any queſtion that might concern me, than yourſelf, yet you muſt give me leave to tell you, that in ſome caſes I muſt appeal from all earthly judges; and if in any, then ſurely in this, when the higheſt judge on earth has impoſed on me the higheſt puniſhment, without trial or hearing. Since then I muſt either anſwer your lordſhip's argument, or abandon my own defence, I will force my aching head to do me ſervice for an hour. I muſt firſt deny my diſcontent, which was forced, to be an humorous diſcontent; and that it was unſeaſonable, or has ſo long continued, that your lordſhip ſhould rather condole than expoſtulate with me. Natural ſeaſons are expected here below, but violent and unſeaſonable ſtorms come from above. There is no tempeſt equal to the paſſionate indignation of a prince; nor at any time ſo unſeaſonable, as when it lighteth on thoſe that might expect a harveſt of their lawful and painful labours. He that is once wounded, muſt needs feel the ſmart till the hurt is cured, or the part become ſenſeleſs: but cure I expect none, her majeſty's heart being obdurate againſt me; and ſenſeleſs I cannot be, becauſe formed of fleſh and blood. But you ſay, I may aim at the end: I do more than aim; I ſee an end to all my fortune; I have put a period to all my deſires. In this courſe do I any thing more for my enemies? When I was at court, I found them abſolute; and therefore I had rather they ſhould triumph alone, than have me attendant upon their chariots. Or do I leave my friends? When I was a courtier, I could yield them no fruit of my love; and now I am a hermit, they ſhall bear no envy for their love of me. Or do I forſake myſelf, becauſe I enjoy myſelf? Or do I overthrow my fortunes, becauſe I build not a fortune of paper walls, which every puff of wind bloweth down? Or do I ruin my honour, becauſe I leave following the purſuit, or wearing the falſe badge or mark of the ſhadow of honour? Do I give courage or comfort to the foreign foe, becauſe I reſerve myſelf to encounter with him? Or becauſe I keep my heart from buſineſs, though I cannot keep my fortune from declining? No, no, my good lord, I give every one of theſe conſiderations its due weight; and the more I weigh them, the more I find myſelf juſtified from offending in any of them. As for the two laſt objections, that I forſake my country when it has moſt need of me, and fail in that indiſſoluble duty which I owe to my ſovereign; I anſwer, that if my country had, at this time, any need of my public ſervice, her majeſty, who governs it, would not have driven me to a private life. I am tied to my country by two bonds; one public, to diſcharge carefully and induſtriouſly that truſt which is committed to me; the other private, to ſacrifice for it my life and body, which have been nouriſhed in it. I am freed from the firſt, by being diſmiſſed, diſcharged, and diſabled, by her majeſty; from the other nothing can free me but death; and therefore no occaſion of my performance ſhall ſooner offer itſelf, but I ſhall meet it half way. The indiſſoluble duty which I owe to her majeſty, is only the duty of allegiance, which I never have, nor ever can fail in: the duty of attendance is no indiſſoluble duty. I owe her the duty of an earl and lord-marſhal of England. I have been content to do her majeſty the ſervice of a clerk, but I can never ſerve her as a villain or ſlave. But yet you ſay I muſt give way to the times: ſo I do; for now I ſee the ſtorm approaching, I have put myſelf into the harbour. Seneca ſays, we muſt give way to fortune: I know that fortune is both blind and ſtrong, and therefore I go as far as poſſible out of her way. You ſay the remedy is not to ſtrive: I neither ſtrive nor ſeek for remedy. But you ſay, I muſt yield and ſubmit: I can neither yield myſelf to be guilty, nor allow the imputation laid upon me to be juſt. I owe ſo much to the Author of all truth, as I can never yield truth to be falſhood, nor falſhood to be truth. Have I given cauſe, you aſk, and yet take ſcandal when I have done? No, I gave no cauſe, not ſo much as Fimbria's complaint againſt me, for I received the whole ſword into my body. I patiently bear all, and ſenſibly feel all that I then received, when this ſcandal was given me. Nay more, when the vileſt of all indignities is done me, does religion enforce me to ſue for pardon? Doth God require it? Is it impiety not to do it? Why? Cannot princes err? Cannot ſubjects receive wrong? Is an earthly power infinite? Pardon me, my lord, I can never ſubſcribe to theſe principles. Let Solomon's fool laugh when he is ſtricken; let thoſe that mean to make their profit of princes, ſhew no ſenſe of princes' injuries: let them acknowledge an abſoluteneſs on earth, that do not believe an abſolute infiniteneſs in heaven. As for me, I have received wrong, I feel it: my cauſe is good, I know it; and whatever happens, all the powers on earth can never exert more ſtrength and conſtancy in oppreſſing, than I can ſhew in ſuffering every thing that can or ſhall be impoſed upon me. Your lordſhip, in the beginning of your letter, makes me a player, and yourſelf a looker-on; and me a player of my own game, ſo you may ſee more than I. But give me leave to tell you, that ſince you only ſee, and I am alone the ſufferer, I muſt, of neceſſity, feel more than you.”

The friends of Eſſex imprudently ſhewed this ſpirited letter; but notwithſtanding this additional affront, the queen's partiality for that young nobleman was ſo ſtrong, that ſhe forgot every provocation. He ſoon became the only confidant of Elizabeth, and the ſole director of the affairs of the kingdom. But few are capable of enjoying the height of proſperity; it darkens the eye of wiſdom, and becomes the precipice of deſtruction to folly. Eſſex was no ſooner eſtabliſhed in the queen's favour, than he abuſed it. The troubles which ſtill ſubſiſted in Ireland opened a new ſcene for his ambition, and he raſhly engaged in an undertaking which terminated in crimes and misfortunes.

The ſtrict œconomy of the queen had hitherto prevented her from keeping a ſufficient force in Ireland to ſubdue the rebels; and the policy of legiſlation, the only means of forming conquered ſavages into uſeful ſubjects, had been entirely neglected.

They were treated rather like wild beaſts than men; and the Iriſh, in return, thought nothing ſo glorious as that of ſhaking off the yoke of the Engliſh. Their firm attachment to the church of Rome heightened their averſion to their proteſtant oppreſſors; while their bogs and inacceſſible woods afforded them retreats, and formed ramparts impenetrable to the enemy.

Hugh O'Neill, whom the queen had created earl of Tyrone, and whoſe treachery was equal to his ferocious valour, excited a great rebellion; and having received aſſiſtance from the king of Spain, gained advantages conſiderable enough to make the court of London very uneaſy. He had already aſſumed the character of the deliverer of his country, and the patron of Iriſh liberty. It was therefore determined to proſecute the war with vigour, and ſubdue the rebels by extraordinary efforts. The queen caſt her eyes on Charles Blount, lord Mountjoy, as a man, who, though hitherto leſs accuſtomed to arms than to books and literature, was endowed with talents that would ſufficiently atone for his want of experience. Jealous of every occaſion that offered for diſtinguiſhing himſelf, Eſſex repreſented, that this expedition required a man of birth, experience and reputation, much ſuperior to thoſe of Mountjoy, and at laſt procured the appointment for himſelf. Had he liſtened to the advice of his enemies, he could not have engaged in a more fatal uudertaking. But Eſſex was incapable of caution; he imagined that every difficulty would give way before him; and that his preſence, at the head of a numerous army, would be ſufficient to huſh the ferocious Iriſh into peace. The queen's preparations were equal to the tenderneſs ſhe cheriſhed for her favourite, and her deſire of ſubduing the flagitious rebels. She raiſed an army of twenty thouſand men, a force conſidered as abundantly ſufficient for finiſhing the war in a ſingle campaign. Eſſex was created lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and furniſhed with a commiſſion more ample than any that had hitherto been granted. He was empowered either to continue or finiſh the war; to pardon the earl of Tyrone, and other rebels; an authority never granted to any of his predeceſſors.

A. D. 1599. Eſſex ſet out for his government about the middle of March, accompanied by a numerous train of nobility and gentry, who, from an affection to his perſon, had attached themſelves to his fortunes; and attended by the acclamations of the populace, by whom he was greatly beloved. The firſt act of his authority in Ireland was an indiſcretion, though of the generous kind. He appointed his friend, the earl of Southampton, general of the horſe, though the queen had enjoined him not to employ that nobleman; and even repeated orders were hardly ſufficient to induce him to revoke the commiſſion. Any other man would have fallen a victim to ſuch temerity. The reſt of his conduct was conformable to this beginning. Inſtead of leading his powerful army into Ulſter againſt Tyrone, and putting an end to the rebellion, by reducing the chief, he ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded by the Iriſh council to march into Munſter, ſituated at the other extremity of the kingdom. He indeed reduced the rebels to ſubmiſſion, but he loſt a very conſiderable part of his army in the attempt; and had no ſooner left the country, than they again revolted. By this time the ſeaſon was conſiderably advanced, his army ſickly, and greatly reduced in their numbers; ſo that he was obliged to requeſt a reinforcement of two thouſand men, in order to enable him to march againſt Tyrone. The troops were immediately ſent by Elizabeth, and Eſſex at laſt advanced into Ulſter againſt the chief of the rebels. Tyrone, though at the head of an army greatly ſuperior in numbers to that of the Engliſh, wiſely avoided a deciſive action, and propoſed a conference with Eſſex, in order, as he pretended, to put a ſtop to the flames of civil diſcord, which had ſo long waſted Ireland. The offer was accepted, and the two generals met without any of their attendants. Tyrone behaved, during the conference, with the greateſt ſubmiſſion, and a ceſſation of arms was concluded till the firſt of May. By this treaty the expenſive expedition of Eſſex was rendered abortive, and affairs continued on the ſame footing as before. The queen did not fail to let him know that ſhe was highly diſſatisfied with his conduct, but commanded him to continue in Ireland till farther orders.

The haughty Eſſex was now ſufficiently alarmed. Perſuaded, that if he continued any longer at a diſtance from the court, he ſhould loſe all his influence with the queen, while his enemies enjoyed the malignant ſatisfaction of triumphing in his fall, he determined to diſobey the orders of Elizabeth. He accordingly left Ireland, and arrived at London before any one was the leaſt apprized of his intentions. He immediately repaired to court, and preſented himſelf before the queen, covered with duſt and ſweat. Whether Elizabeth's tenderneſs awaked at the ſight of her favourite, or whether ſurprize prevented her from attending to proprieties, ſhe gave him a very kind and flattering reception; and, on his departure, he was heard to thank God, that though he had met with many troubles and ſtorms abroad, he had found at home a ſweet and pleaſing calm.

But this placid interval was deceitful. Like the momentary ceſſations in a ſtorm, the tempeſt returned with all its force. Eſſex ſoon learned how much his preſumption and his faults had weakened his influence over Elizabeth's heart, which was leſs tender than haughty. She ordered him to be confined to his chamber, and to be twice examined before the privy council. His anſwers were calm and ſubmiſſive, but not ſufficient to ſatisfy Elizabeth: ſhe committed him to the cuſtody of the lord-keeper; and none of his friends, not even his counteſs, were permitted to viſit him. This diſgrace ſeemed to humble his pride; he dropped many expreſſions of humiliation and ſorrow, none of reſentment. He fell ſick, and his life was thought to be in danger. The queen appeared greatly intereſted in his recovery: ſhe ſent him a meſſage by Dr. James, that if ſhe thought ſuch a ſtep conſiſtent with her honour, ſhe would herſelf pay him a viſit. This proof of her tenderneſs had the moſt ſalutary effect, and the favourite nobleman ſoon recovered his health.

The departure of Eſſex from Ireland revived the courage of Tyrone. The Engliſh army, now without a leader, was not ſufficient to ſtop his progreſs: he reduced the whole province of Ulſter to obedience; and being encouraged by a bull ſent from pope Clement VII. granting him and his adherents the ſame indulgences as thoſe who fought againſt the Turks in the recovery of the Holy Land, he flattered himſelf with being ſoon maſter of the whole kingdom. He was alſo promiſed a ſupply of men and money from Spain; and having received a conſecrated plume from the pope, he called himſelf the champion of the catholic religion.

A. D. 1600. Alarmed at the progreſs of the rebels, the queen ſent lord Mountjoy into Ireland. The whole iſland, at his arrival, was in a very deſperate ſituation; but being a man of capacity and vigour, he was not diſcouraged. He advanced immediately into Ulſter againſt Tyrone, and ſoon penetrated into the heart of that county, the principal ſeat of the rebels. He drove them from the open fields, and obliged them to take refuge in their bogs and foreſts. Sir George Carew had equal ſucceſs in Munſter, and the queen's authority was once more eſtabliſhed in Ireland. The ſucceſs of Mountjoy rendered the conduct of Eſſex leſs excuſable at court, though his popularity increaſed with his misfortunes. The miniſtry was accuſed of malice, and the queen herſelf of injuſtice. Alarmed at the prejudices of the people, Elizabeth determined to bring Eſſex to an open trial before the privy council. Coke, the attorney general, opened the cauſe againſt him, and treated him with the cruelty and inſolence which that great lawyer uſually exerciſed on the unfortunate. Eſſex made no defence; he declared he would never have any conteſt with his ſovereign, and that he ſhould readily ſubmit to any judgment they might think proper to pronounce againſt him. The chancellor's ſentence, on this occaſion, is remarkable. "If the earl of Eſſex (ſaid he) had been tried in the ſtar-chamber, my ſentence muſt have been for as great a fine as ever was ſet upon any man's head in that court, together with perpetual impriſonment in the Tower; but ſince we are now in another place, and in a courſe of favour, my cenſure is, that the earl of Eſſex is not to execute the office of a counſellor, nor that of earl-marſhal of England, nor of maſter of the ordnance; and to return to his own houſe, there to continue a priſoner till it ſhall pleaſe her majeſty to releaſe this, and all the reſt of his ſentence." The celebrated Sir Francis Bacon was ordered by the queen to draw up a narrative of the whole proceedings, in order to ſatisfy the nation that ſhe had acted with the utmoſt lenity. Bacon, who was firmly attached to Eſſex, gave the whole tranſaction a very favourable turn for his patron: he painted, in the moſt elaborate expreſſions, the dutiful ſubmiſſion made by that nobleman before the council. The queen, when Bacon read the paſſage to her, could not forbear ſmiling; and obſerved, that old love could not eaſily be forgotten. He replied, that he hoped her majeſty meant it of herſelf.

Eſſex received his chaſtiſement with ſo much humility, that the queen, perſuaded that it was ſincere, gave him proofs that ſhe had not entirely withdrawn her countenance from him. She gave orders that his ſentence ſhould not be recorded, and reſtored him to his full liberty; but at the ſame time adviſed him to be cautious of giving farther offence, and ordered him not to appear at court. Eſſex immediately prepared for his departure into the country; but before he ſet out, he wrote a letter to the queen, in which he told her, that he kiſſed her majeſty's hands, and the rod with which ſhe had corrected him; but that he never could recover his uſual chearfulneſs till ſhe deigned to admit him to that preſence which had ever been the chief ſource of his happineſs and enjoyment; and that, in the mean time, he would retire into a country ſolitude, and labour aſſiduouſly to atone for his former offences. Pleaſed with theſe ſentiments, the queen replied, that ſhe wiſhed his actions might be conformable to his expreſſions; but as he had ſo long abuſed her patience, ſhe would take ſome time to try his ſincerity. She added, "That if the furnace of affliction produced ſuch good effects, ſhe ſhould ever after have the better opinion of her chemiſtry."

A. D. 1601. Happy had it been for Eſſex, could he have conformed to that ſubmiſſion he knew ſo well how to deſcribe; but his reſtleſs paſſions were too powerful to be guided by the rein of prudence. Tho' bleſſed with the ſociety of an amiable and ſenſible wife, with whom he peruſed the writings of the ancients, ſo capable of healing the diſeaſes of the mind by leſſons equally ſolid and agreeable, he could not eſcape the illuſions of ambition; he cheriſhed a paſſion that preyed upon his repoſe. Elizabeth reflected not, that this haughty ſpirit, when driven to extremities, was capable of trampling under foot every ſpecies of duty, as well as the laws of his country. By puſhing her precautions too far, ſhe inflamed his reſentment. He loſt all hopes of her favour, forgot her former kindneſſes, and flew to revenge. He imprudently followed the intereſted counſels of ſome needy friends who lived upon his bounty, and determined to have recourſe to violent meaſures. To increaſe the number of his partizans, he paid his court to the catholics, and ſecretly ſollicited the king of Scotland's aſſiſtance. He acquainted him, "that whatever appearances the Engliſh court affected, a reſolution was formed to place the Infanta of Spain on the throne of England; that to facilitate this deſign, all places of power, all poſts of importance, were in the hands of thoſe who were ſworn enemies to the Stuart family; the lord high-admiral had the command of the navy and army; Buckhurſt was at the head of the treaſury; Cobham was warden of the cinque ports; Cecil lord-lieutenant of the north; Raleigh governor of the iſlands of Guernſey and Jerſey; and Carew preſident of Munſter; places very favourable for landing the Infanta." He added, "that the queen's underſtanding was ſo greatly impaired, that ſhe was incapable of acting for herſelf, and was entirely guided by her miniſters; that it was therefore abſolutely neceſſary for him to act openly againſt this conſpiracy, by ſending ambaſſadors immediately to the Engliſh court, to demand a public declaration of his title to the ſucceſſion, and the removal of his enemies, all creatures and penſioners of Spain, from the court and council."

But Eſſex placed his chief dependence for ſupport on the puritans, whoſe manners he now entirely adopted. The moſt celebrated preachers of that ſect reſorted to his houſe, which now became a kind of pulpit, where the fervours of fanaticiſm conſtantly diſcharged themſelves. The genius of the age was ſo entirely devoted to theſe rhapſodies, that the language of the reformation had more attractions for the people than pleaſure itſelf: nothing more effectually ingratiated an ambitious leader with the public than theſe religious entertainments. The ambitious Eſſex ſpared not the queen in his diſcourſes; he repreſented her as an old woman, whoſe temper was as crooked as her perſon. Elizabeth was informed of theſe liberties, which highly incenſed her againſt him. He could not have attacked her in a more tender part. Elizabeth was always fond of flattery, and loved to be complimented on her beauty; nor could either her own good ſenſe, or old age itſelf, cure her of this prepoſterous infirmity.

Eſſex had now formed a ſelect council of malecontents, conſiſting of the earl of Southampton, Sir Charles Danvers, Sir Ferdinando Gorges, Sir Chriſtopher Blount, Sir John Davis, and John Littleton of Frankel. The reſt of his friends, according to a liſt he produced at Drury-houſe, the uſual place of their meeting, conſiſted of one hundred and twenty of the firſt noblemen and gentlemen in the kingdom. Here all their plans were laid, and all their reſolutions formed. Among other criminal projects debated in this aſſembly, was that of the moſt proper method of taking up arms; and it was at laſt agreed, that the firſt attack ſhould be made upon the palace; that Sir Chriſtopher Blount, at the head of a choice detachment, ſhould take poſſeſſion of the gates; that Davis ſhould ſeize the hall; Danvers the guard and preſence-chamber; and that Eſſex, attended by a ſelect number of his partizans, ſhould ruſh in from the Meuſe, oblige the queen to remove his enemies, aſſemble a parliament, and ſettle a new plan of government.

Elizabeth was informed of all theſe reſolutions, and took the neceſſary precautions to render them abortive. Eſſex never doubted but the citizens of London, by whom he was greatly beloved, would take up arms at the firſt ſignal. He was, however, miſtaken. The court had taken meaſures to prevent it; and when he appeared in the city, accompanied with about two hundred men, he found that his ſeditious exhortations had no effect. They gazed at him as he paſſed along the ſtreets, but none took up arms in his defence. Diſappointed of aſſiſtance, he returned to his own houſe, which was ſoon ſurrouuded by a detachment of the guards commanded by the admiral. He at firſt determined to defend himſelf to the laſt extremity, and periſh like a ſoldier with the ſword in his hand, rather than by the axe of a baſe executioner. But he ſoon after abandoned this reſolution; and, notwithſtanding all his bravery, ſubmitted at diſcretion.

Elizabeth, who had behaved on this occaſion with the greateſt tranquillity and preſence of mind, ſoon gave orders for trying the moſt conſiderable of the priſoners. The earls of Eſſex and Southampton were arraigned on the nineteenth of February. The trial was ſoon finiſhed; the crime was notorious. Far from making any defence, Eſſex gave himſelf up entirely to the ſentiments of religion, which he had before politically affected, and not only acknowledged himſelf guilty, but alſo impeached his friends; a circumſtance, which at other times, he would have conſidered as the moſt infamous baſeneſs. The celebrated Sir Francis Bacon, is reproached with having pleaded on the trial againſt Eſſex his friend and benefactor, without being obliged to it by any office. Blemiſhes appear in the characters of the greateſt men; Bacon was at this time ambitious of making his fortune.

It now remained with Elizabeth to pardon or execute her favourite nobleman, and ſhe long balanced between juſtice and clemency. She felt all the force of an ill-extinguiſhed paſſion, and if the earl had ſollicited her pardon, love would certainly have granted it. She conſidered this obſtinacy as the conſequence of contempt, and ſigned the warrant for his execution. He ſuffered in the court-yard of the Tower, purſuant to his own requeſt, on the twenty-fifth of February. His behaviour in his laſt moments were conformable to his condition, penitent and reſigned. He reflected not on his enemies, but prayed for the life of the queen and the proſperity of his country.

Thus fell Robert Devereux, earl of Eſſex, in the thirty-fifth year of his age. He was deſcended from a royal lineage on the female ſide, and endowed with ſuperior talents and heroic qualities. He was generous, liberal, and humane, a patron of learning, in which he himſelf held a conſiderable rank, a warm friend and an open enemy. His foibles were vanity, ambition, and an impetuoſity of temper which he could not reſtrain. He ruined himſelf for want of knowing how to enjoy good fortune with moderation. The people, by which he was too much beloved, were irritated by his death; and the queen, who was accuſed of cruelty, no longer heard the uſual acclamations when ſhe appeared in public.

Henry IV. of France, deſirous of forming a cloſe connection with Elizabeth, in order to eſtabliſh a plan for effecting a perpetual balance of power in Europe, made a journey to Calais; and Elizabeth, in hopes of having a perſonal interview with a prince ſhe ſo highly eſteemed, repaired to Dover. Some conſiderations, however, prevented their meeting; but the queen expreſſing a deſire of conferring on ſome buſineſs of importance with a miniſter in whom an entire confidence might be placed, Henry ſent over Roſny, afterwards duke of Sully. What appears very extraordinary is, that both theſe princes, without communicating their ſentiments to each other, had conceived the ſame deſign of humbling the houſe of Auſtria, and eſtabliſhing a juſt equilibrium between the powers of Europe. It principally conſiſted in uniting the ſeventeen provinces of the Low Countries, into one republic. But the wounds which France had received during the civil wars were not yet healed; the attention of Henry was ſtill neceſſary to recover the languiſhing ſtate of his country. The execution of this deſign therefore was put off, and never after reſumed.

The death of Philip II. did not put a period to the deſigns of the Spaniards for diſturbing the peace of Elizabeth. The ſame councils ſtill continued, and the ſame meaſures continued to be purſued. The preparations for an expedition againſt Ireland had been for ſome time finiſhed, but ſuſpended on account of the troubles that broke out in Spain. Theſe having now ſubſided, Don John d'Aquila was ſent at the head of a body of troops into that kingdom, and made religion a pretence for the enterprizes of ambition and rebellion. He aſſumed the title of "General of the Holy war, for the preſervation of the faith in Ireland." Care had been taken to authorize theſe meaſures by bulls from Rome; and d'Aquila endeavoured to perſuade the people, that a queen deprived of her authority by the pope, had no longer any right to the crown; that her ſubjects, abſolved from their oaths of allegiance by the holy father, ought to take up arms againſt her, and drive her from a throne of which ſhe ought to be conſidered as an uſurper. He added, that the ſole intention of his coming was to aſſiſt them in that religious undertaking, and to deliver them from the dominion of the devil. Mountjoy ſaw the gathering ſtorm, and exerted all his abilities to break its force. The Iriſh ſhewed every where ſigns of a general inſurrection, and the utmoſt vigour was neceſſary to prevent it. He immediately laid ſiege to Kinſale, which the Spaniards had taken immediately after their landing; but he had hardly began his operations before he received intelligence, that another body of two thouſand Spaniards, under the command of Alphonſo Ocampo were landed, and had taken poſſeſſion of Baltimore and Berehaven. He found himſelf therefore obliged to detach Sir George Carew to oppoſe the progreſs of the enemy. Tyrone immediately advanced to the relief of Kinſale; but Mountjoy, having received information of his deſign, advanced to meet him at the head of part of his army, totally defeated the rebels, and took ſeveral of them priſoners. Tyrone himſelf eſcaped into Ulſter, but was utterly incapable of giving the Engliſh any farther diſturbance. The Spaniſh general now perceived that all reſiſtance would be in vain, and immediarely offered to ſurrender all the places held by the Spaniards in Ireland, and evacuate the kingdom. The conditions were accepted, and the Spaniards embarked for their own country. This defeat ſtruck the rebels with terror. They ſaw the foreign forces on whom they ſo greatly depended, incapable of giving them any ſupport, and deſpaired of being able to make head againſt the Engliſh.

But notwithſtanding Mountjoy's ſucceſs, the war in Ireland was very burdenſome to the queen, and ſhe was obliged to call a parliament in order to obtain ſupplies. No oppoſition was made to the requeſt of her majeſty; but the commons revived the great queſtion with regard to monopolies, ſo deſtructive to trade and burdenſome to the people. The ſmall revenues of the crown being inſufficient for the queen to confer favours or rewards on thoſe that had ſerved her faithfully, ſhe ſupplied the defect by laviſhing excluſive privileges; and thoſe who were provided ſold them to others. In conſequence of theſe monopolies, almoſt every kind of merchandize was advanced at the pleaſure of individuals; and that liberty which conſtitutes the very ſoul of commerce was no longer known. The effects were viſible by a continual decline of trade; and the nation felt all the vexatious effects of avarice, ſupported by the royal authority. Nor was the abuſe confined to the greater objects of commerce, it extended even to the common neceſſaries of life; ſalt, oil, vinegar, paper, cloths, iron, lead, ſkins, bottles, bruſhes, and many other articles; when this aſtoniſhing liſt was read in the houſe of commons, one of the members aſked, with great vivacity, "Is not bread among the number?" And obſerving that the houſe ſeemed aſtoniſhed at the queſtion, "Yes, bread! added he, if things continue on the ſame footing, we ſhall ſee that monopolized before the next parliament." But it appeared uſeleſs to complain, as abſolute authority was then conſidered as the baſis of the Engliſh government. The courtiers, accordingly, ſupported that tenet with all their eloquence. Bacon aſſerted that the royal prerogative ought neither to be conteſted nor examined; that it gave the ſovereign the power of extending what was reſtrained by the laws, and of reſtraining what the laws had made free and open. Another obſerved, that it would be a frivolous attempt to bind up the queen's hands by act of parliament; becauſe ſhe was poſſeſſed of an unlimited diſpenſing power, and conſequently could extricate herſelf ſelf whenever ſhe pleaſed; and even if the ſtatute ſhould contain a clauſe excluſive of that power, ſhe could equally diſpenſe with that clauſe, and conſequently with the ſtatute itſelf. One of the members went ſo far as to declare, that the Deity had given to princes the power that belonged to himſelf; and attempted to prove his aſſertion from a paſſage in the Pſalms, "I have ſaid that ye are Gods." But notwithſtanding theſe ſtrange poſitions of the courtiers, many of the members ſtrongly oppoſed this alarming abuſe; and the laſt parliament having preſented a petition to the throne without effect, they propoſed to paſs a bill againſt all monopolies whatever. The queen perceived this reſolution, and wiſely avoided the blow. She was unwilling to refuſe the royal aſſent to a bill, that however it might leſſen the prerogative of the crown, could not fail of being very advantageous to her people. She therefore ſent for the ſpeaker, and ordered him to acquaint the houſe, that ſhe would immediately ſuppreſs all ſuch excluſive grants as were moſt burdenſome to her ſubjects.

Struck with aſtoniſhment at the goodneſs and condeſcenſion of the queen, the joy of the commons was exceſſive. They had always been uſed to the tone of abſolute authority, and haughty refuſal, and could hardly contain themſelves within the bounds of decency, at finding the royal prerogative at laſt give way to the intereſt of the nation. One of the memqers obſerved, that this meſſage from the queen was a kind of goſpel of glad-tidings, and ought to be written in indelible characters on the tablets of the heart. They voted, that the ſpeaker, at the head of eighty members, ſhould return her majeſty their humble thanks for this inſtance of parental regard. The ſpeech delivered by the ſpeaker on this occaſion, was more proper to be addreſſed to the Supreme Being than an earthly monarch. So fulſome was the language of flattery! Nor did they wait till ſhe had ſatisfied them with regard to the particular monopolies ſhe meant to aboliſh, they immediately voted her four times the uſual ſupply. An inſtance then without example. But they well knew the imperious diſpoſition of the queen, and that by giving even the moſt diſtant hint of their being diſſatisfied with her promiſe, would have forced her into a denial of their requeſts. Thus Elizabeth, by prudently receding in time from what was then conſidered as the right of the crown, maintained her dignity, and preſerved the affections of her people. Her ſucceſſors imitated not her example in this particular: they wanted her addreſs as well as her power, to triumph over the principles of liberty.

A. D. 1602. The remaining events in the reign of Elizabeth are neither very numerous, nor very important. Exaſperated at the Spaniards for having involved her in ſo many difficulties by fomenting the rebellion, and aſſiſting the inſurgents in Ireland, ſhe reſolved to find them ſufficient employment at home. She accordingly ordered a ſquadron of nine ſhips to be fitted out, under the command of Sir Richard Leveſon and Sir Richard Monſon, with orders to ſail on an expedition to the coaſt of Spain. This fleet left England early in the ſpring, and ſoon after part of the ſquadron fell in with the galleons loaded with treaſure; but were not ſtrong enough to attack them with any proſpect of ſucceſs. The other diviſion alſo met with a fleet of very rich ſhips, and was, for the ſame reaſon, obliged to let them purſue their courſe unmoleſted. Theſe diſappointments induced the two admirals to join the little ſquadrons, and purſue the deſign of the expedition in company. For ſome time they met with no ſhips of the enemy, and it was determined, in order to prevent the expedition from being entirely fruitleſs, to attack the harbour of Coimbra in Portugal, where they were informed a rich carrack had taken ſhelter. The harbour was defended by a caſtle mounted with heavy pieces of cannon; eleven gallies were moored near the entrance, and the militia of the country, amounting to near twenty thouſand men, appeared on the ſhore. But all theſe indications of a powerful oppoſition was not ſufficient to intimidate the Engliſh. They broke into the harbour, diſmounted the guns of the caſtle, ſunk, burnt, and put to flight the gallies, and made themſelves maſters of the carrack. With this prize they returned to England, where her loading was valued at near a million of ducats; a very ſenſible loſs to the Spaniards, and a ſtill more conſiderable ſupply to Elizabeth.

Though the catholic religion was not tolerated in England, great numbers of people ſtill profeſſed the tenets of Rome; the kingdom was full of prieſts of that perſuaſion; and a very rancourous quarrel now broke out between the jeſuits and the ſecular clergy, on the following occaſion: one Blackwell, a perſon entirely devoted to the intereſt of the jeſuits, had been placed over the ſeculars as their ſuperior. Not content with exerciſing the common juriſdiction, he oppreſſed them in the moſt cruel manner; and when they appealed to the pope for redreſs, the ſuperior repreſented them as ſchiſmatics and heretics. The moſt bitter invectives were publiſhed by both parties, and the whole body of the catholic clergy ſeemed to be engaged in this furious conteſt. Whether the whole affair was ſerious, or a ſcheme to lull the government into a fatal ſecurity, while the Spaniards ſtruck ſome deciſive blow, is now impoſſible to be known; but it is certain that the biſhop of London, from political motives, fomented this diviſion, which at laſt roſe to ſuch a height, that the council of ſtate thought proper to interpoſe their authority; and perceiving that their diſputes were incompatable with the peace of the nation, commanded them all to depart the kingdom immediately.

During theſe tranſactions lord Mountjoy improved ſo well his late victory in Ireland, that Tyrone and his friends were ſoon reduced to the greateſt diſtreſs; and many of them, after concealing themſelves in woods and moraſſes, where they lived rather like beaſts than men, thought proper to abandon their retreats, and ſubmit to the mercy of the Engliſh government. They were received with kindneſs, and the terms impoſed upon them were ſo mild and generous, that Tyrone himſelf, ſeeing all hopes either of ſucceeding or eſcaping to the continent, were vaniſhed, applied, in the moſt abject manner, both to the queen herſelf and the governor, for pardon. The queen was long reſolved not to ſhew the leaſt favour to that ferocious and perfidious rebel, but being continually importuned by her council, who repreſented the prodigious expence ſhe had been at, in maintaining an army in Ireland to purſue the rebels, and that by ſhewing clemency to the great leader in every inſurrection, ſhe would infallibly reſtore tranquillity to that diſtreſſed kingdom, and introduce a proper legiſlation among the people; ſhe was at laſt prevailed upon to recede from her reſolution. She ſigned his pardon, and ſent it to Mountjoy; ſacrificing her reſentment to the peace of her ſubjects, who had ſo long felt all the dreadful effects of civil diſcord.

A. D. 1603. The terms to which the lord-deputy was reſtrained were, however, thought ſo ſevere by the council, that they apprehended Tyrone would never ſubmit to them. Had that furious leader perceived even the ſmalleſt proſpect of ſupporting him againſt the Engliſh, there is not the leaſt doubt but he would have rejected the conditions with diſdain; but he was deprived of every reſource, and enjoyed only the wretched alternative of accepting the queen's pardon on her own terms, or periſh with hunger. He choſe the former, and on the thirteenth of March, repaired to Mellefont, where he preſented himſelf upon his knees before the lord-deputy, and in that ſubmiſſive poſture received his pardon. O'Rourk, another active chief in the late inſurrections ſurrendered about a month after Tyrone; and thus that dreadful rebellion which had raged in Ireland with the utmoſt violence during eight years, and had coſt the queen near four hundred thouſand pounds annually, was entirely ſuppreſſed; the whole kingdom was reduced to a ſtate of ſubjection, and taſted the pleaſures attendant on tranquillity.

Elizabeth was not long capable of enjoying the ſatisfaction of ſeeing this conſiderable part of her dominions in a ſtate of peace. She had, for ſome time, fallen into a ſtate of melancholy, was obſerved to be continually in tears, and to labour under ſome extraordinary affliction. She had always been particularly careful of her health, but now obſtinately refuſed all the remedies preſcribed by her phyſicians. Her council uſed every method in their power to prevail upon her to recede from this fatal reſolution, but in vain. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſecretary Cecil, begged her, on their knees, to take what was neceſſary for her ſuſtenance and relief; but ſhe refuſed their requeſt, and, in an angry tone of voice, deſired they would leave off their importunities, and ſuffer her to die in quiet.

Various opinions have been formed with regard to the cauſe of this profound melancholy: ſome aſcribed it to her repentance for having granted a pardon to Tyrone; others to the chagrin of ſeeing her courtiers turn their eyes upon the king of Scotland as the preſumptive heir to the Engliſh crown, and their ſhewing diſpoſitions to neglect her at a time when ſhe laboured under the debilities of age and infirmities; while others attributed it to her paſſion for Eſſex, which a very remarkable incident had lately revived. After his return from his expedition to Cadiz, ſhe made him a preſent of a ring, which ſhe deſired him to keep as the pledge of her affection; at the ſame time aſſuring him, that whatever diſgrace might attend him, or whatever prejudices ſhe might entertain againſt his conduct, yet, on ſight of that precious pledge, ſhe would recollect her former tenderneſs, be ready to give him a favourable hearing, and to liſten candidly to his apology. Eſſex, notwithſtanding all his miſfortunes, preſerved this pledge of her majeſty's affection; and, when under ſentence of death, reſolved to try the experiment. He accordingly prayed the counteſs of Nottingham to carry the ring to Elizabeth; but the earl, her huſband, the capital enemy of Eſſex, would not ſuffer her to execute the commiſſion. The queen waited for this ring with the moſt paſſionate anxiety, and conſtrued her not receiving it as a mark of contempt. Exaſperated at what ſhe conſidered as the higheſt affront, ſhe ſigned the warrant for his execution. Some time after, the counteſs being ſeized with a violent illneſs, was ſtung with the deepeſt remorſe for her conduct; and having obtained a viſit from the queen, ſhe revealed the fatal ſecret. Aſtoniſhed at this alarming confeſſion, Elizabeth burſt into the moſt violent paſſion of grief and rage. She ſtruck the dying counteſs in her bed, telling her, "That God might pardon her, but ſhe never could." This remarkable fact has been rejected by many hiſtorians as romantic; but from the proofs collected by Dr. Birch, in his memoirs of this princeſs, the truth of it ſeems to be ſufficiently eſtabliſhed.

From that moment Elizabeth abandoned herſelf to the deepeſt and moſt incurable melancholy, without diſcovering the cauſe which preyed upon her ſpirits. A miſerable languor ſoon reduced her to the utmoſt extremity, and it was viſible to all about her that her end was approaching. The council had frequent meetings, and ſeriouſly deliberated on the neceſſity of fixing the ſucceſſion. The counſellors themſelves were in general firmly attached to James; but they were fearful of the conſequences that might reſult from the intrigues of the catholic and puritan factions; and therefore reaſonably concluded, that Elizabeth's own declaration in favour of the Scottiſh monarch would greatly tend to ſtrengthen his title. The lord high admiral declared, that when ſhe was firſt ſeized with this dreadful diſtemper, ſhe had ſaid the following words to him in private, "My throne has always been filled by a ſucceſſion of princes, and ought only to go to my next heir." This declaration was not conſidered as ſufficiently explicit; and it was thought proper, that the lord high-admiral, the lord keeper, and ſecretary Cecil, ſhould, in the name of the whole council, intreat the queen to reveal her intention with regard to the perſon ſhe wiſhed to wear her crown. They found her on the very brink of eternity, and almoſt ſpeechleſs; but ſhe had ſtrength ſufficient to repeat the ſubſtance of her former declaration to the lord high-admiral, "that ſhe herſelf had filled a royal throne, and deſired to have a royal ſucceſſor." Cecil thought that even this declaration was not ſufficiently explicit, and requeſted her to make a farther explanation. "I deſire (ſaid ſhe) that a king ſhould ſucceed me; and who ſhould that king be, but my neareſt kinſman, the king of Scotland?" This declaration being made, the archbiſhop of Canterbury deſired her to put her whole truſt in the Almighty, and fix her thoughts on that great and merciful Being, who alone could ſupport her in the hour of death. She anſwered, that ſhe did put her whole truſt in him, nor had her thoughts in the leaſt wandered from him. Soon after, her voice failed, and ſhe fell into a lethargic ſlumber, which continued ſome hours; and ſhe expired without one ſtruggle, pang, or convulſion, in the ſeventieth year of her age, and the forty-fifth of her reign.

The character of Elizabeth has been often drawn, both by the pens of adulation and ſatire. But notwithſtanding all her faults, and all her vices, ſhe will always be ranked, by the candid and judicious, among the greateſt monarchs in Europe. Her vigour, her conſtancy, her indefatigable vigilance, her heroic fortitude in danger, her unavaricious œconomy, her penetration, and addreſs in difficulties, add a luſtre to her reputation that all the efforts of her enemies have never been able to tarniſh; they were hardly ever equalled, perhaps never ſurpaſſed by any monarch, ancient or modern. At the ſame time, the meanneſs of vanity, the weakneſs of love, the tranſports of jealouſy and anger, the artifices of duplicity, and the thirſt of deſpotiſm, have expoſed her memory to very juſt reproaches. But it ſhould be remembered, that in the midſt of all her attempts to become arbitrary, ſhe ſtill ſecured the affections of her people. She even, on many occaſions, gave them proofs of her confidence. "I will never believe any thing of them (ſaid ſhe) that parents will not believe of their children." In a word, her private character is very exceptionable, but her princely qualities render her the object of undiſputed applauſe.

Thoſe who are deſirous of forming an adequate idea of the ancient conſtitution of England, would do well to ſtudy the reign of Elizabeth, as there remain monuments ſufficiently numerous to aſcertain the moſt noted acts of her adminiſtration. At the ſame time, the great popularity ſhe always enjoyed, ſufficiently demonſtrates, that ſhe did not infringe the eſtabliſhed liberties of the people. During the reign of the Tudors, the principles of deſpotiſm took deep root in the kingdom. Elizabeth found theſe principles confirmed when ſhe aſcended the throne; and though ſhe carried them to their full extent, ſhe was better beloved by her ſubjects than any of her predeceſſors. The conſtitution was ſwallowed up by the prerogative, and every attempt againſt it was termed rebellion. Arbitrary courts of juſtice, eſtabliſhed and maintained by that prerogative, were the terrible ſupports of deſpotiſm. The ſtar-chamber, a court which every true Engliſhman now reflects upon with horror, extended its juriſdiction to all manner of offences, contempts, and diſorders, not cognizable by the common law. Penalties, fines, impriſonment, or corporal puniſhment, were there inflicted at diſcretion. The judges were mere dependants upon the court, becauſe they were removable at pleaſure. They only gave their opinions when the ſovereign was preſent, he being then the only judge. The court of high commiſſion was equally formidable to the ſubject, and equally deſtructive to liberty. Its principal object was that of hereſy, a ſubject on which ſo many raſh judgments are continually formed. The manner of proceeding, and the ſentences promulgated againſt even opinions which were not juſtly puniſhable, rendered it a powerful inſtrument of tyranny. The martial law was not only exerciſed on military people, but on all without diſtinction, in caſes of inſurrection and public diſorder: it was even extended to thoſe who brought bulls from Rome, foreign libels, or prohibited books. Nothing could be more arbitrary than that rigorous law; nothing more repugnant to the principles of genuine juſtice. In a word, Elizabeth wanted no power but that of impoſing taxes; and even that her prerogative ſupplied, by granting monopolies, requiring forced loans and free gifts, by purveyance, embargoes on merchandize, and many other burthenſome expedients. The parliament, indeed, aſſumed the legiſlative power, but the crown, in fact, exerciſed it, by edicts and proclamations. At the ſame time, even the laws themſelves were rendered uncertain, by virtue of the diſpenſing power of the ſovereign. We may judge of the deſpotic authority of Elizabeth by the following curious anecdote preſerved by ſeveral of our hiſtorians. Dr. Haywarde having dedicated an hiſtorical performance to Eſſex during the time of that nobleman's diſgrace, the queen was ſo highly offended at his preſumption, that ſhe enquired of Bacon, whether the book contained any thing that might impeach the author of high-treaſon? "I find nothing of that," replied the ſage, "but there is ſufficient matter to convict him of felony." "Which are the paſſages?" aſked the queen haſtily. "The author" ſaid Bacon, "is guilty of theft, having tranſlated many paſſages from Cornelius Tacitus, and inſerted them in his text." This anſwer did not ſatisfy the queen; ſhe pretended that the perſon who had put his name to the performance was not the writer; and added, that ſhe would have him racked, in order to oblige him to produce the real author. "No, madam," anſwered Bacon, "it is not the writer but the ſtyle that ought to be put to the torture. Let the doctor have pen, ink, paper, and books, and let him be enjoined to continue the ſtory; and I will undertake, on comparing the ſtyle, to determine whether he is the real author or not." Thus an innocent man of letters would have been put to the torture, for no other crime than that of having given to Eſſex, that munificent patron of the learned, a public teſtimony of his reſpect, had not the wit and addreſs of Bacon prevented it.

The abſolute authority of the crown was not, however, without its advantages, both in maintaining the internal tranquillity of the kingdom, and in giving vigour to the councils, and expedition to the buſineſs abroad. But, at the ſame time, it was found, by melancholy experience, that arbitrary power is by no means ſo well calculated as regular juſtice to maintain good order, and reſtrain licentiouſneſs among the people.

Before we conclude theſe obſervations on the reign of Elizabeth, it is but juſtice to ſay ſomething with regard to her œconomy, in which ſhe ſurpaſſed moſt of the Engliſh princes. Her ordinary revenue did not exceed five hundred thouſand pounds a year. During the whole courſe of her reign, ſhe received no more from parliament than twenty ſubſidies, and thirty-nine fifteenths. It is not eaſy to compute the exact value of theſe ſubſidies, becauſe they were always decreaſing: they fell, during the courſe of this reign, from one hundred and eighty-two thouſand pounds ſterling, to eighty thouſand. The war with Spain coſt, in two years, one million three hundred thouſand pounds; and that in Ireland, during ten years, more than three millions. It is aſtoniſhing how Elizabeth could undertake and execute ſuch great things with ſuch ſmall reſources. The foreign trade of England conſiderably increaſed; but monopolies and excluſive privileges greatly injured the inland trade of the kingdom. The navy, though conſiderably augmented, was very weak in compariſon of what it became afterwards. Before the reign of this princeſs, it was uſual for the monarchs of England to have recourſe to the city of Antwerp for voluntary loans; but their credit was ſo low, that, beſides the exorbitant intereſt of ten or twelve per cent. they were obliged to make the city of London join in the ſecurity. Sir Thomas Greſham, one of the greateſt and moſt enterprizing merchants of that age, engaged the company of merchant-adventurers to grant a loan to the queen, and the money was regularly paid. This eſtabliſhed her credit in the city, and ſhe was no longer obliged to have recourſe to foreigners for aſſiſtance. In the year 1660, the queen granted the firſt charter to the Eaſt-India Company.

The ſtate of the Engliſh manufactures was very low at this period, and foreign wares of almoſt all kinds were preferred. The perſecutions in France and the Low Countries afterwards drove a great number of foreigners into England; and, by their aſſiſtance, both the commerce and manufactures of the kingdom were greatly improved. It was then that Sir Thomas Greſham built, at his own expence, the magnificent fabric of the Exchange, for the reception of merchants. The queen, highly pleaſed with his public ſpirit, viſited the ſtructure, and gave it the appellation of the Royal Exchange.

A remarkable revolution in the manners of the people happened during this reign, but it by no means contributed to augment the power of the crown. The old hoſpitality of the nobility every day declined, and even their houſes were far leſs numerous. The queen, by proclamation, obliged them to obſerve a reſtriction in that article, and from that moment their influence declined. They had fewer retainers, and, conſequently, were leſs able to form plots and conſpiracies. A taſte for luxury prevailed among them, by which their fortunes were ſoon impaired; while the merchant and mechanic were enriched at their expence and prodigality. In conſequence of this, the towns became more populous; and the country people, by means of agriculture, acquired an independency, which reſcued them from the yoke of the nobility. The barons were now no longer formidable to the crown; but what it gained on one hand, it loſt on the other. The commons grew more jealous of their privileges: they encroached upon the prerogative, and gave, at laſt a mortal blow to monarchy. We ſhall ſee how this was effected in the ſubſequent reigns of the Stuarts.

The Engliſh began early to cultivate maritime affairs, and made diſcoveries in various parts of the world. In the year 1536, Henry VIII. encouraged a ſociety of merchants to ſend two ſhips, in order to make diſcoveries in the northern parts of America, where it was hoped a paſſage to India might be found. The attempt proved abortive with regard to the principal intention, but it laid the foundation of that beneficial fiſhery which the Engliſh ſtill carry on at Newfoundland.

Edward VI. was very deſirous of making diſcoveries in the north-eaſt parts of Europe; and encouraged a company of Engliſh merchants to ſend Sir Hugh Willoughby with three ſhips, in order to open a new paſſage to Ruſſia by the northern ocean, and, if poſſible, to purſue their courſe to China. The attempt proved unfortunate to the commander in chief, who being obliged, by the ſudden approach of winter, to take ſhelter in an obſcure harbour of Ruſſian Lapland, was there, with his whole crew, frozen to death. One of the ſhips, commanded by Richard Chancellor, was more fortunate, by reaching the White Sea, on the coaſt of Ruſſia. Chancellor landed at the abbey of St. Nicholas, near Archangel, in order to wait of the Czar John Bazilowitz, then engaged in the Livonian war. At this time the Ruſſians had neither harbours nor ſhipping on the ſhores of the Baltic; their rich furs, hemp, &c. were carried into Livonia, and thence diſtributed to the different parts of Europe. Chancellor reached the Czar's court at Moſcow, and was kindly received by the emperor; who, deſirous of opening a trade from one one of his own ports with the Engliſh, granted the merchants of that kingdom very extenſive privileges.

The trade to Turkey was begun in 1583, and a company eſtabliſhed for carrying it on with ſpirit and advantage. Before that time, the emperor of the Turks had always conſidered England as a province of France. The power and reputation of Elizabeth deſtroyed this erroneous opinion: he gave the Engliſh a kind reception, and granted them even larger privileges than thoſe he had before given to the French.

Notwithſtanding the attempt made in 1536 for finding a north-weſt paſſage to India proved abortive, the Engliſh were not diſcouraged. Sir Martin Forbiſher made a ſecond attempt, and penetrated much farther than any European before his time. He diſcovered the Streight which ſtill bears his name; and made ſo many flattering diſcoveries, that though he ſucceeded not in his principal deſign, a ſecond voyage was attempted ſome years after, but no north-weſt paſſage could be found.

The firſt attempt of the Engliſh for eſtabliſhing a trade to the coaſt of Guinea was made by Mr. John Hawkins, about the year 1562. He purchaſed a conſiderable number of negroes in Guinea, and carried them to Hiſpaniola, where he diſpoſed of his ſlaves and Engliſh merchandize, and loaded his veſſels with hides, ſugar, and ginger; commodities that found a quick ſale in England, and rendered the voyage very lucrative to the merchants.

Two attempts were made, during the reign of Elizabeth, for ſettling colonies in America, and both proved abortive. One was attempted by Sir Humphry Gilbert in Newfoundland, and the other by Sir Walter Raleigh in Virginia. Raleigh procured a charter from the queen in 1584: but notwithſtanding all the attempts of that great man, who ſeemed born for making diſcoveries, he ſucceeded not in his deſign; all the ſettlements in America owe their eſtabliſhments to later times.

Soon after the revival of learning in Europe, it was cultivated with attention by the princes and nobility of England. Henry VIII. was conſidered as one of the moſt learned perſons of his time. Queen Catherine Parr tranſlated a very uſeful treatiſe into Engliſh in the beginning of the reign of Edward VI. Lady Jane Gray, conſidering her age, her ſex, and her ſtation, may be conſidered as a prodigy of learning. She was familiarly acquainted with the writings of the ancients, and catched their noble ſentiments at a very early age. Elizabeth wrote and tranſlated ſeveral books, and was familiarly acquainted both with the Greek and Latin languages. But cardinal Wolſey may be conſidered as the father of revived learning in England. Wolſey had a ſoul exquiſitely ſuſceptible of the glory ariſing from a patronage that gives a ſurer immortality than power or titles can communicate. The fame of Leo X. who reſtored the arts in Italy, excited his emulation; he was deſirous of diſſeminating the ſeeds of literature in his native country. The learning of the Engliſh was then uſeleſs and heavy; they were totally ſtrangers to taſte. Wolſey ſaw this, and had the virtue to attempt the improvement of the one, and the introduction of the other. He was himſelf well acquainted with many branches of learning, as well as maſter of all the qualities of a fine gentleman and a polite courtier. But it was not enough for Wolſey to confine his love of learning and the muſes to his own example and munificence, without planting thoſe ſeminaries which, in ſucceeding ages, were productive of many of the nobleſt fruits of ſtudy. He ſearched for men of genius and letters, as the lord of the ſoil does for a mine of treaſure. His houſe, like Cicero's Tuſculanum, was the retreat of the learned. Whenever he found a foreigner celebrated for his literary acquiſitions, he ſettled on him a handſome ſalary, and invited him to England. He intended to procure copies of all the MSS. in the Vatican for his college at Oxford; which, if finiſhed according to his plan, would have been the nobleſt foundation in the world.

Henry Howard, earl of Surry, was one of the greateſt ornaments in the court of Henry VIII. He was famous for the tenderneſs and elegance of his poetry, in which he excelled all the writers of his time. His great merit excited the jealouſy of Henry; and, after the formality of a trial, he was condemned and executed for high-treaſon on the nineteenth of January, 1547.

Archbiſhop Wareham ſhone as a divine, a lawyer, and a ſtateſman; but was at laſt ſupplanted in the king's favour by Wolſey. Eraſmus makes honourable mention of this prelate, whom he eſteemed a perfect model of the epiſcopal character. He died on the 23d of Auguſt 1532.

Archbiſhop Cranmer was one of the moſt learned perſons of his age, and has been juſtly eſteemed one of the chief ornaments of our church and nation. He was in high eſteem with Henry VIII. for his learning, his ſincerity, his prudence, and his moderation. But he fell a ſacrifice to the bigotted fury of queen Mary, on the 21ſt of March, 1556.

Cuthbert Tonſtal, biſhop of Durham, was a polite ſcholar, and one of the moſt perfect characters of his age. The celebrated Eraſmus, one of whoſe excellences conſiſted in doing juſtice to the merit of his friends, tells us, that he was comparable to any of the ancients.

John Collet, dean of St. Paul's, was one of thoſe great men that aſſiſted in the revival of learning in England. No higher teſtimony need be given of the merit of Collet, than his great intimacy with Eraſmus. There was a remarkable ſimilitude of manners, of ſtudies, and of ſentiments in religion, between theſe illuſtrious men, who ventured to withdraw the veil of ignorance and ſuperſtition, and expoſe them, in their genuine colours, to the eyes of the world; and to prepare the minds of the Engliſh for that reformation in religion, and the reſtoration of learning, which ſoon after followed. Collet, Lynacre, Lilly, Grocyn, and Latimer, were the firſt that revived the literature of the ancients in England. He founded St. Paul's ſchool, and died in 1519.

William Tindale, canon of Chriſt-church, Oxford, and deſervedly ſtiled the Engliſh apoſtle, was the firſt that tranſlated the New Teſtament into Engliſh from the Greek. This work appeared in 1526; and three or four years after, he publiſhed an Engliſh tranſlation of the Pentateuch from the original Hebrew, and intended to have gone through with the whole: but his attempt provoked the catholic clergy, and he was burnt for hereſy at Wilford, near Bruſſels, in 1536.

Sir Thomas More was a great maſter of the elegant learning of the ancients. His Utopia, a kind of political romance, which gained him the higheſt reputation as an author, is an idea of a perfect republic, in an iſland ſuppoſed to be newly diſcovered in America. He was beheaded, for denying the king's ſupremacy, on the ſixth of July, 1535.

Sir Thomas Smith, Sir John Cheke, and Roger Aſcham, tutor to queen Elizabeth, were the politeſt ſcholars of their time in the univerſity of Cambridge. Among other uſeful attempts for the improvement of learning, they introduced the true pronunciation of the Greek in that ſeat of the muſes.

Richard Hooker, ſome time maſter of the Temple, and afterwards rector of Biſhop's Bourn, in Kent, was one of the moſt celebrated writers of the age in which he lived. His "Eccleſiaſtical Polity", which is a defence of the government of the Engliſh church againſt the cavils of the diſſenters, is written with a claſſic ſimplicity, and eſteemed one of the completeſt works, both for ſtyle and argument, that ever appeared in the Engliſh language. Queen Elizabeth uſed to call him "The judicious Hooker", an epithet by which he is ſtill diſtinguiſhed. He died on the ſecond of November, 1600.

Sir Philip Sidney was the delight and admiration of the court of Elizabeth. He was the ornament of the univerſity; and appeared with equal advantage in a field of battle, at a tournament, in a private converſation among his friends, or in a public character as an ambaſſador. His talents were equally adapted to proſe or verſe, to original compoſition or tranſlation. His Arcadia was not only admired for its novelty, but continued to be read longer than ſuch compoſitions generally are, and has paſſed through fourteen editions. He died the ſixteenth of October, 1586.

John Stow was one of the moſt induſtrious antiquaries this kingdom has produced. He was bred a taylor, but quitted his employment to purſue his beloved ſtudy of the hiſtory and antiquities of England, to which he had an invincible propenſity. His principal works are his "Survey of London", his "Additions to Hollingſhed's Chronicle", and his "Annals". The folio volume, commonly called "Stow's Chronicle", was compiled from his papers after his deceaſe. He died the fifth of April, 1605.

Sir Thomas Bodley deſerves to be mentioned here, as a man of letters; but much more for the ample proviſion he has made for literature, by the library he founded at Oxford, and in which he ſtands unrivalled. In 1599, he opened his library, a mauſoleum which will perpetuate his memory as long as books themſelves endure. He died the twenty-eight of January, 1612.

John Gerrarde, a ſurgeon of London, was the greateſt Engliſh botaniſt of that age. He publiſhed his herbal in 1597, which has, ever ſince its firſt appearance, been conſidered as a very uſeful work.

Edmund Spenſer, the celebrated author of the "Fairy Queen", was the father of the Engliſh heroic poem, and of true paſtoral poetry in this iſland. He ſtands diſtinguiſhed from almoſt all other poets, by that faculty by which a poet is diſtinguiſhed from other writers, namely, invention; and excelled all his cotemporaries in harmonious verſification. The ſtanza of Spenſer, and the old words which conſtantly occur, contribute to give that great poet an air of peculiarity; and hence all the imitations of him reſemble the original. But Parnaſſus proved a very barren ſoil to Spenſer. Elizabeth was far from having a juſt ſenſe of his merit. After the death of Sir Philip Sidney, he languiſhed without a patron, and died, in want of bread, in 1599.

Beſides the writers already enumerated, many others flouriſhed during this period of hiſtory. John Rogers, a clergyman of Lancaſhire, tranſlated the Bible into Engliſh, with notes. Thomas Sternhold and John Hopkins tranſlated the Pſalms into metre, as we ſtill hear them ſung in many of our churches. John Leland, the famous antiquarian, flouriſhed in this period. Fairfax tranſlated Taſſo with eaſe and elegance; and Harrington, Arioſto with tolerable accuracy.

Several diſcoveries, ſome of them very uſeful to this kingdom, were made during this period of hiſtory. One Owen is noted, as being the firſt who caſt braſs cannon in England, ſome ſpecimens of which are ſaid to be ſtill in the Tower of London. They were caſt about the year 1536. Muſquets, or hand-guns, were introduced in the year 1521. Theſe ſuperſeded the practice of bows and arrows, which were ſoon after laid aſide.

About the year 1535, glaſſes were firſt manufactured in England: the finer ſort of it was made in Crutched-Friars, London; and the flint glaſs, little inferior to that of Venice, at the Savoy-houſe in the Strand.

The firſt manufacture of knives in England was begun in 1563, by Thomas Matthews, on Fleet-bridge, London. Before that time, they were imported from Germany; but the art was ſoon improv'd by the Engliſh, and large quantities were ſoon after exported to different parts of the world.

In the year 1589, William Lee, M. A. of St. John's college, Cambridge, invented an engine, or ſteel-loom, called the Stocking-frame, for knitting or weaving of ſtockings. This was not above twenty years after the Engliſh had been taught the art of knitting them with wires or needles, by the Spaniards. Mr. Lee's invention has been of great advantage to the ſtocking manufacture, by enabling the Engliſh to export vaſt quantities of all kinds to foreign countries.

We have the beſt authority for fixing the firſt manufacturing of ſail-cloth in England to the year 1599, being the preamble of an act made for encouraging that uſeful manufacture. Before that time it was imported from France and Germany.

About the ſame time, that uſeful inſtrument, the teleſcope, was diſcovered by one Janſſen, a ſpectacle-maker at Middleburgh, in Zealand. He knew not, however, the theory, on which the inſtrument depended, and therefore never made them of any conſiderable length: eighteen inches was the utmoſt extent of his inſtruments. Galileo, aſtronomer to the grand duke of Tuſcany, was the artiſt that perfected the diſcovery, and rendered it of the greateſt ſervice in aſtronomical obſervations; and hence the teleſcope has acquired the name of Galileo's tube.

The progreſs made in the mathematical arts was chiefly confined to the ſtudies of Dee, and one or two more, who were patronized by Burleigh.

BOOK XI.

From the beginning of the reign of James I. to the reſtoration of Charles II.

JAMES I.

A. D. 1603. THE heirs male of the houſe of Tudor failing, James, king of Scotland, great-grandſon of Margaret, eldeſt daughter of Henry VII. had an inconteſtible right to the crown of England. The will of Henry VIII. had, indeed, ſet aſide the claim of that family; but the teſtament was now odious to the nation, and Elizabeth had named James as her ſucceſſor. The whole nation appeared greatly intereſted in favour of their new monarch, he was received in the capital with the greateſt rejoicings, and crowned at Weſtminſter on Monday the twenty-fifth of July, by Whitgift, archbiſhop of Canterbury, amidſt the acclamations of the people. But James, though far from diſliking the adulation of his ſubjects, hated the buſtle of a mixed multitude; he was much fonder of eaſe and tranquillity.

He was not, however, inſenſible to their affections; and began his reign with laviſhing a profuſion of titles on his courtiers; no leſs than two hundred and thirty-ſeven perſons received the honour of knighthood, within ſix weeks after his aſcending the Engliſh throne. By ſo indiſcriminate a method of beſtow-favours, he imprudently leſſened the rewards of merit. Titles were no longer marks of diſtinction; and being diſtributed without choice or deliberation, they were conſidered rather as proofs of the facility and good nature of the prince, than the marks of any determined friendſhip and eſteem. To ridicule this imprudent manner of laviſhing titles, a paſquinade was affixed to the gate of St. Paul's, advertiſing that an artiſt had diſcovered the beſt method of retaining, in weak memories, the names of the new nobility.

The greater part of theſe honours were conferred upon the Scots, at which the Engliſh were offended, and it might have occaſioned national quarrels, had not James prudently reſolved to employ only Engliſhmen in the adminiſtration. Among theſe ſecretary Cecil, created ſucceſſively lord Effindon, viſcount Cranborne, and earl of Saliſbury, was always regarded as prime miniſter and chief counſellor. He was the ſon of the famous Burleigh, whoſe name, it was natural to ſuppoſe, muſt be odious to James, as the declared enemy of his mother, and the chief cauſe of her tragical cataſtrophe; but Cecil had taken care to make his peace with James before the death of Elizabeth. Skilled in the arts of cunning and duplicity, he had for ſome time before the queen's deceaſe, kept up a correſpondence with James, and informed him of every thing tranſacted in the Engliſh council that regarded his intereſt. Sir Walter Raleigh, lord Grey, and lord Cobham, who had not taken the wiſe precautions of Cecil, and had been at the head of the faction which brought the earl of Eſſex to the ſcaffold, immediately felt the effects of the new monarch's prejudice, and were diſmiſſed from their employments,

The eyes of all the ſovereigns of Europe were fixed in anxious expectations upon James, from the moment of his aſcending the Engliſh throne; they beheld in him the ſon of a princeſs who died a martyr to the cauſe of popery, and who had ſuffered a long ſeries of troubles in a kingdom whither ſhe had fled for protection. The hopes of the catholics and the fears of the proteſtants were equally excited on this occaſion; and ambaſſadors from almoſt all the princes and ſtates of Chriſtendom ſoon appeared at the Engliſh court, in order to compliment the king on his new acquired dignity, and to conclude with him new treaties and alliances. Beſides envoys from Venice, Denmark, and the Palatinate, Henry Frederick of Naſſau, aſſiſted by the famous penſionary Barnevelt, repreſented the ſtates of the United Provinces; Aremberg was ſent by the archduke Albert, and Taxis was ſoon expected from Spain.

Henry IV. of France could not reflect, without concern, that James, in one part of his life, had entered into negotiations with Spain, and thought he had every thing to dread from ſuch an union, eſpecially if James, whoſe real diſpoſition was as yet unknown, ſhould diſcover an enterprizing genius. The marquis of Roſny, afterwards the famous duke of Sully, a miniſter worthy of Henry IV. was charged with the affairs of France at the Engliſh court. That able ſtateſman propoſed a league with James, in conjunction with Venice, the United Provinces, and the northern crowns, in order to invade the territories of the houſe of Auſtria on every ſide, and humble the exorbitant power of that ambitious family. But the genius of the Engliſh monarch was little adapted to ſuch vaſt enterprizes; the love of peace was his ruling paſſion, and Roſny found James to be maſter of ſo much art and diſſimulation, that all his addreſs was inſufficient to diſcover the real intentions of the Engliſh monarch. He refuſed to make any declaration but in general terms, of his ſincere deſire of living in friendſhip with France. A ſolemn conference was, however, at laſt held, and it was agreed that the Dutch ſhould have the liberty of levying forces both in France and England; that the two monarchs ſhould ſupply that republic with the ſum of one million four hundred thouſand livres a year for the maintenance of their forces; that the whole ſum ſhould be advanced by the king of France, but that one third of it ſhould be deducted to diſcharge a debt due from that monarch to Elizabeth; and that if the Spaniards attacked either the territories of France or England, the contracting princes ſhould aſſiſt each other, Henry with a force of ten thouſand, and James with that of ſix thouſand men.

The tranquillity which reigned in England was now diſturbed by a conſpiracy ſaid to have been formed in the kingdom againſt the government. The deſign was to place Arabella Stuart, a near relation of James, and deſcended equally with him from Henry VII. on the Engliſh throne. She had been long a ſtate priſoner in the Tower, and poſſibly never knew that the leaſt deſign was formed for her liberty. Indeed the whole conſpiracy is ſtill a myſtery; time itſelf has afforded no clue that will help us to unravel it. But however that be, Sir Walter Raleigh, with his friends the lords Cobham and Grey, Sir Griffith Markham, Sir Edward Parham, Sir George Brooke, Bartholomew Brookſby, and Anthony Cappely, with two prieſts, Watſon and Clarke, were ſent to priſon. The trial of theſe conſpirators, if indeed any conſpiracy ſpiracy ever exiſted, was imperfect and confuſed; no ſigns of guilt appeared; no regular plot had been formed. A few paſſionate words, flowing from the diſappointed ambition of the diſmiſſed courtiers, compoſed perhaps their whole crime. Sir Edward Coke, the celebrated lawyer, who managed the proſecution on the part of the crown, uſed the moſt violent and opprobrious terms on this occaſion. He called Raleigh a traitor, a monſter, a viper, a ſpider of hell; terms that ſufficiently point out the manners of the age, and will for ever throw a ſtain on the character of that famous pleader. Raleigh, however, defended himſelf with ſurprizing temper, eloquence, and courage; but notwithſtanding all the force of his arguments, he was found guilty by his jury, contrary to all law and the principles of equity. The two prieſts were executed, Cobham, Grey and Markham were pardoned, after they had laid their heads upon the block. Raleigh alſo was reprieved, but not pardoned, and he continued many years after in confinement.

Secure from this danger, James turned his thoughts towards theological controverſies, of which he was much fonder than of the duties of a king. The ſeverities of Elizabeth had reſtrained the partizans of the Roman church; but the fanaticiſm of the puritans was not to be ſubdued. Theſe fiery diſciplinarians expected better treatment under a prince who had been trained up by their own ſect in Scotland. But James was too well acquainted with their independent principles, was too jealous of his new authority, and too much a friend to pleaſure, to ſhew them any favour in a country where they were not the predominant party. He was, however, very willing that a conference ſhould be held at Hampton-court, where he himſelf undertook to preſide in perſon.

A. D. 1604. The conference was opened on the fourteenth of January, and James, in quality of preſident, diſplayed his uncommon talents in diſputation. They diſputed not upon doctrine, the proper object of controverſy, but on ſimple ceremonies, the ſign of the croſs in baptiſm, the wedding-ring, the ſurplice, and the bowing at the name of Jeſus: theſe were the topics debated before this aſſembly, and theſe were the mighty particulars that had excited ſo violent a miſunderſtanding between the two parties, and ſet the whole nation in a flame. Great expectations were formed by the leaders of both parties on the iſſue of this debate; but ſurely they muſt have been totally unacquainted with the dictates of the human heart, who could expect that a candid indifference, and a ſincere ſearch after truth, would be obſerved in a theological enquiry, ſo long and warmly debated in the kingdom. It muſt, however, be owned, that the king from the firſt opening the controverſy, was ſtrongly biaſſed in favour of the epiſcopal party; he frequently ſaid, with a deciſive tone of voice, "No biſhop, no king;" and the primate obſerved, that his majeſty, doubtleſs, ſpoke by the Spirit of God. The alteration of ſome few paſſages in the liturgy were the only fruit of this conference. Each party retained their former prejudices, increaſed by the animoſity of a public diſputation.

James was perſuaded that in ſupporting the epiſcopalians, he ſupported his own prerogative. They admitted a ſeries of ſubordination, and acknowledged the king as ſupreme head of the church; whereas the diſſenters were infected with the levelling principles, and conſidered all men as equal. The love of liberty had taken conſiderable root in Europe, eſpecially in England, where it was carefully nouriſhed by the puritan party. This is, with great probability, attributed to the taſte that now prevailed for letters, which enlarged at once the ideas and the views of men. The works of the ancients, and the hiſtory of ſo many celebrated commonwealths, could not fail of cheriſhing a republican ſpirit, in proportion as they cultivated the underſtanding.

The parliament, whoſe meeting had been deferred on account of the plague, which raged ſo dreadfully in London, that no leſs than thirty thouſand perſons died of it in one year, aſſembled on the nineteenth of March, when James opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne. Though few productions of that age ſurpaſſed this ſpeech, either in ſtile or matter, yet it is deſtitute of that majeſtic reſerve, which ſhould always be obſerved by a king in his addreſſes to the great council of the nation. The general propoſitions are, however, juſt, and the following paſſage demands the applauſe of every lover of Engliſh liberty. "When I have done all that I can do for you, I do nothing but what I am bound to do, and am accountable to God ſhould I do the contrary; for I acknowledge that the moſt eſſential difference between a lawful king and an uſurping tyrant, conſiſts in this; that whereas the proud and ambitious tyrant thinks that his kingdom and people are only ordained for the gratification of his deſires and unreaſonable appetites; the righteous and juſt king, on the contrary, acknowledges, that he himſelf is only ordained for promoting the wealth and proſperity of his people; and that his greateſt and principal happineſs muſt conſiſt in their proſperity. If you are rich I cannot be poor; if you are happy I cannot be unfortunate: and I proteſt that your welfare ſhall be the conſtant object of my ſtudy and attention. That I am a ſervant is moſt true; and that as I am head and governor of all the people in my dominions, conſidering them in number, and in different ranks; ſo, if we will take the people as one body and maſs, then as the head is ordained for the body, and not the body for the head, ſo muſt a righteous king acknowledge himſelf to be ordained for his people, and not his people for him: For though a king and people are relative, yet can he be no king if he is deſtitute of ſubjects; but there are many people in the world, that are without a king. I ſhall therefore never be aſhamed to confeſs it my principal honour to be the great ſervant of the commonwealth, and ever think the proſperity thereof to be my greateſt felicity." The reſt of the ſpeech was calculated to effect an union between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland; and in expreſſing his favourable intentions towards the Roman catholic party; he even dropped ſome ſevere expreſſions againſt the puritans.

This ſpeech produced not the deſired effect. The proteſtants were alarmed at the advances made towards the catholics, and the puritans were enraged to hear the king profeſs himſelf their open enemy. The commons determined now to ſhake off that puſillanimity which had rendered them ſo ſubſervient to the orders of the crown in the preceding reign, and to aſſert their privileges with ſpirit and firmneſs. A caſe ſoon offered for carrying their deſign into execution. Sir Francis Goodwin having been declared duly elected knight of the ſhire for the county of Bucks by the committee of elections, after a full hearing on a petition of Sir John Forteſcue, the king commanded the commons to re-conſider the caſe, and to conſult the judges on the occaſion. This the commons abſolutely refuſed, and a breach between the king and his parliament would probably have been the conſequence, had not the moderation of Goodwin diſengaged the king from an affair which might have been attended with fatal effects. It had been the common practice during the late reign, when any perſon was declared diſqualified to ſit in the houſe, by the chancellor, for him to iſſue his writ for a new election. The houſe now oppoſed this act of prerogative, as injurious to the freedom of elections and the privileges of parliament. They aſſerted, that they alone had the right of iſſuing writs for filling vacancies; and the crown made no difficulty of confirming it. Happily James poſſeſſed neither capacity to perceive the conſequence, nor ſufficient art and vigour to check the firſt attempts of liberty.

Nor was the privileges of elections the only grievance the commons attempted to remove. They endeavoured to free trade from the ſhackles of monopoly, which the imperious, and in this inſtance, the ill-judged tyranny of Elizabeth had laid upon it. Their endeavours failed indeed of ſucceſs; but the very deſign deſerves to be remembered with applauſe. The ſame fate attended a ſimilar attempt to free the people from the burden of purveyance. They offered the king fifty thouſand pounds a year if he would conſent to aboliſh it. James refuſed to comply, and the deſign became abortive.

The ſame ſpirit of independence urged the commons to oppoſe the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, which true policy muſt have conſidered as the greateſt advantage to both. The king was very deſirous of completing this union. He told the parliament, "that he juſtly regarded it as the peculiar felicity of his reign, that he had terminated the bloody animoſities of theſe hoſtile nations, and reduced the whole iſland under one empire, enjoying tranquillity within itſelf, and ſecurity from all foreign invaſions." He added, "that while his ſubjects of both kingdoms reflected on the diſaſters of former times, he hoped they would entertain the ſtrongeſt deſire of ſecuring themſelves againſt a return of ſimilar calamities, by a thorough union of laws, parliaments and privileges." But theſe reaſons, however powerful when conſidered without prejudice, loſt their effect. The commons aſcribed the exceſſive zeal of the king to that partiality in favour of his ancient ſubjects, of which, on other occaſions, they thought they had ſufficient reaſon to complain. So ſtrangely will prejudice warp the reaſoning faculty of human beings!

When the queſtion of a ſupply was brought before the houſe, the ſame ſpirit of oppoſition appeared among the commons. The ſmalleſt ſupply, however reaſonable and neceſſary, appeared to them unreaſonable and exorbitant. James, deſirous of concealing his wants from the parliament, and determined not to ſuffer the mortification of a refuſal, ſent a meſſage to the commons, informing them, that he deſired no ſupply. This conduct of the parliament diſplayed the principles which were now taking root in the nation. James foreſaw not the conſequences: he relied upon the rights of the crown, without imagining that his ſubjects could have any rights to throw in the oppoſite ſcale againſt them.

Soon after the prorogation of the parliament, the peace with Spain was finally concluded. This treaty contained ſome articles not at all favourable to the ſtates of the United Provinces; but as they were never executed, nor any complaints made on that head by the Spaniards, it is natural to imagine, that, by ſome ſecret agreement between the contracting parties, they were never intended for any thing more than mere form. Soon after the concluſion of this treaty, the town of Oſtend capitulated, after a three years ſiege. The Spaniards found nothing in the place but heaps of ruins to recompenſe them for the vaſt ſums of money, and the incredible number of lives they had loſt in making the conqueſt. James gave himſelf no concern about the loſs of this fortreſs, reſolving to improve his preſent connection with Spain. He accordingly diſpatched the earl of Nottingham, lord high-admiral, with the character of ambaſſador extraordinary, to that court, attended by a numerous and magnificent retinue. The Spaniards were extremely ſurprized on their arrival, when they beheld the blooming countenances, and graceful appearance of the Engliſh, whom their bigotry, inflamed by their prieſts, had repreſented as ſo many monſters and demons from the infernal regions.

We come now to relate an event which has not its parallel in hiſtory, namely, the gun-powder plot, which affords a ſtriking inſtance of the human mind, when blinded by religious prejudices. The catholics, perſuaded at firſt that the ſon of Mary Stuart would mitigate the ſeverity of the laws in their favour, were enraged to find themſelves treated with the ſame rigour: they forgot the real duties of religion to indulge the principles of a blind and headſtrong zeal. Cateſby, a gentleman deſcended from an ancient family, of good parts, and maſter of a conſiderable eſtate, had formed a plan for overturning the Engliſh government; and in order to carry the deſign into execution, had made ſeveral journies to the court of Philip, in order to procure an army of Spaniards to land in England: but the late peace having rendered his plan of an invaſion abortive, he formed a moſt extraordinary method of revenge; and declared his intention to Piercy, a deſcendant from the illuſtrious houſe of Northumberland. The hardſhips under which the catholics laboured was often the ſubject of their converſation; and Piercy, in a fit of enthuſiaſtic zeal, hinted a deſign of aſſaſſinating the king. Cateſby anſwered, that the attempt, if ſucceſsful, could not poſſibly remove the evil; that a more general revenge was neceſſary, in order to reſtore the catholic religion in England. The whole royal family, the nobility, and the parliament, are (ſaid he) equally infected with the ſame hereſy, and muſt all be deſtroyed, before a catholic prince can be placed upon the throne, and religion reſtored to its ancient purity. Nor is this undertaking either impoſſible or difficult. They will all aſſemble on the firſt meeting of the parliament, and afford us an opportunity of a ſure and ample vengeance. A mine may eaſily be run under the parliament-houſe; and a few barrels of powder, properly placed, will bury all our enemies in one common ruin." Piercy was highly pleaſed with the contrivance of Cateſby; and it was agreed between them to communicate the deſign to a few of their friends, and, among the reſt, to Thomas Winter, who was immediately diſpatched to Flanders in ſearch of Guy Fawkes, an officer in the Spaniſh ſervice, with whoſe zeal for the catholic religion, and courage to execute any deſperate enterprize, they were well acquainted.

Thus far every thing had ſucceeded according to their wiſhes. Fawkes was found, and entered into the conſpiracy with all the ardour of bigotted enthuſiaſm. A houſe was hired in Piercy's name, adjoining to that in which the parliament was to aſſemble; and it was agreed to carry a mine from the cellar under the room in which the parliament met; and the very moment when the king was delivering his ſpeech to both houſes, to ſet fire to the magazine, and deſtroy the whole aſſembly by one dreadful blaſt: thus making the very ſpot, where the edicts for proſcribing the catholic religion had received their ſanction, the ſcene of this dreadful cataſtrophe.

A. D. 1605. Theſe conſultations were held in the month of December of the preceding year; and it being expected that the parliament would meet in February, the work was immediately begun, and carried on with aſtoniſhing perſeverance. They never deſiſted from their labour, relieving one another by turns; and that no alarm might be given to the neighbourhood, they entered Piercy's houſe by night, and carried with them proviſions ſufficient to ſupport them till the mine was compleated. They had alſo provided themſelves with fire-arms and ammunition, fully determined, in caſe of being diſcovered, to periſh rather than be taken.

On the ſecond of February they had nearly pierced the wall through three yards thick; and were greatly terrified at hearing a noiſe, which they knew not how to account for, as it ſeemed to proceed from the other ſide of the wall. A diſcovery was now greatly feared, and the conſpirators prepared to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity; but, upon inquiry, it was found, that the place from whence the noiſe proceeded was a large vault under the houſe of lords, filled with coals, which were now ſelling off, and that the vault was to be lett to the higheſt bidder. This opportunity was not to be neglected; Piercy immediately hired the place, depoſited in it thirty-ſix barrels of powder, and covered the whole with faggots. Every thing was now ready for the dreadful blaſt; but the parliament being prorogued to the fifth of November, the conſpirators had more time to finiſh that diabolical undertaking. More faggots were carried into the vault, and the doors boldly thrown open, as if it contained nothing dangerous, or that ought to be concealed.

The ſucceſs that had hitherto attended their undertaking rendered them confident of ſucceſs; and they began to deliberate on the beſt method of executing the remaining part of the project. The duke of York, whoſe tender age would not ſuffer him to be preſent at the opening of the parliament, muſt be ſecured, as well as his ſiſter the princeſs Elizabeth, then at lord Harrington's houſe in Warwickſhire. Piercy undertook to ſecure or aſſaſſinate the duke; and Sir Everard Digby, Rookwood, and Grant, who were now let into the ſecret of the conſpiracy, engaged to aſſemble their friends, under pretence of a hunting-match, ſeize that princeſs, and immediately declare her queen. Some propoſed to apply immediately to foreign courts for aſſiſtance; but this was thought too dangerous; and it was reſolved to make no application of that kind till the plot had taken effect.

At laſt the day for carrying this infernal ſcheme into execution approached; and the conſpirators, without the leaſt remorſe of conſcience, waited with impatience for its arrival. The ſecret, though known to above twenty perſons, had been kept with the utmoſt caution. Not a ſyllable had tranſpired, nor one of the conſpirators had abandoned the enterprize, either through fear of puniſhment, or the hopes of reward. Religious frenzy had ſtifled at once the voice of conſcience and the ſoft whiſpers of humanity. A bigotted partiality to preſerve a profeſſor of the catholic religion, at laſt ſaved the kingdom from deſtruction.

The following letter was ſent, about ten days before the meeting of the parliament, to lord Monteagle, ſon to lord Morley, a catholic peer. "My "lord, Out of the love I bear to ſome of your "friends, I have a care of your preſervation. There-"fore I would adviſe you, as you tender your life, "to deviſe ſome excuſe to ſhift off your attendance "at this parliament; for God and man have con-"curred to puniſh the wickedneſs of this time. "And think not ſlightly of this advertiſement, but "retire yourſelf into your country, where you may "expect the event in ſafety: for though there be no "appearance of any ſtir, yet I ſay they will receive "a terrible blow, this parliament, and yet they ſhall "not ſee who hurts them. This counſel is not to be "contemned, becauſe it may do you good, but can "do you no harm: for the danger is paſt as ſoon as "you have burned this letter. And I hope God will "give you the grace to make good uſe of it, to whoſe "holy protection I commend you."

This letter gave Monteagle ſome uneaſineſs. It had been delivered to his ſervant by an unknown hand, and ſeemed to contain ſome myſtery which it was not eaſy to explain. Had his own ſafety alone been concerned, in all probability, he would have ſlighted the notice, as he was inclined to think it was nothing more than an attempt of his enemies to prevent his attendance in parliament; but fearing leſt the king's life might be in danger, he carried it directly to lord Saliſbury, ſecretary of ſtate. The miniſter was alſo inclined to treat it with neglect; but as the words ſeemed to convey an ambiguous meaning, he determined to lay it before his majeſty. The king was of a different opinion: he conjectured, from the ſerious and earneſt ſtyle of the letter, that ſomething very dangerous and important was intended; and that the effect, which was repreſented to be at once both ſudden and terrible, ſeemed to denote ſome contrivance by gun-powder. He was, however, of opinion, that either nothing ſhould be done, or enough to prevent the danger; and that therefore the ſearch ſhould be deferred till the day before the meeting of the parliament, when the vaults under the parliament-houſe ſhould be carefully inſpected. Accordingly, on the fourth of November, the lord chamberlain, who was obliged by his office to ſee every thing in readineſs for his majeſty's coming, viſited all the places about the parliament-houſe. He ſlightly inſpected the cellar, in one of the corners of which ſtood Fawkes, who paſſed for Piercy's ſervant. The lord chamberlain was ſtruck with the appearance of the man, in whoſe countenance all the marks of ferocious courage were conſpicuouſly painted. Piercy was known to be a very rigid papiſt, and to reſide very little in town: the large quantity of fuel was, therefore, conſidered as a little extraordinary, and it was thought neceſſary to make a more particular inſpection of the cellar; but, at the ſame time, it was reſolved, that this ſearch ſhould be made in ſuch a manner as ſhould render it effectual, without giving the leaſt alarm. Theſe reſolutions being taken, Sir Thomas Knevet, a juſtice of the peace, with proper attendants, was ſent about midnight to examine the cellar, under pretence of ſearching for ſtolen goods. Fawkes had juſt finiſhed all his preparations, and was coming out of the cellar when Knevet arrived. The daring conſpirator was immediately ſeized; and, after removing the billets, the barrels of powder were diſcovered. Fawkes had a dark lantern in his hand; and the matches, with every thing neceſſary for ſetting fire to the powder, were found in his pockets. The guilt of this determined conſpirator was now ſufficiently apparent; and knowing that all denial would be in vain, he avowed the deſign, and that it would have been executed on the morrow; at the ſame time, expreſſing the utmoſt regret that he had loſt the opportunity of ſetting fire to the powder, and of ſoftening his own death with the pleaſure of periſhing with his enemies. He expreſſed the ſame intrepid boldneſs when examined before the council. He ſhewed not the leaſt concern but for the failure of the enterprize, nor could the threats of torture prevail upon him to diſcover his accomplices. This obſtinacy continued two or three days; but being cloſely confined in the Tower, and the rack placed before him, his courage at laſt forſook him, and he made a full diſcovery of the whole contrivance, and named all his accomplices.

The conſpirators who then reſided in town, though they knew that the letter to Mounteagle had alarmed the miniſtry, and even that a ſearch was intended to be made by the lord chamberlain, never abandoned their hopes of ſucceſs till they heard that Fawkes was taken. It was then, indeed, too evident that the whole plot was diſcovered; and they fled immediately into Warwickſhire, where Sir Everard Digby, perſuaded that the attempt had ſucceeded, was already in arms to ſeize the princeſs Elizabeth, who had prevented their deſign by flying to Coventry. The whole county was now alarmed; and Sir Richard Walſh, high conſtable of Worceſterſhire, aſſiſted by a great number of the inhabitants, ſurrounded the conſpirators in Holbeach. Their number, including all their attendants, never exceeded eighty; but notwithſtanding their inferiority, they prepared for a vigorous defence, determined either to periſh or eſcape. But misfortune ſtill purſued them. A quantity of powder laid before the fire to dry, taking fire, diſabled them from making any defence. The people ruſhed in upon them. Cateſby and Piercy were killed by a ſingle ſhot: Winter, Digby, Rookwood and Bates, were taken, and carried to London, where they made a full diſcovery of the conſpiracy, and, together with Garnet the jeſuit, died by the hands of the common executioner.

The earl of Northumberland was fined thirty thouſand pounds, under pretence of his having been acquainted with the conſpiracy, though the only grounds of ſuſpicion were, his having admitted Piercy, his kinſman, into the number of gentlemen penſioners, without tendering him the oath of ſupremacy. The lords Mordaunt and Sturton, two catholic noblemen, were alſo tried in the ſtar-chamber, and fined, the former in ten thouſand, and the latter in four thouſand pounds. The lord Monteagle had a grant of two hundred pounds a year in land, and a penſion of five hundred pounds for his life, as a reward for diſcovering the letter which occaſioned the whole conſpiracy to be rendered abortive. Some Roman catholic authors have maintained that the gunpowder plot was nothing more than an idle chimera; but their aſſertations are founded on no hiſtorical evidence; the fact is certain; and however incredible it may appear that the human mind ſhould be capable of forming ſo horrid a contrivance, the whole is founded on proofs impoſſible to be invalidated.

This aſtoniſhing diſcovery occaſioned the meeting of parliament to be put off till the ninth of November, when the king opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he endeavoured to reſtrain the fury of the Engliſh againſt the catholics. He obſerved, that it would be highly unjuſt, it would be criminal, to involve the whole body of catholics in the guilt of a few; that it could not be ſuppoſed they were all diſpoſed to engage in committing ſuch horrid barbarities; that all men who embraced the tenets of the Roman church, ſhould not be conſidered as ſupporters of the pope's power of dethroning king's, or ſanctifying aſſaſſination; for though the wrath of heaven is denounced againſt crimes, yet innocent error may obtain favour. "For my own part, added he, conſpiracy, however atrocious, ſhall never alter my plan of government: while I puniſh guilt with one hand, I will ſupport and protect innocence with the other."

A. D. 1606. The moderation of James was not, however, agreeable to his ſubjects, particularly the puritans, who repreſented his lenity as a proof, that his heart was inclined to the doctrines of Rome. But this ſuſpicion was not ſufficient to alienate the hearts of his ſubjects from him; the commons even laid aſide their parſimonious tenets and granted him a conſiderable ſupply. But while the parliament were cloſely engaged in the buſineſs of the nation, and the paſſions of the people warmed by the recent guilt and and obſtinacy of the conſpirators, a report was ſuddenly ſpread, that James and his principal favourites were aſſaſſinated at Oking, about twenty miles weſt of London. The account was very circumſtantial; James was ſaid to have been ſtabbed with a poiſoned knife, and that the murderers were compoſed of Engliſh Jeſuits, Scots in diſguiſe, Frenchmen and Spaniards. The court and city gates were inſtantly ſhut; the guards at both were doubled; the citizens were put under arms; and Sir William Wade, lieutenant of the Tower, made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for preventing a ſurprize, and ſtanding a ſiege. The parliament was ſitting when the report arrived, and all buſineſs was immediately ſuſpended. Sir Maurice Berkley and two other perſons were diſpatched to know the truth, while terror and confuſion ſeemed to have ſeized every order and rank of men. A ſmall ſpace of time was, however, ſufficient to remove this univerſal conſternation. In about two hours the report became doubtful, and in three a proclamation was publiſhed by the privy-council, informing the people that no unfortunate event happened. James himſelf reached London about two in the afternoon, and was met at Hyde-park by the whole houſe of commons, with the ſpeaker at their head.

The ſupply, though very conſiderable, obtained from parliament, was ſoon ſquandered by the king's profuſion. What conſiderably increaſed the royal expence, was a viſit he received from his brother-in-law the king of Denmark. The whole court was employed in feaſting and revelry, in maſques and interludes. In the midſt of theſe rejoicings, the prince of Vaudemont, third ſon to the duke of Lorraine, attended by ſeven earls, ten barons, forty gentlemen, and one hundred and twenty domeſtics, arrived at court, and greatly increaſed the ſplendor that then reigned in every part of the palace.

The parliament met again at Weſtminſter on the eighteenth of November, when the project for an union between the two kingdoms was again the object of parliamentary diſcuſſion. James was very deſirous of completing this union; and pointed out, in an excellent ſpeech, the advantages that both kingdoms muſt receive from ſo neceſſary a treaty. But all his reaſonings were in vain; the parliament, ſwayed perhaps by the vulgar motive of national antipathy, reſiſted all his efforts, and the projected treaty became abortive. It was left to latter times, and to an age more capable of perceiving the real advantages of the nation, to complete an union of ſo much importance to both kingdoms.

A. D. 1607. Though the principal ſubject debated in parliament during this ſeſſion, was the union between the two kingdoms, it was not the only one; the puritans exerted themſelves as uſual in bringing in bills againſt pluralities; reſtraining the execution of eccleſiaſtical canons not confirmed by parliament; and moved for a toleration of thoſe who oppoſed the ceremonies of the church: but all their efforts were in vain: James had too ſeverely felt the effects of ſuffering that ſect to gain an aſcendancy in the government. In the mean time an inſurrection happened in the counties of Northampton, Warwick, and Leiceſter, occaſioned by large tracts of land being incloſed, whereby the people were deprived of their right of commonage. A body, conſiſting of three or four thouſand men, roved about the country, demoliſhing incloſures, and laying open the lands that had been taken from them. They were headed by one John Reynolds, a perſon of very low condition, but who had acquired great authority among the multitude. Several proclamations were publiſhed, and the ſheriffs raiſed the poſſe of their reſpective counties againſt them, but carefully avoided a general engagement. At laſt James publiſhed a conciliating proclamation, expreſſing his unwillingneſs to proceed againſt them by martial law, and promiſing them mercy, and redreſs of their grievances. This produced the deſired effect: the people laid down their arms, and returned to their reſpective habitations. A few weeks after this commotion ſubſided, James, though no ſupply had been granted him by the parliament, paid a debt of ſixty thouſand pounds contracted by Elizabeth, who, about nine years before, had borrowed that ſum of the citizens of London, and left it undiſcharged at her deceaſe.

A. D. 1608. Nothing memorable occurs in the tranſactions of this year, but the death of Thomas Sackville, earl of Dorſet, lord high-treaſurer. He was ſucceeded in his office by Robert Cecil, earl of Saliſbury, a nobleman of great talents, and every way qualified to inſtruct James in the methods uſed by former kings for raiſing money without the aſſiſtance of parliament.

A. D. 1609. Early in the ſpring was concluded, by a truce of twelve years, that memorable war, which had, for near half a century, been carried on with the utmoſt fury, between Spain and the ſtates of the United Provinces. Every ſtratagem had been tried, and every force exerted to annihilate a people who had made ſuch uncommon efforts in defence of their independence. At laſt the haughty Spaniard, finding the commerce of his kingdom entirely ruined, and his provinces expoſed to the moſt imminent danger from the maritime forces of the ſtates, conſented to acknowledge as a free people, thoſe whom he had ſo long treated as rebellious ſubjects, and ſolemnly to relinquiſh all pretenſions to ſovereignty over them. This event was at once mortifying and diſſatisfactory to James, who always conſidered the Hollanders as rebels. It was his avowed maxim in all debates concerning his prerogative, that ſubjects ought not to withdraw their allegiance from their princes on any account whatever. He therefore conſidered this treaty as a dangerous precedent, and prejudicial to the ſovereign authority of kings.

A. D. 1610. Nothwithſtanding the many artifices made uſe of by James for levying money upon his ſubjects, he ſoon found his exchequer empty, and was obliged to ſummon a parliament to obtain the neceſſary ſupplie s. The nation being enriched by commerce, and the revenues of the crown not augmented in proportion to the price of proviſions, the king found himſelf poor in the midſt of public wealth. Œconomy, indeed, was not one of James's virtues: he was laviſh of his treaſures to his rapacious courtiers, and always in want, becauſe he wanted ſufficient fortitude to reſtrain, within proper bounds, his paſſion for conferring favours. The taſk of procuring a ſupply to his majeſty was undertaken by the earl of Saliſbury, who, in order to conciliate the affections of the commons, aſſured them that the king was reſolved to redreſs all their grievances, and then proceeded to explain the cauſes which obliged the king to have recourſe to his parliament for a ſupply. He enumerated the debts of the late queen, which the king had diſcharged; the maintaining an army of nineteen thouſand men in Ireland; the great ſums he had expended in diſcharging the debts contracted by Elizabeth; in his own journey, and that of his houſhold, from Edinburgh to London: in entertaining the king of Denmark and foreign ambaſſadors; in ſupporting three courts, for himſelf, the queen and the prince of Wales; in ſending envoys to different courts on the continent; and in liberalities to his officers and dependents. He repreſented to them, that Elizabeth, though a ſingle woman, had received very large ſupplies during the laſt years of her life, which alone was expenſive to her; that ſhe had, notwithſtanding, alienated a great part of the crown lands, an expedient, which, though it ſupplied the preſent neceſſities, multiplied thoſe of her ſucceſſor. Theſe, and ſeveral other reaſons, were urged by the treaſurer, to obtain a large ſupply from the parliament; but they were urged in vain; the commons determined to avail themſelves of the king's poverty in order to keep him in dependence. They complained loudly of the king's prodigality, and exceſſive profuſion towards his own countrymen: while others affirmed that his real intention was to ſap the privileges of the ſubject by gradual uſurpations, and, at laſt, to bury the liberties of Engliſhmen in the gulph of prerogative. But being unwilling to ſhock the king with an abſolute denial, they expreſſed their willingneſs to comply with the king's deſires, provided they did not exceed the bounds of reaſon. Accordingly, the earl of Saliſbury moved for a conference with the commons; where he propoſed that an adequate ſupply might be granted for his majeſty's preſent occaſions, and that two hundred thouſand pounds a year ſhould, for the future, be added to the royal revenue, in order to ſupport the dignity of the crown. Fired at this propoſal, the commons voted one ſubſidy and one fifteenth, which did not amount to more than one ſixth part of what had been aſked for the king's preſent occaſions; and abſolutely refuſed to ſettle any ſtanding revenue, unleſs the king would conſent to purchaſe it with ſome valuable conſideration. By the ancient right of poundage the king was to have five per cent. on all merchandize, but as the ancient rates were followed, which did not amount to one third of the real value, he thought he might make ſome improvements, and theſe were made with great moderation. This did not, however, ſatiſfy the commons, they preſented a remonſtrance on that ſubject, in which they ſaid, that ſuch a practice threatened ruin to the ancient liberties of the kingdom, and invaded the properties of the people. They even paſſed a bill for the ſuppreſſion of thoſe taxes; together with another of more importance, againſt eccleſiaſtical regulations made without the authority of parliament; but they were both thrown out by the lords.

Theſe bold attempts, with others of a ſimilar nature, could not fail of being very diſagreeable to a prince firmly attached to the arbitrary principles of his anceſtors. He told the parliament in his ſpeech, that he would never agree to have his power diſputed, but ſhould always be willing to explain the motives of his conduct, and to regulate it by the laws. In a work publiſhed in England, he expreſſed himſelf in theſe terms, "A good prince, though above the laws, will make his actions conformable to them, and thus ſet an example to his people, whilſt he himſelf is not amenable nor ſubject to the laws." Convinced that the royal authority hath no bounds even in England, he found, with indignation, that bounds were preſcribed to it. At laſt he diſſolved the parliament, but did not by that means weaken the new ſyſtem. Theſe agitations ſeemed to announce thoſe violent ſtorms, which, in the reign of his ſucceſſor overwhelmed the throne.

A. D. 1611. The eyes of all Europe were now fixed upon Henry IV. of France, who, by his experience and good ſenſe, was become one of the greateſt politicians, as well as generals, of the age. That prince ſaw, that while the houſe of Auſtria, through its widely extended branches, was always ready to embrace every opportunity of aggrandizing itſelf, France had every thing to fear from its ambition; and he had formed a noble plan for humbling that ambitious family. But all his great deſigns were blaſted in a moment by the poniard of the fanatical Ravaillac. That infamous miſcreant had for ſome time followed the king in his incurſions, in queſt of an opportunity of perpetrating his horrid purpoſe. That very morning he intended to ſtab him at the Feuillans, where he went to hear maſs; but was prevented by the interpoſition of the duke de Vendome. After dinner the king appeared extremely uneaſy, and leaning his head upon his hand, was heard to ſay, "My God! what is this that will not ſuffer me to be at quiet? About four in the afternoon he went into his own coach with the duke d'Epernon, and ſeveral other noblemen. In paſſing through the ſtreet de la Roquelaer, which is very narrow, a ſtop was made by two loaded carts: the king had ſent away his guards, and ordered the coach to be opened, that he might ſee the preparations that were making for the queen's entry; all the pages were gone round another way, except two, one of whom went before to clear the ſtreet, while the other ſtept behind to tie his garter. Ravaillac, who had followed the carriage, took this opportunity to perpetrate his horrid purpoſe. He mounted on the coach-wheel, and, with a long knife, ſharp on both ſides. ſtruck the king over the ſhoulder of the duke d'Epernon. Henry exclaimed, "I am wounded!" The aſſaſſin repeated the blow with greater violence, and the knife, penetrating the thorax, divided the vena cava, ſo that the king expired immediately. Ravaillac was not perceived by any perſon while he perpetrated this atrocious murder; ſo that had he thrown the knife under the coach, he might have eſcaped unnoticed: but he ſtood upon the wheel fixed like a ſtatue, with the bloody knife in his hand. A gentleman coming up, would have put him to death immediately, but the duke d'Epernon called aloud, "Save him on your life!" and the miſcreant was taken alive. On his examination he boldly confeſſed he perpetrated the murder, becauſe the king would not take up arms againſt the Hugonots, and that his making war againſt the pope was nothing leſs than making war againſt God; "becauſe the pope was God, and God was the pope." The fanatical villain ſoon after ſuffered for his treachery all the torments a human being is capable of ſupporting. This dreadful aſſaſſination put the finiſhing ſtroke to the honours of fanaticiſm. The catholic religion appeared more odious than ever, though there were fanatics alſo among the reformers.

The diſcovery of the principle on which this regicide had been committed, gave James great uneaſineſs; and as the Jeſuits were univerſally believed to have been the authors of it, James thought it abſolutely neceſſary to remove from his perſon, men who held ſo deteſtible a doctrine. A proclamation was accordingly iſſued commanding all Jeſuits and prieſts of the Romiſh perſuaſion to depart the kingdom immediately, and all recuſants not to come within ten miles of the court. At the ſame time the juſtices of the peace in every county were ordered to adminiſter the oath of allegiance to all catholics. But theſe precautions did not divert James from exerting himſelf to improve the navigation and commerce of the kingdom. He encouraged diſcoveries of every kind that had a tendence to promote the happineſs of his people. He erected large ſtorehouſes for the benefit of victualling his ſhips and ſupplying them with military ſtores, and carried naval architecture to a much greater degree of perfection than it ever before had reached in England. His care for promoting the intereſt of the Eaſt-India company, ought alſo to be mentioned with honour. That company, which had been incorporated by queen Elizabeth, had hitherto ſubſiſted under great diſadvantages, from the difficulty and length of their voyages, and the barbarous diſpoſition of the inhabitants of the countries they had diſcovered; but the large returns of a fortunate voyage, induced them to apply to the king for an enlargement of their charter, by which they propoſed to increaſe the trade, the ſhipping, the ſtrength, and the wealth of the kingdom, and to deprive the Turks and Perſians of the commerce of the Eaſt-Indies. James entered into all theſe conſiderations with an attention becoming the father of his people; he granted them a perpetual charter, enlarged their patent, and formed them into a body corporate and politic. He alſo prohibited the importation of pepper by any other traders, and fixed the retail price of that commodity. Theſe privileges tended greatly to increaſe the ſtrength and opulence of the company; much larger ſhips, and more in number, were ſent annually to India than before.

James was, however, much better fitted to ſhine in a college than on a throne. He made light of politics, while controverſy excited all his zeal. The famous preacher Arminius, of Amſterdam, had been choſen profeſſor of divinity at Leyden, and had been accuſed by the Calviniſts with teaching abſurd doctrines concerning free-will and predeſtination. Before his death, which happened in 1608, his party remained maſters of the field of diſputation, and his chair was now filled by Vorſtius, who had publiſhed ſeveral treaties in defence of the Arminian principles. James oppoſed the doctrine of Arminius, and conſidered Vorſtius as a dangerous rival in ſcholaſtic reputation. The royal diſputant, therefore, attacked the profeſſor with all the rage of arrogance and preſumption. Fearful of the conſequences that might enſue from this ſcholaſtic warfare, the ſtates thought proper to deprive Vorſtius of the chair he had filled with ſo much reputation. The king was appeaſed by this mark of condeſcenſion in the ſtates, though he very charitably hinted to them, "That as to the burning of Vorſtius for his blaſphemies and atheiſm, he left it entirely to their own chriſtian wiſdom; but ſurely never heretic better deſerved the flames." The ſtates, however, had too much ſenſe and humanity to underſtand his majeſty's meaning; they even procured a chair for the ejected profeſſor in another univerſity. But theſe diſputes did not terminate ſo fortunately; the verticious penſioner Barnevelt, one of the greateſt men the republic ever ſaw, and who juſtly deſerved the name of father of his country, fell a victim to the fanatical enthuſiaſm of the oppoſite party. The learned and illuſtrious Gratius was alſo committed to priſon, for defending Barnevelt.

But amidſt theſe theological diſputes, in which James was engaged, he forgot not a project he had formed in favour of humanity, and which did him more real honour than all his ſcholaſtic divinity. This was the civilizing of the Iriſh, and making them acquainted with the happineſs that attends a well-regulated ſociety. During the ſpace of four hundred and forty years that Ireland had been ſubjected to England, the inhabitants of that iſland retained their ancient manners, which had no other tendency than that of keeping the people for ever in a ſtate of barbariſm and diſorder. Involved in ſtupid ignorance, they were a wretched prey to the tyranny of their conquerors. The cuſtom of the Iriſh, like that of other barbarians who formerly over-ran Europe, was to puniſh the greateſt crimes by fines only. Murder itſelf was atoned for in this manner; and every perſon, according to his rank, had a certain rate or value affixed to him: this rate was called his Eric. When Fermanagh was formed into a county, the viceroy of Ireland told Maguire, that he ſhould ſend him a ſheriff or provoſt. "Your ſheriff (ſaid the Iriſhman) ſhall be well received; but tell me beforehand his eric, that if my people kill him, I may be able to levy the money upon the county." James aboliſhed this, and many other barbarous cuſtoms, ſecured and determined their property, defended the people from the oppreſſions of the nobility, puniſhed all crimes with ſeverity, introduced agriculture into that fruitful but uncultivated country, maintained a ſufficient number of troops to keep good order among the people, aboliſhed their prejudices, and enlightened their underſtandings with the rays of learning. In a word, after proceeding regularly, during the courſe of a few years, he came, at length, to govern, by juſtice and the laws, a people who appeared incapable of acknowledging them. He frequently boaſted of the management of Ireland as his maſter-piece; and it will appear, upon the neceſſary inquiry, that his vanity in this particular was not altogether without foundation: it doubtleſs forms the moſt glorious monument of his reign.

About the ſame time, James gave an agreeable ſpecimen of his impartiality, in the execution of Robert Creighton, lord Sanquhar, who had baſely aſſaſſinated one Turner, his fencing-maſter. In vain was all the intereſt made by ſeveral of the nobility in his favour. The king obſerving how much the Engliſh were provoked at his attachment to his countrymen, liſtened not to the interceſſions that were made to ſave him: he prudently ſuffered the law to take its courſe, and Sanquhar fell a victim to his crime.

A. D. 1612. Henry, prince of Wales, the object of national affection, paid the debt of nature on the ſixth of November, in the ſeventeenth year of his age. He was a youth of very promiſing talents, and of an amiable character. He ſpent his time in ſtudies becoming a prince, and exerciſed himſelf in the moſt manly diverſions. He poſſeſſed the advantage of a fine perſon, and there was a martial turn in his diſpoſition which could not fail of being very agreeable to a warlike people. His death diffuſed an univerſal grief through the nation, and his tomb was watered with the tears of the Engliſh.

Nor was this the only loſs that James ſuſtained in the courſe of this year: his principal counſellor, the earl of Saliſbury, died on the fourteenth of May. His death was a great misfortune to James, who was thereby deprived of a very able miniſter, and one perfectly acquainted with the conſtitution and genius of the Engliſh. He was a perſon of great parts, honour and fidelity; a lover and encourager of virtue and learning in others.

A. D. 1613. On the fourteenth of February, the marriage of the princeſs Elizabeth with the elector Palatine was celebrated with great rejoicings. No expence was ſpared to render the entertainments on this occaſion as magnificent as poſſible. The nation were very much pleaſed with this match, as it promiſed the greateſt advantages to the proteſtant intereſt in Europe. But theſe hopes were, in the end, rendered abortive, and the marriage proved a ſource of diſcontent between James and his parliament.

The king, during his whole reign in Scotland, was hardly ever without a favourite; and both the Engliſh and Scots had, ever ſince his acceſſion, laboured inceſſantly to ſupply this defect in England; but, for ſome time, their attempts were rendered abortive. At laſt the lord Hay introduced Robert Carre, a Scottiſh gentleman deſcended from an ancient family, and who had formerly been a page of honour to the king in Scotland. Hay, without mentioning him at court, aſſigned him the office, at a match of tilting, of preſenting to the king his buckler and device. When Carre was advancing to execute his office, the unruly horſe, on which he was mounted, flung him, and broke his leg in the king's preſence. James approached him with pity and concern, ordered him to be carried to the palace, and to be attended with the utmoſt care. Carre was then about twenty years of age, of an eaſy air and graceful demeanour, extremely ambitious, and profoundly ignorant. James paid him a viſit as ſoon as the tilting was over, and Carre ſoon became the favourite of the monarch. Honours and eſtates were heaped upon him, and he was the channel through which the royal favours flowed to others. He was, however, ſenſible of his own ignorance and want of experience; but found a faithful friend and judicious counſellor in Sir Thomas Overbury, who endeavoured to inſtil into him the principles of prudence and diſcretion. By following the friendly admonitions of that great man, Carre enjoyed at once the higheſt favour of the prince, and the good wiſhes of the people. James, not content with knighting his favourite, created him viſcount Rocheſter, and inveſted him with the honour of the garter.

James, at his firſt mounting the Engliſh throne, ſhewed the greateſt favour to the families of Howard and Devereux: he reſtored young Eſſex to his blood and dignity, and conferred the titles of Suffolk and Northampton on two brothers of the houſe of Norfolk. He alſo married young Eſſex to the lady Frances Howard, ſecond daughter to the earl of Suffolk: but as ſhe was only in her thirteenth, and he in his fourteenth year, they were thought too young to cohabit together; and it was reſolved that the earl ſhould paſs ſome time in the Low Countries, where he enjoyed an opportunity of completing himſelf in the art of war. Upon his return, he found his counteſs the moſt celebrated beauty of the age, while he himſelf was conſidered as one of the moſt promiſing young noblemen in Europe; but he was ignorant that lord Rocheſter, the favourite, was his rival in the heart of his lovely bride. Preſuming on his great intereſt with the king, Rocheſter made profeſſions of love to the young counteſs, and was too ſucceſsful in his addreſſes; but the return of Eſſex interrupted the enjoyment of their guilty pleaſures. Eſſex claimed the privileges of a huſband, but met with an abſolute denial. Alarmed at this ſtrange behaviour, and ignorant of the cauſe, the young nobleman, for ſome time, exerted all his endeavours to gain her favour; but finding his attempts in vain, he determined to give himſelf no farther trouble, but leave her to purſue her own inclinations.

Had the counteſs been ſatisfied with being the miſtreſs of Rocheſter, all the misfortunes that afterwards attended both herſelf and the favourite, might, poſſibly, have been avoided; but loſt to all ſenſe of ſhame, ſhe aſpired to be his wife; and accordingly prevailed upon her lover to uſe his influence with the king, in order to procure for her a divorce from Eſſex. Rocheſter imparted this ſcheme to Sir Thomas Overbury, his faithful counſellor; who, alarmed at the propoſal, uſed every argument in his power to divert his friend from ſo fooliſh and baſe an attempt. The warmth of his honeſt expoſtulations carried him ſo far, that he threatened Rocheſter with the loſs of his correſpondence and friendſhip, if he could ſo far forget his honour and intereſt, as to proſecute his intended marriage with a woman of ſuch abandoned principles. Rocheſter had the weakneſs to impart this converſation to the counteſs, who inſtantly vowed the ſevereſt revenge againſt this bold arraigner of her honour and conduct. The favourite himſelf was alſo ſo infatuated by her charms, that he joined with her in reſolving the ruin of Overbury. He accordingly repaired to court; and after extolling, in the higheſt manner, the great abilities of Overbury, inſinuated, that he was lately grown ſo inſupportably inſolent, that he could wiſh he was removed, by ſome honourable employment, to a greater diſtance from the ſeat of power. Far from ſuſpecting the cauſe of the favourite's application, James appointed Overbury his ambaſſador to a foreign court. On receiving notice of the honour conferred upon him, he conſulted with Rocheſter how he ought to proceed, as he conſidered his appointment as nothing more than an honourable baniſhment. The inſidious favourite, under pretence of not being able to ſupport his abſence, perſuaded him to reject the offer. Overbury followed his advice; but the favourite repairing immediately to court, repreſented the refuſal of Overbury as the higheſt inſolence. James, who could not bear the ſlighteſt contempt of his authority, ſent the unhappy Overbury to the Tower.

The troubleſome counſellor being thus removed from the ſcene of action, the divorce was ſollicited with ſuch ſucceſs, that the ſentence was ſoon pronounced; and the king not only gave his favourite leave to marry the counteſs, but alſo created him earl of Somerſet, that her ſecond huſband might not be inferior in dignity to her firſt. The nuptials were ſolemnized in the moſt magnificent manner; and nothing now was wanting to complete their triumph but the death of Overbury, without which that implacable woman could not be ſatisfied. She uſed every art to effect her bloody purpoſe; and at laſt prevailed, both on her huſband and the earl of Northampton, her uncle, to engage in the atrocious deſign of taking him off by poiſon. Several attempts were accordingly made for this purpoſe, but the ſtrength of Overbury's conſtitution as often rendered them abortive. At laſt nature gave way to repeated attacks, and he died in the Tower on the ſixteenth of September, by a poiſoned clyſter. He was buried with the utmoſt diſpatch and ſecrecy; and tho' this precipitate interment cauſed a ſtrong ſuſpicion in the public, the horrid action was not diſcovered till ſome years after.

A. D. 1614. Without œconomy, and laviſh to his favourites, the reſources of James were ill proportioned to his wants. After ſelling baronets' titles to the amount of two hundred thouſand pounds, and employing thoſe ſad expedients, the effect of which degrades more than it multiplies nobility, he found himſelf obliged to call a parliament. The commons, ſtill animated with the ſame ſpirit againſt the prerogative, determined to make an attempt for preſcribing it within proper bouuds. The office of a member of the houſe of commons, once regarded as a burden, was now, from the authority it aſſumed, become an object of emulation. The miniſtry had exerted their utmoſt efforts to procure a majority; but the meaſures of the court were ſo diſagreeable to the nation in general, that all their endeavours proved ineffectual; and inſtead of granting a ſupply, as deſired by the king, they reſumed the ſubject debated in the laſt parliament; and boldly remonſtrated againſt the regal uſurpations, in levying new cuſtoms and impoſitions by the ſole authority of the prerogative. Nor did they think their remonſtrances ſufficient: they applied to the lords for a conference, in order to concert meaſures to prevent, if poſſible, the ſame practice for the future; and ſecure the liberty of the ſubject, by circumſcribing the unlimited power of the crown. Informed of their intention, and determined to render the deſign abortive, James diſſolved the parliament, after a ſeſſion of about two months, in which not one ſtatute was enacted, nor any ſupply granted. The only reſult of their meeting was an increaſe of jealouſy between the prince and the people. In the ſpace of ſix hundred years, there are only three inſtances of the parliament's refuſing an aid to the crown. The commons ſeemed determined to provoke the indignation of the king: and James carried his reſentment ſo far, that he impriſoned ſome of the members who had been the leaders in this oppoſition; a ſtep which expoſed him ſtill farther to the hatred of the nation.

A. D. 1615. Deprived of the advantage of Overbury's bury's counſel, the earl of Somerſet found himſelf greatly embarraſſed in the management of public affairs. His ſmall experience rendered every thing difficult; he became odious to the court; and tho' the king's partiality continued, his inſolence and weakneſs gave his enemies ſo many advantages, that it was evident he muſt ſoon be removed. The queen herſelf was inſulted by this favourite minion, and joined the party formed againſt him. After many conſultations on the beſt method of effecting the ruin of Somerſet, it was agreed to give the king a new favourite. The ſcheme ſucceeded; and George Villiers, a young man remarkable for his beauty and effeminacy, was the object choſen for this purpoſe. James firſt beheld this gaudy object at a comedy acted at Cambridge, where he was conſpicuouſly placed, and immediately engaged the attention of the king. Villiers was conducted to court, and ſoon weakened the influence of the favourite. He was immediately knighted, and made a gentleman of the bedchamber, with the yearly penſion of a thouſand crowns.

Somerſet ſaw his fall was approaching, and exerted all his influence to avert it. But his efforts were in vain: the diſcovery of Overbury's murder reduced him to the level from which he had been raiſed by the hand of folly. The apothecary's boy, who had been employed in adminiſtering the poiſoned clyſter, revealed the whole ſecret to Winwood, ſecretary of ſtate. The evidence of the boy was confirmed by the information of the counteſs of Shrewſbury, then a priſoner in the Tower. That lady had found means to inſinuate herſelf into the confidence of Sir Jarvaiſe Elwis, lieutenant of the Tower; and being of an intriguing diſpoſition, ſhe drew the ſecret from him. James was ſoon informed of the atrocious deed; and the lieutenant being queſtioned, could not help betraying, by his countenance, the guilt that rankled at his heart. He confeſſed all he knew, and it was now determined to proſecute all the actors in this deteſtable tragedy. Accordingly Weſton, who had given Overbury the poiſon in tarts and jellies, and at laſt in a clyſter; Mrs. Turner, chief confident of the counteſs of Somerſet; Franklin, the apothecary, who had prepared the poiſon; and Sir Jarvaiſe Elwis, lieutenant of the Tower, were ordered to be apprehended. All theſe, together with Somerſet and his counteſs, were convicted of the atrocious fact, on the fulleſt evidence. Somerſet and his counteſs only were pardoned; the reſt ſuffered the puniſhment due to their crimes. After ſome years impriſonment, James ſet them at liberty, and conferred on them a ſmall penſion, on which they lived retired in the country, and languiſhed out old age in infamy and obſcurity.

The fortune of Villiers, in the mean time, grew with amazing rapidity. He was created duke of Buckingham, lord high-admiral of England, conſtable of Windſor, and, in a few years, loaded with thoſe honours and favours that might have rewarded the merit of many illuſtrious men. His family alſo was advanced to opulence. But this ſtrange and unworthy profuſion increaſed the king's neceſſities, and obliged him to raiſe money by very obnoxious means. He reſtored to the Dutch the three important fortreſſes of Fluſhing, the Brille, and Rammakins, for three hundred thouſand pounds. Theſe places had been put into the hands of Elizabeth by the ſtates of the United Provinces, as ſecurities for the ſum of eight hundred and eighteen thouſand four hundred and eight pounds, which that princeſs had advanced during their war with Spain. The neceſſities of James obliged him to accept the ſmall ſum above-mentioned, and the places were accordingly delivered up on the fourteenth of June. From this period we may date the full liberty of the Dutch republic.

But the money was ſoon diſſipated, without the poſſibility of knowing how: none of the king's debts were paid; the navy was not repaired, nor had any money been ſent to the army in Ireland, though their wants formed the chief pretence for treating with the ſtates. At length it was diſcovered, that the lord treaſurer Suffolk had converted the greater part of the money received from Holland to his own uſe. As he was father-in-law to Somerſet, and conſequently no friend to Villiers the favourite, this opportunity to ruin him was readily embraced. The lord-treaſurer was accuſed in the ſtar-chamber, of ſeveral miſdemeanors in the execution of his office, and particularly with having ſecreted large ſums received from the Dutch. Sir Edward Coke, who carried on the proſecution againſt him for the crown, aggravated his miſdemeanors, his extortions, his miſmanagement of the king's treaſure, his boldneſs in applying it to his own uſe, the corruptions and artifices of his deputy Bingley, to abuſe the confidence of ſuch as had any buſineſs with his maſter. He produced ſeveral precedents of treaſurers who had been puniſhed for much ſlighter crimes than thoſe of the earl of Suffolk, and diſplayed the dangerous conſequences that muſt reſult from the corrupt adminiſtration of the public money. Had Suffolk thrown himſelf upon the mercy of the king, he would have been acquitted; but he endeavoured to invalidate the evidence brought againſt him, and juſtify his conduct againſt the malignant accuſations of his enemies. He failed in the attempt; and his judges pronounced him guilty He was fined thirty thouſand pounds, and condemned to impriſonment during the king's pleaſure. Nor did his deputy Bingley eſcape: he was ſeverely reprimanded, and fined two thouſand pounds.

Villiers now wholly engroſſed the royal favour; the friends of Somerſet were no longer capable of giving him any diſturbance. He accordingly began to exert his influence by filling all the places about the court with his own creatures. The lord chief-juſtice Coke was deprived of his office, on pretence of ſome trifling miſdemeanors: but the real cauſe of his diſgrace was his oppoſing the king in beſtowing a vacant biſhopric in commendam. His place was filled by Montague; and Bacon, on the death of Elleſmere, was appointed lord chancellor.

A. D. 1617. James, inſtigated both by political and religious motives, was very deſirous of eſtabliſhing in Scotland the worſhip and tenets of the church of England, ſo favourable to the authority of the crown; for at this time no people in the world were leſs ſubmiſſive to that authority than the Scots. The highlanders, divided into ſeven clans, or tribes, formed, as it were, a diſtinct nation, equally untractable and barbarous. The inhabitants of the Lowlands, where the feudal government ſtill ſubſiſted, were ſtrongly attached to their chiefs and their tribes, in whom they placed their greateſt confidence, and very little in their king, with whoſe weakneſs they had been acquainted. The kingdom was torn in pieces by internal diviſions, which had only been from time to time ſuſpended by their natural hatred of the Engliſh; and what was ſtill worſe, fanaticiſm raged in all its horrors. The authority of the biſhops ſcarce ſubſiſted; the puritan preachers, aſſuming to themſelves a character little inferior to that of the prophets or apoſtles, diſdaining all ſubmiſſion to the ſpiritual rulers of the church, by whom their innovations were ſtrongly oppoſed. The prelates and abbots, however, ſtill maintained their ſeats in parliament, and the church was ſtill ſuppoſed to be repreſented by thoſe ſpiritual lords, in the ſtates of the kingdom. But their vaſt revenues, in which their real power conſiſted, were no more; the greater part had been ſeized by the more powerful barons, and what remained, after many delapidations, was, by act of parliament, veſted in the crown. James, when only king of Scotland, had yielded, much againſt his inclinations, to the aſcendency of the enthuſiaſts. When he came to the crown of England, he was more capable of making them feel the weight of regal power, and had gained conſiderable advantages over them by virtue of his right of ſupremacy. He was now reſolved to viſit his native country, in order to carry into immediate execution the plan he had formed for extending the epiſcopal power, and eſtabliſhing the ſuperiority of the civil government over the juriſdiction of the clergy. Had he proceeded gradually, and concealed his real intention, he might, in all probability, have ſucceeded; but he puſhed his deſign with too much violence, and by attempting to introduce ſome ceremonies uſed in the church of England, rendered the whole ſufficiently apparent, and in the end abortive. The fire of devotion, excited by novelty, and inflamed by oppoſition, ſo poſſeſſed the minds of the Scottiſh reformers, that all rights and ornaments were rejected with diſdain, as uſeleſs burthens; retarding the imagination in its rapturous extacies, and cramping the divine ſpirit by which they ſuppoſed themſelves to be animated. Hence the enlivening intercourſes of ſociety, every ſweet or chearful amuſement, calculated to ſoften or humanize the character, were baniſhed from the kingdom. A gloomy and ſullen diſpoſition, the natural conſequence of fanaticiſm, eſtabliſhed itſelf among the people. James was, therefore, deſirous of infuſing a ſmall tincture of ceremony into the national worſhip, and of introducing ſuch rites as might, in ſome degree, occupy the mind, and pleaſe the ſenſes, without departing too far from that ſimplicity by which the reformation was diſtinguiſhed. He accordingly cauſed ſeveral of the churches to be adorned; an organ was erected in the king's chapel; and ſome attempts made to introduce the fine arts among a people then rude and ferocious. But every innovation from their mode of worſhip, was looked upon with horror and deteſtation. Every ſtep towards introducing ceremonies into the churches was conſidered as an approximation towards that ſpiritual whore ſo much the object of their execrations.

James had ſummoned a general aſſembly of the clergy to meet him at Aberdeen before the death of Elizabeth, but the demiſe of that princeſs rendering it neceſſary for him to repair to England, he prorogued it to the following year. Thoſe who diſavowed his eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy, regarded not his prohibition, but met at the time appointed. The king was exaſperated at this contempt of his authority, and committed them all to priſon. Such as thought proper to ſubmit were pardoned; but the reſt brought to their trial, and condemned for high-treaſon. None of them, however, were executed; but ſix of the moſt refractory were baniſhed the kingdom. This ſevere proceeding had intimidated the clergy, ſo that James met with much leſs reſiſtance in his attempt. But all his power and all his influence were exerted in vain: the Scottiſh miniſters refuſed to introduce the ceremonies he had recommended, and the deſign of the king was conſidered by the vulgar, as an attempt to baniſh the Chriſtian religion out of Scotland.

Nor was James more fortunate in gaining the affections of the puritanical ſect in England. Deſirous of ſoftening that gloomy diſpoſition which was every day gaining ground in the kingdom, he publiſhed a proclamation for allowing and encouraging, after divine ſervice, all kinds of lawful games and exerciſes, that the minds of the people might be exhilirated, and detached from that melancholy horror which was at once injurious to the health of the body, and deſtructive of the enlivening intercourſes of ſociety.

A. D. 1618. The famous Sir Walter Raleigh, during his impriſonment of thirteen years in the Tower, had applied himſelf cloſely to ſtudy, and acquired ſo great a reputation for learning, that all his faults were forgotten. He was now as much lamented, as he had been before hated by the people. That great genius, that renowned warrior, educated amidſt naval and military enterprizes, treated with ſo much rigour, was conſidered as a valuable citizen, who ought to be reſtored to the ſtate. The favourable diſpoſitions of the public increaſing at once his deſire and hopes of liberty, he expected to obtain it by publiſhing, that in the reign of queen Elizabeth he had diſcovered a gold mine of immenſe value in Guiana. James, though he placed little confidence in this report, yet thinking Raleigh had already ſuffered ſufficient puniſhment, releaſed him from priſon, and gave him the command of thoſe adventurers, whom the deſire of ſharing in the pretended mine, had inſpired with a deſire of ſharing his fortunes; but abſolutely refuſed to grant him a pardon, though it ſeemed a natural conſequence, when he was entruſted with power and command.

As ſoon as his fleet, which conſiſted of twelve ſhips, was ready, he ſailed from Plymouth, and ſteered directly for Guiana in America. On his arrival he found the Spaniards had formed a ſettlement on the river Oronoko, built a ſmall town called St. Thomas, and were working ſome gold mines of ſmall value in the neighbourhood. Raleigh entered the mouth of the river with his whole fleet, but did not think it prudent to purſue his deſign againſt the rapid current of the river with his largeſt ſhips. He therefore detached five of his ſmalleſt veſſels under the command of his ſon and captain Keymis, who was ſaid to have diſcovered the mine in queſtion, during his former voyage with Sir Walter to that country, with orders to ſail up the Oronoko, as far as poſſible, in order to find the mountain in the bowels of which the mine was ſituated. But not being able to purſue their courſe, they landed near St. Thomas, where they were fired upon by the Spaniards. Young Raleigh, to encourage his men, called out, "that this was the true mine, and none but fools looked for any other;" and advancing upon the Spaniards, received a ſhot of which he immediately expired. Keymis and his companions were not diſmayed, they carried on the attack with the utmoſt vigour, and ſoon made themſelves maſters of the place. They found not, however, the riches they expected: the Spaniards were poor, and the produce of the mines inconſiderable. Keymis was now requeſted to lead them to the mine he had before diſcovered, but abſolutely refuſed; and the Engliſh, after burning the town, returned to the reſt of the fleet at the mouth of the river. Raleigh, finding himſelf diſappointed in the promiſes of Keymis, threatened him with the king's diſpleaſure, which that officer prevented by retiring to his cabbin, and putting an end to his own life.

It was now ſuſpected by Raleigh's companions, that they had been deceived by their leader; that he had never any aſſurance of their being any ſuch mine he pretended to be in ſearch of; that he had always intended to plunder St. Thomas; and, after encouraging his ſoldiers with the ſpoil of that place, to have proceeded to invade the other Spaniſh ſettlements; hoping by ſuch daring enterprizes to repair the ruins of his ſhattered fortune, and flattering himſelf with being able to purchaſe, by his wealth, the pardon he had before ſollicited in vain. They therefore abſolutely refuſed to make any farther attempts on the Spaniſh ſettlements, and obliged him to return to Plymouth, where he was arreſted by his majeſty's order, and conveyed to the Tower.

During the abſence of Raleigh, the Spaniſh ambaſſador had made loud complaints at the court of London, of the depredations committed by the Engliſh under that intrepid commander; and a reſolution was taken to carry the former ſentence paſſed againſt him into execution. The king accordingly liſtened to the advice of his council, and ſigned the warrant for his execution. Raleigh now called forth all the force of his mind, and met death with the greateſt intrepidity. When he came upon the ſcaffold he touched the edge of the executioner's axe, and ſaid, "This is a ſharp but ſure remedy for all ills." His ſpeech to the people was calm and eloquent, in which he endeavoured to exculpate himſelf from the crimes laid to his charge, and load his enemies with the public hatred. Having finiſhed his harangue, he, with the utmoſt indifference, laid his head upon the block, and received the fatal blow.

His fate was regretted by the whole body of the nobility; and the Engliſh patriots beheld the fate of Raleigh with ſilent indignation. The public clamour againſt the puſillanimous adminiſtration of James was, by this event, greatly increaſed. It was thought an inſtance of cruelty and injuſtice to execute a ſentence, which had been ſo long ſuſpended, and tacitly pardoned, by conferring on him a new truſt and commiſſion; eſpecially as he was then the only man in England who enjoyed a high reputation for valour and military experience.

James had formed the moſt ridiculous notion, that it was unworthy a prince of Wales to marry any but the daughter of a king. Gondomar, the Spaniſh ambaſſador in England, in order to open a negotiation with the Engliſh monarch, dropped ſome hints that the infanta Maria, would not be refuſed if demanded for the king's ſon; and in order to render the temptation irreſiſtible to the neceſſitous monarch, he gave the greateſt hopes that an immenſe dowry would be given with that princeſs. The hopes of accompliſhing ſo advantageous a treaty induced the king to embrace the propoſal with the greateſt avidity: and, after many formalities and ſcruples had been diſcuſſed by the Spaniſh council, certain articles were tranſmitted by lord Digby, the Engliſh ambaſſador at Madrid, for his approbation. They were in ſubſtance as follows;

"That the pope's diſpenſation ſhould be obtained by the ſole act of the Spaniſh monarch.

"That the children of this marriage ſhould not be conſtrained in matters of religion, nor their titles prejudiced in caſe they embraced the doctrines of Rome.

"That the infanta's family, being ſtrangers, may be catholics, and ſhall have a decent place appointed for celebrating divine ſervice according to the church of Rome; and the eccleſiaſtics and religious perſons enjoy the liberty of wearing their religious habits.

"That the marriage ſhould be celebrated in Spain by a procurator, according to the inſtructions of the council of Trent; and after the infanta's arrival in England, ſuch ſolemnization ſhould be uſed as may render the marriage valid according to the laws of that kingdom.

"That the princeſs ſhould have a competent number of chaplains, and a confeſſor, being ſtrangers, one of whom ſhould have power to govern her family in religious matters."

Though theſe articles excited the clamour of the nation, yet, if we except that part which permits the religious and eccleſiaſtics to wear their proper habits, they differ very little from thoſe afterwards agreed upon by the ſame prince and a princeſs of France, and which were approved of by the Engliſh parliament. Gondomar had, however, no authority to conclude the marriage on theſe terms. The whole intention of the Spaniſh court ſeems to have been only to amuſe the king in order to prevent his ſending a powerful aſſiſtance to the proteſtants in Germany.

Notions of liberty never prevailed more ſtrongly in Europe than at this period; even Hungary, Bohemia, and Auſtria, were as jealous of their rights as the Engliſh themſelves. The ſpirit of independence had taken root in Germany ever ſince the reign of Charles V. The example of the inhabitants of the United Provinces was always preſent with theſe people, who pretended to the ſame privileges, and thought themſelves in a better condition to demand them, than even the Hollanders themſelves. The emperor Matthias having procured his couſin Ferdinand of Auſtria, to be elected nominal king of Hungary and Bohemia, and obliged the other archdukes to yield him up Auſtria, the inhabitants of theſe three ſtates joined in complaining, that ſufficient regard had not been ſhewn to their privileges; religion alſo made a part of the grievance of the Bohemians, who ſoon became furious.

In the midſt of theſe confuſions, Matthias paid the debt of nature, and Ferdinand of Auſtria was placed on the imperial throne. This new dignity, however, made no impreſſion upon the proteſtants of Bohemia, whoſe power was now conſiderable. They inſiſted on having liberty to rebuild the churches which had been thrown down by the catholics; upon which the council of ſtate iſſued a declaration againſt the proteſtants, peremptorily refuſing to grant their requeſt. Exaſperated at this denial, they repaired to the palace, and threw three of the emperor's officers out of the window. This outrage expoſed them to the fury of Ferdinand. They knew they had nothing to expect from his clemency, and therefore determined either to ſucceed in an attempt to recover their liberties, or periſh in the glorious cauſe. They conſidered themſelves as entitled to depoſe a king they had not elected, and actually made a tender of their crown to the Elector Palatine, ſon-in-law to the king of England. Frederick accepted the offer, and was actually elected king of Bohemia. James complained of this proceeding in the electors, as diſloyal, imprudent, and diſhonourable. He could by no means approve of the maxims of elective governments, and was perſuaded that Ferdinand, by a kind of preſcriptive right, had acquired a lawful title to Bohemia. He accuſed his ſon-in-law of forcing him either to deſert his cauſe, or break off his negotiation with Spain. He alſo complained of his duplicity, in having deſired his advice with regard to his accepting the crown of Bohemia, and actually received it before the meſſenger could arrive at London. The popularity of Frederick's cauſe was, notwithſtanding theſe reproaches, ſo great in England, that James found himſelf under a kind of neceſſity of doing ſomething in his favour. He could not, however, be prevailed upon to give his ſon-in-law the title of king of Bohemia; and iſſued orders, forbidding the clergy to pray for him in the churches under that appellation.

A. D. 1619. The new emperor, Ferdinand II. who poſſeſſed greater abilities than generally fell to the ſhare of the Auſtrian princes, prepared himſelf, with great diligence, for the recovery of his authority. Beſides the aſſiſtance of his ſubjects who adhered to the catholic religion, he attached to his intereſt a powerful combination of the neighbouring potentates; all the catholic princes of the empire declared in his favour; even the elector of Saxony, the moſt powerful among the proteſtants, and the king of Poland, eſpouſed his cauſe. The Spaniſh monarch, who conſidered his own intereſt as inſeparably connected with the younger branch of his family, ſent him powerful ſuccours from Italy, and from the Low Countries, and alſo furniſhed large ſums of money for the ſupport of Ferdinand and the catholic religion. Gondomar was alſo ordered to continue the deluſive negotiation, in order to prevent James from aſſiſting his ſon-in-law. That artful miniſter, by his inſinuating manners, and a large ſum of money judiciouſly diſtributed, ſoon gained the aſcendency over the king, the favourite, and the miniſtry; ſo that, in effect, he governed the whole kingdom. James, who, above all things, dreaded the breaking off a match on which his affections were ſo warmly fixed, and, at the ſame time, deſirous of acquiring the title of The Pacific King, inſtead of taking any vigorous meaſures to ſupport his ſon-in-law, had again recourſe to his ruinous method of negotiation. He ſent the lord Doncaſter to mediate a peace in the empire; but Ferdinand would ſcarce favour him with an audience, and the embaſſy immediately became abortive.

A. D. 1620. The affairs of Germany now haſtened to a criſis. Ferdinand having collected a powerful army, under the command of the duke of Bavaria and the count de Bucquoy, marched againſt Frederick in Bohemia. At the ſame time, Spinola aſſembled an army of thirty thouſand veterans in the Low Countries; and when Edmonds, James's reſident at Bruſſels, demanded of the archduke Albert the meaning of thoſe large preparations, he was told, that Spinola had received his orders immediately from Madrid; and that the king of Spain alone knew the purpoſe for which the forces were intended. In the mean time, the Elector Palatine was put under the ban of the empire, and the execution of it committed to the elector of Saxony, who immediately entered and ſubdued Luſatia. The war now raged with great fury in the bowels of Germany; and James, unable any longer to reſiſt the ſollicitations of his ſubjects, who offered to advance very large ſums to ſupport the right of the Elector Palatine to the crown of Bohemia, gave leave for Sir Horace Vere to command a ſmall body of forces for the preſervation of the Palatinate. This little army conſiſted of two thouſand two hundred men, compoſed chiefly of volunteers, and headed by the intrepid earls of Oxford and Eſſex: the company of the latter conſiſted of three hundred gentlemen, fifty of whom he paid out of his own pocket; and a kind of promiſe was extorted from James, that he would ſuffer two more regiments to be ſent after them. Thoſe brave volunteers were landed in Holland, paſſed the Rhine below Weſel, and were eſcorted to Frankfort by a body of troops under prince Frederick Henry of Naſſau. On the firſt of October, they joined the Palatine army, commanded by the Margrave of Anſpach. They arrived, however, only time enough to be the melancholy witneſſes of the deſtruction of that cauſe they came to ſupport. The duke of Bavaria having joined the imperial general in Bohemia, advanced towards Prague, in the neighbourhood of which the Elector Palatine was poſted. For ſome days, the two armies faced each other; but on the eighteenth of November, a battle was fought, which decided the fate of the Bohemian crown. The Elector Palatine was totally defeated, and fled, with his wife and family, to Holland. The inhabitants of Prague opened their gates to the Imperialiſts; and the unfortunate Frederick ſaw himſelf abandoned by all his friends and allies, except count Mansfeldt, who ſtill preſerved his fidelity. The complaints of the people againſt the timid and puſillanimous conduct of James were now both loud and alarming. It was ſaid publicly, that he had not only deprived the elector of that aſſiſtance which the Engliſh were both willing and able to afford him, but alſo had deterred other princes from eſpouſing his quarrel.

It cannot be ſuppoſed that James was unwilling to preſerve the Palatinate; but he was ſo much infatuated by the perſuaſions of Gondomar, that he believed the moſt effectual expedient for that purpoſe was the marriage of his ſon with the Infanta of Spain; and that the treaty he was negotiating for that purpoſe, would infallibly miſcarry if he took any vigorous meaſures in favour of the elector. Beſides, his averſion to war was inſuperable: he never dreamed that his peaceable diſpoſition tended only to expoſe him to contempt: he conſidered not that the Spaniſh match itſelf was attended with ſuch difficulties, that all his art of negotiation would never be able to remove, much leſs that this alliance could ſafely be depended upon as the means of procuring the great advantages he expected from it.

A. D. 1621. James ſeems, however, at laſt to have determined to purſue vigorous meaſures; and flattered himſelf with receiving large ſupplies from the parliament, which met on the twenty-firſt of January. He opened the ſeſſion with a long ſpeech from the throne, in which he explained the duties of parliaments, expatiated on his own neceſſities, and demanded ſupplies for the relief of the Palatinate, in the defence of which he declared he would hazard his crown, and the life of his own ſon, ſhould his endeavours to procure a reaſonable peace miſcarry. The commons, extremely incenſed againſt the ambitious proceedings of the houſe of Auſtria, immediately granted the king two ſubſidies, with which James was ſatisfied for the preſent. This affair being diſcuſſed, the commons received petitions againſt the increaſe of popiſh recuſants, monopolies, and projectors. The king had farmed to certain individuals the power of licenſing taverns and public houſes; and granted to Sir Giles Mompeſſon and Francis Michel an excluſive patent for the ſale of gold and ſilver lace. By virtue of this privilege, they had been guilty of ſuch ſcandalous frauds and extortion, that upon complaint being made to the upper houſe, they were ordered to be committed to priſon. Mompeſſon, however, found means to eſcape; but he was degraded from the honour of knighthood, and his eſtate confiſcated. His companion in iniquity was ſentenced to do public penance in the ſtreet, ſitting on horſeback with his face towards the tail, to pay a fine of a thouſand pounds, and to be impriſoned for life.

Perceiving with what eagerneſs the two houſes proceeded againſt theſe delinquents, James began to fear for his favourite, who had been the author of theſe monopolies. He therefore went to the houſe of peers; and in a ſpeech filled with the moſt affectionate expreſſions, aſſured the parliament, that had he known of theſe grievances, he would have puniſhed the authors with the utmoſt ſeverity: at the ſame time, cautioning the houſe not to credit every report, leſt the innocent ſhould ſuffer inſtead of the guilty. The houſe underſtood his meaning, and endeavoured not to trace the evil to its ſource.

Soon after, lord chancellor Bacon, viſcount St. Albans, was impeached by the commons: upon which the king again repaired to the houſe; and, in a ſpeech, repreſented the neceſſity of puniſhing corrupt judges; and ſollicited farther ſubſidies, as the ſupplies granted by the commons were already expended in ſubſiſting the Elector Palatine and his family, who had taken refuge in Holland. He obſerved, that large ſums would be neceſſary for defraying the expence of ſending extraordinary ambaſſadors to all the courts of Europe, as well as in maintaining an army to act with vigour, if the negotiations proved abortive: and concluded with proteſting, that he would not diſſolve the parliament till all the affairs then under conſideration ſhould be fully determined.

Bacon was a nobleman equally admired for the greatneſs of his genius, and beloved for his courteous and affable demeanor: but his want of œconomy, and his indulgence to his ſervants, had involved him in debts; and in order to ſupply his neceſſities, he had been tempted to take bribes from ſuitors in chancery. It is, however affirmed, that notwithſtanding this enormous abuſe, he ſtill maintained, in the ſeat of juſtice, an unſhaken integrity; and had given ſuch juſt and equitable decrees, that none of them were ever afterwards queſtioned or reverſed. Conſcious of his guilt, he imprecated the mercy of his judges, and endeavoured, by a general confeſſion, to avoid the ſhame of a public inquiry. But the lords were inexorable, and inſiſted on a full confeſſion of all his corrupt practices. He acknowledged twenty-eight articles, and was condemned to pay a fine of forty thouſand pounds, to be impriſoned in the Tower during his majeſty's pleaſure, to be for ever incapable of enjoying any office or employment, and of ſitting any more in parliament. This ſevere ſentence he ſurvived five years; and being ſoon after releaſed from his confinement, he retired into the country, and diſplayed ſuch abilities in literature, as have thrown a veil over his guilt, or rather his weakneſs: his genius only is admired by poſterity. He has left a ſtriking leſſon to thoſe of the human ſpecies who are born for the inſtruction of mankind, how much preferable the exerciſe of their talents is to the attractions of ambition.

In the mean time, the bold ſpirit of the commons was growing imperceptibly. Nothing eſcaped their attention and vigilance. It was in this parliament the two parties, afterwards known by the names of Whigs and Tories, were firſt formed; and of whom it may be ſaid, that if they have often threatened the government with total diſſolution, they have, notwithſtanding, been the real cauſe of its conſtant life and vigour. Under the princes of the houſe of Tudor, the great council of the nation were, in reality, nothing more than ſlaves to the court. Tho' they retained the privilege of making laws and granting the people's money, they ſuffered themſelves to be led into the moſt paſſive obedience. Without emulation, without principles, without zeal for the ſecurity of the ſubject, without ſpirit in public buſineſs, they ſeemed ignorant of the Engliſh conſtitution, as founded on Magna Charta, or at leaſt abandoned it to the abſolute power of the ſovereign. But now the ſpirit of liberty, or rather of independence, revived, and every tranſaction of government became a ſubject of diſcuſſion. The commons enquired into the ſmalleſt grievances, and examined the rights of the crown even in the minuteſt articles. They drew up a ſpirited remonſtrance, which they propoſed to preſent to his majeſty, wherein they obſerved, "That the power of the houſe of Auſtria threatened the liberties of Europe; that the progreſs of the catholic religion in England, occaſioned the moſt alarming apprehenſions, leſt it ſhould once more gain the aſcendant in the kingdom; that the king's lenity towards the profeſſors of that religion, had increaſed their arrogance and preſumption; that the uncontrouled conqueſts made by the Auſtrian family, had raiſed the expectations of the Engliſh papiſts; while the expectation of the Spaniſh match inſpired them with the moſt ſanguine hopes of procuring, if not a final eſtabliſhment, at leaſt an entire toleration of their religion." They then proceeded humbly to offer to his majeſty the following remedies againſt theſe growing evils: "That he ſhould immediately undertake the defence of the Palatinate by force of arms; that he ſhould declare war againſt Spain, whoſe arms and riches formed the chief bulwark of the catholic religion in Europe; that he would engage in no negotiations for the marriage of his ſon, but with a proteſtant princeſs; that the children of popiſh recuſants ſhould be taken from their parents, and committed to the care of proteſtant teachers and ſchoolmaſters; and that the fines and confiſcations to which the catholics were ſubject by the law, ſhould be exacted with the utmoſt rigour."

The king was at Newmarket when he heard of this unprecedented remonſtrance, and immediately wrote a letter to the ſpeaker, in which he ſharply rebuked the houſe for debating openly on matters far above their reach and capacity, and ſtrictly forbad them to meddle with any thing that regarded his government or deep matters of ſtate; and eſpecially not to touch on his ſon's marriage with a daughter of Spain, nor to attack the honour of that king, or any of his friends and confederates. In order the more to intimidate them, he mentioned the impriſonment of Sir Edwin Sandys; and though he declared that his confinement was not owing to any offence committed in the houſe, yet he plainly told them, „ that he thought himſelf juſtly entitled to puniſh every miſdemeanor in parliament, as well during its ſitting as after its diſſolution; and that he intended, for the future, to chaſtiſe every man whoſe inſolent behaviour ſhould give occaſion for offence."

This letter was ſo far from producing the effects intended by his majeſty, that it threw the houſe into a flame. They knew their own ſtrength too well to be intimidated at James's menaces. Inſtead of retracting what they had done, they entered with greater freedom than ever on the national grievances, and the dangerous ſtate of the reformed religion both at home and abroad. They formed a new remonſtrance, drawn up indeed in very reſpectful terms, but not leſs bold and ſpirited than the former. After reminding him with the chearfulneſs with which they undertook to aſſiſt him in the defence of the Palatinate, they obſerved, "That their zeal for the proteſtant religion and the intereſt of his majeſty's family, had induced them to repreſent the dangers with which both were threatened, and to point out remedies for thoſe evils: that by his letter to the ſpeaker, he ſeemed determined to deprive them of the parliamentary liberty to ſpeak freely in the houſe, and alſo of the juriſdiction which the houſe exerciſed over its own members; they therefore begged he would not violate a privilege which was their undoubted right, and which they inherited from their anceſtors; a right which he himſelf had confirmed in his ſpeeches to the parliament, and without which it would be impoſſible to diſcuſs and determine the affairs that might fall under their cognizance."

This reſolute anſwer in the commons raiſed every ſpark of regal pride in the compoſition of James. His anſwer was ſhort, peremptory, and ſuitable to that ſpirit of kingly power which filled his breaſt. After explaining his intentions with regard to the prerogative in very clear and explicit terms, he concluded his reply with regard to the rights and privileges of parliament in the following manner: "And although we cannot allow the ſtile, calling it your undoubted right and inheritance, but could rather have wiſhed you had ſaid, that your privileges were derived from the grace and permiſſion of our anceſtors and us (for moſt of them grew by precedents, which rather ſhew toleration then inheritance:) yet we are pleaſed to give our royal aſſurance, that, as long as you continue yourſelves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preſerve your lawful liberties and privileges as any of our anceſtors were, nay, as to preſerve our own royal prerogative; ſo as your houſe ſhall only have need to beware to trench upon the prerogative of the crown, which would enforce us, or any juſt king, to retrench them of their privileges, that would pare his prerogative and the flowers of his crown. But of this we hope there will never be cauſe given."

This anſwer, which is dated at Newmarket the eleventh of December, breathes all the ſpirit of deſpotiſm. The houſe of commons were juſtly alarmed. They ſaw their title to every privilege, if not plainly denied, yet conſidered at leaſt as very precarious. He plainly told them it might be forfeited by abuſe, and they had already abuſed it. They therefore reſolved to grant no ſupply till they received ſatiſfaction from James for the breach of their privileges, and drew up the following proteſtation, which is ſo very remarkable, that it will be neceſſary to give it at full length. "The commons now aſſembled in parliament, being juſtly occaſioned thereunto, concerning ſundry liberties, franchiſes, and privileges of parliament, among others here mentioned, do make the following proteſtation: That the liberties, franchiſes, and juriſdictions of parliament are the ancient and undoubted birth-right and inheritance of the ſubjects of England; and that the urgent and arduous affairs concerning the king, ſtate, and defence of the realm, and of the church of England; and the maintenance and making of laws, and redreſs of miſchiefs and grievances, which daily happen within this realm, are proper ſubjects and matter of council and debate in parliament, and that in the handling and proceeding of thoſe buſineſſes, every member of the houſe of parliament hath, and of right, ought to have, freedom of ſpeech to propound, treat, reaſon, and bring to concluſion the ſame; and that the commons in parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of theſe matters, in ſuch order as in their judgment ſhall ſeem fitteſt, and that every member of the ſaid houſe hath like freedom from all impeachment, impriſonment, and moleſtation (other than by cenſure of the houſe itſelf) for or concerning any ſpeaking, reaſoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the parliament or parliamentary buſineſs. And that if any of the ſaid members be complained of and queſtioned for any “ thing done or ſaid in parliament, the ſame is to be “ ſhewn to the king by the advice and aſſent of all “ the commons aſſembled in parliament, before the “ king give credence to any private information.”

Informed of theſe increaſing heats and jealouſies that prevailed in the lower houſe, James hurried to town from Newmarket, determined to exert the regal authority with which he was intruſted, and convince the commons that they had proceeded too far in aſſerting their liberties. On his arrival, he ſent immediately for the journal book of the commons, and before the council, tore out, with his own hand, the above proteſtation, which he conſidered as an inſult on his prerogative. At the ſame time he declared it abſolutely null and void, becauſe it was voted tumultuouſly at a late hour, and in a very thin houſe; and becauſe it was expreſſed in ſuch general and ambiguous terms, as might be conſidered as a ſufficient foundation for the moſt enormous crimes, and extended to the moſt unwarrantable uſurpations on the prerogative of the crown. Soon after he diſſolved the parliament by proclamation, in which he made an apology to the public for his whole conduct. Some of the leaders among the commons he committed to priſon, and ſent others to execute a commiſſion in Ireland. At laſt he prohibited all diſcourſe on public affairs, as if he had power to prevent the people from ſpeaking on thoſe ſubjects, in which they were moſt intereſted; an authority enjoyed not by the moſt deſpotic monarch.

A prohibition of this kind tended only to heighten the animoſities of the parties. Every nation piques itſelf on diſcuſſing the principles of government. One party exalted the royal prerogative, the other parliamentary liberty. The ſource of authority, its extent and its limits were examined; diſcuſſions ſo much the more dangerous, as the firſt laws being always imperfect, and remoter ages covered with obſcurity, there is inexhauſtible matter for oppoſition and diſpute. By means of argument, the republic ſpirit increaſed, and formed a ſyſtem of which it was eaſy to ſee the dreadful conſequences. If James had not had recourſe to maxims capable of ſtriking the Engliſh with awe, that ſyſtem of independence would then have taken place, which, after diſtuibing his whole reign, brought his ſucceſſor to the ſcaffold.

A. D. 1622. Though James had already ſeen the conſequence of fruitleſs negotiations in Germany, he ſtill purſued the ſame plan which had already rendered him ſufficiently contemptible. He diſpatched Digby to the emperor, deſiring a ceſſation of hoſtilities. The miniſter was referred to the duke of Bavaria, who commanded the Auſtrian armies. The duke told him that there needed no treaty for that purpoſe, ſince hoſtilities were already ceaſed by his having taken poſſeſſion of the Palatinate, which he intended to keep till a final accommodation ſhould take place between the contending parties. Notwithſtanding this groſs inſult, and though every circumſtance concurred to convince James that the emperor induſtriouſly eluded all his applications, that weak monarch had the meanneſs to follow Ferdinand thro' all his evaſions, and renew the conferences at Bruſſels.

Frederick, finding the pacific endeavours of his father-in-law were ineffectual, embraced ſome favourable circumſtances ariſing from the expiration of the truce between Spain and the States-general, and the jealouſies of the Germans excited by the increaſing power of the houſe of Auſtria, to make a final effort for the recovery of his dominions. Three conſiderable armies were raiſed, and commanded by three able generals, Chriſtian, duke of Brunſwick, the prince of Baden, and count Mansfeldt. But the ſame ill ſucceſs ſtill purſued the unfortunate Frederick. Count Tilly, at the head of the Imperial army, defeated the duke of Brunſwick, and ſoon after the prince of Baden. Mansfeldt, though his army was greatly inferior in numbers, ſtill continued the war; but not being ſupported with money either by the Palatinate or the king of England, he could act only on the defenſive. Theſe misfortunes, joined to the perſuaſions of James, who was deſirous that his ſon-in-law ſhould lay down his arms, entirely diſheartened that prince, who retired to Sedan, where he remained an unwelcome gueſt with his uncle the duke of Brunſwick. Count Mansfeldt was diſmiſſed from his employment; and that famous general retired with his army into the Low Countries, where he was received into the pay of the ſtates-general. In the mean time the weakneſs of James rendered him contemptible in every court of Europe; it was even extended ſo far as to paint him ſometimes with a ſcabbard without a ſword, and ſometimes with a ſword which a number of perſons were trying in vain to draw out of the ſcabbard.

Though the king of Bohemia was always perſuaded that a vigorous oppoſition always bids faireſt for obtaining equitable terms, yet the repeated requeſts of his father-in-law, had forced him to abandon his maxim, and now, when it was too late, he repented of his folly. Count Tilly, after the retreat of Mansfeldt, loſt not a moment to haraſs the Palatinate. He beſieged and took Heidelberg, the richeſt city in it, and ſent its fine libraries of books to Rome. The caſtle was bravely defended by Herbert, an Engliſh colonel, who, after performing prodigies of valour, was killed with a muſquet ball. Tilly next made himſelf maſter of Manheim, notwithſtanding the noble defence made by the garriſon commanded by Sir Horace Vere.

James now gave up all thoughts of recovering the Palatinate from the emperor. But he ſtill flattered himſelf that if he could accompliſh his ſon's marriage with the infanta of Spain, he ſhould be able to obtain, by the aſſiſtance of that court, the territories of his ſon-in-law, and re-inſtate him in his former dignity. Ferdinand, however, determined to prevent him from executing his project. He aſſembled a diet at Ratiſbon, in which he declared, “that the elector palatine, having been guilty of high-treaſon, his eſtates, goods and dignities were forfeited; but being unwilling to diminiſh the number of electors, he ordered that Maximilian of Bavaria, ſhould be inveſted with the electorate palatine.”

The eyes of the Engliſh were now turned ſullenly towards Spain, where Digby, earl of Briſtol, had the ſole management of the negotiation for the marriage. Briſtol was a nobleman of great abilities, and had formerly diſapproved of entering into any engagements with Spain; but appeared now ſo convinced of the ſincerity of that court, that he wrote a letter to James, felicitating him on the entire accompliſhment of his views and projects: a daughter of Spain, whom he repreſented as extremely amiable, would ſoon, he ſaid, be conducted into England, and bring with her an immenſe fortune of two millions, a ſum four times greater than ever given with any other princeſs. The truth is, that the court of Spain had hitherto carried on the negotiation merely to amuſe the Engliſh monarch; but perceiving that James was determined, on any terms, to complete the alliance, it was thought that ſo favourable an opportunity of reſtoring the catholic faith in England ſhould not be neglected, as it ſeemed more than probable, it might eaſily be effected by means of the infanta, and her numerous train of domeſtics and dependents, who were to enjoy the free exerciſe of their religion. Purſuant to this reſolution, the behaviour of the Spaniſh court was now entirely changed, and appeared as eager to conclude the negotiation, as before to find excuſes for deferring it. The only difficulty conſiſted in extorting from the Engliſh monarch ſuch conceſſions as might contribute to complete the favourite deſign, and which the impatience of James gave the greateſt reaſon to expect; that the only obſtacles that now remained to the completion of the marriage were thoſe relating to religion.

The earl of Briſtol, ever ſince his arrival in Spain, had been employed in ſettling thoſe preliminaries.

At laſt the court of Spain made their final demands with regard to that particular, and the earl of Briſtol ſent them immediately to his maſter. James made ſome difficulty of agreeing to theſe articles; but his deſire of completing the marriage at laſt got the better of his prudence: he ſigned the articles, and ſent them back to Spain. Among all the conceſſions favourable to the catholics, none gave greater diſguſt to the Engliſh than that in which the king engaged that the children of the prince and the Infanta ſhould be educated by their mother till they were ten years of age; a condition which could only be ſtipulated with a view of implanting in their tender minds the ſtrongeſt prejudices in favour of the Romiſh religion; and though ſo early an age might ſeem little ſuſceptible of any laſting impreſſions, yet the ſame motive which prompted the Spaniſh monarch to inſert it, ſhould have induced the king of England to reject it. Beſides the public treaty, there were ſeveral private articles, by which both the king and prince of Wales engaged to ſuſpend the penal laws againſt the catholics, to obtain a repeal of them from the parliament, and to tolerate the exerciſe of the popiſh religion in private houſes.

A. D. 1623. Every previous ſtep being thus adjuſted, nothing was wanting to conclude the marriage but the pope's diſpenſation, which was conſidered merely as a formality. Elated by this ſucceſs, James triumphed in his pacific councils, and conſoled himſelf for the contempt he had incurred in all the courts of Europe, in having tamely ſuffered his ſon-in-law to be ſtripped of his eſtates and dignity. But while he was boaſting of his ſuperior wiſdom and ſagacity, his flattering proſpects were ruined by the raſhneſs of a man whom he had raiſed from a private ſtation to be the curſe of himſelf, his family, and his people.

Buckingham, who was now as much in favour with the prince as with the king, and ſeemed to direct all the affairs of the kingdom, was envious of the great credit obtained by Briſtol in the Spaniſh negotiation. The ambitious favourite therefore determined to ſupplant him, or, at leaſt, to ſhare in the honour of concluding a treaty ſo agreeable to the king. He perſuaded the prince to undertake a journey to the court of Madrid in perſon, in order to bring home his miſtreſs the Infanta. He repreſented to him, that the romantic nature of the adventure could not fail of attracting the admiration and affection of that monarch and his ſubjects, and of introducing him to the princeſs under the character of a fond lover, rather than of a ſtately huſband; that the negotiation with regard to the Palatinate, which had hitherto languiſhed in the hands of miniſters, would quickly be terminated by ſo illuſtrious an agent, ſeconded by the mediation and intreaties of the grateful Infanta: that the Spaniſh generoſity, excited by ſo uncommon an inſtance of truſt and confidence, would undoubtedly make conceſſions far beyond what could be expected from political views and conſiderations.

Inflamed with theſe generous and romantic ideas, ſo peculiarly adapted to the minds of youth, Charles embraced the propoſal with rapture, and it was agreed to make application to the king for leave to carry the deſign into execution immediately. They choſe the moment when James was in the moſt kind and jovial humour; and by importunities, rather than the force of their reaſons, they extorted from him a haſty and unguarded conſent.

But the prince and Buckingham had hardly left the king, before he repented of his weakneſs: every difficulty occurred with a peculiar force, and the danger to which the prince's perſon muſt be expoſed, affected him in a very ſenſible manner. He reflected, that however pardonable this romantic expedition might be conſidered in youth, it muſt reflect diſgrace on mature age: that if the profeſſions of the Spaniſh monarch were ſincere, a few months only muſt finiſh the negotiation, and bring the Infanta to England, without expoſing his only ſon, the heir of his crown, the prop of his age, to ſo dangerous an undertaking; and if he was not ſincere, the loſs would be abſolutely irretrievable.

Full of theſe reflections, the king determined to recal his promiſe, and prevent, by a timely oppoſition, an undertaking which, if unfortunate, muſt render him at once both infamous to his people, and ridiculous to all poſterity. Accordingly when the prince and Buckingham returned for their diſpatches, James informed them of the reaſons which had prevailed upon him to change his reſolution, and begged they would bury all thoughts of ſo ridiculous an adventure in the pit of forgetfulneſs. The prince was greatly affected at this diſappointment, but anſwered only with tears. Buckingham aſſumed the air of authority, and told the king, that this retraction of his promiſe ſo ſoon after it was given, muſt render all his declarations for ever after ſuſpected; that the word of a king ought to be ſacred, and never broken but by the moſt powerful reaſons, or abſolute neceſſity.

James, who was unable to make any effectual oppoſition to the deſigns of the prince and favourite, renewed his conſent, proper directions were given for the journey, and the prince, with Buckingham, and their two attendants, Sir Francis Cottington, the prince's ſecretary, and Endymion Porter, gentleman of his bed-chamber, with Sir Richard Graham, maſter of the horſe to Buckingham, paſſed, diſguiſed and undiſcovered, through France. They even ventured to appear in a court ball at Paris, where Charles ſaw the princeſs Henrietta, then in the bloom of youth and beauty.

They reached Madrid on the eleventh day after their departure, where every body was ſurprized at a ſtep ſo very unuſual among the princes of that age. Penetrated with gratitude for the unbounded confidence repoſed in him by the prince, Philip paid him a viſit immediately after he was informed of his arrival; made him the warmeſt proteſtations of friendſhip; ſhewed him every reſpect in the power of majeſty to beſtow; and preſented him with a golden key which opened all his apartments, that the prince might have free acceſs to him at all hours. He gave him the upper hand on all occaſions, except in the apartments aſſigned for his reſidence, where he ſaid the prince was at home. The ſame pomp and ceremonies were uſed when Charles firſt viſited the palace, as were common at the coronation of the kings of Spain; and the council received public orders to obey him as the king himſelf. Every kind of rejoicing was uſed throughout the kingdom; and all the priſons were thrown open, that even thoſe who before languiſhed in confinement might ſhare in the general joy. Nor was any advantage taken of the prince's preſence to impoſe any harder condition of the treaty. In the mean time, pope Gregory XV. who had granted the diſpenſation, died, and Urban VIII. was placed in the pontifical chair. This event induced the nuncio not to deliver the diſpenſation till it could receive the ſanction of Urban; who hoping that ſome expedient might be diſcovered, during the prince's reſidence in Spain, to effect his converſion to the catholic faith, delayed the diſpenſation.

This dilatory method of proceeding occaſioned great uneaſineſs both to the king of England and the prince. Philip perceived it, and neglected nothing in his power to diſſipate every apprehenſion, and prevail upon the prince to wait till the diſpenſation could be procured from the court of Rome; but, at the ſame time, he made not the leaſt difficulty of granting him permiſſion to return. He even cauſed a pillar to be erected on the ſpot where they parted, as a monument of their mutual friendſhip. And the prince, having ſworn to the obſervance of all the articles in the marriage treaty, ſet out, attended by a numerous train of the Spaniſh nobility, for St. Andero, where he embarked on board an Engliſh veſſel, ſent by the king for that purpoſe.

Never prince more engaged the affections of the Spaniards than Charles. His character, compoſed of decency, reſerve, modeſty, and ſobriety, rendered him very agreeable to that people. They were in love with his unparalleled confidence, and the romantic gallantry he had practiſed towards their princeſs. At the ſame time, his advantageous figure, and the blooming graces of youth that adorned his countenance, endeared him to the whole court of Madrid, and made deep impreſſions on the heart of the Infanta. Had the character of Buckingham been equal to that of the prince, every thing had ſucceeded according to their wiſhes; but that nobleman was as much deſpiſed and hated as the prince was eſteemed and beloved. His diſſolute pleaſures, his ſallies of paſſion, his arrogant, impetuous temper, rendered him the object of the Spaniards averſion, and he was, in general, treated with contempt.

Conſcious of the affronts he had given to the court of Spain, and fearful of the influence of the Infanta when ſhe arrived in England, he determined to employ all his credit to prevent the marriage from being concluded. But it ſeemed a difficult taſk to prevail upon the prince to treat a court, where he had received the moſt diſtinguiſhed favours, with ingratitude; and, if poſſible, ſtill more difficult to induce James to break off a treaty, the accompliſhment of which had ſo long been the object of his wiſhes, and which he had now ſo nearly brought to a ſucceſsful and happy iſſue. At this diſtance of time it is impoſſible to know the reaſons he made uſe of to accompliſh his deſign: it only appears that he maintained an entire aſcendant over both the king and his ſon. James, indeed, made ſome oppoſition; and had the earl of Briſtol arrived in that critical moment, perhaps the impetuous and turbulent miniſter had ſunk under the burden of his own crimes; but the king wanted ſpirit and reſolution to reſiſt the importunities of Buckingham; he ſacrificed both honour and integrity to the folly of his minion.

Peremptory orders were ſent to the earl of Briſtol for breaking off all negotiations, juſt at the time when that miniſter had, in all appearance, accommodated every difference between the contracting parties, and the Spaniards were on the point of delivering up the Infanta. Philip was not ſurprized at this change of ſentiments in the Britiſh court: he was no ſtranger to the diſguſt of Buckingham; and believing him a man capable of ſacrificing to his own ungovernable paſſions the deareſt intereſts of his king and country, he ſuſpected that the unbounded ambition of that favourite would be employed to foment a quarrel between the two nations.

A. D. 1624. The diſpenſation reached Spain ſoon after the departure of Charles and Buckingham, and the Infanta had immediately aſſumed the title of princeſs of Wales. Philip was therefore very unwilling to break off the treaty, eſpecially as he foreſaw that a rupture between the two crowns would be the inevitable conſequence; and determined that nothing on his part ſhould be wanting to complete the marriage, and maintain the harmony that now ſubſiſted between Spain and England. He, on the eighth of January, ſent the earl of Briſtol a written promiſe, by which he engaged to procure the reſtoration of the Palatinate, either by treaty or force of arms. But when he found that this conceſſion was diſregarded, he ordered the Infanta to lay aſide the title of princeſs of Wales, and to drop the ſtudy of the Engliſh language. At the ſame time, he iſſued orders for making preparations for war in every part of his dominions, perſuaded that the court of England would not ſtop at the violation of the marriage treaty.

The reſolution of James to break off all connections with Spain was no ſooner known to the people, than they celebrated the rupture with bonefires, and other public demonſtrations of joy. Buckingham, by giving a partial, and, in many inſtances, a falſe account of the negotiation, eaſily inflamed thoſe ſpirits which were already prejudiced againſt Spain. Elogiums were poured upon him, as one of the beſt of ſubjects; he was called the deliverer of his country. James, who wanted firmneſs of mind to reſiſt the impetuoſity of the nation, was ſwept away with the torrent, and obliged, contrary to his natural principles, to follow thoſe violent reſolutions that led inevitably to war. He aſſembled a parliament, in order to obtain ſupplies. In his ſpeech to the two houſes, James dropped ſome hints of the cauſes of complaint he had againſt Spain; and graciouſly condeſcended to aſk their advice, which he had ever before rejected, with regard to the conduct of ſo important an affair as the marriage of his ſon. The commons promiſed to aſſiſt him in revenging the affront put upon him by Spain: for Buckingham, by laying before a committee of both houſes a long and partial account, which he pretended was a true and complete narrative of all the ſteps taken in the Spaniſh negotiation, had intirely gained the confidence of that aſſembly. It contained, indeed, ſo many contradictory circumſtances, that they were ſufficient to open the eyes of every reaſonable man, notwithſtanding the artful veil which was thrown over the whole proceedings. But the narrative concurred ſo well with the paſſions and prejudices of the parliament, that no ſcruple was made of immediately adopting it as a truth that could not be diſputed. Charmed with having at laſt the opportunity, ſo long and ſo ardently deſired, of going to war with papiſts, they thought not of future conſequences, but immediately adviſed the king to break off both treaties with Spain, as well that which regarded the marriage, as that for the reſtitution of the Palatinate.

The two houſes having thus given their voice for a war, joined in a petition to the king, that he would cauſe the laws againſt Romiſh prieſts and jeſuits to be ſtrictly executed; that he would iſſue orders for ſeizing the arms of popiſh recuſants, and obliging them to retire from the capital; that he would revoke all licences granted to ſuch recuſants, and put a ſtop to the great concourſe of people who reſorted to hear maſs in the chapels of ambaſſadors; that he would deprive all papiſts of the poſts they enjoyed under the government, and not relax the laws made againſt popiſh recuſants on any account whatever. James returned a very gracious and condeſcending anſwer; but declared himſelf an enemy to all perſecution on account of religion; from a thorough conviction that it always injures the cauſe it is intended to promote; according to the received maxim, "That the blood of the martyrs was the ſeed of the church." At the ſame time, he condemned an intire indulgence to the catholics; and ſtrongly hinted, that a middle courſe ought to be choſen, as at once the moſt humane and the moſt political.

James having determined to purſue hoſtile meaſures, repaired to the parliament-houſe, where he declared, in a ſpeech to that aſſembly, his reſolution of humbling the pride of Spain, provided they would engage to ſupport him. He began his harangue with lamenting his misfortune, in being obliged, in his old age, to exchange the bleſſings of peace for the inevitable calamities of hoſtile meaſures. He repreſented to them the prodigious expence requiſite for maintaining military armaments; and demanded a vote of ſix ſubſidies and twelve fifteenths, as a proper ſtock before war was declared againſt Spain. He mentioned the large debts he had contracted, principally to ſupport the Elector Palatine and his family; but declared, he inſiſted not on any ſupply for himſelf; the honour and ſecurity of the kingdom was all he was deſirous of ſupporting. He even ſo far forgot his prerogative, which he had hitherto ſo ſtrenuouſly ſupported, that he made a dangerous and unexpected conceſſion, that the ſums granted ſhould be veſted in a committee of parliament, and be iſſued by them without being intruſted to his management. Nothing could be more agreeable to the commons; they readily accepted the offer, but voted much leſs than was demanded; three ſubſidies and three fifteenths was by the commons thought a ſufficient ſum for the preſent occaſions of the ſtate; nor did they take the leaſt notice of that part of his ſpeech which regarded his own neceſſities, though he had made a conceſſion greater than they could have even preſumed to aſk.

But though they were ſo very parſimonious in their ſupplies, they took advantage of the preſent agreement between the king and the parliament, to make freſh attacks upon the prerogative. James had aboliſhed all the monopolies ſo loudly and ſo juſtly complained of; but this did not ſatisfy the commons; they paſſed an act, by which it was declared, that all monopolies were contrary to the laws and liberties of the kingdom. By the ſame ſtatute it was enacted, that every man enjoyed an entire freedom with regard to his own actions, provided he did nothing detrimental to any perſon; and that no other authority but that of the laws ſhould ſtop this unlimited right; a principle which ſerved as a baſis for the civil liberties of England.

During theſe tranſactions, the elector palatine wrote a letter to James, wherein he enumerated the reaſons which offered themſelves both for continuing the negotiations, and attempting to recover the Palatinate by force of arms. The latter now predominated at the Britiſh court, ſince a reſolution had been taken to break off all negotiations with Spain. The indefatigable duke of Brunſwick had raiſed another army for the ſervice of the king of Bohemia, with an intention to force a paſſage into the Low Countries, and join the prince of Orange. The Dutch, in general, were well inclined to the ſame cauſe, and the princes of Germany every day diſcovered freſh ſymptoms of diſcontent at the proceedings of the houſe of Auſtria. But above all, the perſon of the queen of Bohemia, the wiſeſt and moſt virtuous lady of her age, became now an object of public concern. Her merits, her misfortunes, her young family, and the unworthy treatment ſhe had received, like ſo many charms, animated every proteſtant, who was not wholly a ſtranger to the dictates of humanity. James himſelf was ſometimes warmed into compaſſion, and ſometimes into reſentment. He had ſpared her and her family a little of the ſcanty remainder his profuſion had ſpared, and they lived on good terms with the prince of Orange, who was at that time ſincerely diſpoſed to have ſerved them, could James have been prevailed upon to truſt the Dutch, or they to put any confidence in him.

But amidſt theſe good diſpoſitions, difficulties intervened, which blaſted all their effects. The inſolence of the Dutch traders, and their cruelty towards the Engliſh in the Eaſt-Indies, were ſo great, that James at laſt yielded to the repeated inſtances of his ſubjects, and gave the earl of Oxford the command of a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips, in order to intercept the Dutch Eaſt-India fleet in their return to Europe. By a treaty lately concluded, the Dutch and the Engliſh were to divide between them the trade of the iſlands they had taken from the Portugueſe and Spaniards; the Engliſh to enjoy one third, and the Dutch two thirds of this valuable trade. Accordingly, Engliſh factories had been ſettled in the Molucca iſlands, and at Banda. A few Engliſh merchants, not more than eighteen or twenty, had, for above two years, lived at Amboyna, where there was a Dutch fort and two companies of ſoldiers, beſides a civil eſtabliſhment. For ſome time, a correſpondence ſubſiſted between the two people; but the Dutch, envying the proſperous ſtate of the Engliſh factory, determined to ruin them. A conſpiracy was accordingly formed againſt their lives, of ſo deteſtable a nature, as is hardly credible to thoſe who do not ſufficiently reflect on the rancour of a people towards their rivals in trade; eſpecially when the ſcene is not only ſufficiently diſtant from all ſeats of juſtice, but where they themſelves preſide, uncontrouled, in the exerciſe of their tyranny, and blinded by the motives of intereſt. It was pretended that the Engliſh and the Japaneſe, the whole not exceeding forty perſons, had formed a deſign for deſtroying the Dutch ſettlement. Upon this Gabriel Towerſon, the chief agent, and the reſt of the Engliſh then upon the iſland, were taken into cuſtody, and ſtrictly examined by the Dutch council. No witneſſes of credit appeared againſt them; and the unhappy priſoners, conſcious of their innocence, denied the fact with the ſtrongeſt aſſeverations. But it had been before determined to put them to death, and only ſome pretence was wanting for carrying the bloody deſign into execution. The rack was therefore to ſupply the place of evidence, and the tortures were ſo dreadful, that even conſcious innocence was unable to ſupport them. Some ſought relief by confeſſion; but on obtaining the mercy of being put to death, they ſolemnly retracted their confeſſions with their lateſt breath; but others, with matchleſs fortitude, expired under their tortures. By this horrid proceeding the Dutch continued maſters of the ſpice trade, and have ever ſince kept it in their own hands. No reparation was, however, obtained for this inſolent affront, till many years after, when Cromwell held the reins of government. That uſurper obliged them to pay three hundred thouſand pounds on that account. It, however, prevented a junction between the armies deſigned to reduce the Palatinate.

When the earl of Briſtol received orders to leave the court of Madrid, he applied for an audience, in order to fulfil the ceremonial of his departure. Philip expreſſed the higheſt regret that Briſtol's ſervices ſhould meet with ſo unworthy a reward; and that his enemies ſhould have ſo far prevailed, as to infuſe prejudices into his maſter and his country againſt a miniſter who had ſo faithfully performed his duty to both. He endeavoured to prevail upon him to engage in his ſervice, promiſing to beſtow upon him every advantage of rank and fortune he himſelf could deſire. But Briſtol, though he expreſſed the utmoſt gratitude for this generous offer, refuſed every thing, and determined to return immediately to his own country, not doubting but the torch of truth would ſoon expoſe the falſhoods of his enemies in their genuine colours. Philip could not even prevail upon him to accept of ten thouſand ducats, though his circumſtances rendered ſuch a preſent neceſſary. The monarch uſed every intreaty in his power to prevail, and aſſured him that neither James, nor any one elſe, ſhould ever know he had received it. "There is one (anſwered the virtuous miniſter) who will be privy to the whole tranſaction; it is the earl of Briſtol, and he will certainly reveal it to the king of England."

It was the intereſt of Buckingham to keep Briſtol at a diſtance from the king and the court, leſt the voice of truth, enforced with thoſe powers of oratory which the earl poſſeſſed in a very eminent degree, ſhould diſcloſe ſcenes which he wiſhed to bury in oblivion. He accordingly no ſooner heard of the earl's arrival in England, than he made uſe of all that power he had acquired over the mind of his weak ſovereign, for procuring an order for committing Briſtol to the Tower, till he had anſwered certain queſtions that ſhould be put to him by the council. He was, however, ſoon after releaſed, but ordered to retire to his own houſe. The earl wrote to James, loudly demanding an opportunity of vindicating himſelf, and of laying his whole conduct before his maſter and the public: he aſſerted his own innocence, and threw the blame of every miſcarriage on Buckingham. He had always flattered himſelf that the hatred of the minion could not prevail over the juſtice of his maſter, as if a weak prince was not generally a dupe to the paſſions of others. Buckingham was deſirous that he ſhould own the pretended faults exhibited againſt him; but he juſtly thought a reconciliation offered on ſuch terms a real diſgrace. James himſelf declared, that to require ſuch a thing of an innocent man was the moſt horrible tyranny. How juſtly ought he to have reproached himſelf for ſuffering ſo unjuſt a ſentence to take place!

The parliament being prorogued on the twenty-ninth of May, it was neceſſary to make ſome preparations for oppoſing the warlike armament fitting out by the court of Spain, and alſo to aſſiſt the count Palatine. Eight citizens of London were appointed as treaſurers for the money raiſed by parliament, and theſe were aſſiſted by ten other perſons from his majeſty's council of war. Without a warrant from theſe, no money could be iſſued, nor even by their order, on any other account than to defray the expences of the war, as they were accountable to the commons in parliament. It was computed that the ſums granted laſt ſeſſion would be ſufficient to ſend twenty-five thouſand men into the Palatinate, under the command of an Engliſh general. Six thouſand only were, however, raiſed, and ſent into Holland to join the army of the States, commanded by the prince of Orange; while another army, under count Manſfeldt, was to penetrate into the Palatinate.

James, ſtill poſſeſſed with the idle opinion, that it would digrace his ſon, if he took any other than a king's daughter to his bed, ſent lord Holland to the court of France with an overture of marriage between the prince of Wales and the princeſs Henrietta Maria, daughter to Lewis XIII. The propoſal being accepted, the conferences were opened at Compeigne, and the marriage articles were ſigned at Paris on the tenth of November. They were nearly the ſame in ſubſtance with thoſe which had been concluded with Spain; for as Lewis only required the ſame conditions which had before been granted to his Catholic majeſty, James made no ſcruple to comply. One of the conditions was, that the children ſhould be brought up by the mother; or, what is the ſame thing, in the catholic religion, till they were thirteen years of age; an article to which the miſfortunes of that family are commonly attributed, though it was never put in execution any more than the other articles, which appear to have been dictated by the court of Rome.

While this affair was depending, count Manſfeldt came over to England, where he was received with extraordinary marks of reſpect, and lodged in apartments, fitted up for his reception, in the palace. After ſome conferences, it was agreed, that Manſfeldt, at the head of twelve thouſand men, ſhould carry on the war in the Lower Palatinate. The French miniſtry, during the negotiation for the marriage, made large promiſes, but always couched in general terms, not only of granting the Engliſh a paſſage through France, but alſo of reinforcing their army with conſiderable bodies of troops during their march to the Palatinate; but on the arrival of the Engliſh, under the command of Manſfeldt, before Calais, they found that no orders had been ſent for their admiſſion. This occaſioned many diſpatches; but the French miniſtry inſiſted that they had entered into no poſitive agreement; and that the granting the count a free paſſage through France was a matter of too much importance to be haſtily admitted. This delay was fatal to the expedition. A peſtilential diſeaſe broke out among the troops, and ſwept away great numbers of them daily; and thoſe that remained were ſo weakened by ſickneſs, and diſcouraged by miſfortunes, that it was thought imprudent to lead them into the Palatinate. Such was the ſhameful iſſue of this expedition, and which reflects the higheſt diſgrace on the Engliſh miniſtry.

Though James had laid a ſolid foundation for putting an end to the troubles in Ireland, he had not been able intirely to complete his plan. The Spaniards ſtill maintained a conſtant intelligence with the diſaffected papiſts, and kept the Engliſh government in continual alarms. The earl of Tyrone having been received into favour by James, and obtained the royal protection, on condition of not relapſing into his former rebellious practices, lived, for ſome time, in great ſubmiſſion to the government; but imputing all the marks of favour he had received to nothing more than the effects of fear, he had the boldneſs, ſoon after, to petition the king for a toleration of the catholic religion. This requeſt being refuſed, he joined the earl of Tyrconnel, and other chiefs of the Iriſh papiſts; and a deſperate confederacy was formed for aſſaſſinating the lord deputy and the council, and maſſacring all the Engliſh in the kingdom of Ireland. This conſpiracy was happily diſcovered by a letter dropped in the council-chamber; and Tyrone, Tyrconnel, and other principal conſpirators, informed of the accident, fled to France, and afterwards to Bruſſels, where the archduke gave them a noble reception, and ſettled on them large penſions by expreſs orders from the court of Spain. Soon after, Tyrone undertook to excite another rebellion, and to paſs over, with his friends, into Ireland; but the deſign being diſcovered before it was ripe for execution, the chiefs who had engaged in the conſpiracy were taken and executed.

Great diſputes alſo aroſe in the Iriſh council, which continued for ſeveral years, and tended greatly to diſturb the peace of that kingdom. The papiſts, ſupported by Rome and Spain, continued to act with great inſolence, and, in ſome churches, to exerciſe their own religion. This occaſioned the government to iſſue a ſevere proclamation againſt the catholics, ordering all the regular prieſts to leave Ireland, under the heavieſt penalties.

A. D. 1625. The reign of James now advanced haſtily towards a period. The habit of his body, like the ſtate of his kingdom, was alarming. He had long addicted himſelf to thoſe pleaſures which he could not taſte, that he might baniſh from his mind the reflections which he could not bear. He had accuſtomed himſelf to the uſe of ſweet wines, and to ride hard, both before and after drinking. This irregular method of living had occaſioned ſeveral ſevere fits of illneſs, which the phyſicians had rather palliated than removed; for James was too impatient in ſickneſs to ſubmit to any troubleſome regimen, in order to obtain a cure. Infirmities therefore increaſed upon him with age, nor was the approach of the king of terrors to be prevented any longer. The ſtate of his mind contributed to increaſe the illneſs of his body. He was highly provoked at the behaviour of Buckingham; he imputed to his headſtrong paſſions all the miſfortunes that now ſurrounded him. He was deſirous of humbling that haughty miniſter, but he wanted power to execute his deſign. Finding that all attempts, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, would be in vain, he compoſed himſelf with a ſullen kind of reſignation, meditating how to take the firſt opportunity of a friendly hand for his deliverance. Such was the king's ſituation when the marquis of Hamilton, who hated Buckingham, and who was as likely as any man to ſerve James in his diſtreſs, died ſuddenly, not without ſtrong ſuſpicions of poiſon. James conſidered the death of that nobleman as a ſure prelude to his own. "If the branches are cut down, (ſaid he) the ſtock cannot long ſtand." From that moment he became penſive and melancholy. He was ſeized, in the beginning of March, with a tertian ague; and when encouraged by his courtiers with the old proverb, that this diſtemper, during that ſeaſon, was health for a king, he replied, that the proverb was meant of a young king. The counteſs of Buckingham, and ſome other ladies, who had no great opinion of regular phyſicians, but thought that life might be rendered immortal by the ſecrets of empyrics, attended James, whoſe impatience for health drove him into the ſame fatal error. Buckingham had, ſome time before, been cured of a tertian ague by an emetic, a plaiſter and a poſſet-drink, which James now inſiſted ſhould be adminiſtered to himſelf. Buckingham uſed every argument in his power to diſſuade him from taking any thing that was not preſcribed by his phyſicians. But all his reaſonings were in vain: James ſent for the medicines, and they were given him, according to his requeſt. Every ſymptom of his diſeaſe was immediately augmented, and it was ſoon evident that he could not long ſurvive. James was himſelf very ſenſible of his approaching end, and met the king of terrors with amazing fortitude. His preparations for death were extremely fervent, and he was chiefly aſſiſted in his devotions by lord-keeper Williams. When the prince of Wales was admitted to his preſence, to receive his laſt advice, he exhorted him to maintain a tender affection for his wife, but at the ſame time to preſerve a conſtancy in religion, to protect the church of England, and to extend his care to the unhappy family of the Palatine. In his laſt moments he declared he died in the religion of the church of England, and expired on the twenty-ſeventh of March, in the twenty-third year of his reign, and the fifty-ninth of his age. He had held the ſceptre of Scotland almoſt from his birth.

The character of James having been drawn by writers of different parties, has been expoſed to the oppoſite extremes of calumny and flattery, of ſatire and panegyric. Nature had delineated on his mind the outlines of many excellent qualities, and ſeveral virtues; but leaving her work unfiniſhed, it was ſhaded by the pencil of vice. His generoſity was blended with profuſion, his learning with pedantry, his pacific diſpoſition with puſillanimity, and his friendſhip with boyiſh fondneſs and folly. No prince ever ruled his paternal dominions with greater equanimity than James did Scotland; but this was before he taſted the cup of fancied power, which intoxicated his brain. He was deſirous of following the examples of the princes of the Tudor line, who had made great breaches in the Engliſh conſtitution. But he did not reflect on the vaſt difference between their ſituation and his own. The ignorance, and conſequently the timidity of the Engliſh, was now vaniſhed; they were reſolved to defend with courage what they had acquired by induſtry. The whole ſyſtem of property among them was now altered; their minds were enlightened by reading and reflection; their principles of government were founded on the baſis of liberty and moderation; their thoughts were now employed on improving foreign commerce and domeſtic freedom: they no longer admitted oppreſſive precedents in former reigns to be ſufficient authorities for the preſent times. The doctrine of reſiſtance was preached from the pulpit, and underſtood in parliament, but with ſuch reſtrictions as left ſufficient room for a king of England to be at once both great and happy.

The pedantic learning of James made him a caſuiſt, but not a politician. He had not the ſmalleſt idea of that manly ſcience which ennobles ſociety, which regulates the paſſions of men in a free ſtate, and which animates, directs and completes the purpoſes of public ſpirit. He was void of all conception of the difference between liberty and licentiouſneſs; and endeavoured to erect for himſelf, in the minds of the people, as ſtrong an opinion of his infallibility, both in religion and politics, as ever the church of Rome had thought to eſtabliſh among her more deluded votaries. Nothing gave James greater diſtreſs, than to hear that his ſubjects dared diſpute or reaſon upon matters which might lead them to a ſenſe of their true intereſt as a people; and nothing gave him greater pleaſure than to hear and decide in the uſeleſs ſpeculative diſputes of ſchool-divinity. By purſuing ſuch prepoſterous meaſures, he made the great duties of a king ſubſervient to the idle diſtinctions of a pedant; and by endeavouring to make a figure as a ſcholar, he ſunk into contempt as a man.

James ſtudied to preſerve peace rather than tranquillity, the ſhadow rather than the ſubſtance; becauſe the genuine baſis of tranquillity is freedom. Though he had held the ſceptre almoſt ſixty years, without any ſenſible reverſe of fortune, yet the life of James was very uneven. No prince ever learned more, or profited leſs by experience. He diſplayed very conſiderable abilities while he only filled the Scottiſh throne; and by making a happy choice of Cecil for his miniſter, on the death of queen Elizabeth, gave a proof that he knew how to diſtinguiſh merit. But Cecil was mortal; and his ſucceſſors, without his abilities, endeavoured to purſue his ſchemes. This miſtake was fatal to James: for though no miniſter ever entertained more arbitrary notions than Cecil, yet he knew ſo well how to manage the Engliſh, that it was leſs dangerous for him than for any other man to purſue them. James was ſoon convinced of this by experience. The Howards, who continued in the miniſtry, had not ſufficient abilities to guide the machine of government; the Scottiſh favourites were diſagreeable to the nation; and thoſe whom James truſted wanted either honeſty or abilities to ſerve him.

His prodigality, or rather extravagant profuſion, rendered him always neceſſitous. The commons took advantage of it; and finding their aſſiſtance was abſolutely neceſſary, they made themſelves his maſters. One of his favourites ſeeing a load of ſilver carrying to the treaſury, ſaid to a perſon who ſtood near him, "How happy would that money make me!" The king deſired to know what he had been ſaying, and immediately gave him the whole ſum, amounting to three thouſand pounds. "You think yourſelf happy, ſaid he; but I am more ſo in obliging an honeſt man whom I love."

James was far from being deſtitute of ambition; but his puſillanimity, both perſonal and political, prevented him from carrying it to any dangerous height. The latter was, perhaps, much ſtronger than the former, though ſome hiſtorians have made fear the predominant ingredient in his nature. During his youth, he gave ſeveral inſtances that he wanted neither ſpirit nor reſolution in his perſon: but his political cowardice had every characteriſtic of baſeneſs, for he trembled moſt when he boaſted loudeſt. But when reflection ſucceeded to fear, his good natural ſenſe ſoon convined him that his ſchemes were impracticable, though his pride always led him to drop them in ſuch a manner, that it expoſed his crown and government to as much danger as if he had purſued them. Hence it happened, that among all the conceſſions he made to his parliament, not one was received with thankfulneſs; they were always conſidered as the reſult of preſent convenience, or the effects of fear.

In 1617, the royal revenues amounted to four hundred and fifty thouſand pounds; and the extraordinary ſupplies which he drew from parliament during his whole reign, only to three millions. The value of the ſubſidy was now ſo conſiderably diminiſhed, and the tax become ſo intirely perſonal, that people only paid it in the counties where they reſided, though they poſſeſſed lands in others. The parliament was at laſt obliged to aboliſh the ancient method, and eſtabliſh a regular land-tax.

What chiefly diſtinguiſhes the reign of James, is the commencement of the Engliſh colonies in America, which are now increaſed to ſuch an amazing height of power and grandeur. Queen Elizabeth had done little more than given a name to the continent of Virginia; and after planting one feeble colony, which ſoon decayed, that country was entirely abandoned. In the year 1606, Newport carried over a colony, and began a ſettlement, which the company eſtabliſhed for that purpoſe in London and Briſtol took care to furniſh with every thing neceſſary for its ſucceſs. About three years after, Nargal diſcovered a nearer and more direct paſſage to Virginia than had hitherto been known. He left the track of the ancient navigators, who directed their courſe to the ſouthward of the tropic, ſailed weſtward by means of the trade winds, and then returned to the northward till he reached the Engliſh ſettlements. Nargal ſtood directly for Virginia, and by that means reached that part of North-America in almoſt half the time that was neceſſary by the ancient method.

James had ſeven children by his conſort, Anne of Denmark; but two of them only ſurvived him, namely, Charles, who ſucceeded him on the throne; and Elizabeth, married to the Elector Palatine.

CHARLES I.

A. D. 1625. THE death of the late monarch made very little change in the cabinet. Buckingham, who had obtained the ſame aſcendency over Charles as he had formerly over James, had filled the court and council with his creatures, and all the great officers of ſtate were continued. Some alterations were, however, thought neceſſary; but this was not the time for carrying the deſign into execution. Williams, biſhop of Lincoln, keeper of the great ſeal, was no friend to Buckingham, and the miniſter determined to deprive him of his office. Laud, biſhop of St. David's, was a ſworn enemy to Williams, and intruſted with all the ſecrets of the cabinet: it was by his direction that the plan of future adminiſtration was laid. This was, indeed, no eaſy taſk; for though the great nobility had been paſſive during the government of James, becauſe they ſaw among the commons a ſpirit of liberty which they did not approve, yet they were extremely indifferent with regard to affairs of ſtate. They could not bear the haughtineſs and inſolence of the upſtart favourite. Though they were friends to the church, they diſliked the churchmen. They conſidered France and Spain as, in a manner, playing for the Engliſh crown; nor were they cordial for forming an alliance with either. Though they entertained a proper ſenſe of their own dignity and importance in the conſtitution of their country, yet they thought that both were weakened by the vaſt increaſe of new nobility created by the Stuart family, under pretence of balancing the growing power of the commons. Hence they attended the court chiefly through duty: they were often admitted to the council, but hardly ever to the cabinet. Even the great officers of ſtate often oppoſed the will of the favourite, and were therefore not often truſted. The earl of Arundel ſtill continued to abſent himſelf from the court; he was unwilling to countenance, by his preſence, meaſures he could not approve. The earls of Northumberland and Pembroke followed his example, though the latter was chamberlain of the houſhold. Lord Lee, treaſurer, and lord Mandeville, preſident of the council, under pretence of attending the duties of their own offices, concerned themſelves very little with the affairs of the cabinet. Weſton, chancellor of the exchequer, was, indeed, wholly devoted to the meaſures of Buckingham; and had he been on the popular ſide of the queſtion, might have made a conſiderable figure in the ſtate; but he was known to be at once a ſycophant and a papiſt. The earl of Worceſter, lord privy-ſeal, was a generous, good-natured man, and loved both the king and his family, but he was not turned for buſineſs. Hence the king found it ſo difficult to form an adminiſtration conformable to the temper and views of his two favourites, that notwithſtanding their hatred of Williams, they were obliged, for ſome time, to leave the great ſeal in his cuſtody.

But buſineſs now engaged the whole attention of Buckingham. The marriage of the king, and an attempt to recover the Palatinate, were objects that admitted of no delay; and there was a neceſſity for the parliament to meet in the ſummer. The favourite rightly conceived, that the friendſhip of the young queen, and of her brother's court, would be of the utmoſt importance to him, and he reſolved to omit nothing in his power to gain their confidence. The death of James had prevented him from carrying over Charles's proxy, but he now prepared to execute that commiſſion; and a ſquadron of ſhips was fitted out for bringing over the queen, who had been eſpouſed, with great magnificence, in the king's name, by the earls of Carliſle and Holland.

The recovery of the Palatinate was an affair of much greater difficulty, though the popularity of the queen of Bohemia's cauſe was ſo great, that every obſtacle was ſurmounted: the Engliſh were fond of engaging in the cauſe of their favourite princeſs. Twelve thouſand men were immediately raiſed by the lieutenants of the ſeveral counties. During the march of theſe troops to Portſmouth, a proclamation was iſſued for putting martial law into execution againſt all who ſhould be guilty of ſuch riotous proceedings as had happened among the ſoldiers commanded by count Mansfeldt. The deſtination of theſe troops was as yet a ſecret: it was only known in general, that they were to be employed in the ſervice of the Palatinate; and that they might be diſciplined with greater facility, two thouſand of them were ſent into Holland, and their place ſupplied with an equal number of veterans from that republic.

Before Buckingham ſet out to execute his ſplendid commiſſion in France, he attempted to engage the Dutch to enter heartily into the alliance againſt the houſe of Auſtria. He knew that his maſter was highly incenſed againſt the Hollanders, on account of the late maſſacre at Amboyna, and that the Eaſt-India Company was at that time preſſing the government for letters of repriſal againſt them. But this was not conformable to the views of Buckingham; he was deſirous of engaging as many powers as poſſible in a confederacy againſt the houſe of Auſtria. He had, therefore, already opened a negotiation with the courts of Denmark and Sweden, both well affected to the intereſt of the king of Bohemia. Theſe powers had promiſed to ſupply Charles with as many troops as would be ſufficient to form an army of between thirty and forty thouſand men, eight thouſand of whom were to be cavalry.

In the mean time, cardinal Richelieu began to be jealous of Buckingham's greatneſs: he conſidered that favourite as the only rival he had in Europe. It was neither for his own intereſt, nor that of his maſter, to ſee an Engliſh miniſter form and direct a confederacy, which, after humbling the houſe of Auſtria, might preſcribe terms to that of Bourbon. James had always affected to prevent religion from having any thing to do in the quarrel; but Charles ſoon perceived that this was impoſſible; and the great art of Richelieu conſiſted in dividing the queſtion, by making uſe of the power of England in humbling the houſe of Auſtria, ſo far only as it was convenient to France; and of the houſe of Auſtria in advancing the cauſe of popery, the common intereſt of all the catholic powers. He entered into this deſign with infinite addreſs. He placed his own creatures about the perſon of the Engliſh queen, and filled the court of Charles with ſpies. All theſe had private inſtructions to attempt the ruin of Buckingham, by forming a party againſt him both in the cabinet and the parliament. The earl of Holland, who, by his perſon and addreſs, was formed for a court, was firmly attached to Buckingham, and had found means to penetrate the ſecret of Richelieu's intentions. He immediately revealed it to the Engliſh miniſter, whoſe ſpirit being as loſty as that of the cardinal, made no ſecret of his enmity to Richelieu.

Buckingham reached Paris on the twenty-fourth of May; and by his magnificence, ſpirit, wit, and converſation, attracted the admiration of the French court; and it is certain that their beautiful young queen perceived charms in Buckingham which ſhe could not diſcern in her dull, inanimated huſband. Buckingham ſaw this, and found hardly any other difficulty to his pleaſures than decency, and the want of time to make regular approaches. Stung with jealouſy, proceeding either from love or policy, the haughty cardinal not only ſought an opportunity to ſurprize and diſpatch him in his unlawful amour, but alſo to make Lewis ſenſible of his intended diſhonour. But pleaſure with Buckingham ſeldom excluded buſineſs, and he vigorouſly preſſed the concluſion of the league againſt the houſe of Auſtria. Richelieu, however, took care to lengthen out the negotiation, by a profuſion of pleaſures and honours which were paid the Engliſh miniſter during the ſeven days he reſided at Paris. But Buckingham was not eaſily impoſed upon. He was exaſperated at the remembrance of his alacrity to oblige a people who now ſo ungenerouſly requited him, and perceived that he was narrowly watched in his amour with the queen-conſort. Unuſed to be controuled in any of his actions, and impetuous in all his deſigns, he bore thoſe mortifications with the utmoſt impatience. It is even ſaid, that he was imprudent enough to throw out ſome menaces againſt the French; and that, upon a very frivolous pretence, he returned from Boulogne to Amiens, where he had an interview with the queen of France.

The princeſs Henrietta-Maria, now queen of England, was received with great ſplendor and affection by Charles, who met her at Dover, and conducted her to Canterbury, where the marriage was conſummated. And notwithſtanding the plague raged dreadfully in London, the parliament met at Weſtminſter on the eighteenth of June, where Charles opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne. It was ſimple and cordial. He ſlightly mentioned the occaſion he had for a ſupply, but employed no intrigue to influence the members. He would not even allow the officers of the crown, who had ſeats in the houſe, to mention any particular ſum which might be expected by him. Secure of the affection of the commons, he was reſolved that their bounty ſhould be intirely their own deed, unaſked, unſollicited; the genuine fruit of ſincere confidence and regard.

The buſineſs of the ſupply was accordingly taken into conſideration: but though they knew that all the money granted by the laſt parliament had been expended on naval and military armaments, and that very large anticipations had alſo been made on the revenues of the crown: though they were not ignorant that Charles was loaded with a large debt contracted by his father; that the public revenues were hardly ſufficient for ſupporting the dignity of the crown, even under the ordinary charges of government; and that the preſent war, againſt the whole power of the houſe of Auſtria, had been undertaken by their importunate applications and intreaties; yet they thought proper to grant their young monarch no more than an hundred and twelve thouſand pounds.

This extraordinary reſolution of the parliament was probably occaſioned by the libertine principles and conduct of the duke of Buckingham, who was now become odious for his vices. The marriage of the king with a catholic princeſs had alſo too much diſpleaſed the puritans, to render them indulgent to the court. Independently of theſe motives, the principal members of the lower houſe extended their views to future times. Perſuaded that the power of the crown had been increaſed at the expence of the liberties of the people, their object was to confine it within narrow limits. The neceſſities of the prince were favourable to their deſigns, and of theſe they were willing to avail themſelves. The right of the commons to grant or refuſe the neceſſary ſupplies, they conſidered as an infallible means of gaining the moſt important conceſſions. Theſe meaſures diſconcerted the hopes of the king. He had formed the warmeſt expectations of receiving the moſt convincing proofs of the love of his ſubjects; but found that the ſupplies they granted him were rather a mockery of his wants, than a ſerious deſign of ſupporting him in a war which might juſtly be ſtiled their own.

Aſtoniſhed at this inadequate ſupply, and intirely ignorant of the cauſe, Charles adjourned the parliament to Oxford, on account of the plague, which now made the moſt dreadful ravages in the capital. But the change of place had no influence on the commons. Determined to carry their favourite point with regard to the prerogative, they abſolutely refuſed to make any addition to the ſupply they had voted: even the trifling pittance of forty thouſand pounds was refuſed; though the parliament well knew that a fleet and an army were lying at Portſmouth, in great want of pay and proviſions; and that Buckingham, the admiral, and the treaſurer of the navy, had advanced, on their own credit, near an hundred thouſand pounds for the ſea-ſervice. In vain were all the arguments of the courtiers to prevail over the obſtinacy of the commons. Governed by a ſet of men of the moſt uncommon capacities, and the largeſt views; formed into a regular party, and united by fixed aims and projects, it was impoſſible to change them from their purpoſe. They perſevered in their former reſolution, though the honour of their country among the potentates of Europe demanded very large ſupplies. Among theſe leaders we may mention the names of Sir Edward Coke, Sir Edwin Sandys, Sir Robert Philips, Sir Francis Seymour, Sir Dudley Diggs, Sir John Elliot, Sir Thomas Wentworth, Mr. Selden, Mr. Pym, all men of aſpiring genius and independent fortune.

The king's notions of the prerogative were, however, very different. Full of the lofty notions of monarchical power, Charles, however moderate in his temper, conſidered the refuſal of the commons as of a criminal and traiterous nature; and when he reflected that they were aſked purely to ſupport a war, entered into at their particular requeſt, their behaviour appeared cruel and deceitful. He actually imputed it to a very different principle; for he could not imagine the commons could expect he could carry on the war without ſupplies. A diſcovery was, however, now made, which not only furniſhed the commons with a pretence for their refuſal, but alſo inflamed them againſt the court in general, and the duke of Buckingham in particular.

James had, ſome time ſince, promiſed to furniſh Lewis, who was deſtitute of a naval force, with one ſhip of war, and ſeven armed veſſels hired from the merchants, which the French monarch pretended were to be employed againſt the Genoeſe, the firm allies of Spain. Charles was now called upon to fulfil the engagement, but the French made no ſecret that the ſhips were to be employed againſt the Hugonots in the ſiege of Rochelle. Vice-admiral Pennington was on the coaſt of France with a ſquadron of men of war, and received an order to employ his ſhips in whatever ſervice the French ambaſſador ſhould direct, after filling them with ſoldiers and marines, under the command of the duke of Montmorency. This was no ſooner known, or rather ſuſpected, than the ſhips crews mutinied, and all, except the Vanguard, which Pennington himſelf commanded, ſtood to ſea. The admiral, however, went on ſhore, and offered to go upon any ſervice the French king ſhould order him, but refuſed to receive on board any ſoldiers. This refuſal exaſperated the ambaſſador, and he gave him to underſtand, that he was a priſoner if he did not comply; and at the ſame time informed him, that not more than fifty or ſixty Engliſhmen would be employed in the expedition. It was in vain for Pennington to remonſtrate againſt the cruelty and injuſtice of this proceeding, and to repreſent the uneaſineſs of his ſailors, who would not fail to refuſe obedience to any ſuch commands.

mands. The ambaſſador, however, was reſolute; and Pennington thought it prudent to diſſemble his real ſentiments, that he might recover his ſhip. The ſtratagem ſucceeded; but he was no ſooner on board, than he abſolutely refuſed to leave his ſhip. This produced a long negotiation between the ambaſſador and the admiral. Proteſts were taken againſt the latter; and, in the hearing of his own men, he was threatened with the puniſhment of death, as a traitor to his country. But all the menaces of the Frenchmen were in vain; Pennington refuſed his compliance, and returned with his ſhips to England. He immediately laid the whole tranſaction before the council; and received expreſs orders to deliver up his own, and all the merchant ſhips, to the French king. This was accordingly done; but not an Engliſhman, one gunner only excepted, was found mean enough to ſerve on board the fleet, under a French commiſſion, and againſt their proteſtant brethren.

Theſe tranſactions were no ſooner known in parliament, than the commons ſhewed the ſame attachment with the ſailors for the proteſtant religion. They even carried their zeal to a height that rendered their deliberations at once ridiculous and unjuſt. Montague, one of the king's chaplains, publiſhed a book, which, contrary to the rigid tenets of the puritans, ſaved virtuous catholics, as well as other chriſtians, from eternal torments. It now became evident that thoſe great men, who reaſoned ſo forcibly on the danger of the conſtitution of their country from the increaſing power of the crown, could not reaſon at all on the ſubject of religion. Montague was ordered to be proſecuted, a committee was appointed to conſider of the proceedings againſt him, and the eccleſiaſtic, for having done an important ſervice to the church of England, by exploding the adopted errors of her antagoniſts, was ordered into cuſtody of the ſerjeant, and to give bail of two thouſand pounds for his appearing at the next ſeſſion. It is no wonder that Charles was offended at theſe proceedings, and that he often put them in mind that they had buſineſs of far greater concern to engage their attention. But finding all attempts were in vain, the king diſſolved a parliament from which he had nothing to expect.

Buckingham had now an arduous and dangerous part to act. He was hated by Spain, he was feared by France; he was diſtruſted in Holland; he was unpopular in England. The affections of the king, and his own aſcendency in the cabinet, were all he had now to truſt to, and he therefore determined to increaſe his power, by putting more of his friends into places of conſequence. All the diſſimulation of Williams could not remove Buckingham's hatred. He was deprived of the ſeals, and retired to his biſhopric with great dejection. Charles had afterwards time ſufficient to regret the loſs of his able ſervant, when the heats that afterwards flamed out ſo fatally, and ſeemed to threaten the deſtruction of the kingdom.

But though Buckingham was an enemy to the perſon of Williams, he was in his heart a friend to his principles, and was daily more and more convinced how impracticable it was for the government to oppoſe the people's torrent of zeal againſt popery. The earl of Holland continued to be his faithful correſpondent at the French court, and gave him intelligence how deeply Blanville, the French ambaſſador, was engaged in plotting his deſtruction. The duke determined to return to France in quality of ambaſſador; but the queen having been ſo incautious in her expreſſions of her paſſion for that nobleman, that Lewis abſolutely refuſed to admit him into his territories. This highly exaſperated Buckingham, eſpecially as the court of France refuſed to ſign a ſecret treaty againſt the houſe of Auſtria, unleſs Charles would employ his forces againſt the French proteſtants.

Deſtitute of aſſiſtance from parliament, Charles was obliged to have recourſe to unconſtitutional methods for raiſing money. He iſſued privy-ſeals in order to obtain the neceſſary ſum; but the advantages he gained by this temporary ſupply were more than balanced by the diſguſt it occaſioned. By means, however, of this ſupply he was enabled to fit out a fleet of eighty ſail, on board of which were ten thouſand ſoldiers. Buckingham was very unfortunate in his choice of the officers. Sir Horace Vere had been created a baron of England, and was endowed with every talent requiſite for the command of this armament; but he was no friend to the miniſter. Sir Edward Cecil, who had commanded under count Manſfeldt, was therefore choſen for that office, and immediately created viſcount Wimbledon. Buckingham could not have made a more unfortunate choice. Wimbledon, though a brave field officer, knew nothing of ſea affairs. The public complained loudly that Sir Robert Manſel was neglected; but but they ſhould have remembered that he was engaged in the party formed againſt the miniſter. Nor was Buckingham more fortunate in his choice of the other officers. The earl of Eſſex was appointed to command under Wimbledon, though there actually ſubſiſted ſo great an antipathy between them, that they would have more readily fought with each other than againſt the enemy.

The fleet ſailed on the firſt of October, and a council of war was held off Cape St. Vincent, in order to form a plan for their future operations. The earl of Eſſex naturally gave his voice for attacking Cadiz, the ſcene of his father's glory, and his propoſal being accepted, the whole fleet ſtood towards that port. But by this time all Spain was alarmed, and ſo dreadful to the Spaniards was the remembrance of the Engliſh valour under queen Elizabeth, that their king was ready in perſon to march down at the head of a royal army to the defence of his coaſt. When the Engliſh reached Cadiz, they found every thing in readineſs to give them a warm reception, and the attack of fort Puntal was given to the earl of Eſſex. He advanced with twenty Engliſh and five Dutch ſhips with ſuch impetuoſity, that the Spaniſh ſhipping, which conſiſted of ſeventeen ſtout ſhips and eight or ten gallies, fearing the fatal conſequence of that fort's being taken, retired to Port Real. The fort, however, made a noble defence; and it was found impracticable to take it on the ſide where the attack was made. Upon this Sir John Burroughs, an old Engliſh officer, landed with his regiment, and driving ſome companies of Spaniſh infantry, who had oppoſed his landing back to the fort, the Spaniſh governor thought proper to ſurrender. The taking of this fort was, however, of no other conſequence than as it opened a paſſage to Cadiz itſelf, and commanded a large extent of villages and country round; but the raw Engliſh ſoldiers could not reſiſt the temptation of the new Spaniſh wines; they drank to exceſs, and could not be brought to act with that ſpirit and reſolution neceſſary for rendering the expedition ſucceſsful. At the ſame time diſſentions prevailed among the officers, and diſeaſes among the ſoldiers; ſo that any farther ſtay appearing fruitleſs, the troops were reimbarked, and the fleet put to ſea with a reſolution of waiting for the Spaniſh galleons. But the plague breaking out among the ſeamen and ſoldiers, Cecil was obliged to return to England with infected crews, ſickly companies, a broken reputation, diſheartened officers, and national diſhonour.

A. D. 1626. Charles was crowned on the ſecond of February with great magnificence, and four days after the new parliament met at Weſtminſter, the king being determined to try once more that regular and conſtitutional expedient for obtaining a ſupply. The ſeſſion was opened by the new lord-keeper, Sir Thomas Finch, by a conciſe ſpeech, wherein he acquainted both houſes, that as his majeſty intended the ſeſſion ſhould be very ſhort, he hoped they would make all imaginable diſpatch in granting the ſupplies. But the commons, without paying any regard to the lord-keeper's ſpeech, began an enquiry into the national grievances, at the very point where they had left off the laſt ſeſſion, as if the ſame men had been every where elected, and no time had intervened between their laſt meeting.

Had Charles been left to himſelf he would probably have ſucceeded much better than he did with this parliament. For though he had loſt nothing of his arbitrary notions, yet the neceſſity of his affairs, and his cloſe engagements on the continent, where both his honour and reputation were at ſtake, would certainly have induced him to have made ſuch ſacrifices, as would have brought over to his intereſt that very ſmall number of members, which gave the oppoſition the majority. But Charles was now governed in eccleſiaſtical affairs by Laud, a furious churchman, who, rather than give up one point of uſeleſs ceremony, or immaterial doctrine, was determined to hazard the rights of monarchy, and the tranquillity of his country. The commons indeed voted a ſupply of three ſubſidies and three fifteenths, and afterwards added another ſubſidy; but reſerved the paſſing that vote into a law till the end of the ſeſſion: ſo that if the king refuſed to grant them a ſufficient time to finiſh their inquiry into the national grievances, or refuſed to comply with their demands, he muſt expect no ſupply from the parliament.

It ſoon appeared that the whole ſtorm was intended againſt Buckingham, who was conſidered as the ſource of all the national grievances. Charles foreſaw the conſequence, and endeavoured to ſoften the inquiries of the commons, by ordering Heath, the attorney-general, to ſend letters to the judges, enjoining them to proceed with more vigour than ever againſt the popiſh recuſants. But all orders of that kind were miſtruſted by the commons; and an embargo being at that time laid on all the Engliſh ſhipping in France, the commons ordered an inquiry to be made into the reaſon for ſuch ſtrange proceedings. In anſwer to this inquiry, it was ſaid, that the French had impoſed it upon the Engliſh, in order to indemnify themſelves for the illegal detention of a ſhip belonging to Havre-de-Grace, called the St. Peter, even after an order had been iſſued by the king for her releaſe. But, upon examination, it appeared that there was ſufficient reaſon for this detention, and the inquiry was laid aſide.

The earl of Briſtol, who had now taken his ſeat in parliament, impeached Buckingham, his inveterate enemy; and the commons ſent up, about the ſame time, another impeachment. But however odious the irregularities of the favourite had rendered him, they were not ſuch as would condemn him as a traitor. The commons, however, purſued their deſign with unwearied attention; but the members of the council of war declining to give any anſwers to the queſtions put to them by the commons, it was thought proper to put a ſtop, for ſome time, to the inquiry.

In the mean time, Charles, preſſed by his allies for fulfilling his engagements, was very urgent with the parliament to finiſh the ſupplies. The houſe of peers candidly declared, that it was neceſſary to put the nation in a poſture of defence both by ſea and land; and that count Mansfeldt's army, and the king's allies, ought to be ſupported. Theſe reſolutions were communicated by the upper to the lower houſe; but the commons paid very little attention to them: the ſupporting their charge againſt Buckingham engroſſed all their attentions. In the courſe of this debate, Mr. Coke, ſon to Sir Edward Coke, ſaid, "It was better to die by an enemy than to ſuffer at home;" and Dr. Turner, a phyſician, propoſed the following queſtions againſt Buckingham.

"1. Whether the duke, being admiral of England, be not the cauſe of the king's loſs of his royalty in the narrow ſeas?

"2. Whether the unreaſonable, exorbitant, and immenſe gifts of money and lands beſtowed on the duke and his relations, be not the cauſe of impairing the king's revenue, and impoveriſhing the crown?

"3. Whether the multiplicity of offices beſtowed on the duke, and his dependents, be not the cauſe of the ill government of the kingdom?

"4. Whether recuſants in general be not ſupported and encouraged by the duke's mother and father-in-law, being papiſts?

"5. Whether the ſale of honours, offices, places of judicature, eccleſiaſtical livings, and promotions, be not carried on by the duke?

"6. Whether the duke's ſtaying at home, though admiral of the fleet and general of the land army, was not the cauſe of the miſcarriage of the expedition to Cadiz; and whether he gave proper directions for executing the deſign?"

In the midſt of this debate, the ſpeaker received the following letter from the king:

"Truſty and well-beloved, &c.

"Having aſſembled the parliament early in the beginning of the year, for the more timely help and advice of our people in our great and important affairs; and having of late, not only by meſſage, but alſo of ourſelf, put our houſe of commons in mind of our preſſing occaſions, and of the preſent ſtate of Chriſtendom, wherein they have equal intereſt with us, as well in reſpect to their own former engagements, as of the common cauſe; we ſhall not need to tell them with what care and patience we have, in the midſt of our neceſſities, attended their reſolutions; but becauſe their unſeaſonable ſlowneſs may produce at home as ill effects as a denial, and hazard the whole eſtate of things abroad, we have thought fit by you, the ſpeaker, to let them know, that without more loſs of time, we look for a full and perfect anſwer to what they will give for our ſupply, according to our expectation and their promiſes; wherein, as we preſs for nothing beyond the preſent ſtate and condition of our ſubjects, ſo will we accept no leſs than is proportional to the greatneſs and goodneſs of the cauſe; neither do we preſs them to a preſent reſolution in this, with a purpoſe to precipitate their counſels, much leſs to enter upon their privileges, but to ſhew that it is unfit to depend any longer upon uncertainties, whereby the whole weight of the affairs of Chriſtendom may break in ſuddenly upon us, to our diſhonour and the ſhame of this nation. And for the buſineſs at home, we command you to promiſe them in our name, that after they have ſatisfied us in this reaſonable demand, we ſhall not only continue them together at this time ſo long as the ſeaſon will permit, but call them ſhortly again to perfect thoſe neceſſary buſineſſes which will be now left undone; and now we ſhall willingly apply fit and ſeaſonable remedies to ſuch juſt grievances which they ſhall preſent unto us in a dutiful and mannerly manner, without throwing an ill odour upon our preſent government, or upon the government of our late bleſſed father; and if there be yet who deſire to find fault, we ſhall think him the wiſeſt reprehender of our errors paſt, who, without reflecting backward, can give us counſel how to ſettle the preſent ſtate of things, and to provide for the future ſafety and honour of the kingdom."

To enforce the intention of this letter, Sir Edward Weſton, chancellor of the exchequer, delivered to the houſe the following meſſage.

"1. That his majeſty's fleet being returned, and the victuals expended, the men muſt, of neceſſity, be diſcharged, and their wages paid; otherwiſe a mutiny will be the conſequence, which may, at this time, prove dangerous.

"2. That his majeſty hath fitted out about forty ſhips, for a ſecond attempt againſt the enemy: theſe want only victuals and a few men, but without a preſent ſupply of money, cannot ſail, nor be kept together.

"3. That the army aſſembled on the coaſts muſt ſoon be diſbanded, if they be not ſupplied with victuals and cloaths.

"4. That if the companies lately ſent to Ireland be not provided for, inſtead of defending that country, they will become the authors of rebellion.

“ 5. That the ſeaſon for providing healthful victuals will be paſt, if this month be neglected.

“ His majeſty therefore commanded me to tell you, that he deſired to know, without farther delay, what ſupply you will give him for theſe his preſent occaſions, that he may frame his courſe and council accordingly.”

This meſſage contained ſuch ſtrong reaſons, that, notwithſtanding all the arts of the oppoſition, and the unbounded aſcendency the leaders of it had acquired over the minds of the people, they thought proper to join very readily in the following anſwer to Weſton's meſſage:

“ Moſt gracious ſovereign,

“ Your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons, now aſſembled in parliament, in all humility, preſent unto your royal wiſdom this their loyal anſwer to the meſſage which your majeſty was pleaſed, by the chancellor of your exchequer, to ſend unto them, deſiring to know, without any farther deferring of time, what ſupply they would give to your majeſty for your preſent and extraordinary occaſions, that you might form your courſes and counſels accordingly. Firſt of all, they moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty to know, and reſt aſſured, that no prince was ever dearer to his people than your majeſty; no people more zealous to maintain and advance the honour and greatneſs of their king than they, which, as upon all occaſions they will be ready to expreſs, ſo eſpecially in ſupport of that cauſe wherein your majeſty and your allies are juſtly engaged. And becauſe they cannot doubt but your majeſty, in your great wiſdom, even out of juſtice, and according to the example of your famous predeceſſors, will be pleaſed graciouſly to accept the faithful and neceſſary information and advice of your parliament, which can have no end but the ſervice of your majeſty, and the ſafety of your realm, in diſcovering the cauſes, and propoſing the remedies of thoſe great evils which have occaſioned your majeſty's wants, and your people's grief.

“ They therefore, in confidence and full aſſurance of redreſs therein, do, with one conſent, propoſe (though, in former time, ſuch courſe hath been unuſed) that they really intend to aſſiſt and ſupply your majeſty in ſuch a way, and in ſo ample a manner, as may make you ſafe at home, and feared abroad; for the diſpatch whereof, they will uſe ſuch diligence as your majeſty's preſſing occaſions ſhall require.”

But notwithſtanding this anſwer, inſtead of immediately applying themſelves to finiſh the bill relative to the ſubſidies, they ſtill purſued their favourite project againſt Buckingham; and having voted, upon the queries of Dr. Turner, “ that common fame was a ſufficient ground of accuſation by the commons,” proceeded to frame regular articles againſt the miniſter. They accuſed him “ of having united many offices in his perſon; of having bought two of them; of neglecting to guard the ſeas, ſo that many merchant-ſhips had fallen into the hands of the enemy; of delivering ſhips to the French king, in order to ſerve againſt the Hugonots; of being employed in the ſales of honours and offices; of accepting extenſive grants from the crown; of procuring many titles of honour for his kindred; of adminiſtering phyſic to the late king, without acquainting his phyſicians; of extorting a ſum of ten thouſand pounds from the Eaſt-India Company; and of confiſcating ſome goods belonging to ſome French merchants, under pretence of their being the property of the Spaniards.” Among all theſe accuſations, the two laſt only could be regarded as of any importance; the reſt ſeem to be frivolous, or falſe, or both. But the duke's anſwer to theſe particulars was ſo clear and ſatisfactory, that it is impoſſible to refuſe our aſſent to ir.

Perceiving that the commons were determined to purſue their own meaſures, notwithſtanding the preſſing neceſſities of the ſtate, Charles ordered the lord-keeper to forbid the houſe meddling any farther with his miniſter and ſervant, Buckingham; and ordered them to finiſh, in a few days, the bill they had begun for the ſubſidies; and to make ſome addition to them, otherwiſe they muſt expect to ſit no longer.

This was the language of an eaſtern, rather than an Engliſh monarch: it tended to deſtroy the conſtitution, and to reduce Britons to that abject ſtate of ſlavery known only in the moſt deſpotic kingdoms. It deſtroyed all confidence between the king and his parliament. At the ſame time, he ſent to demand ſatisfaction of Mr. Coke for the words he had ſpoken, and of Dr. Turner for the queries he had preſented to the commons. The houſe was aſtoniſhed at ſuch proceedings; ſome were intimidated with fear; ſome were filled with indignation; ſome with true patriotic zeal for a coalition between the king and his people; and others, inſtigated by a ſecret ambition, rejoiced at this deſpotic language of the king, as it tended to throw every thing into confuſion. Theſe different paſſions produced different effects; and ſo many left the committee, that the committee was obliged to reſume the chair, and it was ordered that no member ſhould leave the houſe without leave.

The alarming circumſtances of the king's meſſage were taken into conſideration. They ſaw Charles lay down a principle, which, unleſs it could be deſtroyed, rendered it impoſſible for parliaments ever to reach the guilty head of a miniſter who enjoyed the favour of his maſter. They preſented a ſpirited remonſtrance to the king, in which they boldly juſtified their proceedings againſt Buckingham, as being founded upon precedents, and conſiſtent with every principle of natural liberty and ſafety: and concluded with putting the king in mind how readily they had agreed to grant him a ſupply, and requeſted his majeſty not to be prejudiced againſt their proceedings. But neither theſe meſſages nor remonſtrances had any power to withdraw the attention of the commons from their favourite project, that of ſupporting their articles of impeachment againſt Buckingham; though they muſt have known, that few of the articles exhibited againſt him contained real crimes, and that theſe were impoſſible to be proved. It is, indeed, ſurprizing, that men of ſuch remarkable abilities as the leaders of the houſe of commons were, inveterate in their hatred, and keen in their purſuit of a favourite miniſter, young and giddy at his entrance into power, bold and inſolent in its exerciſe, unfortunate and diſappointed in his meaſures, ſhould find ſo little real matter againſt him, during the ſpace of almoſt fourteen years. The truth is, that Buckingham had always been faithful to his maſters; and had been ſometimes, to gratify their arbitrary inclinations, forced upon meaſures his judgment diſapproved; and he had, for ſome years, been ſtruggling in vain againſt the tide of popular fury. The breath of the king, inſtead of diſſipating, ſwelled the ſtorm. It was now agreed to demand of the lords that Buckingham ſhould be committed to ſafe cuſtody. When this meſſage was delivered to the upper houſe, the duke addreſſed the lords in the following manner:

“ My lords,

“ If I hold my peace, it will argue guilt; if I
“ ſpeak, it will argue boldneſs, when accuſed of ſo
“ many crimes. Your lordſhips ſee what complaints
“ are made againſt me by the houſe of commons.
“ How well I ſtood in their opinion not long ſince,
“ your lordſhips well know: what I have done ſince
“ to loſe their good opinion, I proteſt I am intirely “ ignorant. I cannot ſo greatly diſtruſt my own “ innocency, and my heart, which abhors guilt, as “ to decline any courſe, or court of juſtice; and had
“ they not brought my cauſe before your lordſhips;
“ it would have been my own work: they have done
“ me a favour, by delivering me out of their hands “ into thoſe of your lordſhips.

“ I will not endeavour to throw any reflection on “ thoſe who have taken pains to repreſent me in ſo

“ vile a light; it will be ſufficient for me to proteſt my innocence, which I hope to prove, as the cauſe is now before juſt judges: I deſire that my trial may be haſtened, that I may ſuffer no longer than is abſolutely neceſſary: and as my accuſers have not been content with my proceſs only, but to preſcribe to your lordſhips the manner of your judgment, and to puniſh me before I am heard, I ſhall not give way to any of their unjuſt demands.”

About this time, the earl of Suffolk, chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, died; and Buckingham, though then under impeachment, was choſen in his place. The commons reſented, and loudly complained of this affront; but the king was ſo far from regarding the cenſure of the commons, that he wrote a letter to the univerſity, extolling the duke, and giving them thanks for his election.

Two members of the houſe, Sir Dudley Digges, and Sir John Elliot, who had been employed as managers of the impeachment againſt Buckingham, were ſent to the Tower. This highly exaſperated the commons, who immediately declared, that they would proceed no farther upon buſineſs till they had received ſatisfaction with regard to their privileges. Charles alledged, as a reaſon for this violent meaſure, certain ſeditious expreſſions, which, he ſaid, had dropped from thoſe members in their accuſation of the duke. Upon inquiry, it appeared that no ſuch expreſſions had been uſed; upon which the members were releaſed; and the king reaped no farther benefit from this attempt than to exaſperate the houſe ſtill farther; and to ſhew, that notwithſtanding his character for ſolid reflection, he was ſometimes capable of precipitate indiſcretion.

The example of the houſe of commons was now imitated by the peers. They claimed liberty for the earl of Arundel, who had been lately ſent to the Tower. The king made ſeveral attempts to elude the demand of the lords, but was at laſt obliged to comply, and the earl was accordingly releaſed from his confinement.

Charles having complied with the demand of the commons, with regard to the diſcharge of their members, and even declared that he had been impoſed upon, there were no plauſibla reaſons for with-holding the ſupplies. A great majority of the houſe would readily have paſſed the bill, but were oppoſed by others who had formed dangerous views: a firm coalition between the king and parliament was repugnant to their intentions. Theſe turbulent members began by intimating, that they had ſome doubts whether the money would be properly applied, and whether there was any real intention of ſending out the fleet that year. Theſe inſinuations were at once both groundleſs and malicious, yet many events concurred to render them poſſible. The king had as yet given them no ſatisfaction, nor even an anſwer to their remonſtrance. The houſe of peers had refuſed to proceed againſt Buckingham, or even to admit that he might be criminal, by ſending him to the Tower. The French court had made peace with the Hugonots, by the mediation of the Engliſh ambaſſadors: they had paid off, and ſent home, the Engliſh ſhips employed in their ſervice; they had taken off the embargo laid on the Engliſh merchantmen; and, after renewing the treaty of 1610, ſeemed entirely diſpoſed to act with vigour againſt the houſe of Auſtria. For this purpoſe, Lewis had offered to make a diverſion, with twenty-five thouſand men, in Germany; and to continue the war, if neceſſary, for four years to come, provided England would enter into the ſame engagements; but refuſed to be concerned any farther againſt the houſe of Auſtria, than the reinſtating the palatine, and other deprived German princes, in their dominions. From theſe circumſtances the diſcontented members took the opportunity of urging, that there would be no occaſion for the operations of the fleet, and that the houſe ought to be very careful how they granted money for that purpoſe. Theſe artful ſpeeches made a viſible impreſſion to the diſadvantage of the court, and the commons ſeemed perſuaded that the ſupply was not neceſſary. Charles endeavoured to quicken their proceedings by meſſages; and even proceeded ſo far as to threaten the commons, that if they did not furniſh him with the ſupplies, he ſhould be obliged to have recourſe to “new councils.” This language could not be miſtaken; but leſt any of the members ſhould conſider it as ambiguous, Sir Dudley Carleton, vice-chamberlain, took ſome pains to exexplain it fully. “I pray you conſider (ſaid he) what theſe new councils are. I fear to declare thoſe that I conceive. In all chriſtian kingdoms you know that parliaments were formerly in uſe, by which thoſe kingdoms were governed in a moſt flouriſhing manner; until the monarchs began to know their own ſtrength, and ſeeing the turbulent ſpirit of their parliaments, at length they, by little and little, began to ſtand on their prerogatives, and at laſt overthrew the parliaments throughout Chriſtendom, except here only with us.----Let us be careful, then, to preſerve the king's good opinion of parliaments, which bringeth ſuch happineſs to this nation, and makes us envied of all others, while there is this ſweetneſs between his majeſty and the commons; leſt we loſe the repute of a free people by our turbulence in parliament.” Theſe imprudent ſuggeſtions rather gave the commons warning of the deſigns formed againſt them, than ſtruck them with terror. They conſidered a precarious liberty, or that preſerved by unlimited complaiſance, as no liberty at all. They were determined to preſerve the ſubſtance, or loſe the ſhadow. Inſtead, therefore, of paſſing the bill for the ſupplies, they renewed their inquiries into grievances; they ordered the houſe to be called over, and all abſent members to be puniſhed.

The never-failing cry of popiſh recuſants was revived; and the nation ſaid to be in danger, from their unwearied endeavours to re-eſtabliſh the catholic religion in England. But their attack on the revenues of the crown was the moſt dangerous. They entered on a remonſtrance againſt the levying of tonnage and poundage without conſent of parliament. This article, together with the new impoſitions laid on merchandize by James, conſtituted near one half of the royal revenues. This attack, therefore, had it ſucceeded, muſt have proved deciſive; and as they were not able to fix any legal crime upon Buckingham, they intended to preſent a petition to his majeſty for removing him from his perſon and councils. To preſerve, however, the appearance of moderation, the ſubſidy bill was again read, but kept in ſuch ſuſpence as ſufficiently indicated, that if all the grievances preſented by the commons were not removed, the bill would never paſs into a law.

Alarmed at theſe proceedings, Charles determined to diſſolve the parliament. The lords endeavoured to diſſuade him from this reſolution, but in vain; the king was determined; and when they petitioned him, that he would allow the parliament to ſit ſome time longer, he anſwered, in a very haſty manner, “Not a moment longer.” The commons had juſt finiſhed their remonſtrance when the king carried his threats into execution, by diſſolving the parliament, before they had completed a ſingle act.

The remonſtrance of the commons began with a kind of recapitulation of the reaſons why the preſent and former parliament had been in a manner abortive, and the whole blame thrown upon Buckingham. Among other things they charged him with appointing Sir Edward Coke, and ſeveral other leading members againſt him, ſheriffs of counties, in order to diſqualify them from ſerving their country in parliament; and for ſending Mr. Glanvill abroad, as ſecretary of the fleet, for the ſame purpoſe. They afterwards declared it was their firm reſolution to have ſignally ſupported his majeſty in the proſecution of the war, had not all their intentions been blaſted by the enormities of Buckingham, whoſe crimes they ſum up in the following manner. "We found, ſay they, that the moſt preſſing and comprehenſive miſchief and grievance ſuffered by the late king, was fundamentally ſettled in the vaſt paſt power and enormous actions of the ſaid duke, being ſuch, by reaſon of his plurality of offices; ſome procured by ambition, and ſome by money, expreſsly againſt the laws of your majeſty's realm; his breach of truſt in not guarding the ſeas; his high injuſtice in the admiralty; his extortion; his delivering over the ſhips of this kingdom into the hands of a foreign prince; his procuring the compulſory buying of honour for his own gain; his unexampled exhauſting of the treaſures and revenues of the kingdom; his tranſcendant preſumption of that unhappy application of phyſic to your royal father of bleſſed memory, ſome few days before his death; of theſe and ſome other of his offences carefully examined by us, we made a parliamentary charge againſt him to the lords, by your majeſty aſſembled in parliament, there expecting ſome remedy by a ſpeedy proceeding againſt him; but may it pleaſe your moſt excellent majeſty, not only during the time of our examination of the matters and offences of the ſaid charge, we were often interrupted and diverted by meſſages, procured, through miſinformation, from your majeſty, which with moſt humble duty and reverence we did ever receive, whence it firſt fell out that ſo, not only much time was ſpent among us, before the ſaid charge was perfected, but alſo within two days after the ſame charge was tranſmitted by us to the lords, two of our members, Sir Dudley Digges, and Sir John Elliot, upon untrue and malicious informations, privately and againſt the privilege of parliaments, given to your majeſty of certain words, were by your majeſty's command committed to cloſe impriſonment in the Tower of London, their lodgings preſently ſearched, and their papers taken away; by reaſon whereof not only our known privileges of parliament were infringed, but we ourſelves, who in full hopes of ſpeedy courſe of juſtice againſt the ſaid duke, were preparing with all dutiful affection to proceed to diſpatch the ſupply and other ſervices of your majeſty, were wholly, as the courſe and privilege of parliament bind us, employed for ſeveral days in taking into conſideration the proper methods to be purſued for the ratifying and preſerving the privileges ſo infringed."

They next complain of the inſolence of lord Conway, ſecretary of ſtate, who had ordered the meſſengers, who, by their warrants, were to have apprehended the members at their lodgings, to ſeize them in the very houſe of commons. This outrage they alſo charge upon the duke, as they do all the interruptions they received, when they were well diſpoſed to grant the ſupply. They next attack that nobleman for procuring himſelf to be elected chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, becauſe, ſay they, the ſame univerſity, having two burgeſſes in parliament, did, by the ſame burgeſſes, a few weeks before, conſent with us in the charge againſt him, for his ambition in procuring ſuch a plurality of offices; ſuch was his ambition to ſue for it; ſuch was his power to make them give it him, contrary to what they had agreed in parliament with all the commons of England." They next charge him "with having ſcreened Montague, and deſpair of being able to do any thing for the public ſervice, while Buckingham remained in poſſeſſion of his power, continued to abuſe the confidence of his majeſty, and enjoyed the arbitrary diſpoſal of rewards and puniſhments to all ranks of people. They promiſe to reply to this anſwer to the articles they had exhibited againſt him. They tremble to think of the conſequences that muſt attend his majeſty's following new councils, as he had intimated, if, by new councils, he meant to govern and raiſe money without conſent of parliament. They added, that they had reaſon to fear, that this was really his meaning, or perhaps that of his miniſter, "the rather, ſay they, becauſe the ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, which determined on the death of your moſt royal father, our late ſovereign, and were never payable to any of your majeſty's anceſtors, but only by a ſpecial act of parliament, and ought not to be levied without ſuch an act; yet, ever ſince the beginning of your majeſty's happy reign over us, the ſaid ſubſidies have been levied by ſome of your majeſty's miniſters, as if they were ſtill due; altho' one parliament hath ſince that time been held and diſſolved, by procurement of the ſaid duke, wherein no act paſſed for the ſame ſubſidies. Which example is ſo much againſt the conſtant uſe of former times, and the known right and liberty of your ſubjects, that it is an apparent effect of ſome new counſels, given againſt the ancient ſettled courſe of government of this your majeſty's kingdom, and chiefly againſt the right of your commons, as if there might be any ſubſidy, tax, or aid levied upon them, without their conſent in parliament, or contrary to the ſettled laws of the kingdom. But if any ſuch do ſo ill uſe an office, as by the miſrepreſentation of the ſtate and right of your majeſty's loyal ſubjects, adviſe any ſuch new counſels, as the levying any aid, tax, or ſubſidy, among your people, contrary to the ſettled laws of your kingdom, we cannot, moſt gracious ſovereign, but eſteem thoſe who ſhall adviſe, not only as vipers, but peſts to their king and commonwealth, and alſo capital enemies as well to your crown and dignity, as to the commonwealth. And we ſhall, for our parts, ſhew, in parliament, as occaſion may require, and be ready to declare their offences of this kind ſuch, as may be rewarded with the higheſt puniſhment your laws inflict on any offenders."

The concluſion of this remonſtrance has ſomething in it very great, and very pathetic. After laying before the king the dangers and miſeries which muſt attend his continuing to place his confidence in this ſingle miniſter, they proceed in the following manner: "Give us then leave, moſt dear ſovereign, in the name of all the commons of this your kingdom, proſtrate at the feet of your ſacred majeſty, moſt humbly to beſeech you, even for the honour of Almighty God, whoſe religion is directly undermined by the practice of that party whom this duke ſupports; for your honour, which will be much advanced in the relieving your people in this their great and general grievance; for the honour, ſafety, and welfare of your kingdom, which by this means is threatened with almoſt unavoidable dangers; and for the love which your majeſty, as a good and loving father, bears unto your good people, to whom we profeſs, in the preſence of Almighty God, the ſearcher of all hearts, you are as highly eſteemed and beloved, as ever any of your predeceſſors were, that you would be graciouſly pleaſed to remove this perſon from having acceſs to your ſacred preſence, and that you would not balance this one man with all theſe things, and with the affairs of the Chriſtian world, which do all ſuffer, ſo far as they have relation to this kingdom, chiefly by his means. For we proteſt to your majeſty, and to the whole world, that until this perſon be removed from intermeddling in the great affairs of ſtate, we are out of hope of any good ſucceſs; and do fear, that whatever money we can or ſhall give, will, through his miſmanagement, be turned rather to the hurt and prejudice of this your kingdom than otherwiſe; as by lamentable experience we have found in thoſe large ſupplies we have formerly and lately given.

"But no ſooner ſhall we receive redreſs and relief in this, which, of all others, is the moſt inſupportable grievance, but we ſhall forthwith proceed to accompliſh your majeſty's own deſire, for ſupply; and likewiſe, with all chearfulneſs, apply ourſelves to the perfecting of divers other great things, ſuch as we think no one parliament in one age can parallel, tending to the ſtability, wealth, ſtrength and honour of this your kingdom, and the ſupport of your friends and allies abroad: and we doubt not but through God's bleſſing, as you are the beſt, ſo ſhall you be the beſt beloved and the greateſt monarch that ever ſat on the royal throne of this famous kingdom."

Such was the famous remonſtrance of this parliament. The commons intended to have preſented it to the king, but being prevented from carrying their deſign into execution, they cauſed it to be diſperſed among the people in juſtification of their conduct. Charles was no ſtranger to its contents, but determined not to make the ſacrifice requeſted of him. He thought that the great guilt of Buckingham conſiſted in being his friend and favourite: All the other complaints againſt him he conſidered as mere pretences. A few months before he was the idol of the people; and no new crime had ſince been pretended to be diſcovered. After the moſt diligent enquiry, prompted by the greateſt malice, the ſmalleſt appearance of guilt could not be fixed upon him. What idea, he aſked, muſt all mankind entertain of his honour, ſhould he ſacrifice his innocent friend to pecuniary conſiderations? What farther authority would he entertain in this nation, were he capable, in the very beginning of his reign, to give, in ſo ſignal an inſtance, ſuch matter of triumph to his enemies, and diſcouragement to his friends? Indeed the whole charge againſt Buckingham was ſo general, that it might have been thrown out againſt a virtuous as well as a wicked miniſter. It was equally abſurd in them to ſuppoſe, that the act of the two members for the univerſity of Cambridge, was the act of the univerſity itſelf; nor did the repreſentatives of that body, by agreeing or not agreeing to the charge againſt the duke, make it more or leſs binding upon the univerſity to approve or diſapprove of the ſame charge. The raiſing of tonnage and poundage, without conſent of parliament, was indeed a ſtrong and an alarming circumſtance, and laid, as it were, the axe to the root of liberty. An Engliſh houſe of commons could not, therefore, be too loud upon this head; they acted as true patriots, when, while ſuch an arbitrary meaſure was purſuing, they made the poſt of honour the place of danger, and poured out the vials of public indignation againſt any miniſter, guilty or not guilty, who ſhould dare to ſerve a prince that avowed ſuch dangerous principles.

The government alſo diſperſed a declaration, ſhewing the reaſons which induced the king to diſſolve the two laſt parliaments; but it is one of the weakeſt pieces ever publiſhed by any miniſtry. It contains nothing in anſwer to thoſe ſtrong facts and principles which had been urged by the commons in their remonſtrances; it conſiſted of particulars which no body pretended to deny, namely, That the king by the advice of his parliament, had been engaged in a war with the houſe of Auſtria; that this war had been attended with great expence; that he had called the two laſt parliaments for furniſhing him with ſupplies for carrying on the war; that he had preſſed them again and again for that purpoſe; and that being always diſappointed in his expectations, he had diſſolved them. Theſe were facts never diſputed; nor did the moſt violent oppoſers of the court ever deny, that the occaſions for ſtrengthening the hands of his majeſty were great and urgent. But the true queſtions were, whether the foreign war was of ſo much importance, as to interpoſe between them and every thing that ought to be dear to a free people? Whether they ought to ſupport a prince, who threw his favourite into one ſcale as a counterpoiſe againſt his parliament in the other? Whether this favourite, ſole and ſupreme as he was, might not, when poſſeſſed of money granted by the parliament, make uſe of it to rivet thoſe chains he was then forging, and to eſtabliſh the principles his maſter had avowed? Charles in all his papers and declarations, gave no conſtitutional ſatisfaction as to any one of thoſe doubts, and his ſilence admitted of the worſt conſtruction.

The new councils which Charles had threatened were now to be tried, in order to ſupply his neceſſities. Had he immediately made peace with Spain, he might perhaps have found the neceſſary reſources to have ſupported the expences of government in times of peace. Nothing could be more eaſy in the execution than this meaſure, nor more agreeable both to his own and the national intereſt. But beſides the treaties and engagements which he had entered into with Holland and Denmark, the king's thoughts were at this time entirely averſe to pacific counſels. He was determined to carry on the war, and to feed it by opening the ſluices of prerogative. He was always perſuaded that he had much leſs to fear from the papiſts than the puritans; and to take away the great objection which the latter urged for exclaiming againſt the violent part of the church of England, he iſſued a proclamation againſt preaching or diſputing either for or againſt the religious tenets of Arminius. It was long before Buckingham could gain this point; and perhaps no prince ever committed more folly than James and Charles did, in ſo long ſupporting the principles of the Anti-Arminians, contrary to their own private opinions, and to the ſenſe of almoſt every man to whom they truſted for the advancement of their meaſures.

The attention of the council was now entirely engaged in forming meaſures for raiſing the ſupplies neceſſary for carrying on the war, and it was reſolved that the king might continue to levy all thoſe duties upon goods and merchandize, called by the ſeveral names of cuſtoms, ſubſidies, and impoſts, in the ſame manner as they had been levied during the late reign. The other proceedings of the government were of the ſame kind. It was well known that nothing could be more diſagreeable to the people of England, than the leaſt attempt to favour popery; yet the king granted a commiſſion to the archbiſhop of York, Sir John Saville, and others, "to treat and make compoſitions with the ſaid recuſants for all forfeitures in not going to church, under ſuch conconditions and immunities as they ſhall ſee meet and convenient, according to ſuch inſtructions as his majeſty hath, or ſhall give for that purpoſe: his majeſty rather deſiring their converſion than deſtruction."

Charles was perſuaded that he could not effect a more popular action, than to increaſe the ſtrength of the royal navy; and in the commiſſion for compounding with the recuſants, he had aſſigned the neceſſity of guarding the northern ports, as the reaſon for his appropriating the compoſition-money to himſelf. Advantage was alſo taken of ſome precedents, by no means applicable to the preſent times, for charging the ſea-ports with certain ſums of money for fitting out ſhips. This demand fell heavy upon the city of London, which was ordered to fit out twenty ſhips. But the king ſoon perceived that this meaſure would be attended with ſome difficulty. Not only the capital, but the deputy-lieutenants and juſtices of Dorſetſhire, remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt this impoſition, which they conceived to be without precedent. This ſufficiently ſhewed that they were little converſant in Engliſh hiſtory; as many precedents occur, though they were in themſelves either tyrannical, obſolete, or warranted by immediate neceſſity. They were, however, to be found; and the council conſidering them as ſufficient for their purpoſe, rejected all petitions, and particularly that of the city of London, to have this impoſition abated.

To increaſe the appearances of neceſſity, Charles augmented the wages of his ſailors from fourteen to twenty ſhillings a month; and publiſhed ſeveral proclamations, giving them other encouragements. At the ſame time, rigorous directions were iſſued for putting all the ſea-coaſts, and the principal fortreſſes of the kingdom, in a poſture of defence, as if an actual invaſion or rebellion had already taken place. Nothing was ſeen throughout the kingdom but muſters and arrays of forces; and the military law, with all its terrors, was ſuſpended over the heads of the aſtoniſhed people.

It was not, indeed, long before Charles had occaſion for all theſe precautions, though the event was not, perhaps, foreſeen. He had paid the king of Denmark large ſubſidies; and that prince, by his encouragement, having, for ſome time, acted as the patron of the Germanic liberty, had marched his army towards the Weſer, where he took Minden and Hamelin; but upon the approach of count Tilly, at the head of an army of veteran imperialiſts, he retired towards Ferden, to wait the arrival of Manſfeldt with twelve thouſand Engliſh and Dutch forces. While he remained in that ſituation, he had ſeveral ſkirmiſhes with the imperialiſts, who were ordered to keep him fully employed, till the emperor could place the crown of Hungary on the head of his eldeſt ſon. This coronation exaſperated the famous Bethlem Gabor, a prince of Tranſylvania, who aſpired to the throne of Hungary, and propoſed to enter into the league formed againſt the houſe of Auſtria. His offer was accepted; and it was agreed that he ſhould invade Hungary, and be joined by the troops under count Manſfeldt, as ſoon as he arrived in Sileſia. But before this could be effected, the emperor had aſſembled one army on the Weſer, another under the famous Wallenſtein on the frontiers of Sileſia, and a third under count Tilly in Lower Saxony. This obliged the king of Denmark to divide his army, which, by the junction of Manſfeldt and the German princes, was now increaſed to ſixty thouſand men, into three bodies. The firſt, commanded by duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick, was to act upon the Weſer; the ſecond by Manſfeldt, was to oppoſe Wallenſtein, and, if poſſible, force a paſſage into Sileſia; and the third, commanded by the king of Denmark in perſon, was to act in the intermediate ſpace between the other two. The active count Manſfeldt, in his route to Sileſia, made himſelf maſter of the whole province of Magdebourg, before Wallenſtein could come up to oppoſe him; but being ſtopped by general Altringer at Deſſau upon the Elbe, Wallenſtein had time to march to the relief of the place; and falling upon his army, obliged Manſfeldt to retire, with the loſs of the greater part of his infantry, baggage and artillery, into the marquiſate of Brandenburgh. Manſfeldt did not, however, abandon his principal deſign, that of penetrating into Sileſia, and gaining ſome marches upon Wallenſtein. He was ſo induſtrious, that he ſoon recruited his army, which now conſiſted of twenty-five thouſand men, and advanced, at their head, to join Bethlem Gabor. But that prince, upon the firſt news of Manſfeldt's defeat, made peace with the emperor. This behaviour ſo greatly diſguſted Manſfeldt, that he reſigned the command of his troops to duke Erneſt of Saxe Weimar, and retired to Buda, whence he ſet out for Venice, but died on his journey in an obſcure village of Dalmatia. About the ſame time, the brave duke Chriſtian of Brunſwick, who commanded another diviſion of the confederate army, paid the debt of nature; and ſoon after, the duke of Saxe Weimar, Manſfeldt's ſucceſſor. The loſs of thoſe three great generals was irreparable to the confederates, whoſe hopes now intirely centered in the king of Denmark. Tilly, who had all this time watched the motions of that prince, had now retaken Minden and ſome other places; but was very near being ſurprized in his camp by the king of Denmark, at a time when he thought that prince was at thirty leagues diſtance. But Tilly, after making a maſterly retreat, was reinforced by ſo great a body of veterans, that the king of Denmark, who had no great opinion of his own new-raiſed troops, would, in his turn, have gladly declined a battle; but this was impoſſible. The conteſt was very bloody, but ended in favour of the imperial general; and the king was obliged to retire, with the loſs of his baggage and artillery, towards Holſtein. Three thouſand men of the confederate army were ſlain on the field of battle, and three thouſand taken priſoners.

Charles no ſooner heard of the defeat of the king of Denmark, than he redoubled his endeavours to obtain ſupplies. He had ſent a ſquadron of ſhips to lie at the mouth of the Elbe, to prevent the Spaniards from furniſhing themſelves with naval ſtores from that country. But this not only exaſperated the Hamburghers, whoſe commerce was thereby greatly leſſened, but the attempt itſelf was ineffectual, becauſe the enemy was ſupplied from Lubec; and the paſſage of the Sound was left open. The ſquadron was therefore recalled at the interceſſion of the Hamburgh merchants. The public did not fail to make their own reflections upon theſe inconſiſtent diſpoſitions of the court; for either the deſtination of the ſquadron had been improper, or the recalling of it impolitic.

But the truth is, the object of Buckingham's reſentment was changed. Beſides his paſſion for the young queen of France, and his reſentment at the refuſal of Lewis to receive him as ambaſſador, he had the greateſt reaſons to watch the conduct of cardinal Richelieu. The proteſtants of France had accepted the peace, under the guaranty of the king of England. By concluding this treaty, Charles committed a great political error. He gave peace to France, hoping that France would then join him againſt the Spaniards; but he was deceived. Inſtead of fulfilling their promiſes, they made uſe of this tranquillity as an argument for extorting advantageous terms from Spain. Richelieu, the better to conceal his real intentions from the allies during this negotiation, had procured the prince of Piedmont to be appointed lieutenant-general of the French armies in foreign parts: preparations were made in every province of France; and it was expected that the ſtorm, which had been ſo long gathering, would ſoon burſt upon the houſe of Auſtria. But no ſuch thing was intended: for, in a few days, it was publicly known, that a peace had been concluded between France and Spain. This perfidious conduct raiſed Richelieu many enemies, particularly the duke of Savoy, and the duke of Orleans, brother to the king. The former was now left expoſed to the vengeance of the Spaniards; and the latter, for reaſons foreign to this hiſtory, was more exaſperated againſt the miniſter than ever. But Richelieu's fortune roſe ſuperior to all difficulties. Fearful of a correſpondence between England and the duke de Vendôme, governor of Britany, which lay ſo convenient for a deſcent from England, he prevailed upon Lewis to undertake a journey into that province, where he cauſed the duke of Vendôme to be arreſted. But the moſt active agent againſt Richelieu was the abbot of Scaglia, ambaſſador in England from the duke of Savoy, a reſtleſs, intriguing miniſter, who hated Richelieu, and was now become very intimate with Buckingham. This produced a ſecret correſpondence between England, the court of Savoy, and the duke of Rohan, head of the French Hugonots, who were now convinced that all the great preparations in France were intended againſt Rochelle, the principal place in their poſſeſſion.

It was not difficult for the abbot of Scaglia, by the aſſiſtance of Buckingham, and the duke of Soubiſe, who managed the affairs of the French Hugonots in England, to inſpire Charles with a contemptible opinion of the duplicity of the French court; and to perſuade him, that having now loſt all hopes of prevailing upon Lewis to join in the alliance againſt the houſe of Auſtria, he ought to revive the ancient policy of England, in preventing the total ruin of the Hugonots. The abbot gave him the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of his maſter's friendſhip and aſſiſtance; and it was accordingly determined to ſupport the proteſtants of France.

But ſupplies were wanting to pay both the fleet and the army; the neceſſities of Charles increaſed as his extenſive engagements were augmented. It was therefore determined to have recourſe to a general loan, in which every man was to be aſſeſſed according to the rolls of the laſt ſubſidy. But this expedient anſwered not the intentions of the miniſter: the people refuſed to ſubſcribe to the loan, and the whole country became a ſcene of confuſion. Among other articles of ſecret inſtruction, the commiſſioners appointed to levy theſe loans were enjoined, "If any man ſhall refuſe to lend, and ſhall make delays or excuſes, and perſiſt in his obſtinacy, that they examine him upon oath, whether he has been dealt with to deny or refuſe to lend, or make any excuſe for not lending? Who has dealt with him, and what ſpeeches or perſuaſions were uſed for that purpoſe? And that they alſo charge every ſuch perſon in his majeſty's name, upon his allegiance, not to diſcloſe to any one what his anſwer was." It is aſtoniſhing that the king could be prevailed upon to ſuffer ſo impracticable an attempt to be made by his officers. A very little reflection would have been abundantly ſufficient to have convinced him, that the ſecrecy he enjoined was impoſſible; and that ſo violent an inquiſitorial power could not fail of exciting the indignation of his ſubjects.

The conſequence was what might naturally be expected. The principal leaders in the late parliament, and others who had adopted their ſentiments, refuſed to ſubmit to an impoſition not agreed to by the legiſlature. Moſt of them were thrown into priſon; the goals were filled with illuſtrious offenders. All who petitioned the clemency of the king were releaſed; but five gentlemen, Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, and Sir Edmund Hambden, not only refuſed to ſollicit the clemency of his majeſty, but boldly demanded their releaſement, not as a favour from the court, but as a right derived from the laws of their country. The queſtion was at laſt ſolemnly argued in the court of King's-bench, when it appeared, beyond contradiction, that the perſonal liberty of the ſubject had been ſecured againſt the arbitrary power of the crown by ſix ſeveral acts of parliament, beſides an article of the great charter itſelf, the moſt ſacred foundation of the laws and conſtitution of England. The judges, however, thought proper to remand the gentlemen to their priſons, though they refuſed to enter a general judgment, that no bail could be granted upon a commitment of the king or council. But liberty loſes not her nature by confinement: her voice was heard from all quarters of the kingdom, and became much louder than thoſe of venal purſuivants, who ſpread the king's proclamations to excite terrors.

Nor was impriſonment the only engine employed by the government to force the people to ſubmit to the arbitrary orders of the court: recourſe was alſo had to religious prejudices: the duty of unlimited obedience was preached from the pulpit. Manwaring, one of his majeſty's chaplains, diſtinguiſhed himſelf on this occaſion. Among other curious paſſages in his elaborate diſcourſes, the following are remarkable: "That the king is not bound to obſerve the laws of the realm, concerning the ſubjects rights and liberties; but that his royal will and command in impoſing loans and taxes, without the common conſent of parliament, is ſufficient to oblige the conſcience of the ſubject, under pain of eternal damnation. That thoſe who refuſed to pay this loan, offended againſt the law of God, and the king's ſupreme authority, and became guilty of impiety, diſloyalty, and rebellion. That the authority of parliament is not neceſſary for the raiſing of aids and ſubſidies; and that the ſlow proceedings of ſuch numerous aſſemblies are not fitted for the ſupply of the ſtate's urgent neceſſities, but would rather occaſion many impediments to the juſt deſigns of princes." Sibthorpe was another divine that exerted all his abilities in recommending the ſame ſlaviſh tenets. Abbot, archbiſhop of Canterbury, refuſed to licenſe theſe ſermons. This was conſidered as ſo heinous an offence, that the prelate was ſuſpended from the exerciſe of his office, and confined to one of his country-ſeats. This ſequeſtration and confinement of the firſt peer and prelate of England, were alarming monuments of Buckingham's power over the mind of his maſter. The archbiſhop had always acted with the greateſt moderation, and was conſidered by the public as a ſincere friend to the liberties of his country; but he could never be brought to offer incenſe to the favourite miniſter, and this marked him out as an object of diſgrace.

Even an indifference in the ſervice of deſpotic purpoſes was now conſidered as criminal by the government. Sir Randal Carew was removed from his poſt of lord chief juſtice of the King's-bench for his coldneſs in promoting the loan; and Williams, the late lord-keeper, whoſe great abilities had rendered him a favourite of the people, was not ſuffered to enjoy the retirement he had choſen. He was conſidered as an encourager of the puritans; for every perſon who favoured the cauſe of liberty, whatever his religious tenets might be, was branded with that epithet, and was conſidered by the miniſter as an enemy to the government.

While the people were thus haraſſed with perſecutions with regard to the loan, vigorous preparations were making for covering the ſeas with armaments. The duke of Soubiſe, who was then in England, received a commiſſion from Charles for employing the ſhips fitted out by the Hugonots in his ſervice, and for cruiſing on the Spaniards. This occaſioned great confuſion in the buſineſs of the Engliſh admiralty, where it was difficult to diſtinguiſh between the prizes made by the Engliſh and thoſe taken by the French proteſtants.

A. D. 1627. The French court was in a very bad condition to ſupport a war againſt England; but all the catholics in the kingdom were united, and deſirous of exerting all their power againſt the enemies of their religion. On the other hand, the unpopularity of Buckingham, the high exertion of the prerogative, and the impriſonment of ſome of the worthieſt men in England, rendered the ſincereſt intentions of Charles diſtruſted: nothing could be expected from the efforts of a nation divided within itſelf. A fleet of one hundred ſail, having on board an army of ſeven thouſand men, were fitted out for the invaſion of France; and both intruſted to the command of the duke of Buckingham, though he was wholly unacquainted both with the land and ſea-ſervice.

The fleet appeared before Rochelle; but the inhabitants of that city were then divided into two factions, one for the court of France, and the other for the Engliſh. The former endeavoured to perſuade the people, that if the Engliſh were admitted into the town, they would, by their great ſuperiority at ſea, ſeize the government, and keep poſſeſſion of the place in defiance of the whole power of France. The latter, which was headed by the mother and ſiſter of the dukes of Rohan and Soubiſe, oppoſed theſe aſſertions; declaring that the Engliſh were their friends, and were come to ſupport their religious privileges. The French party, however, prevailed, and it was determined not to admit the Engliſh. Buckingham, who was ſurprized that the gates were not opened, ſent Soubiſe and Sir William Beecher aſhore, but it was not without difficulty they were permitted to enter the gates. The council was immediately aſſembled, and Soubiſe did every thing in his power to perſuade them of the friendly intentions of the Engliſh monarch, and that he had fitted out this large and expenſive armament purely for their ſervice. The council, however, thought proper to decline the proffered aſſiſtance, under pretence that they could not determine on an affair of ſuch importance without conſulting the whole body of the Hugonots. Exaſperated at this refuſal, Buckingham determined to make a deſcent on the iſland of Rhé. It had before been agreed between Soubiſe and Buckingham, that the Engliſh ſhould land on Oleron, a fertile and then defenceleſs iſland, where refreſhments of every kind might be eaſily procured, and the troops in no danger of any attack from the enemy. But the Engliſh general thought proper to alter this plan of operations, and ſtood immediately for the iſland of Rhé, then well garriſoned and fortified. Had the military abilities of Buckingham been equal to his perſonal courage, he might have acquired immortal honour both to himſelf and his country. Thoyras, the French general, who commanded in the iſland, no ſooner perceived the Engliſh were preparing to land, than he drew out his forces to oppoſe them; but imagining the firſt debarkation was only a feint to draw his attention to that quarter, while the main body of the Engliſh army was landed at another, he thought it imprudent to attack them, till they were followed by greater numbers. Thoyras now perceived his miſtake, and marched immediately to give them battle; but the Engliſh volunteers jumping aſhore, and performing wonders in their own perſons, ſo animated the ſoldiers, that they preſſed forward with the utmoſt intrepidity, and put the enemy to flight, though far ſuperior in numbers.

Sobiſe, who was an excellent ſoldier, adviſed Buckingham to purſue his victory, and immediately attack the caſtle of St. Martin's. Had this prudent advice been followed, there is the greateſt reaſon to think that the attempt would have ſucceeded; but Buckingham pretended that it would be imprudent to march his troops againſt that fortreſs, till intelligence could be procured of the ſtrength of the enemy. By this dilatory method of proceeding five days were loſt to the Engliſh, and that loſs was irretrievable. He alſo neglected to take fort Prie, which was then but meanly garriſoned, and being ſituated on the ſhore, would have afforded an excellent retreat, in caſe of accident, to the Engliſh.

At laſt, on the twenty-ſeventh of July, he opened his trenches before St. Martins, and was ſo confident of ſucceſs, that he aſſured the king by expreſs, he would be maſter of the caſtle in eight days time. This occaſioned a ridiculous proclamation to be publiſhed in England, for encouraging people to tranſport themſelves and their families to the iſland of Rhé, But Buckingham was not born to ſhine in a camp. Though determined to ſtarve the garriſon into a ſurrender, he took ſo little care to guard the ſeas, that the French found means to throw ammunition and proviſions into the place.

Buckingham now perceived that the taking the caſtle would not be ſo eaſy a taſk as he imagined, and endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of fort Prie; but the garriſon had been reinforced, and the attempt miſcarried. The French had now in the iſland an army, under the command of marſhal Schomberg, ſuperior in numbers to that of the Engliſh; and Buckingham determined to make an attack upon the place, in order to put an end to the ſiege by one deſperate attempt. He had been informed by ſome French deſerters, that there were no more than eight hundred ſoldiers in the caſtle, and that the courtin towards the ſea was but poorly fortified. It was therefore reſolved to ſtorm the courtin without attempting to make any breach in the wall. The army was accordingly divided into two bodies, one of which was to attack the caſtle on the land ſide, and the other on the ſea. The latter was the principal attack, and it was propoſed to mount the courtin with their ſcaling-ladders. But the meaſures were ſo improperly taken, that there were no hopes of ſucceſs. The French immediately perceived their intention, and ſuffered them to advance to the foot of the courtin, where the Engliſh ſoon perceived their ladders were too ſhort for ſcaling the wall. They behaved, however, in both attacks with amazing intrepidity, but were at laſt obliged to retreat with the loſs of five hundred men killed, and fifty taken priſoners.

The French were, however, convinced by this ſpecimen of Britiſh valour, that it would be dangerous to attack them in an open field; Schomberg did not chuſe to preſs cloſely ſo brave an enemy. After this miſcarriage it was ſufficiently evident that any farther attack upon the caſtle would be the height of imprudence; and Buckingham accordingly began his march in excellent order towards his ſhips, intending to paſs through a hollow way, the only paſſage by which he could retreat. The French army under marſhal Schomberg followed him at a diſtance. Buckingham perceived it, and offered the marſhal battle, which he declined, and the Engliſh continued their march towards the hollow-way, their rear, by ſome ſtrange neglect, conſiſting only of the inſignificant guard of eighty horſe. When the Engliſh had advanced a conſiderable diſtance in the hollow-way, they were attacked by the French cavalry, who forced the Engliſh rear-guard to break the ranks of their own men, and there being no room for the foremoſt battalions to form, a general rout enſued. But they had no ſooner paſſed the hollow-way, than they faced about and once more offered the marſhal battle, notwithſtanding the great loſs they had ſuſtained. Schomberg was too prudent to venture a general engagement; he retired with his army, and Buckingham embarked his forces, after loſing near two thirds of his army.

Thus ended an expedition which totally diſcredited Buckingham, both as an admiral and a ſoldier; he acquired no praiſe but that vulgar one of courage and perſonal bravery. If he was unpopular before, he was now deteſted by the people; the enemy triumphed in the narrow ſeas, and inſulted the Engliſh in their own harbours. The inhabitants of Rochelle, who had declared for the Engliſh, were now in the moſt dreadful ſituation. They were threatened with an immediate ſiege from their enraged maſter, and had expended great part of their proviſions in ſubſiſting Buckingham's forces on the iſland of Rhé. The deputies from that city were loud in their complaints; but ſo greatly was Charles infatuated with Buckingham, that all their inſtances joined with the general voice of his people, could not prevail upon him to cenſure his conduct.

It was, however, ſufficiently apparent, that ſomething muſt be done to ſilence the clamours of the people. They believed their liberties had been raviſhed from them, and illegal taxes extorted. They ſaw their commerce daily declining, and the military honours tranſmitted to them by their anceſtors, ſhamefully ſtained by two ill-concerted and unſucceſsful expeditions. They dreaded the calamities of a war carried on againſt two of the moſt powerful kingdoms in Europe, and feared for their domeſtic ſafety from the general clamour excited in every part of the nation. Theſe evils were ſolely aſcribed to the obſtinacy of the king in adhering to the counſels of Buckingham, whoſe abilities were far from deſerving ſuch implicit confidence. The only expedient that offered to relieve the government from this embarraſſing ſituation, was that of calling a parliament. It was expected that the miſcarriage of the attempt upon Rhé would be ſeverely cenſured, and the duke's conduct made the ſubject of the cloſeſt ſcrutiny. Sir Robert Cotton therefore adviſed his majeſty, that Buckingham ſhould make a motion in the council for aſſembling the parliament; hoping that by his appearing to favour a meaſure ſo highly agreeable to the people, his former faults would be forgotten, and that inſtead of a tyrant and oppreſſor, he would be conſidered as the deliverer of his country.

A. D. 1628. The parliament aſſembled on the ſeventeenth of March, and was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, in which the king very pathetically enumerated the neceſſities of the government, and required the aſſiſtance of his parliament; but concluded with fairly telling the commons, "that if they did not do their duty in contributing to the neceſſities of the ſtate, he muſt, in diſcharge of his conſcience, uſe thoſe other means which God had put into his hands, in order to ſave that, which the follies of a few particular men may otherwiſe endanger. Take not this as a threatening, added he, for I ſcorn to threaten any but my equals; but as an admonition from him, who, by nature and duty, has moſt care of your preſervation and proſperity.”

When Charles had finiſhed his ſpeech, the lord-keeper, by the king's command, laid before the houſe the ſtate of affairs in Europe, and the motives which induced the king to attempt the reduction of the dangerous power of the houſe of Auſtria, and to interpoſe between the French king and his proteſtant ſubjects. He obſerved that the powers which uſed to balance the alarming greatneſs of the houſe of Auſtria, were now otherwiſe employed; the Turk in an Aſiatic war, and the Swede in a war with Poland, fermented by Spain; that the king of Denmark was already ſtripped of great part of his dominions, and the houſe of Auſtria on the point of being maſters of all the ſea-coaſts between Dantzick and Embden: that they were arming all the ſhips they can procure in the Baltic ſeas, and endeavouring to engage the Hans Towns in their quarrel, in order to deprive the Engliſh of the Eaſtland trade, and make themſelves maſters of the ſea, without ſtriking a blow: that the fleets of France and Spain, were preparing in conjunction to ruin our fiſhery, and to render it dangerous for our merchant ſhips to paſs from one part of the kingdom to another: that a large armament was fitting out at Liſbon, in order, as there is the greateſt reaſon to fear, to make a deſcent either in England or Ireland. He then ſtrongly recommended unity, as the only means of diſappointing the intentions of the enemy, and preſſed them in the moſt earneſt manner to aſſiſt the government, as the moſt conſtitutional method of impoſing the neceſſary taxes. “This way of parliamentary ſupplies, added he, as his majeſty told you, he hath choſen, not as the only way, but as the fitteſt; not becauſe he is deſtitute of others, but becauſe it is moſt agreeable to the goodneſs of his own moſt gracious diſpoſition, and to the deſire and weal of his people. If this be deferred, neceſſity and the ſword of the enemy make way to others. Remember his majeſty's admonition, I ſay remember it.”

Though the members of this parliament were men of the ſame independent ſpirit with their predeceſſors, and poſſeſſed of ſuch large eſtates, that it was computed their riches ſurpaſſed three times that of the houſe of peers; though they were all inflamed with the love of liberty, and many of them had ſuffered by the violent meaſures of the government; yet they entered upon buſineſs with great temper and decorum. They feared that the king, diſguſted with popular aſſemblies, wanted only a fair pretence, offered by any incident or undutiful behaviour of the members, to govern alone with a deſpotic power; and ſhould that ever happen, no remedy could be hoped for, but from inſurrection and civil war, of which the iſſue would be extremely uncertain, and muſt, at all events, prove infinitely diſtreſſing to the whole nation. Decency of conduct was therefore abſolutely neceſſary to carry on the great work of reformation in the government, and to paſs ſome laws which might ſecure the privileges of parliament, and the liberties of the people.

But though the popular leaders had preſcribed a decent conduct to themſelves, they did not propoſe to ſuffer calmly the grievances under which the nation had lately groaned. They knew that the conſtitution of their country was at ſtake, and that every effort muſt be exerted in its defence. The cry of liberty was therefore echoed in the houſe of commons as it had anciently been in the Roman ſenate. “We are called here by his majeſty, ſaid Sir Francis Seymour, to give him faithful counſel, ſuch as may conduce to his honour and dignity, and we ought to do it without flattery. We are ſent here by the people to deliver them from their grievances, and we ought to do it without fear. Not to be diſpoſed to part with life and fortune when the intereſt of our king and country required the ſacrifice, were not to be good ſubjects; but, on the other hand, to ſuffer our property to be taken from us, inconſiſtently with liberty, our inclination, and the laws of our country, this were to be ſlaves. While we oppoſe ſuch encroachments we tread only in the ſteps of our great anceſtors, who always preferred the public to their private intereſt, nay even to their very lives. It will be the higheſt injury to ourſelves, to our poſterity, to our conſciences, if we forego this claim and pretenſion.”

“I can live, ſaid Sir Robert Phillips, though another, who has no right, be joined with me; nay, I can live, though burthened with impoſitions, beyond what at preſent I labour under: but to have my liberty, which is the ſoul of my life, raviſhed from me; to have my perſon pent up in a goal, without relief from law, and to be ſo adjudged,—O! improvident anceſtors! O! unwiſe forefathers! to be ſo careful in providing for the quiet poſſeſſion of our lands, and the liberties of parliament; and, at the ſame time, to neglect our perſonal liberty, and ſuffer us to lie in priſon during pleaſure, without redreſs or remedy! If this be law, why do we talk of liberties? Why trouble ourſelves with diſputes about a conſtitution, franchiſes, property of goods, and the like? What may any man call his own, if not the liberty of his perſon?”

“The ſame evil, added Sir Thomas Wentworth, affects the king and the people, and the ſame remedy muſt heal it. We are to defend,—what?—any new object?—no—our ancient, our legitimate, or vital liberties; we muſt confirm the laws eſtabliſhed by our anceſtors; we muſt put ſuch a ſeal to them, as no licentious ſpirit ſhall dare to break.” The whole houſe agreed in theſe noble and generous ſentiments; even the court party themſelves did not pretend to offer any thing but the plea of neceſſity in defence of the late meaſures purſued by the miniſtry, and to which the king had been reduced by the obſtinacy of the two laſt parliaments. No oppoſition was therefore made to a vote againſt arbitrary impriſonments and forced loans. This being paſſed, the houſe unanimouſly voted the king five ſubſidies. This ſupply, though not equal to his wants, ſatisfied his majeſty, and even the tears of affection ſtarted from his eyes, when he was informed of this conceſſion in the commons.

But though the ſupply was voted, the bill neceſſary to give it the force of a law was not yet paſſed, and the commons, in order to have time ſufficient to conſider the grievances of the nation, appointed a committee to prepare the model of ſo important a ſtatute, before any draught of it was laid before the houſe. Some of the commons were, indeed, for paſſing the ſubſidy bill with as much expedition as the nature of the ſubject would admit, before the grievances of the kingdom were taken into conſideration; but this was oppoſed by others with all the enthuſiaſtic warmth of true patriotic zeal. Mr. Creſwell, a young gentleman of the law, delivered his ſentiments in a very maſterly manner. “Give me leave, ſaid he, to reſemble juſtice to Nebuchadnezzar's tree; for ſhe is ſo great that ſhe ſhades at once the palace of the prince, the houſe of the noble and the cottage of the beggar. If therefore either the blaſts of indignation, or neceſſity, the irreſiſtible violator of laws, hath ſo bruiſed any part of the branches of this tree, that either our perſons, goods, or poſſeſſions have not the ſame ſhelter as before, let us not, for that reaſon, neglect the root of this lovely plant; but rather uſe every poſſible endeavour to apply to it freſh and fertile mould, and to water it even with our tears, that theſe bruiſhed branches may be recovered, and the whole tree once more proſper and flouriſh.

“I well know that kings, though they are only men before the Almighty, are gods among the people: and therefore to my gracious and dread ſovereign, whoſe virtues are ingenerate both in his judgment and nature, let my arm be cut off, nay, let not my ſoul ſurvive the day that I ſhall dare to “ lift up my hand to touch thoſe forbidden productions, “ thoſe flowers of his princely crown and “ diadem. But yet, in our Eden, in this garden of “ the commonwealth, as there are flowers of the ſun, “ which are too glorious to be touched by any but “ the hands of royal majeſty; ſo are there alſo ſome “ daiſies and wholeſome herbs, which every common “ hand that lives and labours in this garden, may “ pick and gather up, may take comfort and repoſe “ in them. Among all theſe, this eye of day, this “ lovely liberty, is, perhaps, the principal. This “ ſhould be cultivated with the utmoſt care, nor “ ſhould any conſideration, not even the frowns of “ power, prevail upon us to abandon its culture.”

The ſpeeches of the patriots prevailed; and a committee was appointed to draw up the form of ſome ſtatute, which having obtained the force of a law, might form a ſufficient barrier to their rights and liberties, ſo lately violated. Forced loans, benevolences, taxes without conſent of parliament, arbitrary impriſonments, billeting ſoldiers in private houſes, and the impoſition of martial law, were the grievances complained of, and againſt theſe an eternal remedy was to be provided. At laſt the famous petition of right was drawn up, and preſented to the lords for their concurrence; that having thus obtained the ſanction of both houſes, it might have the force of an act of parliament, as ſoon as it received the royal aſſent. Charles uſed every art to divert this fatal blow to an unlimited prerogative. He repeated his meſſages to the commons; he endeavoured to gain over ſome by promiſes of favour, and to terrify others with threats. All the eloquence of the crown lawyers was exhauſted to deſtroy the principles upon which the petition was founded; and, as the laſt reſource, the king wrote a letter to the lords, informing them, that he could not give up the point of committing offenders to priſon in matters of ſtate, without expreſſing the cauſes, as that method muſt often be attended with the moſt dangerous conſequences, ſuch delinquents being generally beyond the reach of the ordinary courts of judicature. He promiſed, however, to be very tender of his people's privileges, and to commit none for the future for refuſing to lend money, and that the cauſes of all commitments ſhould be expreſſed as ſoon as it could be done with ſafety. This letter, together with the influence of the court party in the houſe of peers, had great effect on their proceedings; and ſix weeks were ſpent in hearing the pleadings of the king's council againſt, and the arguments of the commons for, the petition of right. During the whole time of the dependence of this petition, the court party did every thing in their power to diſconcert the commons in their proceedings; and, in a conference between the two houſes, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was ſincerely deſirous of effecting an union between the king and the commons, propoſed, for the ſake of peace, to throw the ſubſtance of the petition into the form of propoſitions, to be preſented by both houſes to the king for his conſent. Theſe propoſitions were the following:

“ 1. That his majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly “ to declare, that the good old law called Magna “ Charta, and the ſix ſtatutes conceived to be declarations, or explanations of that law, continue ſtill “ in force to all intents and purpoſes.

“ 2. That his majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly “ to declare, that according to Magna Charta, and “ the ſtatutes aforeſaid, as alſo according to the moſt “ ancient cuſtoms and laws of this land, every free “ ſubject of this realm hath a fundamental property “ in his goods, and a fundamental property in his “ perſon.

“ 3. That his majeſty would be pleaſed graciouſly “ to declare, that it is his royal pleaſure to ratify and “ confirm unto all, and every his faithful and loyal “ ſubjects, all their ancient, ſeveral, juſt liberties, “ privileges and rights, in as ample and beneficial a “ manner to all intents and purpoſes, as their anceſtors did enjoy the ſame, under the government of “ the beſt of his moſt noble progenitors.

“ 4. That his majeſty would be pleaſed moſt graciouſly to declare, for the good contentment of “ his loyal ſubjects, and for the ſecuring them from “ future fears, that in all cauſes within the cognizance of the common law, and concerning the “ liberties of his ſubjects, his majeſty would proceed “ according to the laws eſtabliſhed in the kingdom, “ and in no other manner.

“ 5. And as touching his majeſty's royal prerogative, intrinſical to his ſovereignty, and intruſted “ him from God ad communem totius populi ſalutem, “ et non ad deſtructionem, his majeſty would reſolve “ not to uſe or divert the ſame to the prejudice of “ any of his loyal people, in the property of their “ goods, or liberty of their perſons. And in caſe, “ for the ſecurity of his majeſty's perſon, the common ſafety of his people, or the peaceable government of his kingdom, his majeſty ſhall find juſt “ cauſe to impriſon or reſtrain any man's perſon, his “ majeſty would graciouſly declare, that within a “ convenient time, he ſhall, and will, expreſs the “ cauſe of his commitment, or reſtraint, either general or ſpecial; and upon a cauſe ſo expreſſed, “ will leave him immediately to be tried, according “ to the common juſtice of the kingdom.”

Theſe propoſitions were by no means agreeable to the commons; but being very deſirous of maintaining a good correſpondence with the lords, without whoſe concurrence all their labours in forming the petition of right muſt be abortive, they made uſe of every reaſon in their power to convince the peers that theſe propoſitions were not ſufficient to ſecure the liberty of the ſubject; a poſitive law only, in which the rights of the people were fully, defined and ſtrongly aſſerted, could anſwer the intended purpoſe. Their reaſons at laſt prevailed. The lords conſented to the petition of right, but propoſed to ſubjoin to it the following clauſe: “ We humbly preſent this “ petition to your majeſty, not only with a care of “ preſerving our own liberties, but with due regard “ to leave intire that ſovereign power, with which “ your majeſty is entruſted for the protection, ſafety, “ and happineſs of your people.”

It required not the penetration of the leaders of the commons to perceive, that this clauſe, if ſuffered to be added to the petition of right, would be ſufficient to elude its whole force; and it was therefore unanimouſly rejected. “ If (ſaid Sir Thomas Wentworth) we admit this addition, we ſhall leave the “ ſubject in a worſe ſtate than we found him, and “ receive little thanks for our labour when we return “ home. Let us leave all power to his majeſty to “ puniſh malefactors; but theſe laws are not acquainted with ſovereign power; we deſire no new “ thing, nor do we offer to trench on his majeſty's “ prerogative; we may not recede from this petition, “ either in part or in whole.” Another conference was therefore held with the lords, where theſe reaſons were thought ſatisfactory: the petition of right paſſed both houſes of parliament, and is as follows:

“ To the king's moſt excellent majeſty,

I. “ Humbly ſhew to our ſovereign lord the king, “ the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons, “ in parliament aſſembled, That whereas it is declared and enacted, by a ſtatute made in the reign “ of king Edward I. commonly called Statutem de “ tallagio non concedendo, that no tallage or aid ſhall “ be levied by the king or his heirs in this realm, “ without the good-will and aſſent of the archbiſhops, “ biſhops, earls, barons, knights, burgeſſes, and “ other the freemen of the commonalty of this realm: “ and by authority of parliament holden in the five “ and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. “ it is declared and enacted, That, from thenceforth, “ no perſon ſhould be compelled to make any loans “ to the king againſt his will, becauſe ſuch loans “ were againſt reaſon, and the franchiſe of the land: “ and, by other laws of this realm, it is provided, that none ſhould be charged by any charge or impoſition called a benevolence, or by ſuch like charge: by which the ſtatutes before-mentioned, and other the good laws and ſtatutes of this realm, your ſubjects have inherited this freedom, that they ſhould not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, not ſet by common conſent in parliament.

II. “ Yet, nevertheleſs, of late divers commiſſions directed to ſundry commiſſioners in ſeveral counties, with inſtructions, have iſſued; by means whereof your people have been in divers places aſſembled, and required to lend certain ſums of money unto your majeſty; and many of them, upon their refuſal ſo to do, have had an oath adminiſtered to them not warrantable by the laws and ſtatutes of this realm; and have been conſtrained to become bound to make appearance before your privy council, and in other places; and others of them have been therefore impriſoned, confined, and ſundry other ways moleſted and diſquieted: and divers other charges have been laid and levied upon your people, in ſeveral counties, by lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, commiſſioners for muſters, juſtices of peace, and others, by command or direction from your majeſty, or your privy-council, againſt the laws and free cuſtoms of this realm.

III. “ And whereas alſo, by the ſtatute called The Great Charter of the Liberties of England, it is declared and enacted, That no freeman may be taken or impriſoned, or be diſſeized of his freehold or liberties, or his free cuſtoms, or be outlawed or exiled, or in any manner deſtroyed, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

IV. “ And in the eight and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it was declared and enacted, by authority of parliament, That no man, of what ſtate or condition that he be, ſhould be put out of his lands or tenements, nor taken, nor impriſoned, nor diſherited, nor put to death, without being brought to anſwer by due proceſs of law.

V. “ Nevertheleſs, againſt the tenor of the ſaid ſtatutes, and other the good laws and ſtatutes of your realm to that end provided, divers of your ſubjects have of late been impriſoned without any cauſe ſhewed; and when, for their deliverance, they were brought before juſtice, by your majeſty's writs of habeas corpus, there to undergo and receive as the court ſhould order, and their keepers commanded to certify the cauſes of their detainer, no cauſe was certified, but that they were detained by your majeſty's ſpecial command, ſignified by the lords of your privy-council; and yet were returned back to ſeveral priſons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make anſwer according to law.

VI. “ And whereas, of late, great companies of ſoldiers and mariners have been diſperſed in divers counties of the realm, and the inhabitants, againſt their wills, have been compelled to receive them into their houſes, and there to ſuffer them to ſojourn, againſt the laws and cuſtoms of this realm, and to the great grievance and vexation of the people.

VII. “ And whereas alſo, by authority of parliament, in the five and twentieth year of the reign of king Edward III. it is declared and enacted, That no man ſhould be fore-judged of life or limb againſt the form of the great charter and law of the land: and by the ſaid great charter, and other the laws and ſtatutes of this your realm, no man ought to be judged to death but by the laws eſtabliſhed in this your realm, either by the cuſtoms of the ſame realm, or by acts of parliament: and whereas no offender, of what kind ſoever, is exempted from the proceedings to be uſed, and puniſhments to be inflicted by the laws and ſtatutes of this your realm: nevertheleſs, of late, divers commiſſions, under your majeſty's great ſeal, have iſſued forth, by which certain perſons have been aſſigned and appointed commiſſioners, with power and authority to proceed within the land, according to the juſtice of martial law, againſt ſuch ſoldiers and mariners, or other diſſolute perſons joining with them, as ſhould commit any murther, robbery, felony, mutiny, or other outrage or miſdemeanor whatſoever, and by ſuch ſummary courſe and order as is agreeable to martial law, and as is uſed in armies in time of war, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of ſuch offenders, and them to cauſe to be executed and put to death according to the law martial.

VIII. “ By pretext whereof ſome of your majeſty's ſubjects have been, by ſome of the ſaid commiſſioners, put to death, when and where, if, by the laws and ſtatutes of the realm, they had deſerved death, by the ſame laws and ſtatutes alſo they might, and by no other ought, to have been judged and executed.

IX. “ And alſo ſundry grievous offenders, by colour thereof claiming an exemption, have eſcaped the puniſhments due to them by the laws and ſtatutes of this your realm, by reaſon that divers of your officers and miniſters of juſtice have unjuſtly refuſed or forborn to proceed againſt ſuch offenders, according to the ſame laws and ſtatutes, upon pretence that the ſaid offenders were puniſhable only by martial law, and by authority of ſuch commiſſioners as aforeſaid: which commiſſions, and all other of like nature, were wholly and directly contrary to the ſaid laws and ſtatutes of your realm.

X. “ They do therefore humbly pray your moſt excellent majeſty, that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or ſuch like charge, without common conſent, by act of parliament; and that none be called to make anſwer, or take ſuch oath, or to give attendance, or be confined, or otherwiſe moleſted or diſquieted concerning the ſame, or for refuſal thereof: and that no freeman, in any ſuch manner as is before mentioned, be impriſoned or detained: and that your majeſty would be pleaſed to remove the ſaid ſoldiers and mariners, and that your people may not be ſo burthened in time to come: and that the aforeſaid commiſſions, for proceeding by martial law, may be revoked and annulled: and that hereafter no commiſſions of like nature may iſſue forth, to any perſon or perſons whatſoever, to be executed as aforeſaid, leſt, by colour of them, any of your majeſty's ſubjects be deſtroyed, or put to death, contrary to the laws and franchiſe of the land.

XI. “ All which they moſt humbly pray of your moſt excellent majeſty, as their rights and liberties, according to the laws and ſtatutes of this realm: and that your majeſty would alſo vouchſafe to declare, That the awards, doings, and proceedings to the prejudice of your people, in any of the premiſſes, ſhall not be drawn hereafter into conſequence or example: and that your majeſty would alſo be pleaſed, for the further comfort and ſafety of your people, to declare your royal will and pleaſure, That in the things aforeſaid, all your officers and miniſters ſhall ſerve you according to the laws and ſtatutes of this realm, as they tender the honour of your majeſty, and the proſperity of this kingdom.”

The royal aſſent now only was wanting to give this famous petition the force of a law. The king accordingly came to the houſe of peers, ſent for the commons; and being ſeated in the chair of ſtate, the petition was read to him; but, to the aſtoniſhment of all men, inſtead of the clear, conciſe, and uſual form by which every bill is confirmed or rejected, Charles made the following anſwer to the petition: “ The king willeth that right be done according to the laws and cuſtoms of the realm; and “ that the ſtatutes be put into due execution; that “ his ſubjects may have no cauſe to complain of any “ wrong or oppreſſion, contrary to their juſt rights

“ and liberties, to the preſervation whereof he holds
“ himſelf as much obliged, as of his prerogative.”

Nothing proves the imprudence of Charles's council more than this ſtrange anſwer given to the petition of right. He certainly ought either to have paſſed it in the uſual form, or rejected it with firmneſs. This evaſive anſwer tended only to raiſe the jealouſy and inflame the anger of the commons; for it could not be imagined they would reſt ſatisfied with ſo vague and undetermined a reply. They accordingly returned in a very ill humour to their houſe; and gave vent to their indignation by cenſuring the ſermons of Dr. Manwaring, whom they impeached before the peers.

But this cenſure was far from diſſipating the chagrin of the commons, a gloomy ſilence for ſome time prevailed, and ſeveral of the leading members burſt into tears. Their conſternation was increaſed when Sir John Elliot, delivering himſelf in his uſual manner againſt the miniſter, was ſtopped by the ſpeaker, who declared that he was ordered to ſuffer no ſuch ſpeeches to proceed. Upon this the houſe came to the following reſolution; “That every member of the houſe is free from any undutiful ſpeech, from the beginning of the parliament unto this day; and ordered that no member preſumed to leave the houſe on pain of being ſent to the Tower.” This reſolution being paſſed, the ſpeaker, at his own earneſt requeſt, was permitted to leave the houſe, and the debate was immediately renewed in the committee with greater vigour than ever. At laſt Sir Edward Coke, after an elaborate detail of the power and privileges of the commons, proceeded in the following manner: “What ſhall we do? Let us palliate no longer; if “ we do, God will not proſper us. I think the duke “ of Buckingham is the cauſe of all our miſeries, “ and till the king be informed thereof, we ſhall “ never go out with honour or ſit with honour here: “ that man is the grievance of grievances; let us ſet “ down the cauſes of our diſaſters, and all will reflect “ upon him.”

This ſpeech was received with the higheſt applauſe, every part of the houſe rang with approving acclamations. Mr. Selden adviſed that a declaration ſhould be drawn up under four heads. 1. To expreſs the dutiful behaviour of the houſe towards his majeſty. 2. To repreſent their liberties that are violated. 3. To preſent what was the real intention of the houſe. 4. That the duke of Buckingham, fearing leſt he might be queſtioned, interpoſed and occaſioned this deſtraction. “ All this time, continued he, we have caſt a mantle over what was done in the laſt parliament; but being now forced again to look upon that man, let us proceed with what was then well begun, and let the charge be renewed that was made againſt him laſt parliament, to which he returned an anſwer, but the particulars were too inſufficient that one might demand judgment upon that anſwer only.”

During theſe debates the ſpeaker was with the king, informing him of the ſenſe and diſpoſition of the houſe. Charles was in the utmoſt perplexity how to behave in this alarming criſis; but underſtanding by another meſſenger, that the commons were on the point of naming Buckingham as the author of all their grievances, he ſent back the ſpeaker, who obtained a reſpite of their proceedings till the next day. Charles ſpent the intermediate ſpace in meditating on what anſwer he ſhould return to the joint addreſs of both houſes for a more ſatisfactory anſwer to their petition of right. When the commons met the next day, they proceeded on their intended declaration. Among other heads they mentioned a deſign which the king had formed of bringing over into England a body of German troops; and Burlamachi, a foreign merchant, being ordered to attend, acknowledged his receiving thirty thouſand pounds by privy ſeals, for purchaſing horſes, a thouſand of which were actually bought, and were to have been brought over into England, but that he had ſince heard they were countermanded. No meaſure ſurely could be projected more odious to the whole nation. It muſt, however, be confeſſed, that the king was ſo far right, that he had at laſt fallen upon the only effectual method for ſupporting his prerogative. But at the ſame time he ſhould have been ſenſible, that till he was provided with a ſufficient military force, all his attempts, in oppoſition to the riſing ſpirit of the nation, muſt, in the end, prove abortive.

It was now ſufficiently evident that the whole ſtorm which had been ſo long gathering, would ſoon burſt upon the head of Buckingham, unleſs ſome method could be diſcovered to prevent it; and no method ſeemed ſo proper as that of giving the commons ſatisfaction with regard to their petition of right. The king, therefore, came to the houſe of peers, and pronouncing the uſual form of words, “ Let it be law as is deſired,” gave full ſatisfaction and authority to the petition. The acclamations with which the houſe reſounded, and the univerſal joy diffuſed over the whole nation, ſhewed how much this petition had been the object of the views and expectations of all men.

Had the king given the ſame anſwer when he came firſt to the houſe of peers, there is the higheſt probability that it would not have been in the power of the ill-deſigning members, for ſuch there certainly were at that time among the commons, to have prevented an entire union between him and his people. But the repeated declarations he had made to ſupport every branch of the prerogative, and the avowed tendency of his principles, through the whole progreſs of the debate, towards deſpotiſm, gave many of the members, who wiſhed well to the peace and tranquillity of their country, ſtrong prepoſſeſſions againſt his deſigns, which through the intermediate diſcoveries that were made and aggravated to his diſadvantage, were improved by his enemies into certainties; and the houſe of commons thought, that they had now no ſafety without a change of men as well as of meaſures. It was therefore pretended, that the petition of right was only declaratory of what the people's rights really were, but was no defence againſt abuſe of the public treaſure, againſt the like miſcarriages of national expeditions, and againſt ſimilar errors in the executive power. This was directly contrary to the opinion of his majeſty. He imagined that by paſſing the petition of right, he had given a full compenſation for all that his ſubjects had ſuffered through the abuſe of prerogative, and that they ought to look upon it as a ſufficient ſecurity for the future; that he had paſſed it on condition that all enquiries ſhould ceaſe, both againſt men and meaſures, and that the neceſſary ſupplies ſhould be chearfully granted. But though the commons determined to carry on their ſcrutiny, the bill for five ſubſidies which had been formerly voted, immediately paſſed the houſe; becauſe the granting of that ſupply was, in a manner, tacitly contracted for, upon the royal aſſent being given to the petition; and had faith been here violated, no farther confidence could have ſubſiſted between king and parliament.

Buckingham in the mean time was labouring to retrieve his popularity, but in vain; the nation in general had conceived ſuch ſtrong prejudices againſt him, that all his endeavours could not remove them. About one hundred and fifty members of the commons were for moderate meaſures, and had voted againſt the remonſtrance; but his enemies prevailed, and every method was employed to force the king to part with his miniſter. Some time ſince a commiſſion had been granted to the moſt conſiderable officers of the crown, empowering them to concert among themſelves the beſt methods of levying money by impoſitions or otherwiſe. The commons endeavoured to make Buckingham the author of this commiſſion, which they termed a commiſſion of exciſe, though that term is not ſo much as mentioned in it. But Charles, to remove even the ſhadow of a diſpute, upon the firſt ſuggeſtion that this commiſſion was contrary to the petition of right, ordered it to be cancelled.

This condeſcenſion was, however, far from ſatisfying the commons. Grievances were every hour multiplied; ſeveral reſolutions were paſſed againſt the authors of them, and the vindictive ſpirit againſt the miniſter was carried on to a much higher pitch than ever. It was now openly ſaid in the houſe, that the king, by the petition of right, could no longer levy tonnage and poundage. All the members therefore who were deſirous of conſolidating an union between the king and his parliament, were for granting the king tonnage and poundage by a bill in parliament; becauſe they knew that without this aid, the five ſubſidies would not be ſufficient to defray the expences of government. But it was neceſſary that theſe rates ſhould be ſettled, and the proportion in which they were to be levied, clearly determined. Theſe, by the arts of the deſigning members, proved ſo perplexed a work, that the king, deſpairing of any farther aſſiſtance from this parliament, ſent a meſſage to the houſe, declaring his deſign of putting an end to the ſeſſion in a few days. This gave his enemies a pretence for dropping the bill, and to draw up a remonſtrance, in which they enumerated the right enjoyed by the people during ſeveral reigns of not paying tonnage and poundage, till laid upon them by their own conſent in parliament; and then declared to the king, “that receiving tonnage and poundage, and other impoſitions, not granted by parliament, is a breach of the fundamental liberties of this kingdom, and contrary to his majeſty's royal anſwer to the petition of right.”

Exaſperated at the behaviour of the commons, Charles no ſooner heard of this remonſtrance being formed, than he determined to put an end to the ſeſſion before it could be preſented. He accordingly, while the remonſtrance was reading in the lower houſe of commons, came ſuddenly to the upper, and ſending for the commons, prorogued the parliament with the following ſpeech from the throne.

“ It may ſeem ſtrange that I came ſo ſuddenly to “ end this ſeſſion, before I give my aſſent to the bills;
“ I will tell you the cauſe, though I muſt avow, that
“ I owe the account of my actions to God alone.
“ It is known to every one, that a while ago the houſe
“ of commons gave me a remonſtrance, how acceptable “ every man may judge, and for the merit of
“ it, I will not call that in queſtion; for I am ſure
“ no wiſe man can juſtify it.

“ Now ſince I am fully informed that a ſecond remonſtrance “ is preparing for me, to take away the “ profit of my tonnage and poundage, one of the “ chief maintenances of my crown, by alledging,
“ I have given away my right thereto, by my anſwer
“ to your petition.

“ This is ſo prejudicial to me, that I am forced to “ end this ſeſſion ſome few hours before I meant,
“ being not willing to receive any more remonſtrances
“ to which I muſt give an harſh anſwer. And ſince
“ I ſee, that even the houſe of commons begin already “ to make falſe conſtructions of what I granted
“ in your petition, leſt it be worſe interpreted in the “ country, I will now make a declaration concerning
“ the true intent thereof.

“ The profeſſion of both houſes, in the time of “ forming this petition, was no way to trench upon “ my prerogative, ſaying they had neither intention “ nor power to hurt it. Therefore it muſt needs be “ conceived, that I have granted no new, but only “ confirmed the ancient liberties of my ſubjects. Yet
“ to ſhew the clearneſs of my intentions, that I neither “ repent, nor mean to recede from any thing I “ have promiſed you, I do here declare myſelf, that “ thoſe things which have been done, whereby many “ have had ſome cauſe to expect the liberties of the “ ſubject to be trenched upon, which indeed was the “ firſt and true ground of the petition, ſhall not “ hereafter be drawn into example, for your prejudice;
“ and from time to time, on the word of a
“ king, ye ſhall not have the like cauſe to complain.
“ But as for tonnage and poundage, it is a thing I “ cannot want, and was never intended by you to “ aſk, nor meant by me, I am ſure, to grant.

“ To conclude, I command you all that are here
“ to take notice of what I have ſpoken at this time,
“ to be the true intent and meaning of what I granted
“ you in your petition; but eſpecially you, my “ lords, the judges, for to you only, under me, belongs
“ the interpretation of laws; for none of the “ houſes of parliament, either joint or ſeparate, “ (what new doctrine ſoever may be raiſed) have any “ power either to make or declare a law, without my “ conſent.”

It will perhaps be needleſs to make any reflections on the infatuation which ſeems to have poſſeſſed both the king and the commons at the cloſe of this ſeſſion. Charles, notwithſtanding his paſſing the petition of right, and receiving the greateſt ſubſidy ever granted to a king of England; notwithſtanding the manifeſt indications that his people were reſolved to make him greater and happier than any of his predeceſſors, could not diveſt himſelf from that fatal notion that the taking tonnage and poundage without the conſent of parliament, was a prerogative of the crown. The declaration he made in the above ſpeech, that he never meant to give up tonnage and poundage, and that the commons never meant to aſk it, was a wretched piece of ſophiſtry. The intention of the commons is ſufficiently implied in the petition of right, where it is ſaid, “That they ſhould not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge, without conſent of parliament.” On the other hand: the leading members of the commons cannot be wholly cleared of a duplicity of conduct in this affair. It is certain that they foreſaw the difficulty that afterwards happened, and for that reaſon carefully avoided, in all their debates, the leaſt mention of tonnage and poundage, leſt it might obſtruct the paſſing of the petition. This conduct, however, is to be imputed to a few only; for it is ſufficiently evident from the great progreſs made in the bill for granting to the king by law, what he was determined to levy without it, that the houſe in general meant well. After all ſome difficulties ſtill remain: nor is it eaſy to determine, whether, if Charles had ſuffered the parliament to continue, ſome of the members, who were no friends to monarchy, would not have found means to have thrown out the tonnage and poundage bill, or at leaſt to have rendered it ineffectual. But however that be, the precipitate meaſures purſued by Charles greatly increaſed that influence, which, by a little moderation and forbearance on his part, muſt have been deſtroyed, by the real deſigns of its authors being diſcovered.

The nation had now but a melancholy proſpect, with regard to the war carried on againſt France and Spain. Rochelle had for ſome time been inveſted, and it was apparent by Richelieu's taking the conduct of the ſiege upon himſelf. that he intended to exterminate the Hugonots, whoſe whole dependence was now upon the Engliſh. Charles was ſincerely deſirous of relieving them, and had given them from time to time aſſurances of his intention. The earl of Denbigh was accordingly ſent in the beginning of May with a fleet to their aſſiſtance. This armament conſiſted of ten ſhips of the line, and about ſixty ſmaller veſſels, moſt of them tranſports, carrying about two thouſand, two hundred ſoldiers. As ſoon as the fleet reached Rochelle, Denbigh found means to inform the inhabitants of that city, that he was come to their relief, and deſired they would place lights on as many of the ſteeples as the months for which they had ſtill proviſion; but no ſuch ſignals appearing, it was concluded that they were already in the greateſt want of neceſſaries. The Engliſh admiral found the entrance into the harbour guarded by a great number of French ſhips; and promiſed the Rochellers, that he would, upon the return of the tide, attack the fleet of the enemy. During the night, a battery of nine pieces of cannon was erected at the mouth of the harbour, and played furiouſly on the Engliſh; and before noon the next day, the French ſhips were filled with troops; an army of land forces was drawn up upon the ſhore to oppoſe their landing, and all the neceſſary diſpoſitions were made for a vigorous defence, in caſe any attack ſhould be made by the Engliſh. Theſe difficulties did not, however, intimidate the Engliſh admiral; he prepared to relieve the place, and to ſink the French ſhips that guarded the paſſage into the harbour; but the wind changing, he was obliged to lay aſide his deſign. Three days after, he attacked the French ſhips on one ſide, while the Rochellers cannonaded their land forces on the other, and brought up four of their largeſt veſſels, which had been purpoſely built to draw as little water as poſſible, in order to paſs the bar; but found the attempt impracticable, not only for want of water, but alſo from the diſpoſitions the French had made to defend the paſſage. A few of the ſmaller ſhips, however, paſſed the bar, but were ſo warmly oppoſed by the French artillery, that they were obliged to return. Upon this miſcarriage, a council of war was held; where ſome of the Engliſh captains were of opinion, that the relief of the place was impracticable, and that the Rochellers had deceived them with regard to the facility of entering the harbour. This opinion was, however, by no means unanimous; for the Engliſh vice-admiral, and one captain Carr, exclaimed againſt the puſillanimity of the reſt; and the few ſmall ſhips in the fleet, belonging to the French proteſtants, offered, by the aſſiſtance of four merchantmen well armed, with three fire-ſhips, and a proportional number of land forces, to throw a quantity of proviſions into the town. The earl of Denbigh, however, refuſed the offer, notwithſtanding the Rochellers agreed to pay for all the Engliſh ſhips that might miſcarry in this attempt. But neither this offer, nor the tears and prayers of the deputies of Rochelle, could prevail upon Denbigh. He returned to England, where he was loaded with calumny and diſgrace.

The enemies of Buckingham had induſtriouſly circulated the remonſtrances of the commons againſt him in every part of the nation. He perceived his dreadful ſituation; and found the wings of royal authority, broad as they were, too narrow to ſhelter him from the dreadful ſtorm raiſed againſt him by the parliament. He plainly ſaw that no efforts of his own, no conceſſions of his maſter, could recover his credit, and that nothing leſs than his blood could ſatisfy his enemies. He therefore threw aſide all other conſiderations, and reſolved, if poſſible, to ſignalize himſelf, and recover the favour of the people, however he might ſtand with the parliament; and well knew, that nothing could ſo readily effect this as his relieving Rochelle. He accordingly cauſed ten ſhips of a particular form, and peculiarly adapted to paſs the bar, to be built with the utmoſt expedition, and made the neceſſary diſpatches for ſailing, to relieve that place, now reduced to the laſt extremity. But a fixed gloom was ſettled on his countenance; he appeared abroad with omens of misfortune in his aſpect; his unſteady motions, his dark expreſſions, his earneſtly recommending his wife and children to Charles, his frequent ſolitary entertainments with his mother, his reflections on the tender ties of nature, and the ſoft endearments of life, which he was juſt going to leave behind him, ſufficiently declared that he feared his approaching fate. But nothing unbecoming a man eſcaped from his lips: and the fleet being ready to ſail, he repaired to Portſmouth, determined to relieve Rochelle, or periſh in the attempt.

One Felton, a man of a good family, but of a gloomy, enthuſiaſtic diſpoſition, had ſerved in the ſtation of lieutenant under the duke, in his late expedition to Rhé. His captain being killed in the retreat, Felton applied to Buckingham for the company; but being refuſed, he threw up his commiſſion, and retired, diſcontented, from the army. The remonſtrance of the commons rouzed at once both his reſentment and enthuſiaſtic fury: he was now convinced, that it would be a meritorious ſervice in the ſight of heaven to murder Buckingham, whom the parliament had accuſed as the author of all the misfortunes of his country. Filled with theſe ideas, he repaired to Portſmouth, fully determined to put his bloody deſign into immediate execution.

Early in the morning of the twenty-third of Auguſt, Buckingham received ſome advices, informing him, that a ſmall convoy of proviſions had got ſafe into Rochelle. This intelligence he communicated to the duke of Soubiſe, and other French gentlemen in his train, who inſiſted, with great vehemence, that the whole was falſe, and calculated only to retard the ſailing of the fleet. During theſe aſſeverations, the duke drew towards the door; and turning himſelf in the paſſage, to ſpeak to Sir Thomas Fryar, a colonel in the army, he was ſtabbed by an unknown hand, over Sir Thomas's ſhoulder. The knife, with which the wound was given, reached his heart; and, without uttering any other words, than "The villain has killed me," he drew out the knife, and immediately expired in a deluge of his own blood.

As no perſon had ſeen the hand that gave the blow, it was conjectured that the murder had been perpetrated by the French gentlemen, whoſe angry tone of voice had been heard, while their words had not been underſtood by the people. Some were for putting them to death immediately, but were prevented by the more conſiderate part, who thought it highly reaſonable they ſhould undergo a lawful trial. In the midſt of this confuſion, a hat was found near the door, in the inſide of which was ſewed a paper, containing three or four lines of the remonſtrance of the commons, which declared Buckingham an enemy to the kingdom. All were now convinced that this hat belonged to the aſſaſſin; but there was ſufficient reaſon to think he had eſcaped far enough, during the tumult, not to be found without a hat. They were, however, miſtaken; Felton never attempted to fly from juſtice, and he was ſoon perceived walking very ſedately before the door without his hat. He was immediately ſeized, confeſſed the murder, and ſeemed to triumph in the action. The enraged ſoldiers drew their ſwords, and were for ſacrificing him immediately on the ſpot. Their fury had no effect upon Felton; he readily expoſed his breaſt to their ſwords, and ſeemed willing to fall a preſent victim to their anger. Their fury was, however, prevented, and the aſſaſſin was ſecured. Some gentlemen, deſirous of finding whether Felton had any accomplices, hinted that Buckingham, though dangerouſly wounded, was not dead, and that there were great hopes of his recovery. Felton ſmiled at this, and replied, in words very expreſſive of his enthuſiaſm, "I know that he is dead, (ſaid he) for I had the force of forty men when I ſtruck the blow." Being queſtioned with regard to the perſons by whoſe inſtigations he had performed the horrid deed, he told them, that their inquiries were uſeleſs; that no perſon upon earth had credit ſufficient with him to have diſpoſed him to undertake ſuch an action; that no man living was privy to his purpoſe; that the reſolution proceeded wholly from the impulſe of his own conſcience; and that if his hat was found, his motives would ſufficiently appear: for, perſuaded that he ſhould periſh in the attempt, he had taken care to explain them, that no innocent perſon might ſuffer on his account.

Charles was at church when the news was brought him of his favourite's death; but he was ſo earneſt in his devotions, that no diſcompoſure appeared in his action, nor alteration in his countenance. The ſervice was, however, no ſooner over, than he retired to his chamber, and gave vent to his ſorrows in a flood of tears. And during his whole life, expreſſed his regard for Buckingham by a ſeries of munificent acts towards his widow, his children, and his friends. Some of the council, and biſhop Laud in particular, threatened Felton with the rack, if he did not diſcover his accomplices. But this had no effect upon the aſſaſſin: he calmly replied, "that if he was put to the torture, he did not know whom he might name in the extremity of anguiſh, perhaps the biſhop himſelf." The judges, however, being conſulted, declared, that though that practice had been formerly common, no man, by the laws of England, could be put to the torture. Reflection and confinement had more effect on the enthuſiaſtic ſpirit of Felton than all their threatenings. He ſeemed, in ſome meaſure, to recover from his deluſion, expreſſed remorſe for what he had done, and ſuffered death with compoſure and reſignation.

Thus fell, in the thirty-ſeventh year of his age, the celebrated George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, whoſe riſe was ſudden, his promotions rapid, and his end untimely. As a miniſter, he deſerved the public hatred, as much as he was unworthy of the favour of the two monarchs whom he had expoſed to ſo many misfortunes. As a man, he merited the higheſt reproaches of the good and the virtuous. It is impoſſible to excuſe either James or his ſon for their attachment to a man who had neither merit nor virtue. To how many calamities are ſtates expoſed, when the royal favour inveſts with power an unprincipled wretch, who lies under no reſtraint with regard to its exerciſe!

The concern ſhewed by Charles for the death of his favourite did not, however, extinguiſh his deſire of relieving Rochelle. He gave the command of the armament to the earl of Lindſay, and repaired in perſon to Portſmouth, in order to haſten the ſailing of the fleet. His preſence had ſuch effect, that more was done in ten or twelve days, than in almoſt as many weeks before. It was, however, the eighth of September, before the fleet ſailed from Portſmouth, when the vaſt genius of Richelieu had finiſhed a work thought impoſſible to be executed in ſo ſhort a ſpace of time: this was a mole of more than a mile in length, carried acroſs the mouth of the harbour, in that boiſterous ocean, and by means of which all relief by ſea was cut off. On the eighteenth of September, the fleet reached the road of Rochelle; but a calm coming on, it was the twentieth before the ſhips approached the mole, when a furious cannonade began, and continued for two hours, without any great loſs on either ſide. Next day the cannonading continued, but with leſs vigour; though it was known, by a gentleman who had found means to eſcape from Rochelle, that the inhabitants, unleſs relieved in two days, muſt ſurrender. But even this intelligence produced no effect on the Engliſh captains, who appear to have been deſtitute of experience, and ſome of them of courage. The duke of Soubiſe offered to attempt the mole with the French ſhips, provided the Engliſh would promiſe to follow him; but this propoſal was rejected, in a council of war, by a majority of the Engliſh captains. The count Laval next propoſed, with the help of artificial mines, contrived in three ſhips, to attempt to blow up the mole; but this was alſo rejected, and the time was ſpent in fruitleſs cannonading. At laſt it was determined, in a council of war, to make one general and deciſive attack upon the mole; but before the deſign could be carried into execution, the beſieged were obliged to capitulate. Of fifteen thouſand perſons who had been ſhut up in the town, four thouſand only ſurvived the fatigues and famine they had undergone. A more ſhocking ſcene of calamity was never beheld than Rochelle preſented at the time of its ſurrender. The living were not ſufficient to bury the dead, ſo that vermin and birds of prey devoured the uninterred bodies in the ſtreets. Many carried their own coffins into the church-yards, to lie down in them, never more to riſe; and the few inhabitants who ſurvived appeared rather as ſpectres and ſkeletons than men.

The reduction of Rochelle was the firſt neceſſary ſtep towards the proſperity of France. Foreign enemies, as well as domeſtic factions, being deprived of that reſource, the kingdom began to ſhine out in its full ſplendor, and gradually to gain an aſcendant over the rival power of Spain. The French king, however, uſed his conqueſt with great moderation; the Hugonots ſtill enjoyed a toleration, though every order of the ſtate, and every ſect, were obliged to pay ſubmiſſion to the lawful authority of the ſovereign.

The failure of the enterprize to Rochelle tended greatly to diminiſh the king's authority in the parliament during the approaching ſeſſion. Nor did his meaſures at home tend to raiſe the character of his government. He again revived the iniquitous opinions of the judges, and ſome oppreſſive practices in former times, to juſtify the impoſition of twenty ſhillings a ton upon wines, and five ſhillings and ſixpence a hundred upon currants; he even declared in full council, that the tax ſhould be levied with rigour, and ſuch merchants as refuſed to pay it exemplarily puniſhed. He was not inſenſible of the ferment which theſe proceedings muſt occaſion in the kingdom, but took no pains to prevent it. His coffers were now full, and he could talk with his parliament upon more equal terms than before. It was therefore reſolved to juſtify the proceedings of the government upon this principle, that though his majeſty's predeceſſors had raiſed tonnage and poundage by act of parliament, yet they had, in fact, levied it in the late reigns when no ſuch act ſubſiſted: that if the parliament would agree to paſs ſuch an act, and make it commence from the beginning of the king's reign, his majeſty's proceeding would be juſtified under that act, and he would deſiſt from his claim of raiſing the tax by his prerogative; but if no ſuch bill paſſed, his majeſty would be juſtified, becauſe he did no more than had been done by his predeceſſors.

The king was confirmed in theſe reſolutions by the late ſucceſs that had attended his endeavours to bring over the famous Sir Thomas Wentworth to his intereſt. This gentleman had been a principal leader in the oppoſition, and was conſidered, by all parties as one of the moſt able members of the Britiſh ſenate. On his embracing the meaſures of the court, he was created viſcount Wentworth, and earl of Strafford, and placed at the head of the miniſtry. Aſhamed at what the party he had abandoned termed apoſtacy, Strafford, for ſome time, concealed his change of ſentiments; but at laſt boldly juſtified it, by ſaying, that he had gone as far in the oppoſition as was conſiſtent with his conſcience, or the conſtitution of his country; and that he had not left his party till he perceived they had views of a very different nature from the redreſs of grievances, or an alteration of meaſures. Theſe excuſes were treated as chimerical by the heads of the party he had forſaken; and Mr. Pym in particular deſired Wentworth not to take any pains in juſtifying his conduct, but added, "Though you have left us, we will not leave you, while your head is on your ſhoulders."

AD. 1629. The parliament met on the tenth of January, and immediately proceeded to take into conſideration every thing that had been tranſacted againſt the liberty of the ſubject, and in direct oppoſition to the petition of right. Several complaints were immediately made to the houſe by merchants, whoſe goods had been ſeized in conſequence of their having refuſed to pay the duties of tonnage and poundage. While the members were employed in debating on this ſubject with their uſual violence, the king ſent a meſſage to the commons, deſiring they would proceed no farther in that buſineſs, till he could ſpeak to both houſes in perſon at Whitehall. The lords and commons accordingly attended him the next day, when he endeavoured to juſtify his conduct on the principles already mentioned to have been laid down in his council. He blamed the commons for their general reſolution of enquiring into all the infractions of the petition of right, and recommended to their diſpatch, the bill for tonnage and poundage, which, he ſaid, would have been paſſed laſt ſeſſion, had there been time ſufficient for that purpoſe, and it was upon that preſumption he had ordered his officers to act in the manner they had done.

But inſtead of following his majeſty's directions, the violent members, who were no ſtrangers to the effect of ſpeeches in popular aſſemblies, turned the attention of the houſe to matters of religion, poured out the moſt inveterate invectives againſt Arminiaſm, which they termed the ſpawn of popery; but in reality they meant nothing more by the term, than biſhop Laud and his party, who in that particular point of doctrine were more juſtifiable than in any other. An Arminian was ſaid to be as bad as a papiſt, and ſome declared that they feared his ſucceſs more, than a ſecond invaſion by a Spaniſh armada. When the houſe was ſufficiently heated by declamatory ſpeeches, Mr. Pym moved to give religion the precedency of all other matters. The motion was agreed to, and a committee appointed accordingly. This was a great point gained, eſpecially as under the head of religion they voted "an enquiry into all eccleſiaſtical preferments; into the ceſſation of the execution of the laws againſt papiſts; into the employments and encouragements they had obtained; into the growth of ſuperſtitious ceremonies, of which Couſins, a prebendary of Durham, was mentioned as the principal author; and into the growth of hereſies, falſe doctrines, and other opinions." The conſideration of ſo many ſubjects could not fail of employing the houſe for a great length of time.

Charles ſaw the intention of the commons, but thought it imprudent to break with them immediately merely becauſe they refuſed to proceed to the bill of tonnage and poundage; he thought, and indeed very reaſonably, that he could better juſtify any violent meaſures he might afterwards be obliged to take, if he allowed them to carry to the utmoſt extremity their attacks upon his government and prerogative. He therefore contented himſelf for the preſent with ſolliciting the houſe by meſſages and ſpeeches. But the commons, inſtead of liſtening to his ſollicitations, proceeded to carry their cenſorial ſcrutiny into his management of religion, the only grievance to which they had not as yet applied a ſufficient remedy by the petition of right.

But though they pretended the utmoſt regard for religion, their principal deſign was to wreſt from the king the duties of tonnage and poundage, in order to render him abſolutely dependent on the parliament for ſupport. The right of tonnage and poundage on the importation and exportation of merchandize, though originally the mere gift of the people, had been ſo ſtrongly confirmed to the crown ſince the reign of Henry IV. that the kings of England had always claimed it from the moment of their acceſſion. This right, which had been granted for life to former princes, was allowed to Charles only for one year. Finding that the intention of the commons was to ſtrip him of it entirely, he ſent them a meſſage, importing, "That he had never pretended to look upon it as a branch of the prerogative; that neceſſity alone had compelled him to levy it till that time, and, in order to terminate all diſputes upon that ſubject, requeſted that the commons would paſs the bill, that he might receive it as a gift from his people."

This meſſage, like all the reſt, was diſregarded by the commons, they continued to give the preference to religion, and made ſome attempts to annul the conſecration of Montague, lately promoted to the ſee of Colcheſter, for certain complaints that had been offered againſt him by one Jones, an obſcure perſon: but failing in this unaccountable attempt, they attacked the pardons that had been granted to Montague, Mainwaring, Sibthorpe, and other divines of Laud's party, who had been cenſured by the commons. It was upon this occaſion that Oliver Cromwell, who had then a ſeat in the houſe, firſt diſtinguiſhed his zeal, by ſhewing how inſtrumental Neile, biſhop of Wincheſter, had been in procuring theſe pardons. Sir Robert Philips called upon the attorney-general to give an account by what authority he drew theſe pardons, and a committee was appointed accordingly. Upon enquiry it appeared, that the warrants had been brought to the attorney-general by the earl of Dorſet and the lord Carleton, and that the biſhop of Wincheſter had corrected them with his own hand, and inſerted the names of Couſins, Mainwaring and Sibthorpe. It alſo appeared upon farther enquiry, that an information had been given upon oath againſt Couſins, for denying the king's ſupremacy in matters of religion, and that the attorney-general had, from a hint given him by the biſhop of Wincheſter, diſregarded the information, becauſe it came from one King, whom the biſhop ſaid was a very empty fellow and deſerved no credit. Elliot upon this diſcovery was very ſevere upon the attorney-general, whom he threatened with an impeachment for high-treaſon for a neglect of duty.

While the houſe was engaged in theſe religious diſputes, Mr. Rolls, one of the members, complained to the houſe, that he had the day before been ſerved with a ſubpœna to attend the court of ſtar-chamber, but that at night he received a letter from the attorney-general intimating, that it had been done by miſtake of the meſſenger, and that the information ſhould be withdrawn. The houſe, however, voted the ſerving of Rolls with a ſubpœna to be a breach of privilege. They alſo proceeded to enquire into the grievances of other merchants, and to cenſure the officers who had ſeized their goods for refuſing to pay the duties of tonnage and poundage. Theſe proceedings alarmed the king, and a council was ſummoned to conſider the moſt proper method to be purſued on this occaſion. And as the houſe of commons had founded their reſolution upon an opinion, that the cuſtom-houſe officers had ſeized the goods upon their own account, Charles thought proper to ſend a meſſage to the houſe, importing, "That what was formerly done by his farmers and officers of the cuſtoms, was done by his own direction and command, being himſelf, for the moſt part, preſent in council: and if he had at any time been abſent from the board, yet he was minutely acquainted with all their tranſactions, gave full directions in every particular, and therefore in this could not ſever the act of his officers from his own, nor could his officers ſuffer for it without the higheſt diſhonour to his majeſty." The houſe was ſo highly exaſperated at this meſſage, that after many bitter ſpeeches, the queſtion was propoſed to be put, that the ſeizing Mr. Rolls goods was a breach of privilege; but the ſpeaker informed the houſe that he was commanded by his majeſty not to put the queſtion. This threw the houſe into the utmoſt conſternation, and they adjourned themſelves for one day. When they met, the ſpeaker told them, that he had the king's command for a farther adjournment, and to put no queſtion. Having made this declaration he roſe and left the chair; but was puſhed back again into it, and detained there by force by Mr. Holles and Mr. Valentine, while Sir John Elliot read the following remonſtrance:

1. "Whoever ſhall make any innovations in religion, or by favour or countenance ſeem to extend or introduce popery or Arminiaſm, or other opinions contrary to the truth and the orthodox church, ſhall be reputed a capital enemy to his kingdom and commonwealth.

2. "Whoever ſhall counſel or adviſe the taking and levying the ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, or ſhall be an actor or inſtrument therein, ſhall be likewiſe reputed an innovator in the government, and a capital enemy to the kingdom and commonwealth.

3. "If any merchant or other perſon whatſoever, ſhall voluntarily yield, or pay the ſaid ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, not being granted by parliament, he ſhall likewiſe be reputed a betrayer of the liberties of England, and an enemy to the ſame."

This remonſtrance was paſſed by acclamation rather than by vote, while many of the members, thinking the leaders had gone too far in their oppoſition, expreſſed their diſlike of the whole proceeding, and the greateſt indecencies, even to blows, were committed. The king ſent the gentleman-uſher of the houſe of lords, but the doors were locked and he could obtain no admittance till the remonſtrance was finiſhed. As ſoon as the door was opened, he, by the king's order, took the mace from the table, which put an end to their proceedings; and a few days after the parliament was diſſolved.

Such were the proceedings of this famous parliament, whoſe heats concerning religion, and their bitterneſs againſt all who were ſuſpected of what they termed Arminiaſm, were as unjuſtifiable and as undutiful, as the noble ſtand they made for the perſonal liberties and properties of the ſubject were memorable and glorious.

This violent rupture between the king and his parliament alarmed the nation; but Charles took no care to make uſe of lenient meaſures, which might, perhaps, have effected a reconciliation. On the contrary, he inflamed the diſcontents of the people, by a ſeverity which he wanted power, perhaps inclination, to carry to extremity. He committed Denzil Holles, eſq; Sir John Elliot, Sir Miles Hobart, Sir Peter Hayman, John Selden, eſq; William Coriton, Walter Long, William Shoude, and Benjamin Valentine, to priſon, on account of the late tumultuous proceedings in the houſe, which were termed ſeditious. Elliot, Holles, and Valentine were brought to their trial in the court of king's bench: but refuſing to anſwer before an inferior court for their conduct as members of a ſuperior, they were condemned to be impriſoned during the king's pleaſure, to find ſureties for their good behaviour, and to be fined, the two former a thouſand pounds a piece, and the latter five hundred. Sir John Elliot died in cuſtody, and was univerſally conſidered as a martyr for the liberties of England.

Charles, that he might no longer be haraſſed with the turbulence of the commons, made peace with France, abandoning the Hugonots to the mercy of Lewis XIII. and ſoon after concluded a treaty with the Spaniards, from whom he obtained nothing more than a general promiſe of their uſing their good offices in reſtoring the elector palatine. Being thus at peace with the neighbouring powers, eaſed of a burthen too heavy for him, inſtructed by experience, naturally moderate, virtuous from principle, no longer a ſlave to the pernicious counſels of Buckingham, and bleſt with an able miniſter in Wentworth, earl of Strafford, it was natural to think that the troubles of his reign were over, and that a ſeries of tranquillity would ſucceed the ſtorms of popular contention. But this was not the caſe. New difficulties, new cauſes of diſtruſt, aroſe among the people, and the olive wand of peace diffuſed not domeſtic felicity over the kingdom. So difficult is it to govern happily, when faction has weakened the reſources of government.

A. D. 1630. Charles, like his father, was a theologician, and equally zealous to maintain his ſyſtem of religion, as to ſupport the prerogative of his crown. Unfortunately for him, and unfortunately for the peace of the kingdom, the king honoured with his confidence Laud, biſhop of London, a prelate whoſe diſintereſted principles and ſtrict morals were doubtleſs praiſe-worthy; but whoſe ſuperſtitious prejudices, obſtinate zeal, enterprizing ſpirit, and inflexible firmneſs, in oppoſition to the ſpirit of the nation, threatened the greateſt misfortunes to the ſtate. Laud was very deſirous of advancing the power of the prieſthood, and of multiplying church ceremonies; ſeveral of which he introduced, and moſt of them very ſimilar to thoſe of the Romiſh church. The puritans beheld, with horror, what they termed abominable ſuperſtitions. The communion-table railed in, the miniſters dreſſed in hoops to adminiſter the ſacrament, the communicants obliged to receive it kneeling, the crucifix and other images placed in the churches, were, in their eyes, ſo many ſcandalous attributes of anti-chriſt. The court of Rome itſelf entertained hopes of regaining its authority in this iſland; and in order to forward Laud's good intentions, an offer was twice made him in private, of a cardinal's hat, which he declined accepting. The general cry, however, was, that the biſhop of London was endeavouring to reſtore popery. One of the daughters of the earl of Devonſhire having turned catholic, was aſked by Laud the reaſon of her converſion. "It is principally, replied ſhe, becauſe I hate to travel in a crowd: for perceiving that you and numbers more are making preparations for Rome, I thought it more convenient to ſet out before you, that I might not be joſtled in the multitude."

But if the biſhop and his partizans carried the ſpiritual juriſdiction too high on one hand, and thereby incurred the hatred of the people, they did not fail, on the other, to preach up the moſt implicit obedience to the royal authority, the ſure means of obtaining the favour of his majeſty. Laud was accordingly advanced to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury, which empowered him to exerciſe a kind of deſpotiſm with vigour in the church. Diſtreſſed for money, notwithſtanding the ſtricteſt œconomy, Charles began to make a freer uſe of his authority. Illegal as the collection of tonnage and poundage was, the council preſſed it with the utmoſt violence. This induced the great merchants to enquire more than ever into its legality, and were ſoon convinced that the principle on which it was founded ſtruck at the root of liberty. This alarmed the whole fraternity of merchants, and their fears were greatly increaſed by the publication of the following reſolutions of the council.

"That warrants ſhould be directed to the officers of the cuſtoms in the port of London, and elſewhere, to ſeize and detain the goods of any perſon, who ſhould attempt to land them without warrant till the duties were paid.

"And that ſuch merchants goods as remained on ſhip-board, ſhould be removed into ſtore-houſes on the cuſtom-houſe quay; and for want of room into the Tower, there to remain till his majeſty's duties, and the freight due to ſhip-maſters were ſatisfied.

"And whereas attempts were made by replevin, directed to the ſheriff of London, to obtain thoſe goods out of the king's ſtore-houſes, the meſſengers of the council were ordered to detain them in their cuſtody, and to apprehend all perſons who ſhould preſume to make reſiſtance."

At the ſame time ſtrict orders were ſent to the officers and chief magiſtrates of the chief ports of the kingdom, to aſſiſt the officers of the cuſtoms, in caſe any oppoſition ſhould be made by refractory perſons. Sir Francis Cottingham was authorized to call before him ſuch merchants as had been truſted by the collectors for ſums now due by cuſtoms, and who had protracted the payment; and to require them to pay the ſeveral ſums they owed his majeſty without delay.

Warrants were alſo iſſued from the council empowering their meſſengers to enter any ſhip, veſſel, houſe, warehouſe, or cellar, to break any bulk whatever, and ſeize the goods, in default of paying the accuſtomed duties; and to apprehend all perſons who ſhall publiſh ſcandalous ſpeeches againſt his majeſty and his government, or cauſe any diſturbance.

Nor were theſe the only methods taken by the king for raiſing money on his ſubjects without the conſent of parliament. He publiſhed a proclamation, “ declaring his majeſty's royal pleaſure to confirm to his ſubjects their defective titles, eſtates and poſſeſſions, by his commiſſion lately granted and renewed for that purpoſe.” But notwithſtanding the ſpecious title of this proclamation, the people in general conſidered it only as an expedient to raiſe money without the conſent of parliament; and this increaſed the alarming diſcontent already diſſeminated in every part of the nation. But this was trifling when compared with the ſpirit raiſed by another proclamation, publiſhed on the thirteenth of July, “ for the eaſe of the ſubjects in making their compoſitions for not receiving the order of knighthood according to law.” The reader may recollect, that in the former part of this hiſtory, many inſtances have been given of ſubjects veſted with a certain degree of property being obliged to take upon them the order of knighthood. This property was very fluctuating in different reigns; and there was an obſolete, though unrepealed ſtatute, called, “ Statutum de militibus,” paſſed in the reign of Edward II. which obliged all ſubjects poſſeſſed of fifteen pounds a year in land, to take upon them the order of knighthood, provided they were fit for that duty. The order was generally conferred at the coronation; and Charles, on account of the plague's raging in London at the time when he received the crown, had diſpenſed with the attendance of ſuch ſubjects as were qualified to be knights. But being now diſtreſſed for money, this diſpenſation was conſidered only as a matter of convenience. It was pretended, that the right of impoſing the honour, which was attended with a large expence of fees, remained ſtill with the crown; and that the king was at liberty to oblige all perſons, properly qualified, either to be knighted, or pay compoſition money to certain commiſſioners appointed to receive it: the qualification was fixed at forty pounds a year. It is not eaſy to conceive a project more abſurd, more unreaſonable, and more unjuſt, than this. As the whole ſyſtem of feudal ſervices in perſon, during war, was now aboliſhed, there was not the leaſt pretence for reviving this tax, but a ſtatute which had been made when theſe ſervices were in full force. Add to this, that if fifteen pounds a year was, in the time of Edward II. a proper qualification, two hundred pounds a year at leaſt ought to have been the qualification under Charles I. The king, while any hopes remained of obtaining ſupplies from his parliament, had deſiſted from collecting ſo invidious a tax; but it was now revived with ſo much vigour, that many were put to great expences in the exchequer and ſtar-chamber for refuſing to pay the compoſition money, which was required to be one third and a half of what the perſons ſo compounding were found rated in the ſubſidity.

Theſe proceedings intimidated ſo many perſons, that the king received above one hundred thouſand pounds compoſition money. Beſides theſe, Charles granted oppreſſive patents, and monopolies, among which thoſe on ſoap and ſtarch are particularly complained of as very burdenſome to the lower claſs of people. It is ſurprizing with what patience theſe impoſitions were borne by the people; they occaſioned no diſturbances in any part of the kingdom. It muſt, however, be obſerved, to the honour of the judges, that they oppoſed many of theſe oppreſſions; and to the honour of the king, that he dropped them on their repreſentations. Perhaps more of them had been annihilated, had not Charles been perſuaded by his flatterers, that they were not burthenſome to the people; that he had an undoubted right to levy them; that his parliament had been the aggreſſors; that the houſe of commons and the people were diſtinct bodies; that though he was, perhaps, acting againſt the ſenſe of the former, he was acting for the good of the latter; while the tides of commerce flowed in ſo faſt, that their riches, as well as patience, were inexhauſtible.

Charles was better pleaſed to govern by his prerogative alone, than in conjunction with his parliament; and leſt the hopes of relief or protection from the commons might encourage oppoſition, the king iſſued a proclamation, in which he declared, “ That whereas, “ for ſeveral ill ends, the calling again of a parliament “ is divulged; though his majeſty has ſhewn, by frequent meeting with his people, his love to the uſe “ of parliaments: yet the late abuſe having, for the “ preſent, driven him unwillingly out of that courſe; “ he will account it preſumption in any one to preſcribe to him any time for the calling that aſſembly.” This was generally conſidered as a declaration, that, during this reign, no more parliaments were intended to be ſummoned.

The eyes of the Engliſh were now turned towards their beloved object, the queen of Bohemia; and the king was very deſirous of procuring ſome relief for his unfortunate ſiſter, and her family. He joined his good offices with thoſe of France, and mediated a peace between the kings of Poland and Sweden, in hopes of engaging the latter to undertake the protection of the diſtreſſed proteſtants in the empire. This was the famous Guſtavus Adolphus, whoſe heroic genius, ſeconded by the wiſeſt policy, rendered him, in a few years, the moſt diſtinguiſhed monarch of the age. Charles, to encourage and aſſiſt him in his projected invaſion of Germany, agreed to furniſh him with ſix thouſand men; but in order to maintain the appearance of neutrality, he made uſe of the marquis of Hamilton's name, a nobleman nearly allied to the crown. Hamilton accordingly entered into an engagement with Guſtavus; and inliſting theſe troops in England and Scotland, at the king's expence, he landed them at the mouth of the Elbe. Guſtavus was greatly pleaſed when he heard the Engliſh were landed, and promiſed to join them as ſoon as poſſible with the ſtipulated number of forces deſtined to conquer Sileſia.

It is inconceivable what ſervice the appearance of ſo fine a body of men did to the proteſtant cauſe. Their numbers were greatly exaggerated by their enemies through fear, and by their friends through deſign; and ſo great was the reputation of their valour, that the celebrated victory gained a few weeks after by the Swediſh monarch over count Tilly at Leipſick, was, in a great meaſure, owing to their reputation. What remained of that hero's life was one continued ſeries of victories, for which he was much leſs beholden to fortune than to thoſe perſonal endowments which he derived from nature, and from induſtry. The veteran troops of Ferdinand, commanded by the moſt celebrated generals of the age, were foiled in every encounter, and all Germany was over-run in an inſtant by the victorious Swede. But, by this extraordinary and unexpected ſucceſs of his ally, Charles failed of the purpoſe for which he framed the alliance. Elated by proſperity, and no ſtranger to ambition, Guſtavus began to form more extenſive plans; and after freeing Germany from the yoke of Ferdinand, he intended to reduce it under ſubjection to his own. Full of theſe ideas, he refuſed to reſtore the Palatine to his principality, except on conditions that would have kept him in total dependence. And thus the negotiation was protracted till the battle of Lutzen, where the Swediſh hero periſhed in the midſt of a complete victory which he obtained over his enemies.

A. D. 1631. The incapacity of the lord treaſurer Weſton to execute that important poſt, had been, for ſome time, evident, and now became every day more glaring by the contraſt between his abilities and thoſe of Wentworth, who was now made preſident of the council of York. This court had been erected, after a rebellion in the north, by a patent from Henry VIII. without any authority of parliament; and this exerciſe of power, like many others, was indulged by that arbitrary monarch. The council of York had long acted chiefly as a criminal court; but beſides ſome innovations introduced by James, Charles thought proper, ſome time after Wentworth was made preſident, to extend its powers, and to give it a large civil juriſdiction, and, in ſome meaſure, a diſcretionary power. Poſſibly the king's intention in this was nothing more than to free the inhabitants of the northern counties from the trouble, expence, and fatigue, of attending the courts at Weſtminſter; but it ſoon appeared, that the inhabitants were, by this means, deprived of the protection of the ordinary law, and ſubjected to an arbitrary authority. And accordingly, ſome irregular proceedings in that court were now complained of, and tended to exaſperate the people ſtill more againſt the government. When Wentworth was gained over to the court party, Sir Dudley Digges was made maſter of the rolls, Noy attorney-general, and Littleton ſollicitor-general. All theſe were leading men in the houſe of commons. But it ſoon appeared, that the ſame abilities which are ſufficient to perplex a court by their oppoſition, are not capable of effectually ſerving it by their compliance. Charles flattered himſelf, that by engaging thoſe eminent leaders in his ſervice, his government would meet with no more oppoſition, and that a calm tranquillity would be eſtabliſhed in this kingdom during the remainder of his reign; but his own upright intentions to make the virtues of his miniſters ſupply the laws of his country, fatally deceived him. Laud purſued the puritans with unremitting fury, and was fond of introducing new ceremonies into the church, and of carrying to the utmoſt height the power of the prieſthood.

A.D. 1632. But if the furious conduct of this imperious churchman alarmed the moderate Engliſh, it ſtruck the Scottiſh preſbyterians with terror. They were, in general, men as violent for one extreme as Laud was for the other; and the dreadful ſhock, when both afterwards encountered, cruſhed the church, the monarchy, and the conſtitution. When Mary was driven from the throne of Scotland, the conſtitution of that kingdom became ſuch a confuſed mixture of monarchical, ariſtocratical, democratical, and eccleſiaſtical powers, that it hardly deſerved the name. The prudent government of James, while he continued in Scotland, and the unſucceſsful attempts of the bigotted zealots to eſtabliſh their favourite model of religion, gave the crown great advantages; ſo that about the year 1621, epiſcopacy was reſtored in Scotland. James had been wiſely cautious in the promotion of his biſhops; they were, in general, men of great moderation, and well acquainted with the genius of the people; for which reaſon they ſtrongly oppoſed every attempt to bring the diſcipline and worſhip of the church of Scotland to a nearer conformity with that of England. The truth is, nothing in the principles of the firſt reformers, either in Scotland or foreign parts, was againſt a ſubordination of eccleſiaſtical government. All of them, indeed, concurred, that the popiſh biſhops ſhould be removed; but neither their plan of government, nor that of power, was ſo fixed, as to enable them to agree who ſhould ſucceed them, though, in general, they ſuffered thoſe who embraced the tenets of the reformation to retain both their revenues and appellations. But what at firſt was no more than a matter of convenience, ſoon became a point of principle. The eſtates of their great men were chiefly compoſed out of the ſpoils of the church; and the misfortune was, that the power of the crown was not ſufficient to prevent theſe dilapidations. The acts of parliament in favour of the preſent poſſeſſors, gave them infinite advantage; but the circumſtances under which theſe parliaments were held, rendered their authority liable to many juſt exceptions. While the king touched not this jarring ſtring of eccleſiaſtical government, the parliament ſubmitted to the prerogative in as full a manner as it had ever been exerciſed; but the landholders of Scotland could not, without the utmoſt concern, ſee the leaſt increaſe of epiſcopal power, or any nearer conformity of their church with that of England, becauſe they conſidered every ſtep as an approximation towards the re-aſſumption of church-lands. During the whole reign of James, the Scottiſh biſhops had been contented to act rather as preſidents in their eccleſiaſtical meetings, than the fathers of the church, in the common acceptation of their character. When a ſee happened to be vacant, James always ordered the biſhops to preſent him with the names of ſuch men as they thought moſt proper to fill it, and he generally pitched upon the beſt qualified. Hence the biſhops, in a manner nominating one another, lived in harmony among themſelves, and acted ſo moderately, that the noblemen and great landholders in Scotland became pretty well reconciled both to their temper and their character. Happy would it have been for Charles, had he preſerved the ſame moderate conduct. But Laud deteſted all moderation in church government, and Charles would liſten to no advice but that of Laud. That imperious churchman repreſented, in the higheſt terms, the dignity of the epiſcopal character: he diſplayed an army of martyrs who had died in its defence: he called to his aid all the tyrants of the eaſtern empire who had favoured it: he poured forth a profuſion of quotations, from what he called the fathers of the church: and, upon the whole, ſucceeded in convincing Charles, that the leaſt defect of reverence, either to the government, the doctrine, or the worſhip of his church, ſtruck at the moſt ſacred rights of the crown. Nor was this all: Laud was of opinion, that the church of England, as left by James, was imperfect in its worſhip. To prove this, he produced ſome opinions, which, in the twilight of reformation, when ſeveral prelates wavered between the old and the new religion, had been maintained in the convocation, and ſometimes in their writings. The authorities of the weakeſt of the fathers of the church were produced, to prove, that certain forms and ceremonies, things as indifferent in themſelves as Laud's own dreams, had been formerly practiſed, and hence he inferred that they were eſſentials in religion.

But Charles, however warm and ſerious in theſe matters, was perſuaded that theſe ceremonies had ſo near a reſemblance to popery, that it would be imprudent to attempt their introduction all at once among a people accuſtomed to think in the oppoſite extreme. It was therefore determined previouſly to new-model the hierarchy, by introducing gradually a ſet of men of very different principles from thoſe that now filled the ſees of Scotland, in order to reſtore authority and diſcipline to the church, and purity and ſplendor to her worſhip. The vacant biſhoprics were accordingly filled with ſuch men as had neither the virtues nor abilities neceſſary for filling their ſtations, in a country where the minuteſt parts of their conduct were ſeverely ſcrutinized by the piercing eye of puritanical enthuſiaſm.

Enemies to epiſcopal government, but without either power or pretence of oppoſing theſe promotions, the Scots made not the leaſt oppoſition; but under the pretence of faſts and other religious exer-exerciſes, they formed many ſecret reſolutions for ſtrengthening their party. They, however, ſtill behaved with all the external marks of the moſt implicit ſubmiſſion to the eſtabliſhed government; they went no farther than a proteſt in parliament againſt the meaſures they could not approve. Charles was ſo much impoſed upon by theſe appearances of acquieſcence, that he thought he ſhould meet with nothing in that country to oppoſe his pleaſure; and imagined that his preſence, the ſplendid appearance of his court, and the weight of his authority, would bear down the ſmall remains of oppoſition, and fix the authority of the crown on a baſis that could not be ſhaken.

A.D. 1633. Full of theſe pleaſing ideas, and deſirous of being crowned in his ancient kingdom, he ſet out for Scotland, attended by the whole flower of the Engliſh nobility, who vied with each other in the ſplendor of their equipages. It was the fifteenth of June before Charles reached Edinburgh; and on the eighteenth, he was crowned in that city with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence. On the twentieth the parliament met, and gave Charles every thing he deſired. Two acts, indeed, met with ſome oppoſition. The firſt, beſides eſtabliſhing the king's prerogative, gave him power to preſcribe what habits he pleaſed to the eccleſiaſtics of Scotland: and by the ſecond, the alienations formerly made of tythes, and other eſtates of the clergy, were revoked.

Many of the Engliſh nobility that attended the king, and diſliked Laud and his principles, ſoon perceived the Scots were far from approving the bill that gave Charles the power of regulating the habits of the clergy. The dreadful ſurplice was before their eyes; and they apprehended, with ſome reaſon, that under the ſanction of this law, it would ſoon be introduced among them. This diſcovery prompted the Engliſh nobility to attempt another; namely, the real ſtrength of the royal party in Scotland. The courtiers had been at great pains to have it believed, that the Scots, who had been ennobled and enriched by Charles and his father, were men of the greateſt intereſt, as well as property, in their country. But the falſhood of theſe ſuggeſtions was eaſily perceived by Charles's attendants: they ſaw the Scots in general treat with great contempt the royal favourites of their own nation; and were ſoon convinced, that the perſons of the greateſt weight and property there were in the country intereſt. This diſcovery tended to leſſen the terror conceived by the Engliſh on account of the king's power in Scotland; and laid the foundation of a correſpondence between the principal perſons of the two kingdoms, and which was not broken off till both found themſelves engaged in all the horrors of a civil war.

Soon after the king's return from Scotland, Juxon was placed in the ſee of London, and alſo made lord high treaſurer. He was a perſon of great integrity, mildneſs, humanity, and underſtanding; but all his virtues could not procure him the friendſhip of the puritans. He was a lover of hunting, and other ſports of the field, a ſufficient reaſon, however eminent in virtue, to procure him the hatred of thoſe whoſe religion admitted not of the leaſt relaxation. Charles was very deſirous of introducing a chearfulneſs into the national devotion. He renewed his father's edict for allowing ſports and recreations on Sunday, after the ſervice was over, to ſuch as attended the public worſhip; and ordered his proclamation for that purpoſe to be publicly read by the clergy after divine ſervice. Thoſe who were puritanically affected refuſed obedience, and were puniſhed by ſuſpenſion or deprivation. This tended greatly to widen the breach between the church and the diſſenters, and promote that ill humour and diſcontent already too predominant in the nation. The queen, though ſtrictly virtuous, was immoderately fond of pleaſure, particularly the entertainments of the ſtage; and her example was followed by the whole court, and the greateſt men in the nation.

In the midſt of this diſſipation, William Prynne, a puritanical barriſter of Lincoln's-Inn, publiſhed an enormous quarto of a thouſand pages, intituled, Hiſtorio-Maſtyx. Its profeſſed purpoſe was to decry ſtage-plays, comedies, interludes, muſic, dancing, and other diverſions of that kind; but he alſo took occaſion to declaim againſt hunting, public feſtivals, Chriſtmas-keeping, bonefires, and May-poles. The author tells us, in his preface, that he was excited to write againſt theſe enormities, by obſerving that plays ſold better than the choiceſt ſermons, and that they were frequently printed on finer paper than even the Bible itſelf. He maintained, that moſt of the players were papiſts, and all of them deſperately wicked; that the play-houſes were Satan's chapels, the frequenters of them little better than devils incarnate, and every ſtep in a dance was a ſtep to hell; that the principal crime of Nero was that of frequenting and acting of plays; and that thoſe who conſpired his death were chiefly excited to it by their indignation at that enormity. This publication gave ſo much offence to the court, that Prynne was indicted before the ſtar-chamber; where his behaviour was remarkably obſtinate and petulant, which tended to increaſe the rigour of his ſentence. He was condemned to pay a fine of five thouſand pounds to the king; to be put from the bar, and rendered incapable of his profeſſion; to be excluded from the ſociety of Lincoln's Inn, and degraded in Oxford; to ſtand on the pillory in Weſtminſter and Cheapſide, to loſe an ear at each place, and to ſuffer perpetual impriſonment.

The remarkable ſeverity of this ſentence raiſed the government many enemies, and greatly augmented the numbers of the puritan party. It was thought extremely hard that an invective againſt plays ſhould merit a puniſhment proper only for the greateſt criminals. But it muſt be remembered, that this ſatire againſt the diverſions in vogue, though the pretended, was not the real crime for which Prynne was condemned. He had ſeverely cenſured the practices of the new hierarchy, and the ceremonies introduced by Laud; a crime not to be forgiven by that imperious prelate.

A. D. 1634. The Dutch were at this time the great rivals in commerce to the Engliſh. A prince of Charles's principles was ſhocked at the independent pretenſions of that haughty republic, which had been nurſed by the blood, and fed by the bounty of England; nor had he received any adequate ſatisfaction for the maſſacre of Amboyna. James had made ſeveral attempts for hindering the Dutch from fiſhing on the coaſt of England, but all his prohibitions were in vain; the Dutch, after various pretences, at laſt aſſerted they had a right to fiſh upon the Britiſh coaſts, founded on immemorial poſſeſſion. The ſtates of Holland, however, diſavowed this plea of their commiſſioners; but, at the ſame time, declared, that however unjuſt, and however contrary to the rights of ſovereignty in the crown of England, their practice of fiſhing on the Britiſh coaſts might be, it was ſo abſolutely neceſſary to the very exiſtence of their ſtate, that they dared not either give it up, or pay any acknowledgment for it, leſt their people ſhould riſe in open rebellion againſt them. This was an argument not to be anſwered by reaſon, and Charles was determined to drive them by force from the Britiſh coaſts.

Vigorous meaſures were therefore begun in ſeveral parts of the kingdom; but theſe could not be carried on without proportional revenues; and thoſe of Charles were only barely ſufficient for maintaining the ſplendor of the court, performing his engagements with foreign princes, and defraying the neceſſary expences of his government. Noy, the attorney-general, was therefore commanded to diſcover ways and means for fitting out a fleet ſufficiently powerful to execute this purpoſe. Noy fell upon the expedient of ſhip-money; grounding it upon obſolete uſages and records, which juſtified a tax upon the people for furniſhing a certain number of ſhips for the defence of the ſeas; and writs were iſſued accordingly.

Theſe writs were accompanied with inſtructions and directions from the lords of the council for the aſſeſſing and levying the ſhip-money. Theſe inſtructions were directed to the ſheriffs of the ſeveral counties; and by them it appears, that the ſhips aſſeſſed upon the counties of Middleſex and Hereford was to coſt three thouſand pounds; and that thoſe who refuſed to pay their proportion, were to be diſtreſſed, and their goods ſold for payment, without any reſpect of perſons. The reſt of theſe inſtructions contain the particular manner of levying the tax, and gave very arbitrary powers to the officers of the peace. The writ being ſerved upon the lord mayor of London, he immediately ſummoned a common council, where it was agreed to preſent the following petition to the king.

"To the king's moſt excellent majeſty,

"The humble petition of your faithful ſubjects, the mayor, commonality, and citizens of your city of London, moſt humbly ſheweth, "That whereas your majeſty, by writ bearing teſte 20 Octobris laſt, commanded your petitioners, at their own charge, to provide ſeven ſhips of war, furniſhed with men, victuals, and all warlike proviſions, to be at Portſmouth by the firſt of March next, and to continue from that time during the ſpace of twenty-ſix weeks in your majeſty's ſervice, upon the defence of the ſeas, and other cauſes in the ſaid writ contained.

"Your petitioners do, in all ſubmiſſive humbleneſs, and with acknowledgements of your ſacred majeſty's favours unto your ſaid city, inform your majeſty, that they conceive, that by ancient privileges, grants, and acts of parliament, which they are ready humbly to produce, they are exempt, and are to be freed from that charge.

"And do moſt humbly pray,

"That your majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed, that the petitioners, with your princely grace and favour, may enjoy the ſaid privileges and exemptions, and be freed from providing of the ſaid ſhips and proviſions."

But notwithſtanding this oppoſition of the capital, Charles proceeded with as much violence as if ſhip-money had always been an eſtabliſhed tax, and as if he did not expect to meet with the leaſt attempt to oppoſe his arbitrary proceedings. Noy, the attorney-general, dying about this time, left the affair unfiniſhed; but the neceſſities of Charles increaſing, he reſolved that ſhip-money ſhould be extended to the inland as well as the maritime counties. But in order to this, it was neceſſary to employ proper perſons, and to invent plauſible pretences. Sir Robert Heath, lord chief juſtice, had, in many reſpects, been found untractable, and was accordingly removed from his office, and his place ſupplied by Sir John Finch, a lawyer of great eloquence, and a firm friend to the court; and Sir John Banks was made attorney-general. It was, probably, owing to the opinion of thoſe lawyers, who were far inferior in abilities to Noy, that Charles made ſhip-money a general tax; but even this attempt did not alarm the nation ſo much as was expected. The merchants, who generally take the lead on theſe occaſions, were too well acquainted with the advantages of commerce to riſque them by an oppoſition which might have given the court a pretence for impoſing heavier duties upon goods; and as the tax propoſed fell more heavy on the landed than the trading intereſt of the kingdom, they did not, for ſome time, conſider it as a ſtretch of arbitrary power. This acquieſcence gave the court a perfect ſecurity. Charles endeavoured to fill the kingdom with apprehenſions, that the Dutch and the French having entered into a new alliance, would certainly attempt to make themſelves maſters of the narrow ſeas; and a proclamation was accordingly publiſhed, commanding all Engliſh ſeamen and ſhipwrights, who were in foreign ſervices, to return home immediately.

But this calm was deceitful. The nation ſtill continued to have the higheſt opinion of thoſe patriots, who had, in a manner, forced the king to paſs the petition of right, and rather acquieſced in, than approved of the many breaches daily made in that famous act, eſpecially with regard to ſhip-money. It was about this time that Edward Coke, the eminent lawyer and patriot, paid the debt of nature, in the eighty-third year of his age. But there were not wanting men who trod in his paths, and endeavoured to rouze the public from their lethargy, by ſhewing, that the continual encroachments of the prerogative would ſoon baniſh all law from the conſtitution. Theſe alarming ſuggeſtions had their weight; they occaſioned ſuch diſputes with regard to the payment of ſhip-money, that not more than two hundred and thirty-ſix thouſand pounds were collected during the whole year.

This oppoſition, however, produced no change in the conduct of Laud: he continued to exerciſe his eccleſiaſtical power with the greateſt ſeverity. He now attempted to oblige all foreigners ſettled in England to conform to the eſtabliſhed church, notwithſtanding all the privileges and indulgences that had been granted them by former princes, and the infinite advantages the nation acquired by their ſettling in this country. The French and Dutch churches, being joined by all the puritans in England, made a vigorous oppoſition, and refuſed, on account of the exemptions and privileges they had received from the crown, to pay any deference to Laud's authority. The primate, however, prevailed ſo far, that though all foreigners of the firſt deſcent were ſuffered to continue their own method of worſhip, yet thoſe of the ſecond deſcent, that is, thoſe who were born in England of foreign parents, were ordered by the king to repair to their own pariſh-churches, under the penalty of being proceeded againſt in the ſpiritual courts.

A. D. 1636. The good effects of the arbitrary tax of ſhip-money began now to appear. A fleet of ſixty ſail of large ſhips was fitted out, under the command of the earl of Northumberland; and a proclamation was iſſued, ſtrictly forbidding all perſons, not the natural born ſubjects of theſe kingdoms, from fiſhing on the Britiſh coaſt, without proper licences from the king, who farther declared, that he intended always to keep a ſtrong ſquadron at ſea, in order to prevent all ſuch encroachments for the future, and to protect thoſe ſhips of his friends and allies who ſhould take out licences. The earl of Northumberland ſailed in the month of May; and coming up with ſome of the Dutch ſhips, he ſunk all that refuſed to leave the coaſts, and diſcontinue their fiſhery. This ſpirited conduct ſtruck a terror into all the maritime powers of Europe; even the haughty Richelieu himſelf, who had formed a deſign of rendering the Dutch the rivals of the Engliſh on the ocean, was obliged to abandon his project. The Dutch themſelves applied to Charles in the moſt earneſt manner; and at laſt conſented to pay thirty thouſand pounds for a licence to fiſh during the remainder of the year, when it was hoped a proper regulation would be made for fixing an annual tribute for the neceſſary licences.

But no advantages of commerce, reputation or ſafety, could prevail upon the people to pay the odious tax of ſhip-money with alacrity. The progreſs of the ſciences had increaſed their thirſt for knowledge; and the excellent writings and ſpeeches on the conſtitution of England, during the late reign, were now purchaſed and read with the greateſt avidity. But particularly the plain inconſiſtencies between the levying of that tax, and the petition of right, were evident to the moſt ſlender capacity; ſo that neither the ſermons of divines, the opinions of lawyers, the threats of power, nor the arts of courtiers, had any effect: they firmly adhered to the dictates of common ſenſe, and ſet all the ſophiſtical arguments of the artful and the eloquent at defiance. Such, however, was their veneration for the government, and ſo high an opinion did they entertain of the natural equity of the king, that many paid the tax, though they were perſuaded the law could not oblige them. They knew that the judges had taken great pains to recommend it from the bench, and doubted not but an attempt would ſoon be made to render it legal by a formal deciſion. Chambers, a merchant of London, abſolutely refuſed to pay, and was ſent to priſon by Sir Edward Bromfield, lord mayor, one of the commiſſioners for levying ſhip-money. But Chambers was not to be intimidated by the hand of power: he brought his action againſt Bromfield for a treſpaſs and falſe impriſonment. Sir Robert Berkley, one of the judges of the court, would not, however, ſuffer Chambers's council to argue againſt the legality of ſhip-money, declaring openly in court, "That there was a rule of law, and a rule of government; and that many things which might not be done by the rule of law, might be done by the rule of government."

This was the deteſtable doctrine, which, like an ignis fatuus, led Charles to thoſe dangerous precipices from whence he fell, to the ruin of himſelf, and the ruin of his people. A regular diſtribution was now drawn up of ſhips adapted to the ſeveral ſhires of England and Wales, with their tonnage, number of men, and monthly expence; together with the ſums charged upon the reſpective corporate towns in each county. And Charles, that he might proceed with more ſafety, and remove the ſeveral objections that had been ſtarted againſt paying the tax, procured the opinion of the judges, "that when the good and ſafety of the kingdom in general is concerned, and the nation in danger, the king might lawfully levy a tax for fitting out ſuch a number of ſhips as ſhall be neceſſary for the defence of the nation; and that his majeſty is the ſole judge both of the danger, and when and how it is to be prevented."

Charles was now ſatisfied that he had not acted contrary to the laws, and determined to puniſh, with the utmoſt ſeverity, all who ſhould, for the future, dare to oppoſe his royal pleaſure. It is amazing with what reluctance the people paid this tax, though they were no ſtrangers to this proſtitution and perverſion of the laws of their country: their uſual aſylum, the courts of law, were ſhut againſt them, and there was no medium; they muſt either ſubmit, or have recourſe to violence, an expedient which no wiſe man would chuſe. A choſen few, however, were ſtill in reſerve; men who dared to think with juſtice, and act with intrepidity; who, armed with the principles of civil and natural liberty, were determined to ſupport the cauſe of their country, and not tamely ſubmit to the arbitrary power of the crown. Strong reaſonings, bold elocution, deep learning, and upright intentions, were not, however, ſufficient to ſuſtain this dreadful combat; a leader muſt be found, who, beſides all theſe accompliſhments, had intrepidity ſufficient to ſtand forth in the cauſe of his country. Such a man was John Hambden, a gentleman poſſeſſed of a conſiderable eſtate, and deſcended from an ancient family in Buckinghamſhire; which being an inland county, afforded him the better pretence for refuſing to pay the tax of ſhip-money. His ſhare did not amount to more than thirty ſhillings, yet he abſolutely refuſed payment, and determined to venture a trial, the event of which would clearly point out to the whole kingdom, whether arbitrary power was to prevail over juſtice.

A. D. 1637. After many pleadings and traverſes, the caſe was argued, during twelve days, in the exchequer-chamber, before all the judges of England; and the nation regarded, with the utmoſt anxiety, every circumſtance of this celebrated trial. It will be eaſily conceived, from the opinion of the judges, that the great queſtion in this cauſe was, Whether the kingdom was in ſuch imminent danger, that the king had a right to aſſeſs his ſubjects, without waiting for the neceſſary forms of parliamentary proceedings? It was confeſſed on all hands, that both public and private dangers may be ſo great, that all property may ceaſe, while the parties are providing for their own ſafety. But none of the crown lawyers pretended, that the danger of the kingdom was then ſo preſſing, as to give the king a right to the property of the ſubject; and the ſmall portion of Mr. Hambden's aſſeſſment was no argument for his paying it, unleſs they could prove it to be according to law. Whether the king was, or was not, the ſole judge of the public neceſſity, was ſtrongly debated, but greatly to the diſadvantage of the court; ſince nothing could be more obvious than this, that when public danger becomes ſo preſſing as to confound all property, the caſe will be notorious, and ſelf-preſervation becomes the common principle with both prince and people. It is true, the king may have reaſons, unknown to his ſubjects, to fear the attempts of ſome public or private enemy, and make the neceſſary preparations to render the whole abortive; but nothing here occurred to convince any man of common underſtanding, that the danger, if indeed any was apprehended, might not have been prevented by regular parliamentary methods. With regard to the precedents brought by either ſide from former reigns, they were equally ſtrong for both parties, and therefore were of no weight in deciding this great national cauſe. The truth is, we have too many melancholy inſtances in the Engliſh hiſtory of iniquity being eſtabliſhed, not only by precedents, but by law: and that liberty often borrowed her gloom or luſtre from the vices or virtues that filled the throne. The lawyers, however, that pleaded the cauſe of Hambden, or rather that of their country, had infinite advantage over their antagoniſts, by unanſwerably proving the illegality of the tax from the poſitive and fundamental articles of the great charter, and other conſtitutional acts, which no practices, no precedents ought to affect or deſtroy. And whoever examines with attention the inſtances produced on both ſides, will perceive, that the current of precedents runs always ſtrongeſt for the people in the moſt virtuous periods of government: while thoſe for the crown ſpring from the fear of arbitrary power, from ſlaviſh complaiſance, from immediate danger, from groſs ignorance, or from prevailing corruption.

But notwithſtanding the force of the arguments uſed by Hambden's counſel, the event was what had been long foreſeen. The prejudiced or proſtituted judges, four of them excepted, gave ſentence in favour of the crown. Hambden, however, obtained, by the trial, the end for which he had ſo generouſly ſacrificed his ſafety, and his quiet: the people were rouzed from their lethargy, and became fully ſenſible of the danger to which their liberty was expoſed. Theſe national queſtions were canvaſſed in every company; and the more they were examined, the more evidently it appeared to many that liberty was totally ſubverted, and an unuſual and arbitrary authority exerciſed over the kingdom. Slaviſh principles, it was ſaid, concurred with illegal practices; eccleſiaſtical tyranny lent aſſiſtance to civil uſurpations: iniquitous practices were ſupported by arbitrary puniſhments; and all the rights of the nation, tranſmitted through ſo many ages, ſecured by ſo many laws, and purchaſed by the blood of ſo many heroes and patriots, now lay proſtrate at the feet of the monarch.

Laud, however, proceeded in the ſame imperious manner, and whoever refuſed to ſubmit to his arbitrary meaſures, was ſure to feel the weight of the hand of power. Among others, Williams, biſhop of Lincoln, was ſingled out as a perſon who oppoſed the meaſures of the government, and was a friend to the puritanical party. He was accordingly indicted in the ſtar chamber on very frivolous pretences, fined ten thouſand pounds, ſuſpended from his office, and committed to the tower during the king's pleaſure. Williams, when deprived of his poſt of lord keeper, retired to his biſhopric, joined the country party, and became one of the chief leaders of thoſe who oppoſed the government. This was a crime not to be forgiven by Laud, though the primate himſelf had been indebted to Williams for his firſt promotion. But to ſee a biſhop countenance puritans; a creature of the court become its obſtinate enemy, and oppoſe with great firmneſs and vigour all the meaſures of government; theſe were circumſtances that excited indignation, and engaged the miniſters to purſue him with the utmoſt vengeance. Men of more generous, and more moderate principles, however, beheld theſe tranſactions in a very different point of light; they conſidered the proſecution of Williams as one of the moſt iniquitous meaſures purſued by the court during the time that the uſe of parliaments were ſuſpended.

Burton a miniſter, and Beſtie a phyſician, were alſo tried in the ſtar-chamber, for writing ſeditious and ſchiſmatical libels, and condemned to ſuffer the ſame puniſhment as had been inflicted on Prynne. Theſe writers had attacked, with great ſeverity, and even intemperate zeal, the ceremonies, rites, and government ment of the church; crimes for which no pardon could be expected from the furious primate. Full of the enthuſiaſtic principles they had endeavoured to ſupport in their writings, they behaved with the greateſt inſolence before the court; and the very anſwers they gave in were ſo full of contumacy, and invective againſt the prelates, that no counſellor could be prevailed upon to undertake their defence. The ſentence of the court was, however, greatly condemned, as very unworthy men of their profeſſion; and the patience, or rather the alacrity, with which they ſuffered the puniſhments inflicted on them, ſtill farther increaſed the indignation of the public.

But notwithſtanding all theſe meaſures, there would have been no danger of the government's being overturned, if fanaticiſm, ſtronger than all human paſſions, had not armed the people againſt a monarch, who, in his own perſon, merited their eſteem. We have already ſeen how deſirous Charles was of eſtabliſhing in Scotland the diſcipline and worſhip of the church of England. He was fond of epiſcopacy, and inveſted the biſhops with an authority which he thought equally advantageous to religion and government. He loved church ceremonies, and wanted to have them received as eſſentials in divine ſervice. Without reflecting how much all men are attached to their particular mode of worſhip. Charles, confident of his own power, now ſent down canons for the government of the church of Scotland, and a new liturgy for regulating the manner of worſhip. The people were far from being diſpoſed to receive them. The nobility from a jealouſy of power, and the diſſenting clergy from principles of equality, were enemies to the hierarchy; and their univerſal hatred of the church of Rome, made them abhor whatever had the leaſt reſemblance to the method of its worſhip. On the ſixteenth of July, public intimations were given from the pulpits, that on the following Sunday the new liturgy would be introduced into the principal churches. Both the biſhop and dean of Edinburgh attended to give the greater ſolemnity to this new form of worſhip. The latter, dreſſed in a ſurplice, began the liturgy. But he had not proceeded far in the ſervice, before the people cried out, "A "Pope! a Pope! ſtone him!" The biſhop, however, mounted the pulpit, and attempted to appeaſe the tumult. But his endeavours were in vain: they threw a bench at his head, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that both him and the dean eſcaped with life. The contagion ſoon ſpread through the city. The magiſtrates ſuffered a thouſand inſults. The clergy declaimed with the utmoſt vehemence againſt innovations, and compared the populace to Balaam's aſs, whoſe mouth the Lord had opened.

But notwithſtanding theſe alarming tumults, no man of any conſequence joined the people. The laws in Scotland were very ſevere againſt treaſon, and men of property were cautious of truſting their lives and fortunes to the furious declarations of an inconſtant multitude. Charles was fatally deceived by this appearance of reſtraint, and attributed their ſilence to an approbation of his meaſures. He had long been deluded by pretenſions, and raiſed to the firſt poſts in the miniſtry, thoſe men who hated his perſon, his family, and his religion; they flattered him the more abjectly, that they might ruin him the more ſecurely. The whole cabinet council, indeed, was compoſed of perſons who wiſhed well to the meaſures they ſeemed to oppoſe, and which they were ſometimes obliged to puniſh. A deep foundation for public diſcontent being thus laid, nothing was wanting but a proper cement for the materials that were to compoſe the ſuperſtructure; and this required great ſkill to perform. The Scottiſh nobility and principal gentry were at that time very fond of travelling into foreign parts, where their countrymen ſerved with great honour in the armies of different princes; and the knowledge they by this means acquired of men and things, gave them great advantages. It was eaſy for them to ſee, that without a common principle of action, the ſpirit of the people muſt ſoon evaporate, and their whole party lie proſtrate at the footſtool of power. What his principle ought to be required attentive conſideration. Intereſt, indeed, was an obvious one in men of property, but this centered in a few, compared to the whole body of the nation, and was therefore deſtitute of force ſufficient to animate the maſs of the populace. A common principle was at laſt agreed upon, and this was religion. They knew with how much advantage the Holy League had been introduced in France, and had ſeen how eaſily the people are animated into rebellion, by the late tumult in the capital.

The criſis which was to decide the fate of the eſtabliſhed religion in Scotland was now approaching. The ſpirit againſt the new liturgy daily increaſed among the common people, and the repeated commands of the court to introduce it proved at once ineffectual, and dangerous to the biſhops. The magiſtrates of Edinburgh, where theſe diſturbances chiefly prevailed, were, in ſecret, enemies to the liturgy, but, in public, they expreſſed the utmoſt abhorrence of the riotous proceedings of the populace, and frequently aſſembled in order, as they pretended, to concert meaſures for putting a ſtop to thoſe alarming attempts of the multitude. They even promiſed to aſſiſt the king to the utmoſt of their power to appeaſe the tumultuous populace, and introduce the new liturgy. But in the mean time a breach enſued between the biſhops and miniſters of Scotland, and ſoon after another between the biſhops and the nobility of that kingdom. The counſel of the moderate biſhops, who had always oppoſed the violent methods of introducing the liturgy, was diſregarded by the new prelates promoted by Laud, and who were perſuaded that the intereſt of their patron with the king was abundantly ſufficient to ſupport them. This induced them to diſregard not only the advice of their more moderate brethren, but alſo that of the nobility, who took advantage of this neglect to withdraw their countenance entirely from the proceedings of the clergy.

Animated by the countenance of their miniſters and the nobility, the people began to unite, and to encourage one another to oppoſe the religious innovations introduced into the kingdom. Petitions to the council were ſigned and preſented by perſons of the higheſt quality: the women, as is common in every religious diſturbance, joined with great violence in the oppoſition: the puritan miniſters declaimed vehemently againſt popery; and the pulpits reſounded with the moſt violent invectives againſt anti-chriſt. In a word, fanaticiſm mingling with faction, and private intereſt with the ſpirit of liberty, ſoon produced the ſymptoms of the moſt dangerous inſurrection and diſorder in every part of the kingdom

A. D. 1638. Charles was, however, determined to perſevere. He ſeemed to deſpiſe the threats of the vulgar, and even the defection of the nobility. The primate of Scotland, a man of great temper, wiſdom, and religion, always averſe to the introduction of the new liturgy, repreſented to his majeſty in faithful colours, the ſtate of the nation. The earl of Traquair, lord treaſurer, repaired to London, in order to lay the matter more fully before the king. But all their repreſentations were in vain: Charles was inflexible. He had, however, nothing to oppoſe to ſo violent a combination of the whole nation but a proclamation, wherein he promiſed pardon for all paſt offences, and exhorted the people to be more obedient for the future, and to ſubmit peaceably to the uſe of the liturgy. But this was ſo far from producing the deſired effect, that it was immediately oppoſed by a public proteſtation, preſented by the earl of Hume and lord Lindeſey. This was the criſis of the oppoſition: the inſurrection which had been gathering by degrees, now broke out at once; the ſtandard of rebellion was diſplayed, and the ſword of civil diſcord on the point of being ſheathed in the bowels of that unhappy country. No diſorder, however, attended theſe dreadful appearances of war and devaſtation: on the contrary, a new order, or rather a new adminiſtration, immediately took place; a ſufficient indication that this diſturbance had been ſecretly fomented by perſons in a ſtation far exalted above the common people. Four tables, as they were called, were formed in Edinburgh: one conſiſted of nobility, another of gentry, a third of miniſters, and a fourth of burgeſſes; and in the hands of theſe four tables the whole authority of the government was placed. One of their firſt, and, at the ſame time, the greateſt act they performed, was that of the ſolemn league and covenant.

This celebrated compact conſiſted firſt of a renunciation of popery formerly ſigned by James in his youth, and compoſed of many invectives well adapted to inflame the minds of men againſt their fellow-creatures, whom heaven hath enjoined them to cheriſh and to love. Then followed a bond of union, by which the ſubſcribers bound themſelves to reſiſt all religious innovations, and to defend each other againſt all oppoſition whatſoever: "and all this for the greater glory of God, and the greater honour and advantage of their king and country." It is aſtoniſhing with what eagerneſs all ranks of people flocked to ſign this covenant, conſidered by them as the bulwark of the chriſtian religion, which, according to their narrow way of thinking, was practiſed no where in its original purity but in Scotland.

Though a people cannot be too jealous of their liberties, and though no government has a right to attack, much leſs to deſtroy them; yet this jealouſy ought to have its bounds in reaſon, in nature, and in duty. The firſt never warrants reſiſtance, but under provocation; the ſecond makes ſelf-preſervation to be her primary law; and the latter, by ſupporting ſubordination in government, preſerves the peace, the happineſs, and the tranquillity of human ſociety. Could the Scots have produced any poſitive fundamental act of their conſtitution, unintelligible as it then was, which Charles had violated; had he governed their country with a rod of iron, or arbitrarily introduced a religion eſſentially different from that eſtabliſhed by law, aſſociations might have been defenſible, though they are never eligible, till after the regular applications for redreſs have been made in vain. But how did this matter ſtand between Charles and the Scots? His father's and his own unſparing hand had enriched, embelliſhed, and ennobled their country, beyond what they ought to have done, in juſtice to their other dominions. If any iniquity had been eſtabliſhed there, it had not only been eſtabliſhed, but acquieſced in, by the legiſlative power; the wholeſomeneſs of their laws had not been corrupted into poiſon by judges, who held over their heads the rod of the king's diſpleaſure. Their civil liberties had never been attacked by power; prerogative had not, as in England, mocked at their calamities, nor ſet at nought the provident wiſdom of their anceſtors. Epiſcopal government was the legal inſtitution; nor could an attempt to introduce a diſputable mode of worſhip, approved of by the government, both eccleſiaſtical and civil, warrant that worſt part of popery, an aſſociation againſt the civil power, under pretence of religion.

But the voice of enthuſiaſm liſtens not to the declarations of reaſon. The Scottiſh preachers, determined to carry their point, though they involved the government of their country in confuſion, recommended the ſtrongeſt oppoſition to the people. Charles was alarmed, and offered to ſuſpend the introduction of the liturgy, provided they would retract the covenant. Their anſwer was, that they would ſooner renounce their baptiſm. He then relaxed in other matters, in order to preſerve epiſcopal government, and permitted a general aſſembly to be ſummoned at Glaſgow. By this unadviſed meaſure the whole deſign was finiſhed. The laity, whom the preſbyterians admitted, and who formed the ſtrongeſt part, began with impeaching the biſhops, whom they charged indiſcriminately with all ſorts of crimes. They afterwards declared all acts with regard to eccleſiaſtical matters, made ſince the advancement of James to the crown of England, null and void. Thus the canons, the liturgy, the court of high commiſſion, and even epiſcopacy itſelf, were aboliſhed in Scotland at one ſtroke. A meaſure ſo audacious could be ſupported only by arms. They accordingly prepared openly for a civil war, ſeized all places of ſtrength, fortified the town of Leith, and ſo remarkable was the deſire of completing the work, that women of quality mixed with the populace, and carried on their ſhoulders the materials neceſſary for the erecting the fortifications. A propheteſs, ſeconded by the harangues of a ſeditious preacher, wonderfully excited the general zeal and courage of the people: ſhe ſaid, that the covenant was regiſtered in heaven; called the Saviour of mankind Jeſus the Covenanter; and farcified all that was great and ſacred in religion.

A. D. 1639. Charles, though he was fond of peace, and of Scotland, his native country, could not avoid raiſing troops to reduce his rebellious ſubjects to reaſon, and ſubdue the refractory ſpirit of the Scots. By his œconomy, he had ſaved two hundred thouſand pounds; and the queen, by her influence with the catholics, engaged them to grant the king a conſiderable ſupply. The Engliſh fleet was very formidable, and well provided with every neceſſary. Five thouſand land forces were embarked on board this ſquadron, the command of which was given to the marquis of Hamilton, who had orders to ſail to the Frith of Forth, and cauſe a diverſion in the forces of the rebels. An army of near twenty thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe was levied, and commanded by the earl of Arundel, a nobleman of great family, but famous neither as a ſoldier nor a ſtateſman. The earl of Eſſex, a nobleman extremely popular, and of great military abilities, was appointed lieutenant-general, and the earl of Holland general of the horſe. On the twenty-ninth of May, the king himſelf joined the army, and ſummoned all the peers of England to attend him. Few diſregarded the ſummons; ſo that the Engliſh army reſembled rather the court of an eaſtern prince than a military expedition againſt an enemy.

The forces of the malecontents were little inferior in numbers to that of the Engliſh, but almoſt deſtitute of cavalry. The infantry conſiſted, indeed, of an undiſciplined and ill-armed rabble, but animated with a religious fervour, which, in ſome meaſure, ſupplied the want of diſcipline, and rendered them very formidable. The declamations of the clergy had greatly aſſiſted the officers in gaining recruits, by thundering out anathemas againſt all "who went not out to help the Lord againſt the mighty." But the leaders of the malecontents did not omit the more ſafe and prudent method of negotiation. They knew that a defeat muſt be fatal; and however their troops might be inſpired with an enthuſiaſtic fury, they were unable to ſtand the regular attacks of diſciplined forces. They therefore immediately ſent very ſubmiſſive meſſages to the king, begged leave to be admitted to a treaty, in order to reſtore tranquillity to their native country, and ſheathe the deſtructive ſword of civil diſcord.

Several conferences were accordingly held; but ſo many difficulties occurred, that it was ſome time before even any preliminary articles could be eſtabliſhed. At laſt, however, a pacification was agreed to, on the following terms:

"1. The forces of Scotland to be diſbanded, and diſſolved, within eight and forty hours after the publication of his majeſty's declaration being agreed upon.

"2. His majeſty's caſtles, forts, ammunition of all ſorts, and royal honours, to be delivered after the ſaid publication, ſo ſoon as his majeſty can ſend to receive them.

"3. His majeſty's ſhips to depart preſently after the the delivery of the caſtles, with the firſt fair wind, and in the mean time to cauſe no interruption either to trade or fiſhing.

"4. His majeſty has been graciouſly pleaſed to cauſe to be reſtored all perſons, goods and ſhips, detained and arreſted ſince the firſt of November laſt.

"5. That there ſhall be no meetings, treatings, conſultations, or convocations, of his majeſty's ſubjects, but ſuch as are warranted by act of parliament.

"6. The works on all fortifications to be abandoned, and the places themſelves to be delivered up to his majeſty.

"7. To reſtore to every one of his majeſty's ſubjects their liberties, lands, houſes, goods, and all other particulars whatſoever, taken or detained from them ſince the above term."

The Scottiſh deputies were at a loſs how to appeaſe their principals with regard to theſe articles, which fell far ſhort of what their ſanguine hopes had taught them to expect. Accordingly the earls of Caſſils, and ſeveral other noblemen and heads of the malecontents, loudly exclaimed againſt a pacification, which was to diſarm them, and leave them, in that condition, to the mercy of the court. No abolition of epiſcopacy, nor acknowledgment of the aſſembly at Glaſgow, had been ſtipulated, as they had been made to believe; the reſtitution of ſhips taken ſince the firſt of November was but a poor conſideration, in compariſon of the common cauſe; and the drawing off the Engliſh fleet from the coaſt was of little importance, becauſe the ſhips might return whenever his majeſty pleaſed. Add to theſe conſiderations, that Charles, in one of the anſwers he had given to the deputies, had actually diſowned the aſſembly at Glaſgow; nor would he conſent to any thing farther than to refer civil matters to a parliament, and eccleſiaſtical affairs to a general aſſembly; both of which he could call or diſſolve at pleaſure.

Nor was the peace more agreeable to the Engliſh; they exclaimed againſt it as loudly as the Scots; and there ſeemed very little hopes that it would be of any long continuance: the ſeeds of diſaffection were ſown in Scotland, and it was no eaſy taſk to prevent their growth.

While Charles was thus engaged in reducing his rebellious ſubjects to reaſon, an incident happened on the coaſt of England, which ſeemed to threaten alarming conſequences. The firmneſs of Charles in ſteadily preſerving his neutrality diſconcerted Richelieu's plan for attacking the ſea-coaſt of Flanders; and the count d'Eſtrades was ſent to conclude a new treaty of ſubſidy with the prince of Orange, in order to enable the Dutch to attack Antwerp, while the French were to beſiege St. Omers. The ſucceſs of thoſe attempts are foreign to this hiſtory. It will be ſufficient to obſerve, that theſe diſpoſitions induced the court of Spain to fit out a ſtrong ſquadron at Corunna, conſiſting of fifty ſhips, under the command of Don Antonio Doguendo, a celebrated ſea officer. Twelve thouſand foot were embarked on board this ſquadron, which was deſigned to join another fleet of Spaniſh ſhips at Dunkirk. Richelieu gave immediate notice of the ſailing of this fleet to the prince of Orange, who ſoon after diſcovered, that the Spaniſh admiral was ordered not to fight, if he could poſſibly avoid it; but put himſelf under the protection of the Engliſh, and land his men upon the coaſt of Flanders. This armament, and the fear of its being joined by the Engliſh fleet, greatly alarmed both the French and Dutch; and extraordinary efforts were made to put their fleets to ſea, in order, if poſſible, to render any attempt of the Spaniards abortive. A ſmall ſquadron of the Dutch, then at ſea, fell in with, and attacked the Spaniſh fleet, but with conſiderable loſs to themſelves. Soon after, the Spaniſh admiral came to an anchor near Dover, where he thought himſelf ſafe under the protection of the Engliſh. But the ambitious Richelieu had no regard to the rights of neutrality, when they oppoſed his views. He ordered d'Eſtrades to lay before the prince of Orange, "the glory that would "attend his defeating the meaſures of two great "monarchs, and of crowning all his noble exploits "in war by a victory over the fleet of Spain under "the protection of the Engliſh, and, perhaps, actually aſſiſted by their ſhips." He added, "that "ſuch an action would infallibly lay Flanders open "to the united forces of France and Holland." The prince of Orange, fond as he was of glory, eſpecially when acquired againſt Spain, was ſtartled at the thoughts of committing ſo groſs an inſult on the Engliſh flag; and aſked d'Eſtrades, with ſome emotion, "Whether Richelieu was in earneſt?" D'Eſtrades aſſuring him he was, the prince ſent orders to Van Tromp to haraſs the enemy with a kind of flying ſquadron; but not to venture a general engagement, till he was joined by admiral Everſon. As ſoon as this junction was performed, Tromp was ordered to ſend a meſſage to the Engliſh admiral, acquainting him, that having received orders from his maſters to attack their enemies wherever he found them, he requeſted that the Engliſh ſhips might leave the Spaniſh ſquadron, becauſe he was commanded not to attack them, unleſs they aſſiſted the enemy, and in that caſe his orders were to attack both without diſtinction. Charles was in the utmoſt perplexity how to behave on this alarming occaſion. The haughty republicans were now at the height of their power: their fleet, when united, conſiſted of one hundred and fifty ſail of ſhips of war, commanded by the beſt ſea-officers in the world; they were highly exaſperated againſt Charles for refuſing them the liberty of fiſhing on the Britiſh coaſts, and wiſhed for an opportunity of revenging the affront, by deſtroying his fleet. At the ſame time, the public were perſuaded, that the Spaniſh fleet was either intended to conquer England, or aſſiſt the king in ſubduing his rebellious ſubjects. Charles therefore knew that he could not truſt to the fidelity of his ſeamen, even if the Dutch ſhould violate their neutrality. At the ſame time, he knew that the Spaniſh fleet, which conſiſted of ſixty-ſeven large ſhips, was in want both of cannon and ammunition; while the Dutch were liberally ſupplied with both from Calais, and other ſea-port towns in France. It was ſome time before the whole Dutch fleet appeared, and made the proper diſpoſitions for attacking the enemy. During this interval, the Spaniſh miniſter preſented repeated memorials to Charles, for his protecting the Spaniſh fleet, which was now riding at anchor under the guns of the Engliſh caſtles near the South Foreland, while the Dutch remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt any Engliſh ſhip being employed in the Spaniſh ſervice. Charles knew not how to behave in this critical conjuncture, but at laſt determined to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality; and immediately iſſued orders, that no Engliſh ſhip ſhould take any Spaniards on board, or paſs from London below Graveſend without a licence. At the ſame time, he acquainted the Dutch ambaſſador, that he could not, without the higheſt diſhonour, refuſe the Spaniards that protection on his coaſts they had a right to demand from the law of nations; and that he had ſent orders to Sir John Pennington, who lay in the Downs with thirty-four ſail of Engliſh men of war, to join that fleet which ſhould be firſt attacked. This declaration leſſened the ardour of the Dutch, and the Spaniſh admiral found means to ſend twelve large ſhips and four thouſand men to Dunkirk. Charles was, however, fearful of the conſequences; and ſent the earl of Arundel to perſuade the Spaniſh admiral to ſlip away the firſt fair wind, as he could not be anſwerable for the ſucceſs of an engagement, if the Spaniards were attacked by the Dutch. Doguendo would gladly have followed this advice, but could not, on account of contrary winds: and the Dutch fleet being now completely reinforced, Van Tromp ſent a letter to Pennington, demanding the benefit of his neutrality, under pretence of the Spaniards having violated their privilege of protection, by firing on the Dutch admiral's barge, and killing one of his men. Tromp accordingly attacked the Spaniſh fleet with the utmoſt fury, forced them to cut their cables, drove twenty-three ſhips a-ſhore, of which three were burnt, and two ſunk. The Thereſa, mounted with a hundred braſs guns, was burnt, ſixteen were taken, and ſent to Fluſhing, with four thouſand five hundred priſoners, and fourteen ſhips were loſt near Boulogne; the Dunkirk ſquadron, under Doguendo, only eſcaping. The victory was complete on the ſide of the Dutch, though it was not obtained without ſome loſs; ten of their ſhips periſhing in the action.

Charles did not fail to repreſent this conduct of the Dutch, as an inſult upon the Britiſh flag; and made uſe of it as an argument for inforcing the payment of ſhip-money, in order to be able to keep a ſufficient fleet at ſea to curb the inſolence of thoſe republicans. New writs were accordingly iſſued and ſent to all the counties of England and Wales for collecting the tax. About this time the lord-keeper Coventry, who had the good fortune to hold the great ſeal many years, died in poſſeſſion of that high office. Every day now increaſed the obſtinacy of Charles, when it ought rather to have increaſed his caution. He determined to ſeize by violence that power which would enable him to govern the nation without controul, and to exerciſe it with prudence and equity, or, at leaſt, with ſomething which Laud and his own conſcience termed equity. The great ſeal was given to Finch, a man fit for promoting every arbitrary purpoſe.

But though the odious tax of ſhip-money was raiſed with great ſeverity, and other acts of deſpotic power were daily exerciſed, the people diſcovered no remarkable uneaſineſs at the neglect of parliaments and the unconſtitutional meaſures of the government. Peace and plenty reigned in the kingdom, and the wars that raged in the other nations of Europe, made England the repoſitory of riches from every part of the world. This greatly contributed to render the people almoſt paſſive in their preſent ſituation. They knew indeed their rights; they murmured at their being violated; they publickly proclaimed their grievances; they proteſted againſt illegal exactions: but this was nothing more than forming a rope of ſand; a parliament was wanting to give their complaints ſtrength and conſiſtency. On the other hand, the ſituation of affairs ſeemed to be irremediable even by wiſdom itſelf, and men of ſenſe plainly perceived that if the affairs of Scotland did not oblige the king to call a parliament, he would continue to govern by his preſent arbitrary methods, till the uſe of thoſe aſſemblies was forgotten.

The conduct of Charles in Scotland anſwered the moſt ſanguine hopes of the warmeſt patriots; and the diſpoſitions of the Scots were equally favourable for bringing matters to the criſis they deſired. The nobility and perſons of conſequence in that kingdom, were perſuaded they had ſufficiently guarded againſt all reſumptions of church revenues by exacting a promiſe from Charles to call a free parliament and an aſſembly of the clergy. They would willingly have waited the reſult of both; and that great point, the only one they dreaded, being gained, they would willingly have concurred and acquieſced in every dutiful meaſure towards the crown. But they found the people untractable: they refuſed to ſtop till epiſcopacy was totally abrogated, and the principles of civil liberty founded on a more ſolid baſis than at preſent. This ſcheme might have anſwered the juſt expectation of men of property, and, at the ſame time, if not have fully ſatisfied the wiſhes, have calmed the ſpirit of the people; but the whole was defeated through a want of moderation on the part of government. The marquis of Hamilton laid before Charles the deſtructive conſequences that muſt attend his not acting with ſincerity, by leaving the approaching parliament and aſſembly in Scotland, at free liberty to gratify the people with regard to every thing that had been underſtood to have been granted by the late pacification. By this he meant the total abolition of the epiſcopal order both in church and ſtate; but he perceived by the manner in which the king received his repreſentations, that this would not be granted. He therefore reſigned the office of high-commiſſioner in Scotland, and that invidious poſt was given to the earl of Traquaire.

The moderate part of the Scottiſh nobility would have been contented with ſome reſtraints being laid on epiſcopal power in parliament; but ſo furious was the ſpirit of the people, that it was thought there was leſs danger in an entire abrogation of the order, than either in continuing it, or riſking the conſequences of popular fury. The marquis of Hamilton was entirely of this opinion, and fairly laid all his reaſons before the king, who had continued ſome time at Berwick. Charles was aſtoniſhed, and ordered fourteen of the chief covenanting lords to attend him, in order to conſult the proper meaſures for ſettling the affairs of Scotland. The people were alarmed at this meſſage, and openly declared, that it had been propoſed by their own leaders in order to elude the force of the covenant. This ſo greatly intimidated the noblemen, that three only of the fourteen lords, could be prevailed upon to obey his majeſty's orders. Montroſe, Loudon, and Lothian, were the perſons who deſpiſed the fury of the populace when it tended to prevent their obedience to the king. The buſineſs of Charles was ſerious and important: he was deſirous of learning the whole deſign of the covenanters, and what they intended to demand in the approaching parliament and aſſembly. Montroſe was one of thoſe noblemen who thought the king had done enough to ſatisfy all his Scottiſh ſubjects, who had no dangerous or fanatical views. His two companions, particularly the earl of Loudon, were of the ſame opinion, but wiſhed to have ſecurity for the performance; and this they thought could only be effected by ſome additional bulwarks to the liberties of their country, eſtabliſhed in a full and free parliament. They therefore laid fairly before Charles what they expected from the next parliament.

In the firſt place the currency of the coin in that country was not very large; but its value might be raiſed or lowered by the crown in ſo arbitrary a manner, that all property, in a great meaſure, depended upon the king, and, at beſt, was very uncertain. The ſame power had formerly been exerciſed in England, and proved an intollerable grievance; but it carried with it its own remedy when commerce enlarged. For foreigners, without regarding the orders of the Engliſh government, always proportioned the price of their commodities to the intrinſic, not the nominal value of the coin. This conduct at laſt obliged the crown to lay aſide thoſe deſtructive practices, which could ſerve only ſome mercenary immediate ends, and the Engliſh mint had been, for ſome time, under excellent regulations. But Scotland had not the ſame remedy againſt this alarming oppreſſion, becauſe the commerce of that kingdom was more reſtrained, and money of much greater value than in England. It was therefore juſtly thought, that the ſubject ought to have ſome ſecurity againſt this grievance; and that the king ſhould declare, "that the coin ſhould not be meddled with, but by advice of parliament."

The next grievance enumerated by the Scots, was that of the command of their garriſons being given to ſtrangers. Both James and Charles had, indeed, to uſe their own expreſſions, broken down the partition-wall between the two kingdoms; and the Scots had poured by multitudes into England, where they enjoyed a great number of offices both eccleſiaſtical and military. But the wiſeſt men in both nations condemned this partiality in favour of the native country of their prince; and even the generality of the Scots themſelves were diſſatisfied with the encouragement many of their great men met with in England; which induced them to ſpend both their money and eſtates in that country. The Engliſh, a great and powerful people, had far leſs to apprehend from the Scots than the Scots from them. The caſtles of Edinburgh and Dumbarton were already garriſoned by the Engliſh; and it was always eaſy for their navy to deſtroy the commerce of Scotland. The Scots therefore thought it reaſonable, that no ſtranger ſhould be intruſted with the government of any of their caſtles, unleſs by the advice of the ſtates.

The heritable juriſdictions of Scotland were thought, even by the natives themſelves, to be dangerous, becauſe they created too great a dependence of the inferior people on particular families. They demanded, therefore, that no commiſſion of juſticiary or lieutenancy might be granted, but for a limited time.

Laſtly, they excepted againſt the precedency of the lord treaſurer and lord privy-ſeal, as not being warranted by any poſitive law. This exception was, probably, intended to prevent arbitrary promotions, which might eclipſe the luſtre of their ancient nobility, and create too powerful an influence of the crown in parliament.

Such were the demands intended by the Scots to be made in the enſuing parliament; and, poſſibly, if Charles had acted with ſincerity, they had ſtopped there; but he could not be prevailed upon to conſent to the abolition of epiſcopacy. The covenanters ſaw this, and were convinced that all conceſſions made by the king muſt be forced, and that he would retract them the firſt favourable opportunity. Their chiefs, therefore, thought they had no ſafety but in uniting more cloſely than ever, and openly oppoſing the power of the crown itſelf. Though their army had ſeparated on the concluſion of the late treaty, they continued ſtill in large bodies; the fortifications of Leith were continued; they iſſued commiſſions for purchaſing large quantities of arms and ammunition abroad; and Leſley ſtill kept up the character and title of general.

As ſoon as Traquaire received his commiſſion, he returned to Edinburgh, where both a parliament and an aſſembly were held. They immediately paſſed a bill for aboliſhing epiſcopacy, and another for removing the grievances already mentioned. The king was greatly exaſperated at theſe precipitate proceedings, and Traquaire received orders to prorogue both the parliament and aſſembly; but his authority was diſregarded; they continued their ſeſſion; and ſent the bill they had paſſed to Charles for the royal aſſent, pretending that no prorogation could take place without the conſent of the eſtates of the kingdom in parliament.

The aſſembly proceeded with equal violence; and all that Charles could obtain was an explanation of the famous covenant, in the following terms: "We "do ſwear not only our mutual concurrence and "aſſiſtance for the cauſe of religion, and to the utmoſt of our power, with our means and lives, to "ſtand to the defence of our dread ſovereign, and "his authority, in the preſervation and defence of "the ſaid true religion, liberties, and laws of this "kirk and kingdom: but alſo in every cauſe which "may concern his majeſty's honour, we ſhall (according to the laws of this kingdom, and the "duties of good ſubjects) concur with our friends "and followers, in quiet manner or in arms, as we "ſhall be required of his majeſty's council, or any "having his authority." Charles was not contented with this explanation, though it was more than could have been expected from perſons of their diſpoſition. The aſſembly paid not due deference to the king's prepoſſeſſions, though they gave the utmoſt indulgence to their own. They voted epiſcopacy to be unlawful in the church of Scotland: the king was willing to allow it, contrary to the inſtitutions of that church. They ſtigmatized the liturgy and canons as popiſh: he agreed ſimply to their being aboliſhed. They denominated the high commiſſion tyranny: he was willing to ſet it aſide. Both were determined to perſevere; and on this account recourſe was again had to arms, and it was now ſuppoſed the ſword alone muſt decide the diſpute.

A. D. 1640. The king, on ſigning the late pacification, had diſbanded his army, a very conſiderable ſum of money was neceſſary for raiſing another, and the council was greatly perplexed to diſcover neceſſary ways and means for that purpoſe. The only conſtitutional method, by ſummoning a parliament, was thought a dangerous experiment; but the neceſſities of the crown were ſo preſſing, that it was determined to ſummon that aſſembly. It was, however, thought, that there was a neceſſity for ſtriking ſome bold, ſpeedy, and effectual blow, to intimidate the rebels; and that the parliamentary ſupplies would be too ſlow and uncertain to anſwer the purpoſe. The earl of Strafford therefore propoſed a ſubſcription, and generouſly opened it with twenty thouſand pounds. The young duke of Richmond followed his example, and ſubſcribed the ſame ſum. Their examples influenced many of the nobility and clergy; ſo that a large ſum was ſoon ſubſcribed, in order to enable the king to oppoſe his rebellious ſubjects.

On the thirteenth of April, the parliament met at Weſtminſter; and were informed by the lord keeper Finch, that the king had been able to aſſemble and ſupport his army, not by any revenue he poſſeſſed, but by means of a large debt, amounting to three hundred thouſand pounds, which he had contracted, and for which he had given ſecurity upon the crown lands. He repreſented, that it was neceſſary to grant ſupplies for the urgent demands of his military armaments: that the ſeaſon was far advanced, the time precious, and that none of it muſt be loſt in deliberations: that though his coffers were empty, they had not been exhauſted by unneceſſary pomp, ſumptuous buildings, or any other kind of magnificence: that whatever ſupplies had been levied from his ſubjects, had been employed for their advantage and preſervation; and, like vapours ariſing out of the earth, and gathered into a cloud, had fallen in ſweet and refreſhing ſhowers on the ſame fields from which they had, at firſt, been exhaled: that though the king deſired ſuch immediate aſſiſtance, as might, for the time, prevent a total diſorder in the government, he was far from any intention of precluding them of their right to enquire into the ſtate of the kingdom, and to offer him petitions for the relief of their grievances: that as much as was poſſible of this ſeaſon ſhould be allowed them for that purpoſe: that as he expected only ſuch ſupplies at preſent as the current ſervice abſolutely required, it would be neceſſary to aſſemble them again next winter, when they ſhould have full leiſure to conclude whatever buſineſs had been left imperfect and unfiniſhed: that the parliament of Ireland had twice put ſuch truſt in his good intentions, as to grant him, in the beginning of the ſeſſion, a very large ſupply, and had always experienced good effects from the confidence repoſed in him: and that in every circumſtance his people ſhould find his conduct ſuitable to a juſt, pious, and gracious king, and ſuch as was calculated to promote an entire harmony between prince and parliament.

But theſe topics, however plauſible, produced not the deſired effect. The leaders of the diſcontented party began to foreſee the conſequences of the Scottiſh inſurrection, and to hope that the time ſo long wiſhed for was at hand, when royal authority muſt become wholly ſubordinate to popular aſſemblies; and when public liberty muſt acquire the full aſcendant. A reaſonable compliance with the meaſures of the court was now conſidered as ſlaviſh dependence; a regard for the king, ſervile flattery; a confidence in his promiſes, ſhameful proſtitution. It was hoped, that by reducing the crown to neceſſities, the king would be puſhed into violent meaſures, which could not fail of ſerving their purpoſes; and that by multiplying theſe neceſſities, his prerogative, undermined on all ſides, muſt at laſt be overthrown, and rendered no longer dangerous to the privileges of the people.

Full of theſe ſentiments, every meaſure that had a tendency to preſerve the government in its preſent form was zealouſly oppoſed by the popular leaders. Inſtead, therefore, of taking notice of the king's complaints againſt his Scottiſh ſubjects, or his applications for a ſupply, the houſe entered immediately upon grievances, and a ſpeech made by Pym upon that ſubject was much more attended to than the harangue delivered by the lord keeper in the name of their ſovereign.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the Scottiſh covenanters were not idle; they proceeded in their preparations with a ſpirit far above their ſtrength. The noblemen and gentry of that party ſtripped themſelves of every luxury, and the ladies of their jewels and ornaments, in order to ſupport the neceſſary expences of what they termed a holy war. Some of the fortifications of Edinburgh having fallen down, the covenanters not only refuſed to ſuffer them to be rebuilt, but openly oppoſed an order ſent by the king for throwing in ſtores, proviſions and ſoldiers, to reinforce that fortreſs. Men, women, and children, worked with amazing alacrity on the fortifications of Leith; and the covenanters having demanded that the caſtle of Edinburgh ſhould be delivered into their hands, declared Ruthven, the governor, a traitor, for refuſing to deliver up the fortreſs.

In the mean time, the ſcene of grievances was every day extended in the houſe of commons. But ſtill there wanted a proper cement for the rougher and leſs valuable, though not leſs ſtrong and uſeful materials, that were to compoſe the mighty fabric of oppoſition. Many gentlemen ſat in the lower houſe, eaſy in their circumſtances, unmoleſted in their properties, and therefore unſuſpicious of any dangerous attempts againſt public liberty. They had ſeen Charles purſue methods which they knew to be illegal; but excepting a few inſtances, and theſe far removed from themſelves, no rigorous ſeverities had been inflicted; and the fortune of other nations, now deſolated by war, taught them to enjoy their own in tranquillity. They were not affected with apprehenſions of public, while they continued to enjoy private liberty. But though inſenſible to realities, they were alarmed by appearances; the ſubſtance was leſs formidable than the ſhadow; the danger which they imagined attended religion, united them all in the preſervation of liberty. They accordingly divided the public grievances into three claſſes, the infringement of parliamentary liberties, innovations in religion, and grievances againſt property, and the common liberties of the kingdom. Each of theſe branches was referred to a proper committee; and it was determined to apply themſelves to remove the grievances of the nation, before they granted any ſupplies to his majeſty.

This perverſe behaviour of the commons excited the indignation of the king. He came to the houſe of peers; and having ſent for the commons, he told them, "That the cauſe of his coming was to put them in mind of what had been delivered in his name by the lord keeper, at the opening of the ſeſſion.

"That, contrary to his expectations, the houſe of commons had held conſultations with regard to religion, property of goods, and liberty of parliament; had voted ſome things on each of theſe three heads, and therefore given them precedence to the matter of his ſupply: that his neceſſities were ſo preſſing, as not to bear delay; but if the commons would truſt him, whatever had been promiſed in his name by the lord keeper ſhould be faithfully performed.

"That with regard to religion, his heart and conſcience went together with that eſtabliſhed in the church of England; and that he would iſſue ſtrict orders to his archbiſhops and biſhops, that no innovations might be made.

"That as to ſhip-money, he never made, nor intended to make any profit of it himſelf, but had levied it merely to preſerve the dominion of the ſeas, which was ſo neceſſary, that without it the kingdom could not ſubſiſt; but left it wholly to them, whether they would raiſe the neceſſary ſupplies for the defence of the kingdom by ſhip-money, or any other means.

"That as for property of goods and liberty of parliament, he always deſired his people ſhould enjoy them, and conſidered no monarch ſo great as he who governed a rich and free people; but if they had not property of goods and liberty of perſons, they could neither be opulent nor free.

"That if the houſe of commons refuſed to truſt him, the affairs of government muſt be diſordered, and the preſent opportunity of retrieving them irrecoverably loſt: that though they truſted him in part at firſt, yet before the concluſion of the parliament, he muſt totally truſt to them, and they, at laſt, wholly confide in him for the execution of every thing paſſed in the preſent aſſembly: that ſince there was nothing more than who ſhould be firſt truſted, and that the truſt in him was but a truſt in part, he deſired the lords to take into their ſerious conſideration his and their own honour, the ſafety and welfare of the kingdom, and the great danger with which it was now threatened; and that they would endeavour, by their advice, to diſpoſe the houſe of commons to give his ſupply the precedence to grievances."

This ſpeech either convinced the houſe of lords, or they were gained over to the intereſt of the court, for they immediately voted that the ſupply ought to have the precedence of all other matters. But this determination of the peers produced not the deſired effect; the commons voted it a breach of their privileges, the propoſing and granting ſubſidies naturally belonging to their houſe. The commons were, however, fully ſenſible of the neceſſity of granting the king a preſent ſupply; and nothing but the violent counſels of Laud, and the other miniſters, could have prevented its being granted. But inſtead of liſtening to any remonſtrance from the commons concerning their grievances, Charles abſolutely inſiſted, that the ſupply ſhould have the preference of all other matters. Accordingly, on Monday the fourth of May, he ſent the following meſſage by Sir Henry Vane:

"Whereas on Saturday laſt, his majeſty was pleaſed to ſend a meſſage to this houſe, deſiring you to give a preſent anſwer concerning his ſupply; to which, as yet, his majeſty has had no other anſwer, than that, upon this day, you will again take the matter into farther conſideration: his majeſty, therefore, the better to facilitate your reſolutions this day, has thought fit to let you know, that, of his grace and favour, he is pleaſed, upon your granting him twelve ſubſidies, to be preſently paſſed, and to be paid in three years, with a proviſo, that it ſhall not determine the ſeſſion, his majeſty will not only, for the preſent, forbear the levying any ſhip-money, but will give way to the utter aboliſhing of it, by any method you yourſelves ſhall propoſe.

"And for your grievances, his majeſty will, according to his royal promiſe, give you as much time as may be now and the next Michaelmas; and expects a preſent and poſitive anſwer, upon which he may rely, his affairs being in ſuch a condition as can endure no longer delay."

The houſe immediately reſolved itſelf into a committee; and a debate enſuing, the ſpeaker, by a pathetic ſpeech, turned the attention of the members on the buſineſs ſo ſtrongly urged by his majeſty; and the only queſtion was, the proportion of ſupply that ſhould be granted. Vane now ſtood up, and told them, that he had authority to ſay, the king would accept of nothing leſs than what had been mentioned in his meſſage. This ill-timed ſpeech threw the whole houſe into a flame, and they immediately adjourned till the next day.

Charles was highly exaſperated, eſpecially when Vane informed him that the commons intended to aboliſh ſhip-money, and all the other branches of the revenue. Determined to prevent any attempt of that kind, Charles came the next morning to the houſe of lords; and having ſent for the commons, diſſolved the parliament.

It is agreed by all hiſtorians that no parliament ever met with better diſpoſitions than this, both with regard to king and people. Even Strafford himſelf had adviſed its being called, and Charles, in his laſt meſſage, had propoſed an expedient, which would have healed all the breaches between himſelf and his people. But the truth is, a ſtate of public tranquillity muſt, to many, have become a ſtate of private danger. The ſecret connections with the Scots had, by thoſe who were enemies to tranquillity in both houſes, been carried into treaſon, and might have been puniſhed by the approbation of the public. Hambden, Pym, and other members of parliament, had been deceived in their opinion of the temper of the nation, which was much more favourable for the king than they imagined. Had the houſe been brought to truſt the king in one inſtance, he had probably gained their confidence for ever. The inſolence of the Scots, their erecting the banner of their covenant againſt the authority of a ſovereign who appeared to have done ſo much to give them ſatisfaction; their repeated menaces of invading England, and their application to the French for aſſiſtance, were ſuch flagrant characters of rebellion, that the parliament could not have failed to have voted a war againſt them to be juſt; the conſequence of which would infallibly have involved all their abettors, whether ſecret or open, in inevitable ruin. Add to this, that Vane's antipathy to Strafford, whoſe talents he could not equal, undoubtedly influenced him on this occaſion, to make that ill-timed ſpeech in the houſe of commons.

Strafford had diſcovered amazing abilities for government. Nor did thoſe conſiſt in low intrigue, in forming cabals, or airy ſpeculative notions of policy, but in the manly, practicable, executive part. He had for ſome time been made lord-deputy of Ireland, and in that capacity experienced the misfortune which attends every prince or miniſter, who attempts to humanize a people, that of being forced to have recourſe to many ſeverities, which, in a well regulated government are unjuſtifiable, though neceſſary in an unſettled ſtate. Many great men in Ireland, though otherwiſe friends to the Engliſh adminiſtration, could not bear that impartial rigour which Strafford always exerted. But his great merit and ſucceſs were ſufficiently conſpicuous through the cloud of malice and envy. The king drew upwards of an hundred pounds a year, clear revenue, from that kingdom. Its manufactures flouriſhed, the people proſpered, the parliament was pleaſed and dutiful, and the army regular and powerful. Strafford was perſuaded that theſe particulars ſpoke ſo ſtrongly in his favour, that the voice of calumny could not be heard; he imagined his public conduct ſtood in need of no private management, either to vindicate or recommend it; and as he was as great an œconomiſt for himſelf as for his maſter, he was above the neceſſity of mean, oppreſſive practices, to increaſe his own fortune. He had alſo the merit of adviſing Charles to call the laſt parliament, a fact not only publickly known, but mentioned with applauſe in both houſes. Strafford's enemies were therefore in danger of ſeeing him at once both popular and powerful. It is therefore no wonder that both puritans and papiſts conſpired his deſtruction; for he was no friend to either.

Charles had hardly diſſolved the laſt parliament before he was convinced of his error. He perceived he had acted too precipitately, and was deſirous, when it was too late, to retrieve it. He was now obliged to call upon his friends for their ſubſcriptions; and ſuch was their ardour, joined with that of the public, that in a few weeks no leſs than three hundred thouſand pounds were brought into the exchequer. This ſum, with the aſſiſtance he expected from Ireland both of men and money, enabled him to purchaſe arms, erect magazines, and levy forces in every part of England. The earl of Northumberland was appointed general, the earl of Strafford lieutenant-general, and lord Conway general of the horſe. According to the original plan of this campaign, an army of twenty thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe was deſigned to act on the borders of Scotland, near Berwick; ten thouſand foot and five hundred horſe were to be landed from Ireland, and to take poſſeſſion of the town of Aire, in Scotland; ten thouſand foot and five hundred horſe were to be ſent into the north of that kingdom; and a fleet of ſhips, having a conſiderable number of ſoldiers on board, were to ſail into the Frith of Forth. Had the ſums of money raiſed by the king been ſufficient to execute this ſcheme with vigour, Scotland muſt have trembled to its foundations.

The heads of the Scottiſh covenanters, ever ſince the breaking up of the laſt aſſembly, had been employed in modelling their church, their ſtate, and their army, according to their own pleaſure, without the leaſt regard to the royal authority. They had blocked up the caſtle of Edinburgh, impriſoned ſeveral noblemen who were friends to the king; and a reſolution was taken, in a meeting at Edinburgh, to march their army into England, under the command of Leſley, their former general. Their parliament met on the ſeventh of June, purſuant to their prorogation; and though an order was ſent down from the king to prorogue it for a longer time, the king's meſſage was diſregarded, under pretence of its being defective in form. They endeavoured to excuſe this proceeding in a letter to the ſecretary of ſtate; but added the ſevereſt menaces, if the king did not order Ruthven to deliver up the caſtle of Edinburgh, and withdraw his ſhips from their coaſt, where they did infinite prejudice to their commerce. They conſidered the diſſolution of the late parliament in England as a proof of their ſtrength in that kingdom; and looked upon the queen, Laud, and Strafford, as the only enemies they had in the nation. This opinion, however unjuſt, gave them infinite ſpirits; and it is aſtoniſhing with what alacrity the gentry, the citizens, and even the lower ranks of people, threw their plate and money upon the tables of the covenant, taking only the bonds of their chiefs for their ſecurity.

The Engliſh convocation was ſtill ſitting; where Laud, from his zeal to ſupport the royal authority, puſhed on the moſt deſtructive meaſures. After granting the king a liberal benevolence, they framed ſeventeen new canons, and aſſumed to themſelves the name of "the holy, ſacred ſynod." One of thoſe canons was calculated to prevent the increaſe of popery, but all the reſt were ſtrongly tinctured with arbitrary doctrines.

It was, however, evident, notwithſtanding the vaſt ſums brought into the royal exchequer, that they were inſufficient to anſwer the expences of an offenſive war againſt Scotland; and recourſe was accordingly had to a cabinet council; the fatal reſult of which was, to employ the whole force of the prerogative in raiſing money. All the various oppreſſive methods already enumerated were accordingly employed in the moſt execrable manner. The feudal grievances were revived, knight-money was exacted, the tenants who held of the king in capite were unreaſonably taxed for men, horſes and arms. Privy-ſeals were every where circulated for a loan; ſhip-money was rigorouſly exacted; cart and conduct-money for the ſoldiers was levied, under the empty promiſe, indeed, of re-payment. It was with great difficulty that Charles was diſſuaded by the merchants from ſeizing all the bullion in the Tower, and to content himſelf with forty thouſand pounds. Commiſſions were renewed for compounding with recuſants; patents, and pardons of all kinds, were ſold for money; and great quantities of India goods were purchaſed upon credit by the king's officers, and ſold at vaſt diſcount for ready money. But what was of ſtill worſe conſequence to the royal cauſe, an order was iſſued, commanding the city of London to furniſh four thouſand men with cart and conduct-money, for the expedition againſt Scotland. The lord mayor and aldermen were alſo ſummoned by the council to give in the names of ſuch citizens as were beſt able to lend the king two hundred thouſand pounds; and, upon refuſal, Sir Nicholas Rainton, and the aldermen Soams, Atkins, and Geere, were ſent to the Tower.

It was no wonder if theſe violent meaſures occaſioned an univerſal diſguſt. The very ſoldiers catched the infection, and repaired ſo unwillingly to the ſeveral places of rendezvous in the north, that in ſome of the towns they mutinied, and murdered their commanders, and in others were guilty of the greateſt diſorders. Notwithſtanding this, an army of twenty thouſand men was raiſed, and continued their march to the northward. In the mean time, the earl of Northumberland was taken dangerouſly ill; and Strafford being very lately recovered from a very alarming diſtemper, was unable to join the army; ſo that the active part of the command fell upon lord Conway, who was by no means equal to the taſk.

The Scots army, though ſuperior in numbers, was ſooner ready than the king's, and advanced with great alacrity to the borders of England. To engage them to proceed, beſides their general knowledge of the diſcontents of the kingdom, lord Saville had forged a letter, in the name of ſix noblemen, the moſt conſiderable in England, in which the Scots were invited to aſſiſt their neighbours in procuring a redreſs of their grievances. But notwithſtanding theſe warlike preparations, the covenanters ſtill made uſe of the moſt pacific and moſt ſubmiſſive language; and entered England, as they pretended, with no other view than that of obtaining acceſs to the king's preſence, and laying their humble petition at his royal feet.

On their reaching Newburn upon Tyne, they were oppoſed by a detachment of four thouſand five hundred men, under the command of lord Conway, who ſeemed determined to diſpute with them the paſſage of the river. The Scots firſt intreated them, with great civility, not to ſtop them in their march to their gracious ſovereign; but being refuſed, they attacked them with ſuch fury, that they gained the paſſage, and drove the Engliſh from their intrenchments. A panic now ſeized the whole army, and the forces left to defend Newcaſtle fled, with the utmoſt precipitation, to Durham; and not yet thinking themſelves ſafe, they left that city, and retreated into Yorkſhire.

The Scottiſh army marched immediately to Newcaſtle; and though ſufficiently elated with their victory, they preſerved an exact diſcipline; well knowing, that if they acted otherwiſe, the people would become their enemies, join the king's army, and drive them back into their own country. They alſo diſpatched meſſengers to the king, who was now arrived at York; and were particularly careful, after the advantage they had obtained, to redouble their expreſſions of loyalty, duty, and ſubmiſſion to his perſon; and even made apologies, full of ſorrow and contrition, for their late victory.

Charles had ſummoned a great council of the Engliſh peers to meet at York, and was highly exaſperated at the proceedings of his Scottiſh ſubjects, but he was in no condition to chaſtiſe their inſolence. Served by officers whom he could not employ; ſurrounded by counſellors whom he dared not truſt; his exchequer empty, his ſpirits low, his general deteſted, and his cauſe diſliked by the public, to what ſide could he turn for advice? When he mentioned war and the chaſtiſement of the rebels, he met with coldneſs in every look of his peers, more expreſſive of diſapprobation than the moſt violent debate. Such ſullenneſs forced him to aſk counſel of his faithful Strafford, who frankly confeſſed he was for fighting the rebels. This advice was, doubtleſs, the beſt that Charles could have purſued at that critical juncture. Notwithſtanding the coldneſs of his peers, and the diſlike many of them entertained againſt Strafford, the Engliſh would have gladly revenged upon the Scots the inſult of invading their country. The refinements of the great had not reached their inferiors, and every man who could ſee or feel was touched with the indignity ſuffered by the Engliſh. The emptineſs of the exchequer was no argument againſt fighting, becauſe the two armies might have met in a few days, and the conteſt have been ſoon decided. Should the attempt have been unſucceſsful, Charles, even after the loſs of a battle, could not have been more diſtreſſed, or reduced to a more deplorable ſituation: on the contrary, it would, in all human probability, have ſo exaſperated the Engliſh, that they would have forgot, at leaſt for a time, their hatred of the court, and exerted all their efforts to take a dreadful revenge on their inſulting enemy. The marquis of Hamilton retained ſtill his pacific ſentiments; he trembled for the danger of his native country, ſhould the king be victorious; and for his majeſty's ſituation, ſhould the Scots ſucceed. He was therefore very earneſt for concluding a treaty; and was ſo well ſeconded by the reſt of the council, that Charles determined to embrace pacific meaſures.

During theſe tranſactions in the Engliſh council, the Scots actually gave themſelves over for loſt, and the heads of the army held ſeveral conſultations on the moſt eligible meaſures to be purſued in this alarming criſis. It was even propoſed to throw themſelves entirely upon the king's mercy, and to give up the names of the Engliſh, who had not only encouraged, but invited them to invade their country. They were, however, diverted from this reſolution, by intelligence received from their friends in the Engliſh camp; but it was not without difficulty they were perſuaded to continue in their preſent ſituation, and to endeavour to conciliate the friendſhip of the Londoners by ſome ſignal act of kindneſs. They wrote a very affectionate letter from Newcaſtle to the mayor and aldermen of London, inviting them to continue the Newcaſtle trade, and aſſuring them of all imaginable ſecurity. This was a very prudent and ſucceſsful meaſure, and induced the citizens to ſend a petition to his majeſty for calling a parliament; and ſoon after, twelve noblemen preſented a petition to the ſame purpoſe. As theſe petitions ſeemed to expreſs the ſenſe of the whole nation, Charles iſſued writs for the meeting of the parliament on the third of November.

On the twenty-fourth of September, Charles opened the great council of peers with a ſpeech, in which he demanded their advice with regard to two particulars of the utmoſt importance. What anſwer was proper to be given to the rebels, and in what manner they were to be treated? And what methods muſt be uſed for raiſing money till a parliamentary ſupply could be obtained? After various debates, it was reſolved to name commiſſioners for treating with the Scots; and fourteen noblemen, all of them profeſſed friends to moderate meaſures, were named as commiſſioners. It was firſt propoſed, as moſt conſiſtent with the king's dignity, that the conferences ſhould be held at York; but the Scots, not ſo much from any real apprehenſion they entertained of danger, as to increaſe the popular odium againſt Strafford, refuſed to meet in a place where he had any power, and Rippon was accordingly appointed for that purpoſe. With regard to the king's ſecond queſtion, it was propoſed to borrow two hundred thouſand pounds of the city of London: but this loan could not be obtained till the peers aſſembled at York joined in the requeſt; ſo low was this unfortunate prince already fallen in the eyes of his own ſubjects!

The Scots, during the whole conference, behaved with that inſolence, as ſufficiently ſhewed they were not ignorant of their own importance. The earl of Rothes, though no commiſſioner, upbraided the lord Mandeville for not having more early appeared, purſuant to the promiſe he had made under his own hand. Mandeville, ſeemingly ſurprized at this, Rothes put the forged letter, already mentioned, into his hand. The ſignatures were ſo exactly copied, that it would have been difficult for the lords, whoſe names were forged, to have denied the writing; but by their all concurring in the moſt ſolemn aſſurances that the whole was a forgery, the Scots were ſatisfied they had been impoſed upon.

After propoſing ſome inſolent preliminaries, the Scots demanded forty thouſand pounds a month for the ſubſiſtence of their army during the treaty. Charles would very gladly have conſented to the diſbanding of both armies, but could not prevail, and ſoon perceived that nothing advantageous to him could reſult from the conferences at Rippon. He therefore made another attempt to remove the meeting to York, where the great council of peers were ſtill ſitting; but was again diſappointed through the obſtinacy of the Scots. Some of the Engliſh noblemen, exaſperated at their inſolent behaviour, adviſed Charles to break up the conferences, and fortify himſelf in York, where he might be able to ſet his enemies at defiance, and, in all probability, render their expedition abortive. This was, indeed, the only expedient Charles could have taken to ſupport his own authority; but the majority of the council were of a different opinion, and it was therefore rejected.

The conferences, though they ſtill continued at Rippon, were carried on in ſo languid a manner, that the commiſſioners ſeemed to meet rather to conſult meaſures than to ſettle differences. The Scots, who were very aſſiduous in careſſing the Engliſh, ſolemnly proteſted, that they intended nothing more than to concur with the parliament in limiting the prerogative, in circumſcribing the high claims of the clergy, in chaſtiſing the inſolence of the papiſts, and in ſettling the conſtitution of the two kingdoms upon free and equitable principles. Nothing but the facility of the Engliſh commiſſioners could have given the Scots ſuch great advantages on this occaſion, though it muſt be admitted they behaved with great addreſs. They had treated Wilmot, and other Engliſh officers taken priſoners at Newburn, with the utmoſt politeneſs; and after giving them the higheſt ideas of their courage, reſolution, diſcipline, and good intentions, ſent them back to the Engliſh camp. This behaviour was of the utmoſt conſequence to their affairs, which were far from being in ſo promiſing a condition as the public imagined. The earl of Montroſe had kept up a ſecret correſpondence with the king; and one of his letters, either through accident or treachery, fell into the hands of Leſley, the Scottiſh general. This affair was at once both alarming and delicate. The Scots were particularly deſirous of carrying on their deſigns with an air of candour, in conjunction with their Engliſh friends; but the reputation of Montroſe, the moſt able officer they had, together with the ſenſe of his ſervices, which were far ſuperior to thoſe of any other nobleman, rendered him dear to the whole army. His correſpondence with the king, after the many profeſſions of loyalty the Scots had made for his majeſty's perſon, could not, with any appearance of juſtice, be deemed treaſonable; but, at the ſame time, the heads of the covenanters were convinced that he had abandoned their cauſe. Montroſe ſoon perceived that his correſpondence was diſcovered, by his being no longer admitted to the private conſultations and councils of war held by the other general officers; but he took no pains either to conceal or excuſe the fact: he openly avowed and juſtified it. Leſley was for bringing him to a court-martial, and putting him to death; but the other noblemen were more cautious: they knew that the ſoldiers loved Montroſe, and the loſs of their leader might make ſuch a diviſion in their army as might prove their ruin. Charles was reduced to ſo unfortunate a ſituation, that he could take no advantage even of this favourable incident. His own commiſſioners preſſed him to remove the conferences from Rippon to London, and he was obliged to comply, though he was very ſenſible of the great advantages the Scots would reap by it. A ceſſation of arms was alſo agreed to, by which the Scots were aſſured of maintenance for their army, and the river Tees was made the boundary between both parties.

The utmoſt endeavours had been uſed throughout the nation in electing members for the enſuing parliament; and the perſons returned were, perhaps, men of the greateſt abilities that any age or country ever ſaw convened together at one time. Happy had it been for England, had the virtues of ſome of them been equal to their abilities! The circumſtances of the juncture were as extraordinary as the characters of the members. The army of an enemy, whoſe riches were not ſufficient to ſupport it ten days beyond the bounds of their own country, lay in a friendly manner in the heart of England. So violent were the prepoſſeſſions of all ranks againſt the conduct of the miniſtry, that the ſword of the enemy was thought leſs dreadful than the power of the court. The nobility alſo, whom the king had no means of retaining by offices and preferments ſuitable to their rank, had been ſeized with the general diſcontent, and unwarily threw themſelves into the ſcale, which began already too much to preponderate. Senſible of ſome encroachments that had been made by royal authority, the people entertained no jealouſy of the commons, whoſe enterprizes for the acquiſition of power had always been covered with the appearance of public good, and had hitherto gone no farther than ſome diſappointed efforts and endeavours. The progreſs of the Scots had reduced the crown to an entire dependence for ſupply; their union with the popular party in England brought the latter a great acceſſion of authority; the near proſpect of ſucceſs rouzed all the latent murmurs and pretenſions of the nation, which had hitherto been held in ſuch violent conſtraint; and the torrent of general inclination and opinion ran ſo ſtrong againſt the court, that the king was in no ſituation to refuſe any reaſonable pretenſions of the popular leaders, either for reſtraining or limiting the powers of his prerogative.

The parliament met on the third of November, and the ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the throne; but this was very little regarded; the grievances of the kingdom engaged the whole attention of the commons. Unfortunately, the Engliſh conſtitution, obſcure, uncertain, and ill-ſettled in ignorant and troubleſome times, opened a wide field for troubles and diſcord. The monarch concluded he was maintaining an inviolable right, in ſupporting an authority which the Tudors enjoyed in tranquillity. He thought it would be a diſgrace to him to ſacrifice any branch of the prerogative. The parliament, on the other hand, perceiving open attempts were made againſt the laws, exulted in the defence of civil liberty, of which they had acquired much clearer ideas, and the love of which was now the prevailing paſſion among the people. Encouraged by their firſt attempts, and animated by reſiſtance, they forgot the reſpect and ſubmiſſion due to the ſovereign, and determined to eſtabliſh a new ſyſtem of government, under the ſpecious pretence of reſtoring the ancient conſtitution. Intereſt, ambition, cabals, and, above all, fanaticiſm, united their formidable influence with that patriotic zeal, which, while it was contending for liberty, threw the whole nation into a flame. At the very opening of the ſeſſion, one of the members complained, that religion was ſtigmatized with the name of puritaniſm. "Whoever (ſaid he) will conform his actions to divine and human laws, is a puritan. Whoever declines to do what others chuſe he ſhould do, is a puritan." The great object of theſe declarations was to render thoſe odious who profeſſed the catholic religion, by repreſenting them as diſaffected to the ſtate.

Strafford was too much devoted to the intereſts of his maſter, too vigilant, and too firm in his adminiſtration, not to be univerſally hated by the popular leaders. Pym began the attack in a long ſtudied ſpeech, divided into many heads, after his general manner; wherein he enumerated all the grievances under which the nation laboured; and inferred, from a complication of ſuch oppreſſions, that a deliberate plan had been laid for changing entirely the form of government, and ſubverting the ancient laws and liberties of the kingdom. "Could any thing (ſaid he) increaſe our indignation againſt ſo enormous and criminal a project, it would be to find, that, during the reign of the beſt of princes, the conſtitution has been endangered by the worſt of miniſters, and that the virtues of the king have been ſeduced by wicked and pernicious counſels. We muſt enquire (continued he) from what fountain theſe waters of bitterneſs flow: and though, doubtleſs, many evil counſellors will be found to have contributed their endeavours, yet there is one who challenges the infamous pre-eminence, and who, by his courage, enterprize, and capacity, is intitled to the firſt place among the betrayers of his country; I mean the earl of Strafford, lieutenant of Ireland, and preſident of the council of York, who, in both places, and in all other provinces where he has been intruſted with authority, has raiſed ample monuments of tyranny, and will appear, from a ſurvey of his actions, to be the chief promoter of every arbitrary counſel." He proceeded to enumerate ſome particulars of imperious actions and expreſſions; and then entered on a more perſonal attack of that miniſter, and endeavoured to expoſe his whole character and manners. At laſt the orator concluded, that it belonged to the houſe to provide a remedy proportioned to the diſeaſe, and to prevent further miſchiefs, which might otherwiſe be juſtly apprehended from the influence he had acquired over the meaſures and counſels of their ſovereign.

Several other ſpeeches were made againſt the miniſter; and it was at laſt moved, that Strafford ſhould be impeached of high-treaſon. This motion was received with univerſal applauſe; nor was there a ſingle perſon who ſpoke in his favour. Lord Falkland alone, though known to be his enemy, modeſtly deſired the houſe to conſider, whether it would not be more conformable to the gravity of their proceedings, firſt to digeſt, by a committee, many of thoſe particulars that had been mentioned, before they ventured to ſend an accuſation againſt him to the lords. But this was over-ruled, the accuſation was voted, and Pym choſen to carry up the impeachment, and was followed by the greater part of the commons. Strafford was in the houſe of peers when Pym brought up the impeachment. The lords ſeemed almoſt as much prejudiced againſt him as the commons, for all the favour he could obtain was to be heard in his place. He urged how unreaſonable it was, upon a general charge, unſupported by evidence, to deprive him of liberty, which was in itſelf a puniſhment, before any crime had been proved againſt him; and how dangerous a precedent to the peerage itſelf they would eſtabliſh, by admitting ſuch precipitate meaſures. But theſe conſiderations, however juſt, had very little weight with the houſe: the earl was committed to the cuſtody of the black rod, till the commons ſhould exhibit a more particular charge againſt him.

Having been thus ſucceſsful againſt a man who was conſidered as their capital enemy, they proceeded to conſider more particularly the grievances of the nation, which they reduced under the heads, Privilege of parliament; prejudice of religion; liberty of the ſubject.

"Under the firſt head were reckoned, 1. Reſtraining the members of parliament from ſpeaking. 2. Forbidding the ſpeaker to put a queſtion. 3. Impriſoning divers members for matters done in parliament. 4. Proceeding againſt them in inferior courts. 5. Enjoining their good behaviour, and continuing them in priſon till death. 6. Abrupt diſſolutions of parliament.

"Under the ſecond head of religion were mentioned, 1. The ſuſpenſion of the laws againſt perſons profeſſing the popiſh religion. 2. Their places of truſt and honour in the commonwealth. 3. Their free reſort to London, and to the court, to communicate their counſels and deſigns. 4. Their being permitted to have a nuncio here, to execute the orders of the pope.

"Under innovations in religion were enumerated, 1. Maintenance of popiſh tenets in books, ſermons, and diſputes. 2. Practices of popiſh ceremonies countenanced and enjoined, as altars, crucifixes, and images. 3. Diſcouragements of proteſtants, by rigid proſecutions of the ſcrupulous, for things indifferent; no vice being conſidered ſo great as non-conformity. 4. Encroachment of eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction.

"Under the third head were claſſed the grievances. 1. By tonnage and poundage unduly taken. 2. Compoſition for knighthood. 3. The unparalleled grievance of ſhip-money. 4. Enlargement of the foreſts beyond due bounds. 5. Selling of nuiſances, by compounding for them. 6. The commiſſion for building. 7. The commiſſion for depopulation. 8. Unlawful military charges, by warrant of the king, letters of the council, and orders of the lieutenants of the counties, and their deputies. 9. Extra-judicial declarations of judges, without heating counſel or arguments. 10. Monopoliſts countenanced by the council-table, and juſtices of the peace required to aſſiſt them. 11. The ſtar-chamber court. 12. The king's edicts and proclamations lately uſed for maintaining monopolies. 13. The ambitious and corrupt clergy preaching divine authority, and abſolute power in kings to act as they pleaſe. 14. The intermiſſion of parliaments."

Theſe heads of inquiry ſufficiently indicated, that a total alteration in government was intended, and this intention was ſupported by ſpeeches enforced by all the learning and eloquence of that age. Almoſt every county in England had its peculiar grievances, which were preſented to the houſe by members, many of whom were afterwards the firmeſt friends to the king, and ſuffered deeply in his cauſe. They who were the warmeſt aſſerters of the king's legal prerogative, inveighed with the greateſt vehemence againſt its abuſe. Among others, Mr. Capel, who afterwards fell a victim to his loyalty, expatiated in the warmeſt manner on the grievances of the county of Hertford, which he repreſented in parliament. Hyde, afterwards lord Clarendon, and Falkland, were alſo in this number: but, in their ultimate views and intentions, they differed widely from the majority, though they were equally deſirous of removing the real grievances of the nation, and of placing proper bounds to the royal prerogative.

The houſe of lords were not backward in encouraging this ſpirit of the commons. Lord Digby, who afterwards ſuffered ſo deeply in the cauſe of royalty, was among the firſt who inveighed againſt the oppreſſions of the court. But other matters, for ſome time, engaged the attention of the parliament. Sir Thomas Rowe having made a report concerning the treaty with the Scots, it appeared, that a contribution of eight hundred and fifty pounds a day had, for a very conſiderable time, been levied on the inhabitants of the north, and that they had petitioned his majeſty for relief in the moſt affecting terms. From theſe complaints, it was ſuſpected, that they were unable to ſupport this heavy contribution; and it was known that the Scots had declared, they ſhould conſider the ceſſation of payment as an infraction of the treaty; and that they ſhould be then at liberty to paſs the river Tees, and advance farther into the heart of England.

From this ſhort ſtate of the caſe, the lord-keeper, in a conference between the two houſes, endeavoured to prove, that as the lords commiſſioners were the firſt that adviſed the ceſſation of arms, the miſeries of the country, in conſequence of that meaſure, could not be attributed to the king. This being premiſed, he admitted the neceſſity of providing for the Scottiſh army, but, at the ſame time, enlarged on the abſurdity of ſuffering that of the king to ſtarve, or be diſbanded; becauſe Yorkſhire, and ſeveral of the fineſt counties in England, would, by that means, be wholly expoſed to the ravages of an inveterate and rapacious enemy. The commons, however, were of a very different opinion: they had already ſhewn ſome diſguſt at an expreſſion in his majeſty's ſpeech at the opening of the ſeſſion, in which he had called them traitors, and had called one of their own members to the bar of the houſe for making uſe of the ſame expreſſion. They were even ſo far from cenſuring the lords commiſſioners at Rippon, that it was reſolved upon the queſtion, “That this houſe doth approve of the perſons of thoſe lords that were commiſſioners in the late treaty of Rippon, to be commiſſioners now, to treat with the Scotch commiſſioners; with this declaration, that no concluſion of their's ſhall bind the commons without their conſent in parliament.” The houſe could not, however, with any appearance of decency, refuſe to provide for the royal, as well as for the rebel army. But it was ſufficiently apparent, that the former was not an object of their favour. They appointed a committee to conſider the ſtate of the king's army, and what commanders, or other inferior officers, were papiſts; to conſider of the ſtate of the northern counties; and how the money, after being raiſed, may, with convenience and diſpatch, be ſent into the north.

The Scottiſh commiſſioners were by this time arrived in London, where they were received as the guardian angels of the rights and liberties of the people. They were attended by Henderſon, and other fanatical preachers; and the church of St. Atholin was appointed for the place of their devotions. It was amazing to ſee the propenſity of the public for this new religion: multitudes of all ranks crowded into the church. They who were ſo happy as to find acceſs early in the morning, kept their places the whole day: thoſe who were excluded, clung to the doors and windows, in hopes of catching at leaſt ſome broken murmurs of the holy rhetoric. All the eloquence of parliament, now well refined from pedantry, animated with the ſpirit of liberty, and employed in the moſt important intereſts of the nation, was attended to with much leſs avidity than theſe lectures, delivered with ridiculous cant, and a provincial accent, full of barbariſm and ignorance.

The commons were now very aſſiduous in providing for the ſubſiſtence of the two armies; and becauſe ſubſidies would be levied too ſlowly for ſo urgent an occaſion, money was borrowed from the city on the ſecurity of ſome particular members. Two ſubſidies, a very ſmall ſum, not more than a hundred thouſand pounds, were at firſt voted; the intention of this ſupply being only to indemnify the members, who by their private had ſupported public credit.

It ſoon appeared, that the buſineſs of the Scotch commiſſioners was rather to conſult meaſures with their friends, than to finiſh the treaty. It was ſufficiently evident, that the Scots had proceeded much farther than they originally intended, which was nothing more than that of forming and ſecuring the conſtitution of their country; but this was rather owing to the arts of the malecontents in England than their own. The great aim of the popular leaders was to protract the treaty, though that could not be effected but at the enormous expence of maintaining at leaſt forty thouſand men, in a country already exhauſted. The commons, indeed, made no ſecret of retaining theſe invaders of their country till all their enemies were ſuppreſſed, and all their purpoſes effected. “We cannot ſpare the Scots, (ſaid Strode plainly in the houſe) the ſons of Zeruiah are ſtill too ſtrong for us.” The earl of Rothes, a man of parts, and of great credit with his countrymen, though he had never joined their popular clamour, was very ſenſible of this deſign, and exerted all his intereſt to render it abortive. But he ſoon perceived that his labours were in vain; the Scottiſh commiſſioners being given to underſtand, that if they did not aſſiſt their Engliſh friends, their country would be abandoned to the mercy of the king.

Many of the leaders of the commons were, however, alarmed, and thought it highly improper that the ſpirit of oppoſition ſhould loſe any of its vigour, till the parliament had teſtified, in the ſtrongeſt terms, its diſapprobation of the late arbitrary meaſures, and inflicted ſome ſignal infamy or puniſhment upon their principal authors. A committee was accordingly appointed to conſider of the ſtate of the nation, and the members were to be directed in their proceedings, by the petitions againſt grievances, ſent up by different counties. Religion was one of the principal ingredients in the compoſition of the remonſtrance intended to be drawn up by this committee, and it was reſolved to accuſe Windebank of high-treaſon, for the many ſervices and favours, which he, as ſecretary of ſtate, had conferred on prieſts and papiſts. Windebank ſaw their intention; but affected ſuch a firmneſs of reſolution, that the commons imagined he would make a ſtand againſt all the power of their indignation; but being interrupted by a meſſage from the lords, when they were on the point of declaring him a traitor to his country, he took the opportunity of leaving the houſe, and made his eſcape into France.

Several violent ſpeeches were made againſt the uſurpations of the clergy; and it was reſolved to purge the army of papiſts, to preſent the names of recuſants, to examine the high commiſſion courts of Canterbury and York, and to enquire into the proceedings of the late convocation, or as the clergy themſelves had termed it, the holy and ſacred ſynod. Theſe reſolutions were hardly finiſhed when alderman Pennington preſented to the houſe, a petition ſubſcribed by above fifteen hundred perſons in the city of London, againſt the hierarchy and government of the church of England, by archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, and arch-deacons, praying the houſe, “that the ſaid government, with all its dependences, roots, and branches, might be aboliſhed; and all laws in their behalf made null and void.” A ſchedule was annexed to this petition, conſiſting of twenty-eight articles, in which were contained all the common-place objections to the epiſcopal hierarchy, whether founded on the pretended unlawfulneſs of the order itſelf, or the abuſes and vices of thoſe who compoſed it.

Thus was launched the dreadful bolt which had been long preparing againſt the church, and which, at laſt, together with the church, deſtroyed the conſtitution of England. The length of the ſchedule annexed to this petition, required time for deliberation, and it was ordered that members only ſhould have a copy of either. Four days after the petition was delivered, the houſe came to the following reſolutions:

“That the clergy of England, convened in any convocation, or ſynod, or otherwiſe, have no power to make any conſtitutions, canons, or acts whatſoever, in matter of doctrine, diſcipline, or otherwiſe, to bind the clergy, or laity of this land, without the common conſent of parliament.

“That the ſeveral conſtitutions and canons eccleſiaſtical, paſſed with the conſent and approbation of his majeſty, in the laſt ſynod, do not bind either the clergy or laity of this kingdom.

“That theſe canons and conſtitutions eccleſiaſtical eſtabliſhed with the king's conſent in the laſt ſynod, contain in them many matters, contrary to the king's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and ſtatutes of this realm, to the rights of parliaments, and to the property and liberty of the ſubject; and alſo matters tending to ſedition and dangerous conſequence.

“That the ſeveral grants of the benevolence, or contribution, granted by his majeſty by the laſt ſynod, are contrary to the laws, and ought not to bind the clergy.”

Theſe reſolutions were followed by ſeveral bitter ſpeeches againſt Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, particularly one by Mr. Grimſtone. He accuſed the primate of having introduced the earl of Strafford to his majeſty, and of procuring the poſt of ſecretary for Windebank, whom he termed "the very broker and pander to the whore of Babylon." He upbraided him for having advanced Montague, Manwaring, and other prelates, ſuſpected of popery; and laſtly, he accuſed him of being the main ſpring and promoter of all the deteſtable projects and monopolies, that had proved ſo oppreſſive to the ſubject. Several others ſpoke nearly to the ſame purpoſe, and it was at laſt voted, that Mr. Hollis ſhould go up to the lords with a meſſage, "To accuſe William Laud. archbiſhop of Canterbury, of high-treaſon, in the name of the commons of England, and to deſire he might be immediately ſequeſtered from parliament, and committed; and that the houſe, in a convenient time, will offer particular accuſations againſt him."

The demand of the commons was immediately complied with, and the primate was ordered to withdraw, but he requeſted to be heard a few words in his place. This being complied with, he began with proteſting his innocency, and added, that he was perſuaded, there was not a member in the houſe of commons, who believed, in his heart, that he was a traitor. He was called to order for that expreſſion by the earl of Eſſex, who obſerved, that the primate had ſeverely reflected on the houſe of commons, by affirming they had brought him in guilty of a charge, which they themſelves did not believe. Laud was deſirous of retracting this indiſcretion, which had eſcaped him without mature deliberation; but the peers were ſo little favourable to his cauſe, that they refuſed to grant him even this ſmall indulgence. He was immediately ſequeſtered from parliament, and committed to cuſtody.

The fall of Laud was accompanied with the releaſe of biſhop Williams from the Tower. The maxims and conduct of that able prelate were remembered to his honour by all parties. His ſufferings had rendered him popular. and every wiſe and moderate Engliſhman, thought him the only perſon, whoſe counſels and prudence could give ſuch weight to the epiſcopal character, as would enable it to ſtem the torrent by which it was now oppoſed. During all his ſufferings he had behaved towards his country like a genuine patriot, and towards the church as a worthy prelate. Thoſe who formed the oppoſition to the king were perſuaded, that the many provocations he had received could not fail of having rendered him an implacable enemy to the court; but the friends of Charles knew too much of his private character to believe, that his reſentments would ever influence him to join with thoſe who aimed at the deſtruction both of church and ſtate. He had made ſeveral dutiful applications to the king to be reſtored to his ſeat in parliament, but all his attempts were defeated by the violent oppoſition of Laud, notwithſtanding the queen herſelf had interpoſed in his favour. This was now publickly known, and a motion was made and carried in the houſe of peers, for reſtoring Williams to his ſeat in parliament. The king readily gave his conſent, and he was, with great pomp, introduced into the houſe of lords, where he omitted nothing conſiſtent with his duty, as a churchman, to conciliate the friendſhip and good opinion of the houſe of commons.

The cauſe of ſhip-money now came to be heard before the commons, and ſeveral animated ſpeeches were made on the occaſion, and it was reſolved, "that the charge impoſed upon the ſubjects of this kingdom, for the providing and furniſhing of ſhips, and the aſſeſſments for raiſing of money for that purpoſe, commonly called ſhip-money, are againſt the laws of the realm, the ſubjects right of property, and contrary to former reſolutions in parliament, and to the petition of right."

This reſolution was followed by others which condemned the extra-judicial determination of the judges upon ſhip-money, publiſhed in the ſtar-chamber, all writs iſſued for levying it, and the judgment in the exchequer againſt Mr. Hambden. It ſhould be remembered, that all theſe reſolutions paſſed in the houſe without one diſſenting voice, though many gentlemen, who afterwards ruined their families and loſt their lives in defence of his majeſty, were members. A convincing proof in favour of thoſe meaſures that rendered the calling of a parliament neceſſary, and firſt kindled the flames of popular diſcord in the kingdom.

But the great queſtion is, whether thoſe meaſures were not carried too far, and whether they ought not to have left ſufficient power in the crown after all the grievances were removed, and the conſtitution ſettled upon a ſolid foundation. That the nation had been provoked is paſt all doubt. But was there a neceſſity that the knife of juſtice, intended to prune away the luxuriances of government, ſhould wound its eſſence and its root? Should the medicine, intended to cleanſe and heal the wound, be converted into a poiſon that cankers and deſtroys? Perhaps from a fair and candid collection of facts, the reader will be beſt enabled to form a proper judgment, whether the houſe of commons, through the ignorance of many, the inadvertence of ſome, and the malice of a few, did not afterwards paſs that ancient boundary, beyond which the conſtitution of England cannot ſubſiſt. Their firſt and greateſt grievance was the earl of Strafford: he had deſerted the country party, and conſequently irritated the leaders in the oppoſition. His great abilities rendered him dangerous; his lofty carriage unpopular, and his ſeverity, odious. But ſtill thoſe particulars admitted of degrees of alleviation. His abilities could not have injured a people, protected by a parliament always on its guard; and he had effected one of the greateſt ſervices that could poſſibly have been done to the crown and people of England, by rendering Ireland, inſtead of being dangerous, to be dependent upon England; from being a gulph of expence, to be a province of profit. It ought therefore to have been the care of parliament to have preſerved thoſe advantages which Strafford had procured; to have improved thoſe revenues he had raiſed; and to have prevented thoſe dangers he had introduced. His practices, as lord-preſident of the council of York, amounted, at moſt, to nothing more than miſdemeanors; and with regard to Ireland, his government, however ſevere, tranſgreſſed not the bounds of juſtice; and that ſeverity was perhaps abſolutely neceſſary among a wild and ferocious people. The arbitrary maxims he had ſupported at the council-board, were juſtly odious in a free nation; but they had been cruſhed in the bud, and were never ſo ſufficiently proved as to deſerve a parliamentary condemnation. The people were now ſufficiently convinced, that the greateſt miniſter muſt be levelled with the meaneſt ſubject, when he became obnoxious to the kingdom. The impeachment and impriſonment of Strafford had more effectually plucked the ſting from prerogative, than all the oppoſitions, the ſufferings, the remonſtrances, and reſolutions of parliaments had ever been able to effect; and there ſeems to have been no neceſſity of having recourſe to injuſtice to ſhed the blood of a perſon who could no longer direct the councils of his ſovereign.

The next public grievance was archbiſhop Laud, a man great indeed by his ſtation in the church and his favour with his ſovereign, but, ſtripped of thoſe accidents, deſpicable in his qualities, either to hurt or to ſerve the public. His actions againſt the commonwealth had proceeded from an enthuſiaſtic zeal, bordering upon frenzy, and an inſatiable deſire of extending eccleſiaſtical dominion. His cenſure therefore could not be too ſevere for his demerits, yet in his perſon he was too inconſiderable to be the cauſe of ſtraining juſtice, or even hazarding the conſequences of ſhocking the minds of many well-meaning people, who highly reverenced his character, by bringing his grey hairs to the grave, in a manner till then unprecedented, and which it is to be hoped will never be revived.

The book of canons was a third national grievance; and certainly they well deſerved the attention of parliament, becauſe they ſerved as a ſcourge to freemen. They were paſſed in the late convocation; and though ſome of them were excellent, and others indifferent, yet the whole was poiſoned by the firſt canon, which eſtabliſhed the indefeaſibility of kingly authority, and the unlawfulneſs of reſiſting it on any pretence whatever. Several of the other canons tend to eſtabliſh a deteſted and unnatural power in the church, and to exclude the lawful exerciſe of reaſon in religion. But the malignity of thoſe canons ought to have been imputed to the whole body of the clergy aſſembled in convocation, many of whom were unimpeached in their lives and principles, and no power of the crown prevented the parliament from cenſuring them for their behaviour in convocation. Neither Charles nor his miniſters ought therefore to have been charged with this crime, nor ought the ſword of public juſtice to have fallen on the head of any ſingle perſon on this account.

The breach of parliamentary privileges, and of perſonal liberty, is the next grievance loudly complained of by the commons. But theſe, however neceſſary to be ſupported, and however neceſſary to be redreſſed, ought impartially to be conſidered as the acts of thoſe who had already ſuffered, or were now ſuffering for them. All that the commons could do, was to proſecute the authors of ſuch pernicious meaſures, and to prevent their being repeated for the future. They had full liberty from the king to do this; and if they failed in the attempt, the fault could not be imputed to him. The ſame may be ſaid of ſhip-money, the adviſers of which, and the judges who had given their opinions for it, being now under proſecution by the houſe, were all the ſacrifices Charles could make to atone for the abuſes he had authoriſed.

With regard to the other grievances, they were nothing more than ſuch as may happen under any well-regulated government. Parliaments had been intermitted, and to that intermiſſion the unpuniſhed abuſes of power were chiefly, if not entirely, owing. But a bill was now preparing of a new and unuſual, though ſalutary, nature, to remove that complaint for the future. The Engliſh conſtitution knew no other law than the will of the ſovereign, with regard to the ſittings of parliaments. Thoſe who wiſhed well to both the king and his people, thought that the ſpirit of the conſtitution ought, in this reſpect, to ſupply the letter. While the feudal ſyſtem continued in vigour, the ſubject ſeldom complained of the intermiſſion of parliaments, becauſe by their aſſiſtance only the king could demand other aids and ſubſidies. Under the government of the Tudors, till towards the end of the reign of queen Elizabeth, parliaments were conſidered as the ſcourges of the people; both the wicked and the virtuous were alike ſacrificed to their fear, their venality, or their bigotry. But when the people began to think for themſelves; when they diſcuſſed the great points between the crown and the ſubject, they perceived many examples of parliaments forcing kings to give up miniſters to juſtice, and to redreſs the grievances of the public, in conſideration of the aids and ſubſidies they received from the people. The condition of the ſubject was deſperate, if theſe aids could be commanded by the crown without the conſent of parliament; becauſe then there could be no neceſſity for calling one. This had, in fact, been the caſe under Charles; nor did he ever call a parliament, but when his revenue, however illegal, was inſufficient to defray the expences of his government. The parliament now ſitting had, by their vigorous proceedings, gone far towards ſtopping the ſources of iniquitous exactions, which, in fact, muſt have put Charles under a tacit neceſſity of frequently calling parliaments.

But theſe precautions were not thought ſufficient; it was feared that ſome rapacious miniſter might prevail upon the king to diſſolve the parliament, cruſh their proceedings in the bud, and attempt to reduce England to a deſpotic government. To prevent ſo dreadful a calamity, no meaſure was thought ſo proper as ſome poſitive, conſtitutional act, which might render the calling of parliaments leſs precarious, and more frequent. Many ſpecious arguments, beſides thoſe drawn from the circumſtances of this important criſis, were urged, with great force and eloquence. Parliaments, in former times, regularly met once a year, and it could not be any unreaſonable conceſſion in the crown to bring the conſtitution ſo far back to its firſt principles, as to paſs an act for triennial parliaments. This bill was ſtrongly ſupported by lord Digby, ſon to the earl of Briſtol. He appealed for the truth of what he urged to the violations of the petition of right, which had happened through the diſcontinuance of parliaments. "Let his majeſty (ſaid he) hear our complaints ever ſo compaſſionately; let him purge away our grievances ever ſo efficaciouſly; let him puniſh and expel ill miniſters ever ſo exemplarily; let him make choice of good ones ever ſo exactly: if there be not a way ſettled to preſerve and keep them good, the miſchiefs will all grow again like Sampſon's locks, and pull down the houſe upon our heads.

"The people of England (continued he) cannot open their ears, their hearts, their mouths, or their purſes, to his majeſty, but in parliament. We can neither hear him, acknowledge, nor give, but there.

"This bill, Mr. Speaker, is the ſole key that can open the way to thoſe reciprocal endearments, which muſt make and perpetuate the happineſs of the king and kingdom.

"Let no man object any derogation from the king's prerogative by it: we only preſent the bill; it muſt be made a law by our ſovereign; his honour and his power will be as conſpicuous in commanding at once, that a parliament ſhall aſſemble every third year, as in commanding a parliament to aſſemble this or that year: there is more of majeſty in ordaining primary and univerſal cauſes, than in the actuating of ſubordinate effects.

"I do not doubt but that the glorious king Edward III. when he made thoſe laws for the yearly calling of parliaments, did it with a right ſenſe of his dignity and honour: the truth is, the kings of England are never in their glory, their ſplendor, their majeſtic ſovereignty, but in parliament. Where is the power of impoſing taxes? Where is the power of reſtoring from incapacities? Where is the legiſlative authority? In the king, Mr. Speaker, but how? In the king encircled and environed by his parliament.

"Out of parliament the king has only a limited power, a circumſcribed juriſdiction; but, waited on by his parliament, no monarch of the eaſt is ſo abſolute in diſpelling grievances.

"In chaſing away bad miniſters, we do nothing more than diſſipate clouds that may gather again; but in voting this bill, we ſhall contribute, as far as is in our power, to the perpetuating our ſun, our ſovereign, in his vertical, in his noon-day luſtre."

Such were the ſentiments of that great man, who afterwards loſt his life and fortune in the royal cauſe. He thought the ſentiments of liberty were not at all incompatible with thoſe of loyalty; that a king of England could be great only by ruling over a free people; and that the people could be no longer free than the king was great. But he believed, and believed with reaſon, that Charles had imbibed falſe notions of royal greatneſs, and that he ſought to make that perſonal which was only political. That a king of England can do no ill, was an allowed maxim in the conſtitution; but that his miniſters may, and that they may be puniſhed for it, was equally allowed. Charles, while he was able to keep the ſeat of power, ſupported the firſt of theſe maxims, but was willing to evade the latter. He endeavoured to ſcreen his miniſters, and by this prepoſterous conduct, he at laſt received, in his own breaſt, thoſe darts of popular reſentment which were originally aimed only at his miniſters.

The more the commons proceeded in their inquiry after grievances, the more they multiplied. The truth is, there was a party in the houſe of commons, who laboured aſſiduouſly to diſcover grievances, and ſought rather to propagate than extinguiſh them. Every unthinking court divine, every buſy officer, and every imprudent perſon who was honoured with a commiſſion in the army or navy, who ſpoke with warmth for ceremonies in religion, or deſpotiſm in the ſtate, were called before the commons, and their follies or offences were obliquely charged upon the court. The ſervants of the high commiſſion court, the ſtar-chamber, and other officers, where illegal or other arbitrary meaſures had been purſued, were condemned to make ſatisfaction to the injured parties, and ſometimes corporally puniſhed. By theſe, and other artful meaſures, the anger of the houſe againſt the late grievances was kept up perpetually, without allowing a calm hour for reflection, or the leaſt allowance for natural infirmity, miſtakes, or miſrepreſentations. Some alleviations ought ſurely to have been made for the weakneſſes and infirmities of human nature: it would be the height of cruelty to demand perfection in a mortal being. But men's paſſions were now too much heated to be ſhocked by any inſtance of injuſtice, which ſerved ends ſo popular as thoſe purſued by the houſe of commons.

The king remained entirely paſſive during theſe violent operations. The few ſervants who continued faithful to him, were ſeized with aſtoniſhment at the rapid progreſs made by the commons in power and popularity, and were glad, by their inactive and inoffenſive behaviour, to compound for impunity. The torrent riſing to ſo dreadful and ſo unexpected a height, all thoſe who, either from intereſt or habit, were moſt attached to monarchy, were ſeized with deſpair: and with regard to thoſe who maintained their duty to the king, merely from their regard to the conſtitution, they ſeemed, by their concurrence, to ſwell that inundation which began already to deluge the kingdom. Charles ordered both houſes of parliament to attend him at Whitehall, where he complained ſtrongly of their ſlow proceedings, and recommended to them the better ſupport of the two armies, the forts and the navy. He profeſſed, in very earneſt terms, his deſire of their perfecting the reformation they had begun; but, at the ſame time, wiſhed them not to make any alteration in the eſtabliſhed government. "You have (ſaid he) taken the whole machine of government in pieces; a practice frequent with ſkilful artiſts, when they deſire to clear the wheels from any ruſt which may have grown upon them. The engine may again be reſtored to its former uſe and motions, provided it be put up entire, ſo that not a pin be wanting." But this was far from the intention of the commons; they were perſuaded that the machine was incumbered with many wheels and ſprings which retarded and croſſed its operations, and deſtroyed its utility. Happy would it have been for themſelves, and happy for the kingdom, had they proceeded with moderation, and been contented with their preſent plenitude of power, to remove ſuch parts only as might juſtly be deemed ſuperfluous and incongruous.

The petition preſented by alderman Pennington againſt the government of the church, had hitherto lain dormant; the attempt was thought too dangerous, and the leaders of the oppoſition determined to proceed with caution. They accordingly introduced a bill for prohibiting all clergymen from exerciſing any civil office. One of the conſequences of this bill would have been a deprivation of the biſhops of their ſeats in the houſe of peers; but it was ſoon diſcovered, that though this meaſure was very acceptable to the zealous commons, who obſerved, with regret, the firm attachment of that order to the crown, it was not generally approved; for when the bill was preſented to the peers, it was rejected by a great majority. This was the firſt check the commons had met with in their popular career; and ſufficiently informed them of the oppoſition they muſt expect to meet with from the upper houſe, whoſe inclinations and intereſt could never be totally ſeparated from the throne.

The cry againſt popery was immediately revived; an engine which the commons well knew would effectually alarm the populace. One Goodman, a Romiſh prieſt, but of a very inoffenſive and virtuous character, and guilty of no crime beſides that of executing the duties of his function, had been tried and found guilty; and Charles, from motives of juſtice and compaſſion, had reprieved him from time to time. This mercy was conſidered as a crime by the commons, and a remonſtrance was preſented to the king on this ſubject. Though this violent proceeding could be conſidered only as a groſs inſult upon the common underſtanding of mankind, yet Charles thought proper to ſend an anſwer to the houſe, in which he obſerved, that there was no inſtance upon record of any prieſts being executed merely for their religion, either in the reign of queen Elizabeth, or that of her father; and that he feared any acts of ſeverity exerciſed on perſons guilty of no other crime than that of religion, would be fatally felt both by his own ſubjects in foreign countries, and the proteſtants abroad. He, however, added, that after informing the houſe of the real reaſons that influenced his conduct, he ſhould leave the affair entirely to their determination, and think himſelf ſufficiently diſcharged from any ill conſequences that might enſue upon the execution of Goodman.

But this moderation of the king was much leſs remarkable than the magnanimity of the prieſt, who preſented to Charles the following petition, which deſerves to be recorded, as it does honour to his memory.

"To the king's moſt excellent majeſty,

"The humble petition of John Goodman humbly ſheweth,

"That whereas your majeſty's petitioner hath been informed of a great diſcontent in many of your majeſty's ſubjects, at the gracious mercy your majeſty was freely pleaſed to ſhew your petitioner, by ſuſpending the execution of the ſentence of death pronounced againſt your petitioner for being a Roman prieſt: Theſe are humbly to beſeech your majeſty, rather to remit your petitioner to their mercy that are diſcontented, than to let him live the ſubject of ſo great diſcontent in your people againſt your majeſty; for it hath pleaſed God to give me the grace, to deſire with the prophet, that if this ſtorm be raiſed for my ſake, I may be caſt into the ſea, that others may avoid the tempeſt.

"This is, moſt ſacred ſovereign, the petition of him who ſhould eſteem his blood well ſhed to cement up the breach between your majeſty and your ſubjects upon this occaſion."

Charles immediately ſent this remarkable petition to the houſe; but whether it produced any effect on the popular leaders, is uncertain. Goodman, however, eſcaped with life; but, probably, more from the multiplicity of buſineſs than any pity ſo uncommon an inſtance of magnanimity excited in the breaſts of thoſe who had given riſe to ſo much diſturbance.

For ſome years, Can, a Scotchman, and afterwards Roſetti, an Italian, had openly reſided at London, and frequented the court, as perſons veſted with a commiſſion from the pope. The queen's zeal and authority with her huſband had been the cauſe of this imprudence, ſo offenſive to the nation. But the ſpirit of bigotry now roſe too high to permit any longer ſuch indulgences. Informed that the commons were greatly exaſperated at theſe proceedings, and deſirous of removing every cauſe of complaint, the queen ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, in which ſhe obſerved, "That ſhe had been always ready to uſe her beſt endeavours for removing all miſunderſtandings between the king and his ſubjects: that, at the requeſt of the lords, who petitioned the king for calling a parliament, ſhe wrote expreſsly to his majeſty, conjuring him to have recourſe to ſo ſalutary a method: that ſhe had ſince been moſt willing to do every good office in her power between the king and his people, a circumſtance not unknown to ſeveral in the houſe of lords; and that ſhe would continue to purſue the ſame intention, from a full perſuaſion of its being the only method of procuring happineſs to the king, to herſelf, and to the kingdom: that it was her earneſt deſire, that all things might be juſtly ſettled between the king and his people, and all cauſes of miſunderſtanding taken away and removed; that her majeſty being informed that the perſon ſent to her from the pope is obnoxious to the kingdom, ſhe is deſirous of giving all the ſatiſfaction in her power, and will, within a convenient time, remove him out of England: that underſtanding exception has alſo been taken at the great reſort of people to her chapel at Denmark-houſe, her majeſty will be careful not to exceed what is convenient and neceſſary for the exerciſe of her religion: that as the parliament is not ſatisfied with the method ſhe purſued for raiſing money on the catholics, for aſſiſting the king in his late journey to the north, ſhe deſires it may be obſerved, that ſhe was moved to it merely by her dear and tender affection for the king, and the example of many others among his majeſty's ſubjects. If, therefore, any thing in her proceedings be illegal, ſhe hopes it will be remembered, that ſhe was ignorant of any laws to the contrary, and carried away by her great deſire of aſſiſting the king on ſo preſſing an occaſion; but promiſes to be more cautious for the future, not to do any thing contrary to the eſtabliſhed laws of the kingdom: that being deſirous of employing her own power to unite the king and his people, ſhe wiſhes the parliament would look forward, and paſs over ſuch errors and miſtakes as her ſervants may formerly have committed; and promiſes to repay this inſtance of reſpect with all the good offices ſhe can do the houſe; and that they ſhall experience the real good effects of her interpoſition, as often as there ſhall be occaſion."

A bill was brought in for giving the king the duties of tonnage and poundage for a limited time; but the utmoſt care was taken by the commons, in the preamble, to aſſert their own right of beſtowing this gift, and to diveſt the crown of all independent title of aſſuming it. And that they might increaſe, or rather finally fix, the entire dependence and ſubjection of the king, they voted theſe duties only for two months; and afterwards renewed their grant from time to time, by very ſhort periods. Charles paſſed this important bill without any heſitation; probably with an intention to ſhew, that he entertained not the leaſt intention of ever more attempting to govern without a parliament.

The triennial act did not ſo readily obtain the royal aſſent. By this bill it was enacted, that if the chancellor, who was firſt bound under ſevere penalties, failed to iſſue writs by the third of September, every third year, any twelve or more of the peers ſhould be empowered to exert this authority: in default of the peers, the ſheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, &c. ſhould ſummon the voters: and, in their default, the voters themſelves ſhould meet, and proceed to the election of members, in the ſame manner as if writs had been regularly iſſued from the crown: nor could the parliament, after it was aſſembled, be diſſolved in leſs than fifty days. As this act, however neceſſary to prevent the diſuſe of parliaments, retrenched ſome of the nobleſt and moſt valuable prerogatives of the crown, it is no wonder that the king was unwilling to paſs it into a law; eſpecially as theſe aſſemblies had lately eſtabliſhed it as a maxim, to carry their ſcrutiny into every part of government. But finding nothing leſs would ſatisfy the commons, he came to the houſe of lords, and gave it the royal aſſent. Solemn thanks were returned to his majeſty by both houſes for this mark of condeſcenſion. Great rejoicings were made in every part of the kingdom, eſpecially in the capital; and the higheſt profeſſions were every where made of gratitude and mutual returns of ſupply and confidence.

The king had determined to beſtow gratifications on individuals, as a much ſurer method of ſoftening the malignancy of the popular leaders, than any conceſſions he could make to the public. Accordingly ſeveral new privy-counſellors were ſworn; among whom were the earls of Hertford, Bedford, Eſſex, Briſtol, and Warwick; the lords Say, Saville, and Kimbolton: all theſe were of the popular party; and afterwards, when the commons puſhed affairs to extremity, proved the greateſt ſupport of the throne. Juxon, biſhop of London, was very deſirous of reſigning the treaſurer's ſtaff, a poſt he had never ſollicited; and the king at laſt conſented to his requeſt. It is ſomething very remarkable, that during all the ſevere inquiries carried on againſt the conduct of miniſters and prelates, the mild and prudent virtues of this man, who filled both theſe invidious characters, continued unmoleſted. The ſtaff was intended for the earl of Bedford, a popular nobleman of great authority, as well as prudence and moderation. But unfortunately both for the prince and people, he paid the debt of nature ſoon after his being ſworn one of the privy council. The following promotions were alſo intended: St. John, ſollicitor-general; Hollis, ſecretary of ſtate; Pym, chancellor of the exchequer; lord Say, maſter of the wards; the earl of Eſſex, governor; and Hambden, tutor to the young prince. But it was ſoon perceived that theſe promotions would not be ſufficient to anſwer the end propoſed, as theſe popular leaders ſeemed determined ſtill to promote all the meaſures of the parliament; or, in other words, to oblige the king to reſign himſelf paſſively to their direction and government. The projected promotions, therefore, never took place.

Ever ſince the impriſonment of the earl of Strafford, the king had laboured inceſſantly to ſave his life. He attempted to mollify, by every indulgence, the rage of his moſt inveterate proſecutors, and was willing to make almoſt any ſacrifice to obtain his wiſhes. But he laboured in vain: the members of the oppoſition dreaded his experience and great capacity; and were fully perſuaded, that if he eſcaped their vengeance, he would again aſſume his former power, and ſeverely repay the miſeries he had ſuffered. They therefore conſidered his death as their only ſecurity, and on which all their ſucceſs in their future enterprizes muſt ultimately depend. Every method was therefore taken that human prudence could ſuggeſt, to prevent his eſcaping the fate they were preparing for him. An oath of ſecrecy had been taken by the committee appointed to draw up the charge againſt him; and they were inveſted with the power of examining all witneſſes, of calling for all papers, and of uſing every means of ſcrutiny with regard to any part of the earl's conduct and behaviour. A man muſt have been very cautious, or very innocent indeed, not to afford, during the whole courſe of his life, ſome matter of accuſation againſt him; eſpecially when ſo general and unbounded an inquiſition was exerciſed by ſuch powerful and implacable enemies.

The houſe of commons in Ireland, as ſoon as advice arrived of Strafford's impriſonment, entered into all the violent counſels againſt him, notwithſtanding they had ſo very lately beſtowed the moſt ample praiſes on his adminiſtration. They prepared a repreſentation of the miſerable ſtate into which the kingdom was fallen, as they ungenerouſly pretended, by his miſconduct. They ſent over a committee to England, to aſſiſt in the proſecution of their unfortunate governor.

A. D. 1641.

A. D. 1641. Some unfair methods had been uſed to intimidate the biſhops, and they were privately given to underſtand, that no farther notice would be taken of the petition from the citizens, provided they did not inſiſt upon their right of ſitting on Strafford's impeachment. By an ancient canon they were forbid to aſſiſt in any trial for life, and being unwilling to exaſperate the commons, who were already too much prejudiced againſt them, they thought proper to withdraw, nor did they aſſiſt at any of the tranſactions preparatory to this famous trial.

The earl of Arundel, was appointed lord high-ſteward, a nobleman not at all favourable to Strafford. He was, indeed, a perſon of too great honour to be guilty of any glaring injuſtice, but he ſeized not any opportunities of doing him ſervice, though ſeveral offered during the courſe of this celebrated trial. The cauſe came on before the houſe of lords on the twenty-ſecond of March, in Weſtminſter-hall, where both houſes were aſſembled, the one as accuſers, the other as judges. Beſides the chair of ſtate, a cloſe gallery was prepared for the king and queen, who attended during the whole trial.

Twenty-eight articles of impeachment were exhibited againſt Strafford, and regarded his conduct, as preſident of the council of York, as deputy of Ireland, and, as counſellor or commander in England. But though every method had been uſed; though the managers had ſpent four months in framing the accuſation; and though the earl was obliged to give his anſwers extemporary, it appears, from compariſon, that he was not only free from the crime of treaſon, of which indeed there is not the leaſt appearance, but that his conduct, though expoſed to ſuch ſevere ſcrutiny, if proper allowance be made for the infirmities inſeparable from human nature, innocent and even laudable. His greateſt enemies confeſſed, that his defence was ſomething more than human.

With regard to his behaviour when preſident of the council of York, it appeared to have been unexceptionable. The power of the council had indeed been greatly extended; but there was not the leaſt reaſon to conclude that Strafford had uſed any art to procure theſe extenſive powers; becauſe, after the court was inveſted with the authority ſo loudly complained of, he had never once ſat as preſident, nor exerciſed one act of judicial authority.

The Iriſh committee had, if poſſible, ſtill leſs reaſon to complain. Induſtry and the arts of peace had been introduced, during his adminiſtration, among that rude and ſavage people: the ſhipping of the kingdom had been augmented more than an hundred fold: the cuſtoms trippled upon the ſame rates: the exports double in value to the imports: manufactures, particularly that of linen, introduced and promoted: agriculture, by means of the Engliſh and Scots plantations, gradually advancing: and the proteſtant religion encouraged, without having recourſe to perſecution. Theſe were known facts, and ought to have concealed any diſcretionary authority, ſo much practiſed during that age, eſpecially as they were never exerciſed to the prejudice of the people. No illegal adviſe or action was proved againſt him; and the whole amount of his guilt during his adminiſtration in Ireland, conſiſted of ſome peeviſh, at moſt, imperious expreſſions, which, during ſuch dreadful extremities, and during a bad ſtate of health, had caſually dropped from him.

Among all the ſpecies of guilt the laws of England had, with the moſt ſcrupulous exactneſs, defined that of treaſon; becauſe on that ſide it was found moſt neceſſary to protect the ſubject againſt the violence of the king and his miniſters. By the famous ſtatute of Edward III. all kinds of treaſon are enumerated, and every other crime, beſides ſuch as are there expreſsly mentioned, is carefully excluded from that denomination. The commons endeavoured to prove that Strafford had been guilty of "An endeavour to ſubvert the fundamental laws of this kingdom;" and would willingly have inferred that the crime was treaſon. But ſurely to introduce a ſpecies of guilt of which the act is totally ſilent, and conſtrue it treaſon, is, in itſelf, a ſubverſion of all law; becauſe, under the ſpecious pretence of defending liberty, it reverſes a ſtatute the beſt calculated for defending liberty, that had ever been enacted by an Engliſh parliament.

On the thirteenth of April Strafford was brought to the bar, and commanded to make a general reply to all the crimes laid to his charge. This he very nobly performed in a ſpeech that does honour to human abilities; nor perhaps can hiſtory produce any performance equal to it, in the perſpicuity of language and ſtrength of reaſoning, in ſtating, clearing or evading controverted evidences and facts, in extenuating ſome charges, in confuting others, and in following a ſubtle adverſary through all the mazes of a long and complicated impeachment. In all the argumentative part of this noble ſpeech, the earl confined his language only to the facts themſelves; but when he comes to repel the arguments of the commons, to make the guilt amount to treaſon, he gave himſelf a much greater latitude, and diſplayed ſuch an amazing ſtrength both of ſtyle and reaſoning, as at once aſtoniſhed and affected the audience.

"Where, (ſaid he) has this ſpecies of guilt lain ſo long concealed? Where has this fire been buried, during ſo many centuries, that no ſmoke ſhould appear, till it burſt out at once to conſume me and my children? Better it were to live under no law at all, and by the maxims of cautious prudence, to conform ourſelves the beſt we can, to the arbitrary will of a maſter; then fancy we have a law on which we can rely, and find, at laſt, that this law ſhould inflict a puniſhment precedent to the promulgation, and try us by maxims unheard of till the very moment of the proſecution. If I ſail on the Thames, and ſplit my veſſel on an anchor; in caſe there be no buoy to give warning, the party ſhall pay me damages: but if the anchor be marked out, then is the ſtriking on it at my own peril. Where is the mark ſet upon this crime? Where is the token by which I ſhould diſcover it? It has lain concealed under water; and no human prudence, no human innocence, could ſave me from the deſtruction with which I am threatened.

"It is now full two hundred and forty years ſince treaſons were defined; and ſo long has it been, ſince any man was touched to this extent, upon this crime, before myſelf. We have lived, my lords, happily to ourſelves at home: we have lived glorious abroad, to the world: let us be content with what our fathers have left us: let not our ambition carry us to be more learned than they were, in thoſe killing and deſtructive arts. Great wiſdom it will be in your lordſhips, and juſt providence, for yourſelves, for your poſterities, for the whole kingdom, to caſt from you into the fire, theſe bloody and myſterious volumes of arbitrary and conſtructive treaſons, as the primitive chriſtians did their books of curious arts, and betake ourſelves to the plain letter of the ſtatute, which tells you where the crime is, and points out to you the path by which you may avoid it.

"Let us not, to our own deſtruction, awake thoſe ſleeping lions, by rattling up a company of records, which have lain, during ſo many ages, by the wall, forgotten and neglected. To all my former afflictions, add not this, my lords, the moſt ſevere of any; that I, for my other ſins, not for my treaſons, be the means of introducing a precedent, ſo pernicious to the laws and liberties of my native country.

"However theſe gentlemen at the bar ſay, they ſpeak for the commonwealth, and they believe ſo: yet, under favour, in this particular, it is I who ſpeak for the commonwealth. Precedents, like thoſe endeavoured to be eſtabliſhed againſt me, muſt draw along ſuch inconveniences and miſeries, that, in a few years, the kingdom will be in the “ condition expreſſed in a ſtatute of Henry IV. and no man ſhall know by what rule to govern his words and actions.

“ Impoſe not, my lords, difficulties unſurmountable upon miniſters of ſtate, nor diſable them from ſerving with chearfulneſs their king and country. If you examine them, under ſuch ſevere penalties, by every grain, by every little weight, the ſcrutiny will be intolerable; the public affairs of the kingdom muſt be left waſte; and no wiſe man, who has any honour or fortune to loſe, will ever engage in ſuch dreadful, ſuch unknown perils.

“ My lords, I have now troubled your lordſhips a great deal longer than I ſhould have done. Were it not for the intereſt of theſe pledges, which a ſaint in heaven left me, I ſhould be loth”---Here he pointed to his children, and his weeping ſtopped his voice---“ What I forfeit for myſelf, it is nothing; but I confeſs, that my indiſcretion ſhould forfeit for them, it wounds me very deeply. You will be pleaſed to pardon my infirmity: ſomething I ſhould have ſaid; but I ſee I ſhall not be able, and therefore I leave it.

“ And now, my lords, I thank God, I have been, by his bleſſing, ſufficiently inſtructed in the extreme vanity of all temporary enjoyments, compared to the importance of our eternal duration. And ſo, my lords, even ſo, with all humility, and with all tranquillity of mind, I ſubmit clearly, and freely, to your judgments: and whether that righteous doom ſhall be to life or death, I ſhall repoſe myſelf, full of gratitude and confidence, in the arms of the great Author of my exiſtence.”

Whitlocke, who was himſelf chairman of the committee which conducted the impeachment againſt this unfortunate nobleman, candidly declares, “ That never any man acted ſuch a part, on ſuch a theatre, with more wiſdom, conſtancy, and eloquence; with greater reaſon, judgment, and temper, and with a better grace in all his words and actions, than did this great and excellent perſon; and he moved the hearts of all his auditors, ſome few excepted, to remorſe and pity.” In a word, this nobleman, without the leaſt aſſiſtance, blending modeſty and humility with firmneſs and vigour, made ſuch a defence, that the commons themſelves, tho’ far from being ſtrangers to his great abilities, were aſtoniſhed: they perceived that it would be impoſſible, by any legal proſecution, to obtain a ſentence againſt him, and therefore determined to bring in a bill of attainder immediately after the pleadings were finiſhed; for many of the leaders in the oppoſition well knew, that either Strafford or themſelves muſt periſh. It was known that he intended to impeach Pym, Hambden, and ſeveral others, of high treaſon, for having invited the Scots to invade England. It was thought, that had he not been prevented by the accuſation of the commons, he would that very day have preſented the impeachment to the houſe of peers. The bill was therefore puſhed, with the utmoſt violence, in the lower houſe. This gave great offence to the lords; becauſe it, in a manner, altered the courſe of the proceedings, as the commons ſeemed deſirous of exchanging the character of proſecutors for that of judges. The friends of Strafford, who had the courage to declare their ſentiments, took great advantage of this particular; they declared rebellion to be equally odious with treaſon; and that it was plain the commons intended, with the aſſiſtance of their friends, the clamorous and inſolent populace, to deprive the crown and houſe of lords of their moſt valuable privileges. The peers themſelves ſeemed to entertain ſome apprehenſions of this kind, and declared their intention of proceeding according to the method already begun by impeachment. The bill, however, paſſed the commons, with only fifty-nine diſſenting voices. It was, however, apprehended the bill would miſcarry in the upper houſe, and it became neceſſary for the popular leaders to make uſe of other methods to execute their purpoſe.

The puritanical miniſters, who hated Strafford, entertained their congregations, the Sunday after the bill of attainder was paſſed by the commons, with the moſt enthuſiaſtic declamations on the neceſſity of executing juſtice on great delinquents. Theſe deſtructive orations were not uttered in vain. About ſix thouſand men, armed with ſwords, ſtaves, &c. iſſued from the city, and ſurrounded the two houſes of parliament. They threatened with the ſevereſt puniſhments the fifty-nine members who had voted againſt the bill of attainder, and poſted up their names in every part of the city, under the title of Straffordians, and betrayers of their country; by which means they were expoſed to the continual inſults of an ungovernable rabble: and all the peers ſuſpected of being friends of the unfortunate miniſter, were ſure to meet with menaces of the moſt deſperate vengeance from the enraged populace. The lords ſent complaints to the commons againſt theſe violences, which they juſtly repreſented as the moſt flagrant breach of privilege, and as tending to deſtroy the freedom of parliament. But they ſoon perceived, from the affected coolneſs and indifference of the lower houſe, that the popular tumults were far from being diſagreeable. So greatly were their ſentiments altered with regard to the privileges and freedom of parliament!

A diſcovery, which was made about this time, tended to increaſe theſe popular diſorders. Some of the principal officers of the Engliſh army, partly from an attachment to the court, and partly from a diſguſt they had conceived againſt the parliament, at the preference they gave the Scottiſh army, entered into an aſſociation, took an oath of ſecrecy, and kept up a cloſe correſpondence with ſome of the king's ſervants. They drew up the form of a petition, and propoſed to get it ſigned by the whole army. In this petition they repreſented, that the great and unexampled conceſſions made by the king for the ſecurity of public peace and liberty, produced not the deſired effects; becauſe of ſome inſatiable, turbulent ſpirits, whom nothing leſs than a total ſubverſion of the ancient conſtitution can appeaſe. “ Far be it from our thoughts (added they) to believe, that the violence and unreaſonableneſs of ſuch perſons can have any influence upon the prudence and juſtice of the parliament. But what increaſes our preſent trouble and diſcontent is, that we are informed theſe ill-affected perſons are ſupported in their violence by the multitude, and the power of raiſing tumults; that thouſands flock at their call, and beſet the houſes of parliament, and even Whitehall itſelf; not only to the prejudice of that freedom ſo eſſentially neceſſary to great councils, and judicial proceedings, but may poſſibly be productive of ſome perſonal danger to your ſacred majeſty, and the peers.

“ Deſirous of preventing the malignant deſigns of thoſe perſons, and the licentiouſneſs of the multitudes that follow them; and impreſſed with the deepeſt care and zealous affection for the ſafety of your ſacred majeſty and the parliament, our humble petition is, that in your wiſdom, you would be pleaſed to remove ſuch dangers, by puniſhing the ringleaders of theſe tumults, that your majeſty, and the parliament, may be ſecured from ſuch inſolences for the future. For the ſuppreſſion of which, we offer, in all humility, to wait upon you ourſelves, hoping we ſhall appear a ſufficient defence to our gracious ſovereign, the parliament, our religion, and the eſtabliſhed laws of the kingdom, and able to repel whatever numbers may audaciouſly preſume to violate them: ſo ſhall we, by the wiſdom of your majeſty and the parliament, not only be vindicated from the precedent innovations, but be ſecured from the future which are threatened, and which are likely to produce more dangerous effects than the former.”

The draught of this petition being conveyed to the king, he was prevailed upon to counter-ſign it himſelf, as a mark of his approbation. The officers in general approved of this petition; but ſuſpecting that unleſs they went farther, they ſhould be abandoned by the court, and if they went ſo far they ſhould become obnoxious to the parliament, the petition itſelf, with the whole project was laid aſide.

About two months after, Goring, one of the principal actors, betrayed the ſecret to the popular leaders, who took advantage of it to alarm the people, tho' they well knew the danger was over. The attempt fully anſwered their purpoſe. Pym opened the matter in the houſe; and the terror was ſoon conveyed to every corner of the kingdom. A proteſtation was ſigned by the parliament, declaring that they would defend their religion and liberties againſt any force whatever. The panic of the people was artfully kept up by alarms continually ſpread of freſh conſpiracies. It was given out, That great numbers of papiſts were gathering in Lancaſhire: that ſecret meetings were held by them in ſubterraneous paſſages in Surry: that they had entered into a plot to blow up the Thames with gunpowder, in order to drown the city: that proviſions of arms were making in foreign parts: ſometimes France, ſometimes Denmark, was forming deſigns againſt the kingdom. All this tended to one point, namely, that of animating the people in their demands of juſtice againſt the earl of Strafford.

The king was now greatly alarmed for the fate of his favourite miniſter, whom his conſcience told him, was innocent. He came to the houſe of peers, and offered the parliament any ſecurity that Strafford ſhould never again be employed in any public buſineſs, provided his life might be ſaved. At the ſame time he declared, that he was totally diſſatisfied with regard to the circumſtances of the treaſon; and on that account mentioned his difficulty of giving his aſſent to the bill of attainder ſhould it paſs the houſe of peers. This miſtaken mercy in the king, produced a fatal effect. Charles ſhould have known, that his attachment to Strafford was the chief motive for paſſing the bill; and that the great proofs he gave of his anxious concern for the life of his miniſter, rendered his deſtruction the more inevitable. The commons took fire at this proceeding, and voted it a breach of privilege for the king to take notice of any bill depending before the houſe.

Numbers of the lords were ſo intimidated by the popular tumults, that they retired into the country, to avoid the brutal fury of the rebels; ſo that only forty-five were preſent when the bill of attainder was brought into the houſe. Yet even of this ſmall number nineteen had the courage to vote againſt it. A certain proof, that if entire freedom had been allowed, it would have been rejected by a great majority. The popular leaders of the commons knew this, and were therefore very aſſiduous in raiſing the popular tumults which prevented the lords from attending their duty, and conſequently deſtroyed the freedom ſo neceſſary in parliamentary debates: they ſupported the very grievance they had ſo long and ſo loudly complained of; for nothing is more evident than that all this ſtorm of popular fury, was raiſed, directed, or allayed, by the breath of the fanatical preachers, and the violent enemies of Strafford.

The condition of Charles was now truly deplorable. Racked with the pangs of conſcience, with regard to his conſenting to the death of a miniſter whom he loved, eſteemed, and believed to be innocent. He ſaw the commons whom he and his family had always hated and deſpiſed treating him as the mere phantom of a king; and that they reverenced his perſon only, that they might preſent him with a reed inſtead of a ſceptre. The two armies continued in their former ſituation, but greatly altered in their ſentiments and affections. The Scots perceived they had been made the tools of a party, who had reduced the power of the crown much lower than they had ever intended to level it in Scotland. But they had experienced the fruits of this deſpicable employment, by an immenſe profuſion of money, as it were thrown at their feet, for their entertainment: at the ſame time they were highly careſſed and complimented by the parliament. The Engliſh forces, on the other hand, tho' extremely well diſpoſed to ſupport the power and authority of the king, were no friends to the queen and her party; and perceived that they muſt entirely depend upon the parliament for ſubſiſtence. The popular leaders made the greateſt advantages of this unhappy ſituation of the Engliſh troops, and endeavoured to fill the minds of the people with terror, by repreſenting the army as little better than a company of wild beaſts who could be kept tame and innocent only by feeding them with a ſparing hand. At the ſame time the commons, by raiſing all the money neceſſary for the payment of the two armies in the city of London, made, in fact, that city the national creditor, and themſelves her debtors. The money had been raiſed by a vote of parliament; the parliament was therefore to refund it; and the intereſt of the city depended upon ſupporting the credit of the parliament, which could only be done by prolonging the duration of that aſſembly. Such was the artful reaſoning that induced many well meaning members to give their conſent for the bringing in a bill "That the parliament ſhould not be adjourned, prorogued, or diſſolved, but by its own conſent."

It muſt be granted that by this bill, the parliament diſſolved the Engliſh conſtitution. Even the people themſelves, however diſguſted againſt the meaſures of Charles, would not have ſuffered the thoughts of ſuch a bill, had they not ſeen it through a falſe medium; through the miſt of terror, occaſioned by ſeventy thouſand men in arms, ready to ſheath their ſwords in the bowels of their country. Charles beheld all the tumults excited by the arts of ambitious men, with amazement and diſmay. He imagined that the ſceptre trembled in his hand, even at the time when its touch would have diſpelled every commotion, had not his hand been too weak to wield it.

The populace now flocked about Whitehall and accompanied their demand of juſtice upon Strafford, with the moſt ſhameful and open menaces. Rumours of conſpiraces were again ſpread abroad: invaſions and inſurrections talked of: and the whole nation thrown into ſo violent a ferment, as ſeemed to foretell ſome great and alarming convulſion. Wherever the king turned his eyes he was preſented with a gloomy and frightful proſpect: he perceived no reſource, no expedient, no ſecurity. All his ſervants prefered their own ſafety to that of their maſter, and even declined interpoſing with their advice between him and his parliament. The queen, terrified with the appearance of ſuch alarming inſurrections, preſſed him with tears to ſatisfy his people with regard to his miniſter, as it was hoped that his death would reſtore that tranquillity which had for ſome time forſaken the kingdom. Juxon alone, whoſe courage was not inferior to his other virtues, deſpiſed the menaces of the populace, and boldly told the king, that if in his conſcience he thought Strafford innocent of the treaſon laid to his charge, he ought not to paſs the bill of attainder.

While the king continued in this dreadful ſituation of mind, Strafford took a ſtep which demonſtrated that his ſoul was a ſtranger to fear. He wrote a letter to the king, in which he intreated his majeſty to prefer the peace and ſafety of his kingdom to the life of an unfortunate, though innocent man; and quiet the tumultuous populace, by granting the requeſt they made with ſo much vehemence. "In this, added he, "my requeſt will more acquit you to God, than all "the world can do beſides. To a willing man there "is no injury. And by God's grace, I forgive all the "world with a calmneſs and meekneſs, of infinite "contentment to my diſlodging ſoul; ſo, Sir, to you "I can reſign the life of this world with all imaginable chearfulneſs, in the juſt acknowledgment of “ your exceeding favours.” This letter aſtoniſhed his majeſty: he knew the ſoul of Strafford was not eaſily terrified, but he thought him not endowed with ſuch amazing magnanimity. But it tended little to remove the doubts of Charles: he could not bear the thought of putting to death a man whom he loved, eſteemed, and believed to be innocent.

At laſt, however, after the moſt violent anxiety and doubt, Charles granted a commiſſion to four noblemen, empowering them to give the royal aſſent to the bill. Carleton, ſecretary of ſtate, was ſent to inform Strafford that the bill of attainder was ſigned. On receiving this fatal news, he roſe from his chair, lifted up his eyes to heaven, laid his hand upon his heart, and ſaid, “ Put not your truſt in princes, nor in the ſons of men, for in them there is no ſalvation.” He, however, ſoon recollected his ſpirits, and prepared himſelf to ſuffer the fatal ſentence. Three days only were allowed him; nor could the king, though he ſent a letter by the prince of Wales to the parliament, obtain any longer reſpite.

He was attended, in his laſt moments, by archbiſhop Uſher; and in paſſing from his apartment to Tower-hill, where the ſcaffold was erected, he ſtopped under the window of archbiſhop Laud, with whom he had long lived in the moſt intimate friendſhip. The aged primate appeared diſſolved in tears; and on Strafford's begging the aſſiſtance of his prayers in thoſe awful moments which were ſo nearly approaching, the prelate pronounced, in a broken voice, a tender bleſſing on his departing friend, and ſunk into the arms of his attendants. This affecting ſcene of tender friendſhip drew tears from the eyes of the unfortunate Strafford, but could not ſhake the magnanimity of his ſoul. With a mind ſuperior to his fate, he marched on with an air of greater dignity than that which uſually attended him. His behaviour on the ſcaffold was noble and decent. “ I fear (ſaid he) it is an ill omen for the projected reformation in the ſtate, to begin with ſhedding innocent blood.” He complained not of the malice of his enemies, nor of the methods that had been taken to deprive him of life; but laid himſelf down with great tranquillity, and his head was ſevered from his body by one ſtroke of the executioner. He periſhed on the twelfth of May, in the forty-ninth year of his age.

Strafford was one of the greateſt men that ever appeared in England; and though he was not irreproachable, yet he certainly merited a much better fate: and whatever advice he might give his majeſty when dangers rendered deſperate methods neceſſary, yet he often repeated to his maſter this memorable and noble maxim, “ That if ever neceſſity obliged “ the ſovereign to violate the laws, it ought to be “ done with great reſerve; and that, as ſoon as it was “ poſſible, reparation ought to be made to the laws “ for what they had ſuffered by ſuch violation.”

The ſame commiſſioners who ſigned the bill againſt the miniſter, ſigned alſo another more fatal to the royal authority. By this act it was declared, that the parliament ſhould not be adjourned, prorogued, or diſſolved, without the conſent of both houſes. The king conſidered not the conſequence of this ſtatute. Abſorbed in grief for the loſs of his favourite, he gave his aſſent to an act that rendered him the ſlave of his oppreſſors.

It was in vain that Charles expected a proportional return for ſo many inſtances of unbounded compliance. The commons proceeded in their career, and reſolved to annihilate all remains of arbitrary power. They attacked the court of high commiſſion and the ſtar-chamber, whoſe juriſdiction, almoſt without rule or bounds, put real ſhackles on civil liberty. A bill unanimouſly paſſed the houſe to aboliſh theſe courts; and, in them, to annihilate the principal and moſt dangerous articles of the king's prerogative. The breach made in the power of the crown by this abolition was the greater, as the ſtar-chamber took cognizance of all the infractions of the royal proclamations. The right of iſſuing ordinances was, from that time, in a great meaſure abrogated, as the king no longer had it in his power to carry them into execution.

The marſhal's court, which took cognizance of offenſive words, and was thought not ſufficiently limited by law, was alſo, for that reaſon, aboliſhed. The ſtannary courts, which exerciſed juriſdiction over the miners, being liable to a ſimilar objection, underwent a ſimilar fate. The abolition of the council of York, and the council of Wales, followed from the ſame principles. The authority of the clerk of the market, to whom the care of a general inſpection of the weights and meaſures throughout England was committed, was transferred to the mayors, ſheriffs, and ordinary magiſtrates.

Thus did the commons aboliſh every remains of arbitrary power; and made the rigid maxims of law and equity the ſole rule of conduct. No courts of judicature now exiſted but thoſe of Weſtminſter-hall; and though the means they made uſe of to procure theſe great advantages to poſterity, often favoured of artifice, ſometimes of violence, yet it ſhould be remembered, that it is, perhaps, impoſſible to effect a revolution in government, merely by the force of reaſon and argument. Upon the whole, therefore, if we except that complication of cruel iniquity that effected Strafford's attainder, it muſt be owned, that the tranſactions during the firſt period of this memorable parliament, were productive of very great advantages to the nation, by fixing the liberty of the ſubject on a firm and ſolid foundation.

The parliament now adjourned to the twentieth of October; and the king ſet out on a journey to Scotland, in order to ſettle the government of that kingdom. As his path lay through the places where both the Engliſh and Scottiſh armies were cantoned, the commons entertained great jealouſy on that account; and a committee of their houſe was appointed to attend him, under pretence of ſeeing the articles of the treaty with the Scottiſh commiſſioners fully executed, but in reality to be a ſpy upon his actions.

While Charles continued in Scotland, Argyle and Hamilton precipitately left the parliament, where every tranſaction was carried on with candour, under pretence that the earl of Crawford and others intended to aſſaſſinate them. This plot, if indeed any thing of that kind ever exiſted, ſeems to have been laid in England, where it made a much greater noiſe, and was much better underſtood than in Scotland. Charles on this occaſion behaved nobly. He went, attended by about five hundred gentlemen, to the parliament, and deſired the members not to be alarmed at pretended deſigns, which had, probably, no real exiſtence, but ſearch the affair to the bottom, and reſtore ſecurity to the kingdom, by withdrawing the veil of deception, or puniſhing, with the utmoſt ſeverity, thoſe who dared diſturb the tranquillity of the kingdom. His advice was followed; and the circumſtances of the plot being thoroughly examined, they were found to be wholly deſtitute of ſupport; and even the noblemen themſelves were ſo much aſhamed of their conduct, that they returned in a few days to attend their duty in parliament. But though this incident had no effect in Scotland, it was attended with very alarming conſequences in England. The parliament, which was now again aſſembled, repreſented it as a premeditated deſign in the papiſts to break off the treaty of pacification; and that there was not the leaſt doubt of their having a large party to carry on the ſame deſigns in England. The two houſes, therefore, came to the moſt alarming reſolutions; and circular letters, full of apprehenſion and terror, were ſent to all the civil and military officers in the kingdom.

The arrival of the Scottiſh commiſſioners at Edinburgh changed the face of affairs in that kingdom. Charles was obliged to conſent to every propoſal, however exorbitant, in order to ſave the lives of his friends who were ſtill in priſon. For notwithſtanding the articles ſigned at London, it was now made a matter of conſcience with the violent covenanters, that according to their religious engagements, their deaths only ought to ſatisfy them. Strange and prepoſterous conduct, to make religion, intended to diſſeminate peace and happineſs in every part of the world, the author of the moſt horrid crimes! Charles, who determined not to abandon thoſe who ſuffered for their loyalty, was obliged to court the favour of the Scots. He made ſuch a diſtribution of public poſts and preferments among the rigid covenanters, that it may with juſtice be ſaid, that his enemies were loaded with riches and honours, while his friends were abandoned to poverty and diſtreſs.

It was the fate of Charles to ſee his three kingdoms in flames at the ſame period of time. Ireland had been peaceable ſince the eſtabliſhment of the laws, and a proper ſubordination, till the late tranſactions of the Engliſh parliament excited the flame of rebellion in that kingdom. The remains of the old Iriſh families had indeed never been thoroughly ſatisfied with their ſtate of ſubjection under the kings of England, while the aſſiſtance they conſtantly received from the catholic princes, kept them firmly attached to the religion of Rome. There were among them, as well as among the Engliſh and Scotch, men of ſenſe and penetration, who knew the dreadful effects of enthuſiaſtic fury, among a wild and ferocious multitude. They had ſeen its conſequences in their ſiſter kingdom, and determined to follow the example. Popery in Ireland acted in the ſame manner, and pointed to the ſame ends, as fanaticiſm in England and Scotland. They began with wreſting from the government many civil privileges; and at firſt attempted nothing more than the free exerciſe of their own religion. Charles had agreed that four catholic regiments ſhould be ſent over into Spain in order to ſerve in the armies of that kingdom. Had this been effected, the dreadful rebellion and maſſacre that enſued had, poſſibly, never been excited: the horrid deſign had ſlept in the boſom of its contrivers, and periſhed with them: but this meaſure was oppoſed by the puritans in England, and the papiſts in Ireland. The faction in England oppoſed it merely becauſe the king was engaged in honour to aſſiſt the king of Spain: the well-meaning papiſts in Ireland oppoſed it in parliament, becauſe they knew from fatal experience, how dangerous enemies to the civil government of their own country all Iriſh ſoldiers are, when bred in foreign ſervice: and the malignant papiſts oppoſed it, becauſe they were unwilling to loſe ſo large a body of their friends, who could not fail of being of the utmoſt ſervice in their projected rebellion. Charles therefore was obliged to break his promiſe with the Spaniſh monarch, and the Iriſh committees, who had aſſiſted in the proſecution of Strafford, returned from England loaded with favours and privileges for their countrymen.

By the ancient conſtitution of Ireland, their ſucceſſions paſſed by a kind of adoption. Thus every ſept or family, out of which a king or leader happened to be elected, conſidered itſelf as the deſcendants of that man, and as having a right to the territories he had governed. Thoſe prejudices were encouraged by the clergy, who conſidered themſelves as ſo many martyrs and confeſſors, while aliens and heretics enjoyed their power and poſſeſſed their patrimonies. The old Engliſh families, who had, in fact, conquered Ireland for the kings of England, thought themſelves ill treated, and moſt of them being catholics, they joined in ſentiments, as they had done before in intereſts and alliances, with the old Iriſh.

The party being thus numerous both in country and parliament, they followed the example ſet them by the Engliſh, and their attempts were crowned with ſimilar ſucceſs. They impeached and perſecuted all the miniſters of Charles, till there was hardly a ſingle perſon left, who had courage ſufficient to oppoſe their deſtructive meaſures. Nor was there any thing a people could deſire, with regard to indulgence in religion, or the ſecurity of their properties, which the Iriſh did not now enjoy. But theſe were not ſufficient to ſatisfy the craving diſpoſitions of the Iriſh. Zealous catholics, but ſunk into the very abyſs of brutal and ſuperſtitious ignorance, they beheld with horror a number of puritans ſcattered over their country, and the ancient revenues withheld from their clergy.

Roger More, a gentleman deſcended from a very ancient family in Ireland, and highly celebrated among his countrymen, for valour and capacity, firſt formed the project for expelling the Engliſh, and aſſerting the independency of his native country. He was indefatigable in the purſuit of his purpoſe; going, with the utmoſt ſecrecy, from one chieftain to another, and uſing all the arts in his power to awaken every latent principle of diſcontent. He maintained a cloſe correſpondence with lord Maguire, and Sir Phelim O Neale, the moſt powerful perſons among the ancient Iriſh. He obſerved, that the rebellious factions in England and Scotland offered the moſt favourable opportunity for effecting their purpoſe; that the Engliſh planters who had expelled them from their poſſeſſions, ſuppreſſed their religion, and bereaved them of their liberties, were but a handful when compared with the natives; that though the catholics had hitherto enjoyed, in ſome tolerable degree, the exerciſe of their religion, from the moderation of their indulgent prince, they muſt henceforth expect the government would be conducted by other maxims and other principles; that the puritanical parliament having at laſt ſubdued their ſovereign, would, doubtleſs, when their power was conſolidated, extend their ambitious enterprizes to Ireland, and make the catholics in that kingdom feel the ſame furious perſecution, to which their brethren in England were at preſent expoſed; and that a revolt in the Iriſh, tending only to vindicate their native liberty againſt the violence of foreign invaders, could never, at any time, be deemed rebellion, much leſs, during the preſent confuſions, when their prince was, in a manner, a priſoner, and obedience muſt be paid, not to him, but to thoſe who had traiterouſly uſurped his authority.

Conſiderations like theſe could not fail of awakening the native pride of the Iriſh, and induce them to form a conſpiracy againſt their hated maſters. Plunket, a ſoldier of fortune, readily engaged in the undertaking, and it was agreed that Sir Phelim O'Neale, and the other conſpirators, ſhould begin the inſurrection on the ſame day in the different provinces, while lord Maguire and Roger More made themſelves maſters of the caſtle of Dublin. The twenty-third of October was the day fixed upon for carrying their deſign into execution. The ſcheme was at firſt propoſed with a great deal of moderation; it was reſolved not to ſpill any blood but in caſes of neceſſity, and not to moleſt the Scots, who were very numerous in the northern parts of the kingdom. The Engliſh ambaſſadors at foreign courts, received frequent hints of what was projecting in Ireland, and the lords juſtices were deſired, by repeated advices, to be upon their guard; but all theſe intimations produced no effect, they continued in the ſame ſupine indolence and ſecurity. The caſtle of Dublin, by which the capital itſelf was commanded, contained arms for a hundred thouſand men, thirty-five pieces of cannon, and a proportional quantity of ammunition: yet even this important fortreſs, was guarded by no greater force than fifty men. The truth is, there was at this time ſo great a ſimilarity of intereſts between the Engliſh puritans, and the Iriſh catholics, that the lords juſtices, who were enemies to Strafford, did not chuſe to be very active againſt the papiſts. Leiceſter, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, remained in London, and Sir William Parſons and Sir John Borlace, the two chief juſtices, were men of ſlender capacities, and owed the promotion merely to their zeal for the party that now governed every thing. Tranquil from their ignorance and want of experience, they ſlumbered on the very brink of deſtruction.

But the evening before the horrid deſign was to be carried into execution, they were rouſed from their lethargy by the information of O'Connolly, an Iriſh proteſtant, who betrayed the whole ſecret to Parſons. On his information, Mahone, lord Maguire, and about thirty of the conſpirators were ſeized during the night; but More, Plunket, and ſome others, made their eſcape. Mahone diſcovered the project that was formed for a general inſurrection, but his information came too late to prevent the intended effect.

The conſternation which the diſcovery of this conſpiracy occaſioned among the Engliſh in Dublin, was greatly increaſed, when it was known that the catholics in every part of the kingdom had been barbarouſly punctual at the appointed time. It is ſhocking to imagine, much more to deſcribe, the maſſacre that followed. Death was the ſmalleſt penalty thoſe religious ruffians exacted from the unhappy proteſtants. It would have exhauſted the fancy of the moſt ingenious ſavages, practiſed in all the cruel arts of deſtruction, to have inflicted greater inhumanities than the Iriſh rebels perpetrated on men, women, and children, without diſtinction. Theſe barbarities appeared as works of piety to thoſe in whom ſuperſtition had extinguiſhed every natural ſentiment. And while they were inflicting the moſt brutal torments on the unhappy proteſtants, they told them, with a kind of infernal pleaſure, that the miſeries they ſuffered were only the beginning of an eternity of torments they were going to receive in the regions of perdition. Some authors make the number of proteſtants that periſhed in this rebellion amount to one hundred and fifty, or two hundred thouſand; but according to the loweſt computation, above forty thouſand fell by the hands of theſe mercileſs enthuſiaſts.

Had Dublin fallen into the hands of the rebels, all the Engliſh had been exterminated; but the capital being preſerved, a ſmall remnant eſcaped thither, and were preſerved from the ſwords of the catholics.

Charles was in Scotland when he received advice of this rebellion and maſſacre; and appeared ſo ſenſibly affected by it, that he recommended, in the moſt affecting language, the relief of the Iriſh proteſtants to the parliament of Scotland; and was extremely deſirous that ſome part of the Scottiſh army, which had not either yet been diſbanded, or might eaſily be re-aſſembled, might be ſent immediately over to Ireland. The Scots were not at all averſe to this propoſition, and appointed a committee of their parliament to treat with the commons of England; but ſo much time was ſpent in negotiations, that the opportunity of chaſtiſing the rebels, and putting a ſtop to their inhuman ravages, was irretrievably loſt; and the unfortunate proteſtants denied that aſſiſtance from their brethren in England, which even the laws of nature, and the ſacred ties of friendſhip, gave them the higheſt reaſon to expect.

When the heat of ſlaughter was over, and cool reflection returned, the Iriſh rebels trembled for their ſituation, and endeavoured to conceal the blackneſs of their crimes by the moſt horrid impoſture. They pretended they had received authority from the king and queen, eſpecially from the latter, for the horrid murders they had committed; and by this ſpecious aſſertion, though deſtitute of the leaſt foundation in truth, they deceived many of their deluded countrymen. They added, that the ſole reaſon for their taking up arms was to vindicate the royal prerogative, ſo unjuſtly invaded by the puritanical parliaments of England and Scotland. To give ſome colour of truth to this improbable declaration, recourſe was had to artifice and fraud. Sir Phelim O Neale having found a royal patent in the houſe of lord Cranfield, whom he had murdered, tore off the ſeal, and affixed it to a commiſſion he had forged for himſelf.

Senſible of his utter inability to defend his Iriſh ſubjects, and chaſtiſe the rebels for their inhuman murders, Charles was obliged to have recourſe to his Engliſh parliament for that aſſiſtance he was unable to ſupply. He flattered himſelf, that the terror they had always expreſſed againſt popery, a religion that now appeared in all its horrors, would ſufficiently ſecond his exhortations, and procure his proteſtant ſubjects immediate relief. But he was miſtaken; a real zeal for religion was not the object of the parliament; it wanted the ſtimulation of faction or intereſt to produce the deſired effect. Charles was not, however, wanting on his part, to rouze the parliament to revenge the blood of their countrymen. He laid before the commons all the intelligence he had received; and informed them, that the inſurrection was not, in his opinion, the reſult of any raſh and furious enterprize, but of a formed conſpiracy againſt the crown of England. He added, that a cauſe ſo important to national and religious intereſts, required their utmoſt attention, muſt be entered upon immediately, and purſued with vigour.

But he ſoon perceived that the parliament were more deſirous of exalting their own authority on the ruins of the prerogative, than of ſending aſſiſtance to their brethren, though plunged in the very abyſs of diſtreſs. As ſoon as the particulars of this infernal maſſacre arrived, all the privy-counſellors in the neighbourhood of London repaired to the houſe of commons, and laid before the aſſembly all the informations they had received. The dreadful narrative ſeemed to rouze in the breaſts of the members the tender feelings of humanity; and it was immediately reſolved to borrow fifty thouſand pounds from the city, on parliamentary ſecurity. Several committees were appointed to take care of the Iriſh affairs; and the following reſolutions were taken by the houſe:

" That a convenient number of ſhips be provided for guarding the ſea-coaſts of Ireland.

" That ſix thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, be raiſed with all convenient ſpeed, for a preſent expedition into that kingdom.

" That the lord-lieutenant be deſired to preſent to both houſes of parliament the names of ſuch officers as he ſhall think proper to ſend into Ireland, for commanding the forces intended to be tranſported thither.

" That magazines of proviſions be immediately provided at Weſt Cheſter, in order to be ſent over to Dublin, as the occaſions of that kingdom may require.

" That the magazine of arms, ammunition and powder, now in Carliſle, be forthwith ſent over to Knockfergus, in Ireland.

" That it be referred to his majeſty's council to conſider of ſome method of offering rewards to ſuch as ſhall ſignalize themſelves in the Iriſh expedition; of pardoning thoſe rebels in that kingdom who ſhall make their ſubmiſſion in a limited time; and of offering ſums of money as rewards to ſuch as ſhall bring in the heads of the principal rebels.

" That letters be immediately ſent to the juſtices in Ireland, informing them how ſenſible this houſe is of the affairs of that kingdom.

" That the committee of Iriſh affairs conſider how and in what manner this kingdom may make uſe of the friendſhip and aſſiſtance of Scotland in the affairs of Ireland.

" That directions be given for drawing a bill for impreſſing men for this particular ſervice.

But notwithſtanding theſe reſolutions, the preparations were carried on ſo ſlowly, that all the hopes of the Iriſh proteſtants with regard to a ſpeedy aſſiſtance from their brethren in England, vaniſhed. In the mean time, the commons took care to alarm every part of the kingdom with the moſt dreadful apprehenſions of the horrid deſigns and numbers of the papiſts. This gave many of their own friends in the houſe of commons a diſlike to their proceedings; they began to be alarmed at their conduct, and to miſtruſt their deſigns. Capel, member for Hertfordſhire, and a perſon of great integrity, had been very warm in the oppoſition, and as forward as any gentleman in the houſe for removing the real grievances of his country. The ſame may be ſaid of the lords Falkland and Digby, Sir John Culpepper, Mr. Hyde, and many others whoſe concurrence in the meaſures againſt the court had given great credit to the oppoſition. But they now thought the king had gone as far as in prudence, and, perhaps, farther in duty than they could require; and therefore, that all oppoſition ought now to ceaſe. They made no ſecret of theſe ſentiments; but none, except lord Digby, had as yet the courage to break with the popular leaders in the houſe of commons.

It was, however, ſufficiently evident, that the two parties muſt ſoon divide; and the oppoſition took every method in their power to ſtrengthen themſelves againſt the approaching rupture, and to prevent the deſertion of ſo many powerful friends from having any effect in turning againſt them the current of popular favour. Nothing contributed more to this than the continual alarms they artfully ſpread with regard to the deſigns of the papiſts, already ſo much the object of general abhorrence. Accuſtomed, in all their invectives, to join the prelatical party with the catholics, the people immediately ſuppoſed the inſurrection in Ireland to be the reſult of their united counſels: and when they heard that the rebels in that kingdom pleaded the king's commiſſion for all their violences, bigotry, ever credulous and malignant, aſſented, without ſcruple or examination, to that groſs impoſture, and loaded the unhappy prince with the whole enormity of a contrivance ſhocking to humanity. It is, however, at preſent, ſo univerſally allowed that the king had no hand in the Iriſh rebellion, that it would be nothing leſs than offering an affront to the judgment of the reader, to urge any arguments to prove a point that ſtands in need of no elucidation.

The commons, however, took care not to contradict a report that ſeemed ſo favourable to their deſigns. They did not, indeed, pretend to charge the king with this enormous cruelty, but inſinuated that the Iriſh rebellion had been ſecretly planned, and was at that very time fomented by papiſts in great truſt about the perſons of the king and queen. Alarmed at theſe baſe imputations, Charles, to clear himſelf and his conſort from all ſuſpicions, unhappily recommended the ſuppreſſion of the Iriſh rebellion to his parliament. Probably, the popular leaders had foreſeen this, and took care to make uſe of the advantages they had acquired from an act of ſo much imprudence. Under pretence of this acquiſition of truſt, they aſſumed the power of diſpoſing of the royal magazines, and of iſſuing orders for raiſing forces, which till that time had always been underſtood to be lodged in the crown. In ſhort, Charles, by thus injudiciouſly devolving his authority to the parliament, in ſome meaſure put his own ſword into the hands of his ſubjects. Care was taken to publiſh to the whole world, that his majeſty had particularly recommended the preſervation of Ireland to both houſes of parliament; but, at the ſame time, effectual meaſures were purſued to defeat the king's prudent intention of ſending over immediately a body of Scots to ſuppreſs the Iriſh rebels, and to reſtore peace to that miſerable kingdom. They had, indeed, voted, that a conſiderable army ſhould be immediately raiſed for the ſervice of Ireland; but no effectual ſtep was taken for carrying that vote into execution, though the rebellion was now arrived to ſuch a height, as to call for the whole power of England. They, however, carried on the proſecution againſt the papiſts with the utmoſt vigour: five prieſts were executed at one time: the law of nations was violated with regard to foreign ambaſſadors, whom they ſuſpected of harbouring prieſts: all the recuſants of any figure or fortune in England were ſecured; and it was reſolved that all the Iriſh in the inns of court, who refuſed to take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, ſhould be expelled thoſe ſocieties, and rendered incapable of being again admitted. Theſe violent proceedings alarmed the lords, who expreſſed a viſible reluctance to proceed to ſuch extremities. This occaſioned ſeveral ſtrong reſolutions of the commons, ſufficiently indicating their intention of acting without the concurrence of the houſe of peers, if they continued to oppoſe them.

On the twenty-fifth of November, Charles arrived in London from Scotland; and was ſoon informed, that the commons were preparing a remonſtrance on the ſtate of the nation. It ſoon after appeared, and was followed by very important conſequences. It was not addreſſed to the king, but was openly declared to be an appeal to the people. It was a recapitulation of all the wrong meaſures embraced by the king ſince the commencement of his reign: the unſucceſsful expeditions to Cadiz and the iſle of Rhé are mentioned; the ſending ſhips to France for the ſuppreſſion of the Hugonots; the forced loans; the illegal confinement of men for refuſing to obey illegal commands; the violent diſſolution of four parliaments; the arbitrary government that always ſucceeded; the queſtioning, fining, and impriſoning members, for their conduct in the houſe; the levying taxes without conſent of parliament; the introducing ſuperſtitious innovations into the church, without the authority of law: in ſhort, every thing which, either with or without reaſon, had given offence during the courſe of fifteen years, from the acceſſion of the king to the calling of the preſent parliament.

Had Charles been ſtill in the full exerciſe of his authority; had the necks of his people been ſubject to the chariot-wheels of his power; had the deteſtable rod of the ſtar-chamber ſtill hung over the heads of his ſubjects; had the court of high-commiſſion ſtill endeavoured to fetter their conſciences with the cords of iniquity; had all theſe, and a thouſand other oppreſſions, ſtill continued, this famous remonſtrance had been the braveſt and wiſeſt meaſure that any parliament ever purſued, and muſt have gained its authors immortal honours. But as the landmarks of the conſtitution had been now replaced; as Charles had been as liberal in granting as his people had been importunate in aſking; as nothing that the will of heaven could warrant, or the art of man deviſe, was now wanting to the ſecurity of the people; and as no recent violations of the king's conceſſions, or the people's rights, had been ſo much as pretended; it is ſufficiently plain, that this remonſtrance could not be calculated to promote the happineſs and tranquillity of the nation.

It was eaſily perceived, that ſome farther attacks on the prerogative were intended, and that the remonſtrance was intended as a ſignal to the whole party to exert all their powers. It is, therefore, no wonder that it met with very ſtrong oppoſition in the houſe of commons. For more than fourteen hours the debate was ſupported with remarkable warmth and acrimony; and the remonſtrance would poſſibly have miſcarried, had not the uncommon length of the debate wearied out many of the king's party, which principally conſiſted of perſons advanced in years; for it was at laſt carried by a ſmall majority of eleven.

When Charles returned from Scotland, he was received at London with ſhouts and acclamations of the people. This was not at all agreeable to the leaders of the commons; and one of the principal deſigns of the remonſtrance undoubtedly was to efface thoſe favourable ſentiments which the citizens were inclined to entertain of the king, and to reconcile them to the commons. It was ſoon after preſented to his majeſty, together with a petition, requeſting, that the biſhops might be deprived of their votes in parliament, that ſeveral alterations might be made in the eſtabliſhed worſhip, and that the king would remove all evil counſellors from his preſence. They did not, indeed, name particulars; that was impoſſible; becauſe all places of power, profit, and confidence, about his perſon, and in his councils, were filled by men recommended by the commons, and in whom they placed an entire confidence. But the words Religion, Popery, Purity, Malignance, with the unmeaning ſounds of Arminianiſm, and others of a ſimilar kind, reconciled every doubt, and removed every difficulty.

During the king's abſence, the commons affected ſuch terror, that they procured a guard from the earl of Eſſex; but on his return, Eſſex ſurrendered his commiſſion, as general on the ſouth of Trent; and Charles had the reſolution to order the guard to be diſcontinued; adding, that his royal preſence ought to be a ſufficient ſafety to his parliament.

Soon after the remonſtrance of the commons appeared, Charles diſperſed an anſwer to it, though he lay under very great diſadvantages in the conteſt. The only reaſons on which he could apologize for his former conduct, were of ſuch a nature, that it would have been imprudent to have urged them at this dangerous criſis. To have blamed the paſt conduct of the parliament, would have been conſidered as an affront to the nation; and had he aſſerted the prerogative of ſupplying, by his own authority, the deficiencies in government, ariſing chiefly from the obſtinacy of parliaments, he would have increaſed the clamours which already reſounded in every part of the kingdom. He therefore contented himſelf with obſerving in general, that even during the period ſo much and ſo bitterly complained of, the people enjoyed a large ſhare of happineſs, even when compared with the moſt fortunate periods of Engliſh hiſtory. He made the warmeſt profeſſions of ſincerity in the reformed religion; promiſed indulgence to tender conſciences, with regard to the ceremonies of the church; enumerated his great conceſſions to natural liberty; and blamed the infamous libels every where diſperſed againſt his government and the national religion. “ You have thrown out (ſaid he)
“ general reproaches with regard to pernicious councils;
“ but aſk your own conſciences, have I protected
“ any miniſter from parliamentary juſtice?
“ Have I retained any unpopular ſervant, or conferred “ offices on any one who enjoyed not, in a high “ degree, the eſteem of the public? But if, notwithſtanding
“ this, any malignant party ſhall take heart,
“ and be willing to ſacrifice the peace and happineſs
“ of their country to their own ſiniſter ends and ambition, “ under whatever pretence of religion and “ conſcience; if they ſhall endeavour to leſſen my “ reputation and intereſt, and to weaken my lawful “ power and authority; if they ſhall attempt, by “ diſcountenancing the preſent laws, to looſen the “ bands of government, that all diſorder and confuſion “ may break in upon us; I doubt not but “ God, in his own good time, will diſcover them to “ me; and that the wiſdom and courage of my high “ court of parliament will join with me in their ſuppreſſion
“ and puniſhment.”

This anſwer, though the king was obliged to conceal the ſtrongeſt reaſons for his conduct ſo greatly complained of in the beginning of his reign, and to confine himſelf within the limits of civility towards ſubjects who had tranſgreſſed all the bounds of regard and good manners, had great effect on the more wiſe and prudent part of the nation. Even the leaders of the commons themſelves were alarmed, and began to fear, that unleſs they could remove the biſhops from the houſe of lords, they ſhould never ſucceed in the plan they had projected. They had already attempted this without ſucceſs, though thirteen of the biſhops were impeached of high-treaſon. Nor could the committee, with all their art, draw up any charge againſt Laud that would affect either his life or fortune. They, however, renewed their attempts againſt the biſhops with great violence, but without ſucceſs; the peers thought it highly unreaſonable to condemn them before they were proved to be guilty. Exaſperated at this, and other inſtances of oppoſition they had lately met with from the upper houſe, particularly by their inſiſting on taking ten thouſand Scots into their pay, the commons appointed a committee “ to prepare heads for a conference “ with the lords, and to acquaint them what “ bills this houſe hath paſſed, and ſent up to their “ lordſhips, which much concerned the ſafety of the “ kingdom, but have had no conſent of their lordſhips
“ to them; and that this houſe being the repreſentative “ body of the whole kingdom, and their “ lordſhips being but particular perſons, and coming “ to the parliament in a particular capacity; that if “ they ſhall not be pleaſed to conſent to the paſſing
“ of thoſe acts, and others, neceſſary for the preſervation
“ and ſafety of the kingdom, that then
“ this houſe, together with ſuch of the lords as are “ more ſenſible of the ſafety of the kingdom, may “ join together, and repreſent the ſame to his majeſty.
“ They are likewiſe to take into conſideration “ ſome methods for guarding the towns of Hull and “ Newcaſtle; and they are for this ſervice to withdraw “ immediately into the inner court of wards.”

It is very difficult, even in this enlightened age, to diſcover the real intention of this ſtrange reſolution. But tares, in this ſeaſon, grew among the wheat, and a fanatical fury often obſcured the reaſoning faculty. The public had now acquired a great compaſs of knowledge with regard to the Engliſh conſtitution; nor were there wanting many great men, who were perſuaded that ſeveral abuſes had crept into the conſtitution, and could plead no better right to their continuance than preſcription. This, in effect, was all the plea the biſhops had to offer for their ſeats in parliament, and which ſtood on the ſame foundation with thoſe of the temporal lords. The commons, perhaps, ſaw how difficult it would be to deprive the biſhops of their votes, without affecting the privileges of all the peers; and knew no better expedient for ſucceeding, than by intimidating the lords into their meaſures, by aſſerting a new doctrine, which they afterwards carried into execution: that the original conſtitution knew no diſtinct houſe of parliament, becauſe in theſe early times all the members ſat together in one houſe, and enjoyed the ſame powers. If, therefore, the conſtitution ſhould revert to its firſt principles, it would be found that the majority in both houſes was concluſive upon the whole, by which the majority of the lords alone loſt their negative upon the commons. Bold and abſurd as this doctrine ſeemed, the lords knew the ſpirit of the commons too well to exaſperate them: they paſſed no violent votes on that head, though the reſolution carried with it a much ſtronger violation of the privileges of the peers, than Charles, during his whole reign, had ever committed on thoſe of the commons.

But this violence of the lower houſe produced a different effect from what it was intended; it operated ſtrongly in favour of the king. They ſoon perceived it; and in order to avert the conſequences, encouraged the lower claſs of people, and perſons incapable of judging for themſelves, to preſent petitions to the houſe againſt the biſhops votes in parliament. One was brought up by the London apprentices. But the principal object of their attention was that of wreſting from Charles all his power over the military. He had offered to raiſe ten thouſand volunteers for the ſervice of Ireland; but the propoſal was rejected under pretence that they were unwilling to truſt the king with ſo large a military force; though the moſt dreadful accounts and pathetic petitions were every day received from the proteſtants in Ireland. The Scots thought themſelves trifled with, and preſented a paper to the commons, inſiſting upon a categorical anſwer. It was in vain for Charles to endeavour to quicken the motions of the commons by repeated meſſages; the time was fruitleſsly ſpent in voting money, that was never paid; in making reſolutions, that were never executed; in conferences that had no concluſion, and in debates that had no meaning.

Though the tumultuous aſſemblies of the lower claſs of people ſtill continued about Weſtminſter-hall, and the two houſes of parliament, yet the popularity of Charles daily increaſed among the better ſort. The common-council of London not only diſclaimed publicly their having any ſhare in them, but alſo preſented ſeveral dutiful addreſſes to the king, beſeeching him to continue his reſidence at Whitehall, and aſſuring him of protection againſt any who ſhould dare to offer him the leaſt inſult. The Scots alſo, affected to ſee their king ill uſed by others, however contumaciouſly they had treated him themſelves, informed him of the correſpondence carried on between the chief covenanters and the principal leaders of the houſe of commons, both before, and during the continuance of the late invaſion.

Unfortunately Charles miſtook this gleam of compaſſion for the return of luſtre to his reign. He began therefore to act with more ſpirit and vigour. He diſcharged Belfour from his government of the Tower, and appointed Lansford in his place, notwithſtanding the warm declarations made againſt it by the commons. But Charles wanted courage to ſupport his nomination; he ſoon after diſmiſſed Lansford, and gave the command to Sir John Biron. On the eleventh of December, while the houſe was engaged in warm debates with regard to biſhops voting in parliament, the king iſſued a proclamation for paying obedience to the laws for eſtabliſhing the true religion in England; and the next day he iſſued another, commanding all abſent members to attend their duty in parliament. Theſe two proclamations, publiſhed at ſuch a juncture, gave the commons room to believe, that Charles was meditating ſome dreadful blow, and their apprehenſions were increaſed when they ſaw Falkland, Culpepper, Hyde, and ſevera others of the wiſeſt and moſt popular members in the houſe, divide againſt them.

The commons had paſſed a bill for impreſſing men for the ſervice of Ireland; in the preamble to which the king's power of impreſſing, though always practiſed by former princes, was declared illegal, as contrary to the liberty of the ſubject. While this bill was debating by the peers, Charles, unwilling to ſubmit to ſo conſiderable a diminution of his power, came to the upper houſe, where he told the lords he was very willing to paſs the bill without the preamble, by which means, he obſerved, that ill-timed queſtion with regard to the prerogative would, for the preſent, be avoided, and the pretenſions of each party remain entire. Both houſes took fire at this precipitate meaſure; and immediately declared it to be a high breach of privilege for the king to take notice of any bill before it was preſented to him for the royal aſſent. The king ſoon perceived his error, and made an apology to the parliament.

A. D. 1642. Weary at laſt of making conceſſions, which inſtead of acquiring returns of gratitude, tended only to increaſe the demands of the commons, Charles unfortunately determined to alter his conduct. He aſcribed the inſolence of the commons in a great meaſure to his own indolence and facility, and was unhappily confirmed in this opinion by the queen and ladies of the court; who repreſented to him, that if he exerted the vigour, and diſplayed the majeſty of a monarch, the daring uſurpations of his ſubjects would ſhrink before him. Had the king continued in tranquillity, and cautiouſly eluded, for a little longer, the violence of the tempeſt now raiſed againſt him, the leaders of the oppoſition would ſoon have loſt their popularity, and alſo their majority in the houſe, and the king, in the end, would have certainly prevailed; at leaſt ſo far as to have preſerved entire the ancient laws and conſtitution of England. But Charles had taken his meaſures, and loſt all the advantages he had gained over the oppoſition by a ſingle ſtroke.

Perſuaded that he was now capable of giving the final blow to the popularity of the diſcontented leaders, by producing undoubted evidences of their having invited the Scots to invade England, the king ordered the attorney-general to impeach them of high treaſon, at the bar of the houſe of lords. He obeyed his majeſty's commands, and preſented at the clerk's table in the houſe of peers, the following accuſations.

"Articles of high-treaſon, and other miſdemeanors againſt the lord Kimbolton, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, Mr. John Pym, Mr. John Hambden, and Mr. William Strode.

"1. That they have traiterouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental laws and government of England, to deprive the king of his royal authority, and to place in ſubjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power over the lives, liberties, and eſtates of his majeſty's ſubjects.

"2. That they have traiterouſly endeavoured, by many foul aſperſions upon his majeſty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majeſty odious to them.

"3. That they have endeavoured to draw his majeſty's late army to diſobedience to his majeſty's command, and to ſide with them in their traiterous deſigns.

"4. That they have traiterouſly invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade his majeſty's kingdom of England.

"5. That they have traiterouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the rights and very being of parliaments.

"6. That in order to complete their traiterous deſigns, they have endeavoured, ſo far as in them lay, by force and terror, to compel the parliament to join with them in their traiterous deſigns; and to that end had actually raiſed and countenanced tumults againſt the king and parliament.

"7. And that they have traiterouſly conſpired to levy, and actually have levied war againſt the king."

After delivering theſe articles of impeachment, the attorney demanded, in behalf of his maſter, that the houſe ſhould appoint a committee of ſecrecy for examining the king's witneſſes; that he ſhould have liberty to add or alter as he pleaſed, and that the perſons he had impeached ſhould be ſecured.

Theſe precipitate meaſures of the king aſtoniſhed the nation. It was madneſs they ſaid to ſuppoſe that the houſe of lords, however willing, would be permitted by the populace to paſs a ſentence which muſt totally ſubdue the lower houſe, and put an end to all their undertakings. But their aſtoniſhment was increaſed that a ſerjeant at arms had been ſent to the houſe of commons, and in his majeſty's name, demanded the perſons of the five accuſed members; but was ſent back without any poſitive anſwer. In the mean time meſſengers were employed to ſearch for, and arreſt them. Their trunks, chambers and ſtudies were ſealed up and locked. Theſe proceedings being reported to the commons, they came to the following reſolutions.

"That the ſerjeant at arms be ordered to apprehend and bring hither as delinquents the perſons who have ſealed up the trunks, or doors, or ſeized the keys of Mr. Pym, Mr. Hollis, or any other member of this houſe; and that the ſerjeant ſhall have power to break open the doors, and to break the ſeals off from the trunks.

"That if any perſon whatſoever ſhall come to the lodgings of any members of this houſe and there offer to ſeal the trunks, doors, or papers of any members, or to ſeize upon their perſons, that ſuch members ſhall require the aid of the conſtable, to keep ſuch perſons in ſafe cuſtody, till this houſe give farther order; and this houſe doth declare, that if any perſon whatſoever ſhall offer to arreſt or detain the perſon of any member without firſt acquainting this houſe therewith, and receiving farther order, that it is lawful for ſuch member, or any perſon aſſiſting him, him to ſtand upon his or their guard of defence, and to make reſiſtance according to the proteſtation taken to defend the privilege of parliament.

Irritated at theſe proceedings, the king reſolved to go the next day in perſon to the houſe of commons, and demand the impeached members. But this deſign was not kept ſufficiently ſecret to anſwer his majeſty's intention. The counteſs of Carliſle, ſiſter to the earl of Northumberland, diſcovered it, and ſent intelligence to the five members, ſo that they had time to withdraw a few minutes before the king entered. Charles was attended with his ordinary retinue, amounting to about two hundred men, armed in their uſual manner, ſome with halberts and ſome with walking ſwords. He left his attendants in the lobby, and the door being immediately thrown open, he entered the houſe and advanced to the ſpeaker's chair, all the members ſtanding up to receive him. Charles looked carefully round the houſe, but not ſeeing the accuſed members, he made the following ſpeech to the commons.

“ Gentlemen,

“ I am ſorry for this occaſion of coming to you.
“ Yeſterday I ſent a ſerjeant at arms to demand ſome,
“ who, by my order, were accuſed of high-treaſon.
“ Inſtead of obedience, I received a meſſage. I muſt
“ here declare to you, that though no king that ever
“ was in England could be more careful of your privileges
“ than I ſhall be, yet, in caſes of treaſon, no “ perſon has privilege. Therefore am I come to tell “ you, that I muſt have theſe men wherefoever I can “ find them. Well, ſince I ſee all the birds are “ flown, I do expect you will ſend them to me as “ ſoon as they return. But I aſſure you, on the word
“ of a king, I never did intend any force, but ſhall “ proceed againſt them in a fair and legal way; for
“ I never want any other. And now, ſince I ſee I “ cannot do what I came for, I think this no unfit ‘ occaſion to repeat what I have ſaid formerly, that “ whatever I have done in favour, and to the good
“ of my ſubjects, I do intend to maintain it.”

It is impoſſible to deſcribe the diſorder into which this imprudent action of Charles threw the houſe; and even before the king reached the door, ſome of the members called aloud, “ Privilege, Privilege.” Immediately after his departure, the houſe adjourned till the next day; and the five accuſed members retired into the city, where they were ſure of protection. The guards at the gates were immediately doubled, and the greater part of the citizens continued the whole night under arms.

Early the next morning, Charles diſpatched a meſſage to the lord mayor, ordering him to call a common council immediately. His commands were obeyed; and about ten o'clock, the king, attended only by three or four lords, repaired to Guildhall, and made the following ſpeech to the common-council.

“ Gentlemen,

“ I am come to demand ſuch perſons as I have “ already accuſed of high-treaſon, and do believe “ are concealed in the city. I hope no good man will “ keep them from me; their offences are treaſons,
“ and miſdemeanors of a very high nature. I deſire
“ your loving aſſiſtance herein, that they may be “ brought to a legal trial.

“ And whereas there are divers ſuſpicions raiſed,
“ that I am a favourer of the popiſh religion, I do “ profeſs, in the name of a king, that I did, and “ ever will, to the utmoſt of my power, be a proſecutor
“ of all ſuch as ſhall any ways oppoſe the laws
“ and ſtatutes of this kingdom, either papiſts or “ ſeparatiſts; and not only ſo, but I will maintain “ and defend that true proteſtant religion which my “ father profeſſed, and will continue in it during life.”

The lord-mayor and aldermen behaved with very great civility, and attended him to Temple-Bar; but he could not eſcape the contumelious language of the populace; the cry of “ privilege of parliament” reſounded from all quarters; and one of the rabble, more inſolent and more daring than the reſt, advanced almoſt to the coach door, and called aloud, “ To your tents, O Iſrael;” words uſed by the rebellious Iſraelites, when they abandoned their king Rehoboam.

The king had hardly left the city, before a committee of the parliament met at Merchant-Taylor's Hall, doubtleſs to inſinuate, that they did not think themſelves ſafe without the walls of London. This committee was charged with the affairs of Ireland, which, notwithſtanding the dreadful ſituation of the proteſtants in that kingdom, had been hitherto neglected. A declaration was, ſoon after their meeting, drawn up, with regard to the late attempt on the privilege of parliament, and afterwards confirmed by the houſe. It was conceived in the following terms:

“ Whereas his majeſty, in his royal perſon, came “ yeſterday to the houſe of commons, with a great “ multitude of men, armed in a warlike manner,
“ with halberts, ſwords, and piſtols, who came up
“ to the very door of this houſe, and placed themſelves
“ there, and in other places and paſſages near “ to the houſe, to the great terror and diſturbance of “ the members thereof then ſitting, and, according “ to their duty, in an agreeable and orderly manner, “ treating of the great affairs of both kingdoms of “ England and Ireland; and his majeſty having “ placed himſelf in the ſpeaker's chair, did demand
“ the perſons of divers members of that houſe to “ be delivered to him.

“ It is this day declared by the houſe of commons, “ that the ſame is a high breach of the rights and “ liberties of parliament, and inconſiſtent with the “ liberty and freedom thereof; and therefore the “ houſe doth conceive, that they cannot, with ſafety
“ of their own perſons, or the indemnities of the “ rights and privileges of parliament, ſit here any “ longer, without a full vindication of ſo high a “ breach of privilege, and a ſufficient guard wherein “ they may confide, for which both houſes jointly,
“ and this houſe by itſelf, have been humble ſuitors
“ to his majeſty, and cannot as yet obtain.”

This imprudent action of Charles ſet the nation in a flame. Nothing was now talked of but declarations, votes and remonſtrances, againſt the late flagrant breach of privilege; and ſeveral addreſſes were preſented to the king, requeſting him to name the perſons who had adviſed him to purſue ſuch alarming meaſures. Petitions were alſo ſent up from different parts of the kingdom; and, among others, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, repreſented to his majeſty, “ That trade is decayed, to the ruin of the proteſtant religion, and the lives and liberties of the ſubjects, by the deſigns of papiſts; more particularly, by their fomenting the Iriſh rebellion, by changing the conſtable of the Tower, by fortifying Whitehall, and his majeſty's late invaſion of the houſe of commons. They therefore pray, that by the parliament's advice, the proteſtants of Ireland may be relieved; the Tower put into the hands of perſons of truſt; a guard appointed for the ſafety of the parliament; and that the five members may not be reſtrained, nor proceeded againſt, but by the privilege of parliament.”

Charles thought proper to return an anſwer to this petition; in which he obſerved, “ that it was impoſſible for him to expreſs a greater ſenſe of Ireland than he had done; that, merely to ſatisfy the city, he had removed a very worthy perſon from his command in the Tower; and that the late tumults had rendered it abſolutely neceſſary for him to fortify Whitehall for the ſecurity of his own perſon: that his going to the houſe of commons was to apprehend thoſe five members for high-treaſon, to which the privilege of parliament could not extend; but that he never intended to proceed againſt them any otherwiſe than by legal methods only.”

During the continuance of the tumults of the populace in the neighbourhood of Whitehall, ſeveral reduced officers and young gentlemen from the inns of court offered their ſervice to his majeſty, to protect his perſon, in this time of danger and diſorder, from the inſolence of the multitude. Frequent ſkirmiſhes paſſed between them and the populace, which ſometimes ended in blood. Theſe gentlemen, by way of reproach, called the rabble "Roundheads," on account of their wearing their hair cropt ſhort; and the others gave them the name of "Cavaliers." Thus the two factions, which had ſo long divided the nation, were now diſtinguiſhed by party names, under which they might rendezvous, and ſignalize that mutual hatred they had conceived for each other.

This did not at all tend to quiet the people. Exaſperated by oppoſition, and inflamed by the artful harangues of their leaders, the popular tumults every day increaſed; and the king thinking himſelf and family in danger, determined to remove from Whitehall, and take up his reſidence at Hampton-Court. His friends, who were beſt acquainted with the nature of popular inſurrections, particularly thoſe of the lower claſs in London, exerted all their influence to prevail upon the king to lay aſide his deſign. They obſerved, that a little firmneſs would be ſufficient to diſſipate the ſtorm raiſed by an artful faction: that if the king would remain in his palace, and his friends return to their ſeats in parliament, the giddy populace muſt ſoon ſpend their rage, and the affairs of government reſume their natural order. But all their reaſonings were in vain: Charles, after diſmiſſing the guard that attended at Whitehall, removed, with his whole family, to Hampton-court, on the tenth of January.

Two days after, he ſent a meſſage to the commons, in which he propoſed, that they ſhould agree upon a legal method, by which he might carry on his proſecution againſt the members, leſt farther miſunderſtandings happen with regard to privileges. In their anſwer, they deſired the king to lay the grounds of his accuſation before the houſe, pretending that they muſt firſt judge whether it would be proper to abandon their members to a legal trial. In a ſubſequent meſſage, Charles informed them, that he was willing, for the preſent, to wave all proſecution; and, by another, he offered pardon to the members; offered to concur in any law that ſhould acquit or ſecure them; offered any reparation for the breach of privileges, of which he acknowledged they had reaſon to complain. But the commons were determined to accept of no ſatisfaction, unleſs he would name the perſons who adviſed him to purſue that illegal method; a condition which they well knew he muſt refuſe.

But though the commons were deaf to all the offers made them by his majeſty, the diſtreſs to which himſelf and his family were reduced, excited the compaſſion of the wiſer part of the nation. They were alarmed at the furious proceedings of the commons: no perſon ſeemed to be ſafe, as it could not be known what they would, or what they would not vote to be treaſon. It ſoon appeared that they were determined to ſtrike a terror into every perſon who ſhould venture either to ſpeak his mind, or to do his duty. They allowed the attorney-general but one night to prepare for juſtifying his conduct with regard to his accuſing the five members; and after many captious queſtions, which he could not anſwer without breaking his oath of ſecrecy, they voted him guilty of a high crime, and addreſſed the lords to ſecure his perſon till they could bring him to an open trial. It appears, however, that the true deſign of theſe proceedings againſt the attorney-general was to diſcover the names of the witneſſes whom the king could produce againſt the accuſed members; but in this they were diſappointed by the attorney's firmneſs. Had they ſucceeded in their intention, it might, perhaps, have proved ſtill more favourable to Charles, as it is more than probable, that he had both his information and proofs from the Scots, who would then have been obliged to declare in his favour; and they ſeem themſelves to have been apprehenſive of this, for the Scottiſh parliament ordered their commiſſioners to mediate a peace between the king and his parliament.

The accuſed members, who had hitherto affected to remain in the city, now returned in triumph to Weſtminſter. The Thames was covered with boats and other veſſels, mounted with ſmall pieces of ordnance, and prepared for battle. Skippon, whom the commons, by their own authority, had appointed major-general of the city militia, conducted the members, at the head of a tumultuous army, to Weſtminſter. When the populace, both by land and water, paſſed by Whitehall, they aſked, in a very inſulting manner, "What was become of the king and his cavaliers? and whether they were fled?"

It was now ſufficiently evident, from the proceedings of both parties, that the ſword alone could decide the conteſt. Charles, however, was ſtill deſirous of averting the horrors of a civil war; and accordingly ſent a meſſage to the parliament, deſiring, "that they would digeſt into one body all the grievances of the kingdom, and to ſend them to him, promiſing his favourable aſſent to thoſe means which ſhould be thought moſt effectual for redreſs." But this requeſt was refuſed: the commons pretended they were too much engaged in matters of far greater conſequence, to allow them time ſufficient for that purpoſe.

Theſe conceſſions were ſurely ſufficient to have quieted the apprehenſions of men who were deſirous of peace. But the leaders of the party had ſo invincible a diſtruſt of Charles, that they put no confidence in his promiſes; and were perſuaded that nothing leſs than wreſting all power from his hand would be ſufficient for their ſafety. He, however, ſtood at preſent fairer in the eye of the public than they. He had taken away, by his meſſages and conceſſions, all the points controverted between them. New ones were therefore ſtarted. They deſired him to put the Tower of London, all the forts, and the whole militia of the kingdom, into ſuch hands as they could truſt. Charles agreed to give the command of the Tower to Sir John Coniers, inſtead of Sir John Biron, though the latter had done nothing to merit his diſcharge; but he abſolutely refuſed their requeſt with regard to the militia.

Charles had removed to Windſor, and began to make diſpoſitions againſt providing for events which he now ſaw no proſpect of avoiding. He perceived that the intention of the parliament was to ſecure the magazines in the Tower of London, Hull, and Portſmouth; and even their addreſſes to him had hinted ſomething of that kind. He had given private orders to the duke of Newcaſtle to ſecure Hull; but the deſign being diſcovered by the treachery of ſome about his perſon, the houſe of commons inſiſted on his attending his duty in parliament; and ordered Sir John Hotham, a gentleman of great eſtate in that neighbourhood, to take care of the place for the parliament. At the ſame time, they paſſed a vote, that the governor of Portſmouth ſhould admit no perſon into that fortreſs, nor ſuffer any part of the ordnance or military ſtores to be diſpoſed of, without an order from the king ſignified by both houſes of parliament.

Theſe proceedings were by many conſidered as a diſſolution of the regal government; eſpecially as the commons had taken upon themſelves, not only to diſpoſe of the militia and trained bands of the capital, but to name lord lieutenants of ſeveral counties, and even the captains that were appointed to command the ſhips of war. The duke of Richmond was highly exaſperated at theſe proceedings, and made a motion in the houſe of peers to adjourn for ſix months; but his motion was over-ruled, he was ſlightly cenſured for his conduct, and a proteſt was entered by thoſe lords who were friends to the commons, becauſe, as they pretended, his puniſhment was not adequate to his crime. So dangerous was it to oppoſe the current of popular fury, whatever unconſtitutional methods were made uſe of to effect it!

Richmond was a nobleman of great ſpirit, nearly related to the king, and in poſſeſſion of a very large eſtate. The leaders of the commons therefore thought it neceſſary to point him out as an object of popular reſentment. They procured an atteſted copy of the proteſt, and reſolved, “ that the houſe had ſufficient cauſe to accuſe him of being one of the malignant party, and an ill counſellor to his majeſty.” Sir Ralph Hopton alſo felt the weight of their reſentment. He had been one of the moſt ſtrenuous declaimers againſt the real grievances of his country; but was perſuaded the conceſſions made by the king were more than ſufficient for reforming the government, and placing the liberties of the ſubject on a baſis not to be ſhaken: He therefore oppoſed the proceedings of the houſe with great force of reaſon, and ſometimes with indecent expreſſions, ſimilar to thoſe that had been uſed by many of the leaders againſt their ſovereign. But the very words that had been applauded when uttered againſt majeſty, were cenſured when they were directed againſt the leaders of the commons. His ſpeeches were declared malignant, and he himſelf committed to the Tower.

Charles ſaw the proceedings of the commons with aſtoniſhment, and began to be anxious for the perſonal ſafety of his wife and children, whom he loved with the moſt tender affection. It was therefore reſolved to ſend them to Holland, where they would be beyond the reach of their inveterate enemies. His eldeſt daughter, the princeſs Mary, had been lately married to the prince of Orange, who now greatly intereſted himſelf in favour of a monarch reduced to the greateſt diſtreſs. Charles accordingly repaired to Dover, where they embarked for the continent. While the king was employed in providing for the ſafety of his family, the commons preſented to him a bill for diſpoſing of the militia, or rather putting it entirely into the hands of the parliament. The lower houſe had been ſo accuſtomed to inſult the perſonal character of the king, that the very preambles to their bills preſented to him for the royal aſſent, were generally conceived in the moſt contumelious language. This with regard to the militia was remarkable; it was as follows: “ Whereas there has been “ of late a moſt dangerous and deſperate deſign
“ upon the houſe of commons, which we have juſt “ cauſe to believe an effect of the bloody counſels of “ papiſts and other ill affected perſons, who have “ already raiſed a rebellion in the kingdom of Ire“ land. And whereas by reaſon of many diſcoveries, “ we cannot but fear they will proceed, not only to “ ſtir up the like rebellions and inſurrections in this “ kingdom of England; but alſo to back them with “ forces from abroad, &c.”

Charles was weary of making conceſſions, and now determined to change his conduct. He did not, however, abſolutely refuſe the royal aſſent, but replied, that he was not ſufficiently at leiſure to conſider a matter of ſuch importance, and therefore they muſt wait till his return for a poſitive anſwer. Alarmed at this delay, the parliament inſtantly diſpatched another meſſage to the king, preſſing him for an immediate anſwer. They repreſented that when dangers and diſtractions prevailed, a delay was of equal conſequence with a denial; that it was their duty to ſee a meaſure ſo neceſſary to the ſafety of the public carried into execution; that the people in many parts of the kingdom had applied to them for that purpoſe, in the moſt earneſt manner; and that in ſome places, the inhabitants were ſo alarmed at their preſent dangers, that they had exerted their own authority in preparing for their defence.

Charles had already paſſed a bill for depriving the biſhops of their votes in parliament, and hoped his compliance in that particular would have prevented their making any farther demands. He was miſtaken; and now perceived that the commons were not to be ſatisfied, while any power remained in the crown. The king did not, however, think proper to give the commons an abſolute denial; but deſired that if the military authority was in any part defective, it might be conferred on the crown; promiſing at the ſame time, that he would immediately give commiſſions to ſuch perſons only as the parliament ſhould name. But this was far from ſatisfying the commons. They replied, that the dangers of the kingdom were ſo preſſing as to admit of no longer delay; and that if his majeſty refuſed to ſatisfy his people, they would do it by their own authority. But though they had recourſe to menaces, where they found perſuaſions had no effect, they did not chuſe as yet to pull off the maſk, but pretended the greateſt ſorrow at his majeſty's leaving the capital, and earneſtly preſſed him to return, and fix his reſidence at Whitehall. The king was aſtoniſhed at this meſſage, and made the following anſwer to the committee who delivered it.

“ I am ſo much amazed at this meſſage, that I “ know not what to anſwer. You ſpeak of jealou“ ſies and fears! Lay your hands upon your hearts,
“ and aſk yourſelves, whether I may not likewiſe be “ diſturbed with fears and jealouſies; and if ſo, I “ aſſure you, this meſſage has nothing leſſened them.

“ As to the militia, I thought ſo much of it be“ fore I gave that anſwer, and am ſo much aſſured, “ that the anſwer is agreeable to what in juſtice or “ reaſon you can aſk, or I in honour grant, that I
“ ſhall not alter it in any point.

“ For my reſidence near you, I wiſh it might be “ ſafe and honourable, and that I had no cauſe to “ abſent myſelf from Whitehall: aſk yourſelves
“ whether I have not.

“ What would you have? Have I violated your “ laws? Have I denied to paſs any bill for the eaſe
“ and ſecurity of my ſubjects? I do not aſk what “ you have done for me.

“ Have any of my people been tranſported with “ fears and apprehenſions? I offer as free and gene“ ral a pardon as you yourſelves can deviſe. All this “ conſidered, there is a judgment of heaven upon
“ this nation, if theſe diſtractions continue.

“ God ſo deal with me and mine as all my thoughts
“ and intentions are upright for the maintenance of
“ of the proteſtant religion, and for the obſervance
“ and preſervation of the laws; and I hope God
“ will bleſs and aſſiſt thoſe laws for my preſerva-
“ tion.”

The commons declared that the king's anſwer was a refuſal; that thoſe whoſe counſels he followed were enemies to the ſtate; that if he perſiſted in his reſolution, he would expoſe the ſafety of the three kingdoms to the utmoſt danger, unleſs the parliament provided ſome remedy; and that they approved the conduct of thoſe who had already put themſelves in a poſture of defence.

But notwithſtanding this they were greatly alarmed, eſpecially when it was known that his majeſty intended to viſit the northern parts of his kingdom, and to make the city of York the place of his reſidence. As ſoon as the king reached Huntingdon, he ſent a meſſage to the commons, upbraiding them for their conduct with regard to the affairs of Ireland, and informing them, “ that he expected an equal tenderneſs in them with regard to his majeſty's known unqueſtionable privileges, among which he is ſure it is a fundamental one, that his ſubjects cannot be obliged to obey any act, order, or injunction to which his majeſty hath not given his conſent; and therefore he thinks it neceſſary to publiſh, that he expects, and hereby requires obedience from all his loving ſubjects to the laws eſtabliſhed, and that they preſume not, on any pretence of order or ordinance, to which his majeſty is no party, concerning the militia, or any other things to do or execute what is not warranted by thoſe laws; his majeſty being reſolved to keep the laws himſelf, and to require obedience to them from all his ſubjects.

“ And his majeſty recommends to his parliament, what he had before required, that they ſhould compoſe and digeſt as ſoon as poſſible, ſuch acts as they ſhall think fit, for the preſent and future eſtabliſhment of their privileges, and the free and quiet enjoyment of their eſtates and fortunes, the liberties of their perſons, the ſecurity of the true religion now profeſſed in the church of England; the maintaining of his majeſty's regal and juſt authority, and the ſettling of his revenue; his majeſty being very deſirous to take all fitting and juſt ways; which may beget a happy underſtanding between him and his parliament, in which he conceives his greateſt power and riches conſiſt."

This meſſage threw the houſe into a new ferment. They reſolved to inſiſt upon their former reſolutions concerning the militia; they voted ſevere penalties againſt all who had adviſed the king to give that anſwer; and reſolved upon the queſtion, "that when the lords and commons in parliament, which is the ſupreme court of judicature in the kingdom, ſhall declare what the law of the land is; to have this not only queſtioned and controverted, but contradicted, is a high breach of the privilege of parliament."

Charles was now leſs afraid of their inſolence. He had reached York; and finding the people faithful to him, he determined firmly to oppoſe the attempts of the parliament with regard to the militia. On the contrary, the commons, reſolved to ſupport the power they had uſurped, in contempt of all laws, appointed lord lieutenants to the different counties, gave them the command of the militia, the garriſons, and all the forts in the kingdom; obliging them to obey his majeſty's orders ſignified to them by both houſes; that is, the orders of parliament, ſignified in the king's name, with an intent to dethrone him. Manifeſtos, the forerunners of civil wars, were publiſhed on both ſides. Thoſe of the king carried with them a force of evidence, which was only oppoſed by invectives. A detail of the ſacrifices and conceſſions he had made, and of the violences and inſults which had been their only reward, gave an appearance of juſtice to his cauſe. Confiding in the ſtrength of his arguments, the king was deſirous that the declarations of the parliament might be diſtributed with his own; while the parliament was very induſtrious to ſuppreſs the king's papers. Lord Falkland, ſecretary of ſtate, and Mr. Hyde, afterwards lord Clarendon, were the authors of the papers in behalf of the king. In theſe the Engliſh conſtitution was defined with great preciſion; the three ſpecies of government, the monarchical, the ariſtocratical, and the democratical, were diſtinguiſhed; and the government of England ſhewn to be a compound of the whole, each tempering the other.

The parliament could not anſwer the facts brought by the king, to convince the world that he had done all that could be required of him to give them ſatiſfaction. But they pretended, that the king, even while he was making his conceſſions, was contriving the means to deſtroy them. Had they been able to prove this aſſertion; had they been able to have brought any other evidences for it than a few frivolous facts, many improbable ſuſpicions, and more groundleſs fears; could they have ſhewn any recent inſtances of the king's violating his conceſſions, or even of appearing backward to grant any thing farther, if they ſhould be found conſiſtent with the ſafety and conſtitution of the kingdom; they might have been juſtified in ſome part of their harſh treatment of majeſty. But nothing of that kind appears, even after the ſtrained conſtructions which the two houſes put upon the leaſt indiſcreet action or word of every imprudent friend of the king; and the journals of the houſe at this time are filled with inquiries, proceedings, and ſeverities, which would diſgrace not only the barbarous, but the irrational part of mankind. Charles had denied them nothing but the militia, which the conſtitution had confeſſedly lodged in his hands, and which they endeavoured to wreſt from him, under pretence of extraordinary dangers. It may here be obſerved, that the very queſtion returned againſt themſelves, which, but a few months before, they had ſo ſolemnly determined againſt Charles. He had attempted to levy ſhip-money, and other illegal taxes, under pretence of danger, of which he was the ſole judge. The parliament denied that this danger was ſufficiently imminent to warrant an arbitrary exerciſe of power; and therefore they voted his proceedings to be illegal. In the ſame manner, the parliament now demanded the militia, under pretence of extraordinary and imminent dangers. The king refuſed to gratify them, becauſe he did not apprehend theſe dangers to be ſufficiently alarming, as to warrant them to require from him a ſurrender of the real part of regal authority, which had been veſted in him by the conſtitution.

The arms of all the forces levied againſt the Scots had been depoſited in the magazine of Hull; and Sir John Hotham, the governor, had accepted a commiſſion from the parliament, but was thought to be no enemy either to the church or monarchy. Theſe circumſtances induced Charles to believe, that if he proceeded in perſon to the gates of that town, before the commencement of hoſtilities, the governor, overawed by his preſence, would admit him with his ordinary retinue; by which means he might eaſily become maſter of ſo important a place. He was, however, miſtaken. Hotham had received ſtrict orders from the parliament to be upon his guard; ſo that when Charles appeared before the place, the governor ſent him a very reſpectful meſſage, deſiring his majeſty not to approach nearer to the town; but the king continuing to advance, he ordered the bridge to be drawn up, and the garriſon to appear on the walls in a poſture of reſiſtance. When Charles was near enough for his voice to be heard by the garriſon, he called for Hotham, and demanded entrance; which the governor refuſed, declaring, that he had received his truſt from the parliament. Charles was in no condition to attack the place; and therefore repeated his demand, offering to reduce his train to twenty perſons. This was alſo denied; and the king perceiving that the governor was determined to defend the place, he retired, after proclaiming Sir John Hotham a traitor by two heralds at arms. He afterwards complained to the parliament of the diſobedience of the governor; but was ſo far from obtaining redreſs, that they juſtified the action.

The increaſing inclinations of the inhabitants of Yorkſhire for the royal cauſe, greatly alarmed the parliament. They had raiſed a guard of ſix hundred men for his perſon, and ſeemed determined to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power. The parliament, though they had already levied a guard for themſelves, had attempted to ſeize the whole military power, the navy, and all the forts of the kingdom, yet they immediately voted, "that the king, ſeduced "by wicked counſels, intended to make war againſt "his parliament, who, in all their conſultations and "actions, had propoſed no other end but the care of "his kingdoms, and the performance of all duty "and loyalty to his perſon: that this attempt was a "breach of the truſt repoſed in him by his people, "contrary to his oath, and tending to a diſſolution "of the government; and that whoever ſhould aſſiſt "him in ſuch a war, were traitors by the fundamental laws of the kingdom."

Every thing now haſtened towards a criſis. The parliament appointed the earl of Eſſex general of their forces; and the ardour was ſo great among the people in the capital, that no leſs than four thouſand men inliſted in one day. At the ſame time, the parliament voted a declaration, which they required every member to ſubſcribe, that they would live and die with their general. Orders were iſſued for bringing in loans of money, in order to maintain the forces levied to defend the parliament: and the zeal of the people was, in this particular, more remarkable than in their enliſting under Eſſex; for during ten days, the throng was ſo great, that the perſons appointed to receive the offerings of the populace had neither time nor room ſufficient for the purpoſe:

many of them were therefore obliged to carry back their treaſures, till a more convenient opportunity, when the commiſſioners would be at leiſure to receive them.

But though the parliament was thus ſupported by the voluntary offerings of the people, they were totally eclipſed by the ſplendid appearance of the nobility, who flocked to the king at York. Above forty peers of the higheſt rank in the kingdom attended upon Charles, among whom was the lord-keeper Littleton; while the houſe of lords at Weſtminſter ſeldom conſiſted of more than ſixteen members, and even ſome of theſe were of the royal party, and conſtantly oppoſed the meaſures of the commons. The king iſſued commiſſions of array all over the kingdom, but the execution of them was voted treaſonable by the parliament. They were, however, greatly aſtoniſhed and alarmed, when they perceived ſo large and reſpectable a part of the kingdom had declared for the king. This produced a new ſet of propoſitions, on which they were willing to come to an agreement. Their demands were as follows:

“ 1. That the officers of the crown, the miniſters of ſtate, and the governors of all the ports and forts of the kingdom, ſhould be choſen and approved of by the two houſes, or by the council in the intervals of parliament. 2. That no places ſhall be given for life; but that thoſe on whom they ſhould be beſtowed, may hold them no longer than they diſcharge their duty well. 3. That the two houſes, and the council, ſhall name the perſon unto whom the government and education of the king's children ſhall be committed. 4. That no marriage ſhall be concluded, or treated, for any of the king's children, without the conſent of parliament. 5. That the laws againſt jeſuits, and other ſecular prieſts, and in general againſt all papiſts, ſhall be ſtrictly put in execution, without any toleration or diſpenſation whatſoever. 6. That the popiſh lords be expelled from the houſe of peers, and their children taken from them, in order to their being brought up in the proteſtant religion. 7. That ſuch a reformation be made of the liturgy and church government, as both houſes of parliament, with the advice of divines, ſhall adviſe. 8. That the king ſhall reſt ſatisfied with the method taken by the parliament for ſettling the militia. 9. That a ſtrict alliance be entered into with the ſtates of the United Provinces, and other neighbouring princes and ſtates of the proteſtant religion, againſt the pope and his adherents. 10. That the five impeached members be cleared by act of parliament, and reſtored to their rights, that future parliaments may be ſecured from the conſequence of that bad example. 11. That peers made hereafter be reſtrained from ſitting and voting in parliament, without the conſent of both houſes. 12. That the military forces now attending the king be diſcharged. 13. That the lords and others of the privy-council, and others in offices and employments, be removed, except ſuch only as ſhall be approved by both houſes of parliament; and that the perſons made choice of to fill their places and employments, may be approved of by both houſes of parliament; and that the privy counſellors ſhall take an oath for the due execution of their places, in ſuch form as ſhall be approved of by the parliament. 14. That the great affairs of the kingdom ſhall not be concluded nor tranſacted by the advice of private men, or by any unknown or unſworn counſellors; but that ſuch matters as concern the public, and are proper for the high court of parliament, ſhall be debated, reſolved, and tranſacted only in parliament, and ſuch as ſhall preſume to do any thing to the contrary, ſhall be reſerved to the cenſure and judgment of parliament; and ſuch other matters of ſtate as are proper for the privy-council, ſhall be debated and concluded by ſuch of the nobility and others as ſhall, from time to time, be choſen to fill that board, by approbation of both houſes of parliament; and that no public act, concerning the affairs of the kingdom, which is proper for the privy-council, ſhall be eſteemed of any validity, as proceeding from the royal authority, unleſs it be done with the advice and conſent of the major part of the council, atteſted under their hands; that the council ſhall be limited to a certain number, not exceeding twenty-five, nor under fifteen; and if any counſellor's place happen to be vacant, it ſhall not be ſupplied without the aſſent of the major part of the council, which choice ſhall be confirmed at the next ſitting of parliament, or elſe be void. 15. That the lord high-ſteward of England, the lord high conſtable, the lord chancellor, or keeper of the great ſeal, the lord treaſurer, the lord privy-ſeal, the earl marſhal, the lord admiral, the warden of the cinque ports, the chief governor of Ireland, the chancellor of the exchequer, the maſter of the wards, the ſeveral ſecretaries of ſtate, the two chief juſtices and chief baron, ſhall always be choſen with the approbation of both houſes of parliament; and in the intervals of parliament, by the aſſent of the major part of the council, in the ſame manner as is before expreſſed in the choice of counſellors. 16. That ſuch members of either houſe of parliament, as, during this preſent parliament, have been put out of any place or office, ſhall either be reſtored, or otherwiſe have ſatisfaction upon the petition of ſuch houſe of which they are members. 17. That all privy-counſellors and judges ſhall take an oath, the form whereof ſhall be agreed upon and ſettled by act of parliament, for maintaining the petition of right, and of certain ſtatutes made by this parliament, which ſhall be mentioned by both houſes; and that an inquiry of all breaches and violations of thoſe laws ſhall be given in charge by the juſtices of the king's-bench every term, and by the judges of aſſize in their circuits, and juſtices of the peace at the ſeſſions, to be preſented and puniſhed according to law. 18. That the juſtice of parliament ſhall paſs upon all delinquents, whether they be within the kingdom or in foreign parts; and that all perſons cited by either houſe of parliament ſhall appear, and abide the cenſure of parliament. 19. That a general pardon ſhall be granted, with ſuch exceptions as ſhall be adviſed by both houſes of parliament.”

It could not be expected that theſe demands would ever be complied with. No ſubjects had ever talked in ſo high a ſtrain ſince Henry III. was in the power of the Mountforts. They had, indeed, ſo changed every part of the conſtitution, that it ſcarce retained any veſtige of its former ſtate, except the name of a king at the head of a republic. “ Should I grant theſe demands,” ſaid the king in his reply, “ I may be waited on bareheaded, I may have my hand kiſſed, the title of majeſty may be continued to me, and The king's authority, ſignified by both houſes, may be ſtill the ſtyle of your commands; I may have ſwords and maces carried before me, and pleaſe myſelf with the ſight of a crown and ſceptre, (though even theſe twigs would not long flouriſh, when the ſtock upon which they grew was dead): but as to true and real power, I ſhould remain but the outſide, but the picture, but the ſign of a king.”

Nor did Charles content himſelf with refuſing the demands of the parliament. He retorted their accuſations with great force; and, in a very ſpirited anſwer, exhibited his charge againſt the commons. “ If the parliament (ſaid he) had unſeaſonably vented ſuch propoſitions, as the wiſdom and modeſty of their predeceſſors never thought fit to offer to any of our progenitors; nor we in honour, or regard to our legal authority, which God hath intruſted us with for the good of our people, could receive without juſt indignation, and ſuch many of their propoſitions are, their hopes would ſoon have been blaſted, and thoſe perſons to whom offices, honours, power, and commands were deſigned, by ſuch ill-timing their buſineſs, would have failed of their expectation, not without a brand upon the attempt. Therefore, before any thing of this nature ſhould appear, they have (certainly with great wiſdom in the conduct of it) thought fit to remove a troubleſome rub in their way, I mean, the law; and, in order to undermine the very foundations of it, a new power hath been aſſumed, to interpret and declare laws, without us, by extemporary votes, without any cauſe judicially before either houſe, (which is, in effect, the ſame thing as to make laws without us) orders and ordinances made only by both houſes, were preſſed upon the people as laws, and their obedience required to them.

"Their next ſtep was to erect an upſtart power without us, in whom, and only in whom, the laws of this realm have placed that power, to command the militia. And to promote this deſign, they have wreſted from us our magazine and town of Hull, and abetted Sir John Hotham in his barefaced treaſon. They have prepared and directed to the people unprecedented invectives againſt our government, to weaken, as much as lay in their power, our juſt authority, and due eſteem among them: they have, as injuriouſly as preſumptively, (though we conceive by this time impudence itſelf is aſhamed of it) attempted to caſt upon us aſperſions of an unheard of nature, as if we had favoured a rebellion in our own bowels. They have likewiſe broached a new doctrine, that we are obliged to paſs all laws that ſhall be offered to us by both houſes, however our judgment and conſcience ſhall be unſatisfied with them; a point of policy as proper for their preſent buſineſs, as deſtructive to all our rights of parliament; and ſo, with ſtrange ſhameleſsneſs, will forget a clauſe in law, ſtill in force, made in the ſecond year of Henry V. wherein both houſes of parliament acknowledge, that it is of the king's regality to grant or deny ſuch of their petitions as pleaſeth himſelf. They have interpreted our neceſſary guard, legally aſſembled, for the defence of us, and of our children's perſons, againſt a traitor in open rebellion, to be with intent to levy war againſt our parliament, the thought whereof our very ſoul abbors, thereby to render us odious to our people.

"They have ſo awed our good ſubjects with purſuivants, long chargeable attendance, heavy cenſures, and illegal impriſonments, that few of them durſt offer to preſent their tenderneſs of our ſufferings, their own juſt grievances, and their ſenſe of thoſe violations of the law, the birthright of every ſubject of this kingdom, though in an humble petition directed to both houſes; and if any did, it was ſtifled in the birth, called ſedition, and burnt by the hands of the common hangman.

"They have reſtrained the attendance of our ordinary houſhold ſervants, and ſeized upon thoſe ſmall ſums of money which our credit had provided to buy us bread, with injunctions that none ſhould be ſuffered to be returned or conveyed to us at York, or to any of our peers or ſervants with us; ſo that, in effect, they have blocked us up in that county.

"They have filled the ears of the people with the noiſe of fears and jealouſies, though taken up upon truſt, tales of ſkippers, ſalt fleets, and ſuch like, in order by which alarms to prepare them to receive ſuch impreſſions as might beſt advance this deſign when it ſhould be brought to maturity; and now it ſeems they think we are ſufficiently prepared for theſe bitter pills. We are in a handſome poſture to receive theſe humble deſires, which probably are intended to make way for a ſuperfetation of a yet higher nature, if we had not made this diſcovery, for they do not tell us this is all. In them we muſt obſerve, that theſe contrivers, the better to advance their true ends, diſguiſed, as much as poſſible, their intentions, with a mixture of ſome things really to be approved by every honeſt man; and ſome which were already granted by us; all which are artfully blended with thoſe other things of their main deſign of ambition and private intereſt; in hopes that, at the firſt view, every eye may not ſo clearly diſcern them in their proper colours."

The ſword of civil diſcord was now drawn, and both parties made preparations for deciding by it the dreadful conteſt. Hambden, Whitlocke, Mainyard, Grimſtone, St. John, and Selden, accepted of the parliament's commiſſions, under the ordinance of militia; but the great weight of landed intereſt declared for the king. Charles was furniſhed by his queen with money, which ſhe had borrowed upon her jewels; but the parliament had a much ſurer reſource in public credit, upon which great ſums were raiſed by way of loan; and ſmall ſkirmiſhes paſſed between the royal and parliamentary parties in different parts of England.

The houſe of peers had hitherto ſhewn a ſpirit becoming ſo auguſt a body. But the greater number of the lords were now with the king; ſome of them were reduced by the authority of Eſſex, and the leading members of the commons; ſome were intimidated by the danger to which their perſons were expoſed by the inſolence of the populace; ſome by the threats of the commons to annihilate their order; ſome were influenced by reſentment, and ſome by principle; ſo that upon the whole there was not a party ſufficient, in their houſe, to ſtem the dreadful torrent that was now ready to ruſh upon the conſtitution. The venerable earl of Briſtol, diſdaining the ignoble motives of reſentment for the uſuage he had met with from the king, in a very pathetic, but ineffectual ſpeech, expoſed the impending calamities of England, and exhorted them to conclude a peace with the king on honourable terms. But his advice, however prudent and ſalutary, produced not the deſired effect; the parliament were determined to puſh the advantage they enjoyed over the king to the utmoſt extremity. Hollis, by order of the houſe of commons, demanded at the bar of the lords, the names of thoſe peers who had refuſed to comply with the ordinance for the militia, and made an ungenerous uſe of the diſcovery. The names of thoſe as were known to be well affected to the king were publiſhed, by which means they were inſulted by the populace, and could not attend their duty in parliament without being expoſed to the utmoſt danger; while thoſe who had the courage to join his majeſty were branded with the opprobrious title of "betrayers of the liberties of their country." The commons likewiſe voted, that all horſes ſent to the north, without an order from the parliament, ſhould be ſeized and ſecured. At the ſame time they voted nine of the lords incapable of ever again ſitting in parliament.

The laſt reſolution produced a ſurprizing alacrity among the nobility now with the king. They ſigned a paper, "that they would obey no orders or commands whatever, but ſuch as were warranted by the known laws of the land; that they would defend the king's perſon, crown, and dignity, together with his majeſty's juſt and legal prerogative, againſt all perſons and power whatſoever; that they would defend the true proteſtant religion, eſtabliſhed by the law of the land, the lawful liberties of the ſubject of England, and the juſt privileges of his majeſty, and both houſes of parliament; and that they would obey no rule, order, or ordinance whatſoever, that had not the royal aſſent." Animated by theſe aſſurances of ſupport, Charles having collected a few forces, advanced to the ſouthward; and, on his arrival at Nottingham, he erected his royal ſtandard, the open ſignal of diſcord and civil war thoughout the nation.

Never perhaps was quarrel more unequal than that between the two contending parties; when Charles erected his ſtandard, almoſt every advantage lay againſt the royal cauſe. The parliament were maſters of the royal revenues, the fleet, the ſea-ports, and all the magazines of arms and amunition. The king was deſtitute of almoſt every advantage. He had neither arms nor amunition except what belonged to the trained bands in the counties favourable to his intereſt, and a ſmall ſupply ſent him by his queen from Holland. It is therefore no wonder that the parliament entertained the moſt ſovereign contempt for all the efforts they imagined the king was capable of making in ſupport of his prerogative; many imagined that he would not even attempt to make any reſiſtance, but muſt at laſt yeild to the pretenſions, however enormous, of the two houſes. To this perſuaſion Charles owed his ſafety. Even after his ſtandard was erected, the danger of a civil war was not, in general, apprehended; nor was it imagined he would have the imprudence to engage his implacable enemies, and render his own condition ſtill more deſperate, by oppoſing a force ſo greatly ſuperior to his own. Theſe hopes were confirmed by the low condition of his army, if indeed his few forces deſerved that name, when he appeared at Nottingham. His train of artillery, though far from being large, he had been obliged to leave behind him at York, for want of horſes to draw it. The troops of the parliament, conſiſting of above ſix thouſand men, well armed and well appointed, lay at Northampton, under the command of the earl of Eſſex, within a few days march of him, and ſeemed to threaten him with inevitable deſtruction.

Charles himſelf was alarmed at his melancholy ſituation, and determined to make one more effort for concluding a peace with his parliament. He accordingly ſent a meſſage to the two houſes, by the earls of Southampton and Dorſet, Sir John Culpepper, and Sir William Uvedale. He propoſed to open a negotiation immediately, in order to conclude a treaty of peace. He aſſured them, that nothing on his part ſhould be wanting to advance the true proteſtant religion, oppoſe popery and ſuperſtition, ſecure the laws of the kingdom, confirm all the juſt power and privileges of parliament, and render both king and people happy. “ Bring with you (added he)
“ as firm reſolutions to do your duty, and let all our “ people join with us in our prayers to Almighty
“ God, for his bleſſing upon this work.”

Charles then, in a very pathetic manner, diſclaimed all intention of injuring the liberties of his people; and laid the guilt at the door of the parliament, if they refuſed his offers. But the commons, inſtead of joining with the king in his propoſals for reſtoring the public tranquillity, reproached him with having erected his royal ſtandard; and refuſed to open any negotiation, unleſs he would recall all his proclamations publiſhed againſt them. Even this anſwer did not exaſperate Charles to make uſe of any indecent expreſſions; he offered to take down his ſtandard, and recall his proclamations, provided they would recall the papers they had publiſhed againſt him and his friends. This was abſolutely refuſed; they would agree to no terms, unleſs he would immediately take down his ſtandard, and recall his proclamations, without their acting a reciprocal part. But this negotiation, unſucceſsful as it was, did Charles the greateſt ſervice. The parliament had treated the king's meſſengers with the utmoſt indignity; they had not even paid the common civility to their perſons. At the ſame time, they ordered all their officers to repair to their reſpective poſts immediately, and publiſhed the following declaration to vindicate their conduct.

“ Whereas his majeſty, in his meſſage, requires,
“ that the parliament ſhould revoke their declara“ tions againſt ſuch perſons as had aſſiſted his ma-
“ jeſty in this unnatural war againſt his kingdom; “ it is this day ordered and declared by the lords and “ commons, that the arms which they have been “ forced to take up, for the preſervation of the par“ liament, the religion, the laws, and the liberties of “ the kingdom, ſhall not be laid down till his majeſty “ ſhall withdraw his protection from ſuch perſons as “ have been voted by both houſes to be delinquents,
“ and ſhall leave them to the juſtice of the parlia“ ment, to be proceeded with according to their de“ merits; to the end, that both this and ſucceeding “ generations may take warning, how they incur the “ like heinous crimes; and alſo to the end that thoſe “ great charges and damages, wherewith all the com“ monwealth have been burthened ſince his majeſty's “ departure from the parliament, may be borne by “ the delinquents and other malignant and diſaffected
“ perſons; and that all his majeſty's good and well-“ affected ſubjects, who by loan of monies, or other“ wiſe at their charge, have aſſiſted the common“ wealth, or ſhall in like manner hereafter aſſiſt the “ commonwealth in time of extreme danger, may be “ repaid all ſums of money lent by them for thoſe “ purpoſes, out of the eſtates of the ſaid delinquents, “ and of the malignant and diſaffected party in the “ kingdom.”

This declaration, together with ſeveral other papers that paſſed between the king and his parliament, turned the tide of popular affection ſtrongly in favour of the king. This was perceived by the parliament, and rendered them cautious of offering violence to their ſovereign; and, perhaps, to this ſingle conſideration the king owed his preſent ſafety, which was now conſidered as ſo precarious, that Sir Jacob Aſtley, whom the king had appointed major-general of his army, told him, that he could not give him aſſurance but he might be taken out of his bed, ſhould the rebels make a briſk attempt for that purpoſe. It was therefore determined to leave Nottingham; and the king accordingly began his march for Shrewſbury, the moſt convenient town in England for the rendezvous of his army. Every hour during his march added conſiderable acceſſions to his ſtrength, the people flocking from all parts to join the royal ſtandard. On his arrival at Wellington, Charles ordered his army to be drawn up, ranged in ſeveral diviſions under proper officers, and his military orders to be publiſhed at the head of each regiment. This being finiſhed, Charles addreſſed his army in the following terms:

“ Gentlemen,

“ You have heard thoſe orders read; it is your “ part, in your ſeveral places, to obſerve them exactly.
“ The time cannot be long before we come to action,
“ therefore you have the more reaſon to be careful;
“ and I muſt tell you, I ſhall be very ſevere in the “ puniſhing of thoſe, of what condition ſoever, who “ ſhall tranſgreſs theſe inſtructions. I cannot ſuſpect
“ your courage and reſolution; your conſcience and “ your loyalty have brought you hither, to fight for “ your religion, your king, and the laws of the land.
“ You ſhall meet with no enemies but traitors, moſt
“ of them browniſts, anabaptiſts, and atheiſts; ſuch “ who deſire to deſtroy both church and ſtate, and “ who have already condemned you to ruin for being “ loyal to us. That you may ſee what uſe I mean to “ make of your valour, if it pleaſe God to bleſs us
“ with ſucceſs, I have thought fit to publiſh my re-
“ ſolution to you, in a proteſtation, which, when you “ have heard me make, you will believe you cannot “ fight in a better quarrel; in which I promiſe to “ live and die with you.

“ I do promiſe, in the preſence of Almighty God,
“ and as I hope for his bleſſing and protection, that “ I will, to the utmoſt of my power, defend and “ maintain the true reformed proteſtant religion, “ eſtabliſhed in the church of England; and by the “ grace of God, in the ſame will live and die.

“ I deſire to govern by all the known laws of the “ land; and that the liberty and property of the “ ſubject may be preſerved by them with the ſame “ care as my own juſt rights. And if it pleaſe God,
“ by his bleſſing upon this army, raiſed for my ne-
“ ceſſary defence, to preſerve me from the preſent “ rebellion; I do ſolemnly and faithfully promiſe,
“ in the ſight of God, to maintain the juſt privileges

“ and freedom of parliament, and to govern to the utmoſt of my power by the known laws of the kingdom; and particularly to obſerve inviolably the laws to which I have given my conſent in this parliament. In the mean while, if this time of war, and the great neceſſity to which I am now driven to, beget any violation of law, I hope it will be imputed, by God and man, to the authors of this war, and not to me, who have ſo earneſtly laboured for the preſervation of the peace of the kingdom.

“ When I willingly fail in theſe particulars, I ſhall expect no aid or relief from man, nor protection from above. But in this reſolution, I hope for the chearful aſſiſtance of all good men, and am confident of the bleſſing of heaven.”

This ſpeech and proteſtation produced amazing effects. The whole army was animated with freſh ſpirits; they promiſed to live and die with their ſovereign; they now conſidered him not only as the father, but the guardian of his country. His cauſe became ſo popular, that the town of Shrewſbury declared in his favour, by which he acquired a communication with all North Wales, and other places beyond the Severn. The king had now learned in the ſchool of adverſity, the uſeful leſſons of complaiſance, affability, and other popular arts, which he practiſed with infinite ſucceſs. He erected a mint at Shrewſbury, and the nobility and gentry of his party poured in money and plate with as much zeal, tho' not in ſuch large quantities, as the Londoners had done to the parliament. He had ſtooped to many other meaſures, which nothing but his neceſſities could juſtify, for raiſing money, and his troops were as regularly paid, as thoſe of the parliament, and as little burthenſome to the country. The people were charmed to ſee the alteration made in the king, with regard to his addreſs and behaviour. In all his excurſions and marches, he repeated to his people his tenderneſs for their laws and liberties, and his reſolution rather to die than infringe them. This behaviour gained the hearts of the populace; they flocked to his ſtandard, and his army now amounted to ten thouſand men.

At the firſt appearance of the commotions in England, the two princes Rupert and Maurice, ſons to the unfortunate Palatine, offered their ſervice to the king, and the former now commanded a body of horſe, which had been detached to Worceſter, in order to watch the motions of Eſſex, who was then on his march towards that city. Rupert had hardly reached Worceſter, before he ſaw a body of the enemy's cavalry approaching the gates. He immediately attacked them with the utmoſt fury. The diſpute was very obſtinate, till colonel Sandys, who commanded the parliament's detachment, being mortally wounded, they gave way, and were totally routed by the royal party. This action, though inconſiderable in itſelf, tended greatly to raiſe the ſpirits of the king's forces, and acquired prince Rupert a conſiderable ſhare of reputation.

It was now determined to march to meet the parliament's army, and if poſſible decide the quarrel by a general battle. The royal forces were commanded by the earl of Lindeſey, who had ſerved many years in the Low Countries with great applauſe: prince Rupert commanded the horſe; Sir Jacob Aſtley the foot: Sir Arthur Aſton the dragoons: Sir John Heydon the artillery: and lord Bernard Stuart a troop of guards. Lord Clarendon tells that the eſtate and revenues of this ſingle troop, was at leaſt equal to that of all the lords and commons, who remained in the parliament at Weſtminſter. Nor will this appear improbable when it is conſidered, that both houſes were now remarkably thin; the commons often voting matters of the greateſt moment, when not more than forty-five or fifty members ſat in the houſe.

The king left Shrewſbury on the twelfth of October, and in order to bring on a battle with the army of Eſſex, purſued his march towards the capital with great expedition. This alarmed the parliament ſo much, that they ſent repeated expreſſes to their general, to ſtop the progreſs of the royal army. Eſſex obeyed with reluctance. He was very unwilling to begin a war, which threatened the deſtruction of his country; but at laſt determined to obey the orders of his maſters. Though the two armies were not above twenty miles diſtant when the king left Shrewſbury, yet neither had intelligence of their approach, till they were within ſix miles of one another.

The king's army lay in the neighbourhood of Banbury, and that of the parliament at Keinton, in Warwickſhire. In the night of the twenty-ſecond of October, Charles received intelligence from prince Rupert, that the enemy was approaching, and early the next morning the king repaired to the top of Edge-hill, fully reſolved to give them battle, and ſhewed himſelf as ready to expoſe his perſon as any private officer in the whole army. As both parties ſeemed equally forward for an engagement, the forenoon was ſpent in drawing up both armies, in which the king was the leſs expeditious, as ſome of his foot were not yet come up, and his ſituation was ſuch, that he could not be attacked without great diſadvantage.

The right wing of the parliament's army was compoſed of a conſiderable body of troops, which lined ſome hedges, and two bodies of horſe, drawn up near the town of Keinton. The left wing was compoſed of a ſtrong body of foot and a thouſand horſe, commanded by Ramſay, a Scotch officer; and the center, which was deſigned as a body of reſerve, by Sir William Balfour, under the earl of Bedford, general of the horſe. Eſſex himſelf reſolved to charge in perſon at the head of a regiment of foot.

The right wing of the royal army was commanded by prince Rupert, the left by general Wilmot, and the center by Sir John Biron. The king intended to have ſcattered ſome proclamations among the parliament army, offering his pardon to ſuch officers and ſoldiers as ſhould join his forces; but this prudent meaſure was neglected; and the old earl of Lindeſey was ſo affected at the heat and animoſity of the young officers, that he declared, “ he did not look upon himſelf as a general, but would die as a private colonel, with a pike in his hand, at the head of his own regiment.”

Sir Faithful Forteſcue, who had levied a body of horſe to ſerve againſt the rebels in Ireland, had been obliged to ſerve in the parliamentary army, and was now poſted in the left wing; but he no ſooner perceived prince Rupert advancing, than ordering his troop to diſcharge their piſtols in the ground, he joined the royal detachment. This incident, together with the furious charge of the prince, ſtruck the whole left wing with conſternation; they gave a very diſorderly fire, and were broken, routed, and driven off the field by prince Rupert, who purſued them above two miles, forgetting that he carried with him the flower of the royal army, and thereby expoſed the king and the remaining part of his forces to the moſt imminent danger. The right wing of the parliament's army had no better ſucceſs. Chaſed from their ground by lord Wilmot and Sir Robert Aſton, they alſo took to flight. The action had hitherto been chiefly among the horſe, the foot on both ſides were pretty entire, and fought with great courage. The forces of Eſſex made their chief efforts againſt the king's ſtandard, which was carried by Sir Edward Verney, and bravely defended by the royaliſts; but their principal attack was againſt the diviſion commanded by Sir William Stapleton. It was here the error committed in drawing up the king's forces was perceived. For though the body of reſerve under Sir John Biron had now advanced and joined in the attack againſt the artillery of Eſſex, and were on the point of taking it; yet Balfour's reſerve was ſtill entire, and advanced to the relief of the artillery juſt at the time when Stapleton was going to abandon it.

Had prince Rupert, or general Wilmot, returned at this critical moment, the victory had been complete, and perhaps a final period put to the civil war; but both theſe commanders were at a great diſtance, and the diſpute was now very unfavourable to the king. For Balfour's diviſion charged him in flank and rear with ſo much fury, that the earl of Lindeſey, fighting on foot at the head of his regiment, was mortally wounded, the royal ſtandard was taken, and ſome of the king's cannon nailed up.

Charles, attended by his two ſons, was, during this furious engagement, in the center of his own foot, but a little removed from the hotteſt part of the ſervice; but upon Balfour's breaking in, his perſon was in the moſt imminent danger, and he ſent the two princes back to the hill, which they reached with ſome difficulty. The duke of Richmond, the earl of Dorſet, and ſeveral other noblemen, kept by his perſon; and it was here that Charles had the firſt opportunity of ſhewing his perſonal courage. For drawing his ſword, and advancing to attack the enemy, his ſoldiers were ſo animated by the example of their king, that they returned to the charge with more fury than ever; the royal ſtandard was retaken, and the enemy in their turn obliged to give ground. Rupert at the head of his horſe, now returned from the unſeaſonable purſuit, and the battle aſſumed all the appearances of beginning afreſh. The prince ſaw with aſtoniſhment, that every thihg bore the appearance of a defeat inſtead of a victory; but his troops were ſatisfied with carnage, and could not be prevailed upon to renew the attack. The two armies faced each other for ſome time, but neither of them ſhewed courage ſufficient for a new battle. All night they lay upon their arms; and the next morning perceived themſelves in ſight of each other; but neither general nor ſoldier ſhewed any diſpoſition to renew the fight. Eſſex firſt drew off his forces, and retired to Warwick. The king returned to his former quarters. The loſs was greateſt on the ſide of the parliament; and near five thouſand men were found dead on the field of battle. On the king's ſide the earl of Lindeſey, lord Aubigny, and Sir Edmund Verney, the king's ſtandard-bearer, were ſlain in the action; and the lord Willoughby, Sir Thomas Lunsford, Sir William Vavaſor, and Sir Edward Stradling taken priſoners. Among the parliamentarians, the lord St. John, and colonel Eſſex, one of their beſt officers, were killed, and Sir William Eſſex, father to the colonel of the ſame name, was taken priſoner. The coach of the earl of Eſſex, with ſome of his papers and his wagggons, fell into the hands of the royaliſts.

Such was the iſſue of the battle of Keinton or Edge-hill, the firſt action of conſequence that happened between the contending parties; and though neither could boaſt of any remarkable advantage, it occaſioned a general conſternation in the kingdom. A civil war was known in England only by reading or tradition; the inhabitants were not yet habituated to conſider one another as enemies in the field, nor to think it their duty to plunge their ſwords in the breaſts of their friends, their neighbours, their relations, their brothers, and their parents; for ſuch are the horrors entailed upon civil war. Both parties therefore ſhuddered at dipping their hands in the blood of their countrymen; but when the firſt dreadful eſſay was over, all ties of nature and duty were forgotten; all relations, however tender, diſappeared; they wantoned in floods of cruelty, and ſported upon the wrecks of their country. The diſpoſitions of both parties were ſo violent, that it was almoſt impoſſible for any man to remain neuter, without expoſing himſelf and his family to inevitable ruin. Many had joined the parliament merely from a received opinion, that the king was utterly incapable of making even a ſhew of reſiſtance, and muſt be obliged, without effuſion of blood, to comply with their demands. But when they ſaw him joined by thoſe, who had lately appeared at the head of the moſt forward oppoſers of whatever was uſurped, or even doubtful in the prerogative; when they ſaw him ſurrounded by a ſplendid court, and retain all the forms of laws and juſtice; when they ſaw the nobleſt blood in England offered to be ſhed in his defence, and his own perſon expoſed at the head of the army with as much appearance of reſolution, as that of a common ſoldier of fortune, they began to imagine they had been too haſty in their choice, and to repent of their precipitate engagements: but they had gone too far to retract, and were obliged to ſtand or fall by the party they had embraced; thinking that the king, whatever profeſſions he might make, never could pardon the provocations he had received.

When prince Rupert firſt attacked the left wing of the parliamentary army, and put the whole diviſion to flight, ſome of fugitives flying to a great diſtance from the field of battle, carried the news of a total defeat, and ſtruck the whole city and parliament with terror and diſmay. Even Lenthall, the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, adviſed the members to be early in their application to the king for a general peace. A few days after this panic was diſſipated by the arrival of a more juſt account: and then the parliament pretended to have gained a complete victory. But this was flying from one extreme to the other; for though the principal advantage the king could boaſt was that of the ſurrender of Banbury, yet he was undoubtedly the victor, becauſe the earl of Eſſex firſt drew off his army, and left him maſter of the field of battle.

Charles, after refreſhing his troops, and placing a garriſon in Banbury, continued his march to Oxford, the only place in his dominions at his devotion. But as the weather ſtill continued favourable, the royal army was not ſuffered to remain idle. One Martin had been appointed governor of Reading by the parliament, who had conſiderably augmented the fortifications of the town. A party of horſe was therefore detached to make an attempt upon the place, which was thought of great importance. At their approach both the governor and garriſon were ſeized with a panic, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation to London, ſo that the royal detachment entered the town without oppoſition. This remarkable ſucceſs induced Charles to march his whole army to Reading; and to form the deſign of approaching the capital itſelf.

Alarmed at the king's progreſs, and the conſequences that might enſue if his army ſhould reach the city, the commons ſent an expreſs to the earl of Eſſex, ordering him to march with the utmoſt expedition to London. He obeyed the order, and was received by both houſes as a conqueror; preſented by the parliament with five thouſand pounds, the houſe declaring, "that they were infinitely obliged to the ſaid earl, for the great and acceptable ſervice he had done the commonwealth, and that they ſhould be ready on all occaſions to expreſs the due ſenſe they have of his merit, by aſſiſting and protecting him, and all others under his command, with their lives and fortunes, to the utmoſt of their power; that this ſhould remain upon record in both houſes of parliament for a mark of honour to his perſon, name and family, and for a monument of his ſingular virtue to all poſterity."

But notwithſtanding this compliment to Eſſex, ſeveral of the moſt powerful perſons in the parliament were diſſatisfied with the great powers with which he was inveſted; and were very deſirous of preventing any farther effuſion of human blood, if an equitable accommodation could be obtained. They were perſuaded that the king would have no objection to enter into a treaty with the parliament, if he could procure the ſafety of his friends, who had in a manner been proſcribed by both houſes. But in this perhaps they were miſtaken. All the priſons, ſeveral of the halls, and other large houſes in London, were filled with thoſe the parliament termed delinquents, among whom were ſome of the aldermen both above and below the chair, and many of the richeſt citizens. Theſe commitments had been made with all the inſolence of power; and the goods, money, and houſes of the delinquents, had been ſeized, in as arbitrary a manner as any act of authority ever committed by the king. The delinquents were not only puniſhed before conviction, but upon the ſlighteſt ſuſpicions. Theſe arbitrary proceedings could not fail of alarming every perſon of ſenſe and reflection; and peace now appeared to be a very deſirable object. The parliament had diſcharged many ſuſpected officers and ſoldiers, who not having an opportunity of joining the royal army, continued in the neighbourhood of London, and were perpetually forming cabals againſt the parliament. As it was impoſſible to prevent their correſpondence with the king's friends, Charles conceived great hopes of their aſſiſtance, and this motive induced him to continue his march towards the capital. Previous to his leaving Reading, he ſent a proclamation of pardon to the cities of London and Weſtminſter; but this the parliament ordered the ſheriffs to repreſs; the moſt effectual method they could have taken to render it univerſally known. At the ſame time, Sir Peter Killigrew was ſent with a petition to his majeſty, for fixing ſome place near London, where he might reſide, while the negotiations for a peace were carrying on. Charles ſhewed great readineſs to embrace the offer, named Windſor as the place for carrying on the conferences, and deſired that the parliament's garriſon might be removed, and his own troops admitted into that caſtle.

In the mean time, Eſſex ordered ſix thouſand of his army to march to Kingſton, that they might be in readineſs to advance to Hounſlow, to ſtop the progreſs of the royal army, provided they continued their march towards London; and ſent ſeveral of his beſt regiments to Brentford, where they threw up ſome works, while another ſtrong detachment filed off towards Acton.

Killigrew having received his majeſty's anſwer, immediately ſet out for London; but on their reaching Brentford, and finding it full of ſoldiers, he ſtrongly repreſented to Eſſex, that he feared his advancing ſo far from the city might prove an obſtacle to the peace; but Eſſex took no notice of it. He, however, on his arrival at Weſtminſter, prevailed with the parliament to write a letter to the king, intimating their deſire that a ceſſation of arms ſhould take place between the two armies. The active prince Rupert was perpetually ſcouring the country at the head of his cavaliers. He well knew that the ſecret intention of Charles was, if poſſible, to march to London; and foreſaw it would be very difficult, if not impoſſible, to effect it, if Eſſex had time ſufficient to complete his diſpoſitions. It is ſufficiently evident, that the commons themſelves never meant, that their petition for peace ſhould imply a ceſſation of arms; becauſe they thought it neceſſary to make the ceſſation a ſeparate act, which they had diſpatched to Charles by Sir Peter Killigrew. While that gentleman was poſting with it to the king's head quarters, then at Colebrook, prince Rupert attacked the parliament's regiments and works at Brentford with the utmoſt fury; and notwithſtanding they made a noble reſiſtance, they were all cut off, wounded, or taken priſoners, and the prince remained maſter of the town. In the heat of this action, Killigrew arrived, with the letter for a ceſſation of arms in his pocket, and immediately informed Eſſex of the purport of his meſſage. Eſſex would not ſuffer him to proceed any farther, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for acting on the defenſive, till he could receive reinforcements from London.

Charles now moved with his whole army to Brentford; while the city marched its trained bands in excellent order, to join the earl of Eſſex, who now determined to fight the royal army. The parliamentary forces amounted to twenty-four thouſand fighting men, beſides detachments conſiſting of eight thouſand more, which might have been recalled in a few hours. Eſſex was likewiſe poſſeſſed of a complete train of artillery, which he drew up in a lane between Turnham Green and Hammerſmith. His van conſiſted of Stapleton's and Goodwyn's regiments of horſe. His main body and reſerve were compoſed of his infantry, intermixed with the city trained bands. His cavalry formed the wings, the left extending towards the Thames, and the right towards Acton. A council of war being held, it was propoſed by ſome of the officers, that the party lying at Kingſton ſhould advance towards Hounſlow; that two of the beſt regiments of horſe ſhould defile off towards Acton; and that, upon a ſignal given, Eſſex, at the head of the main body, ſhould advance in front; by which means the king's army would be attacked at one and the ſame time in front, flank, and rear. But none of the principal officers were for putting the ſucceſs of the war upon the iſſue of a ſingle battle; becauſe if they gained the victory, the conſtitution muſt be deſtroyed; if they were defeated, both themſelves, their friends, the city of London, and the cauſe of liberty itſelf, muſt be left to the mercy of an incenſed ſovereign, and a furious army. Eſſex, however, thought that ſome art was neceſſary in order to ſupport his deſign of not coming to a general engagement. It was urged, that the intended detachments would ſo greatly weaken the center of the army, that the king might eaſily force his paſſage, and get between them and London, before either the flank or rear of his army could be attacked, eſpecially as it was known with what irreſiſtible fury prince Rupert charged at the head of his cavaliers. It was therefore reſolved not to venture a battle; that the three thouſand men lying at Kingſton ſhould immediately march to London, where their appearance was highly neceſſary to allay a ſtrong ferment that now appeared in favour of his majeſty; and that the detachment at Acton ſhould rejoin the main body. Both armies continued to face each other for ſome time, and ſeveral ſmall ſkirmiſhes happened between the advanced parties, but nothing material occurred. At laſt they both retired, the king to Colebrook, and Eſſex to London.

Soon after, the parliament ſent the following meſſage to the king; for the principal men in the city, weary of ſupporting the enormous expence of the army, were very deſirous of an accommodation.

"May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"It is humbly deſired by both houſes of parliament, that your majeſty will be pleaſed to return to your parliament, with your royal, not your martial attendants; to the end that religion, laws, and liberties, may be ſettled and ſecured by their advice; finding, by a late and ſad accident, that your majeſty is environed by ſome ſuch counſellors, as rather perſuade a deſperate diviſion, than a joining and good agreement with your parliament and people: and we ſhall be ready to give your majeſty aſſurances of ſuch ſecurity as may be for your honour, and the ſafety of your royal perſon."

Beſides this meſſage, petitions were now drawing up by the cities of London and Weſtminſter for a peace, which ſo greatly alarmed the violent party in the houſe of commons, that they were ordered to be diſcontinued. Theſe diſorders, and the difficulties to which the commons were now reduced for raiſing the neceſſary ſupplies, encouraged Charles, in anſwer to their late addreſs, to tell them, "That he hoped all his good ſubjects would look upon that meſſage with indignation, as intended, by the contrivers of it, to treat him with contempt; and deſigned, by that malignant party, of whom he had ſo often complained, as a wall of ſeparation between his majeſty and his people: that he had often told them the reaſons that induced him to leave his capital, from which indeed he was driven; and had often complained, that the greater part of his peers, and of the members of the houſe of commons, could not, with with ſafety to their perſons, ſit and vote freely among them; but were debarred, by violent and artful practices, of thoſe privileges which their birthrights, and the truſt repoſed in them by their conſtituents, juſtly gave them: that the whole kingdom knew an army was raiſed, under pretence of orders of both houſes, (an uſurpation never before heard of in any age) which army had purſued his majeſty in his own kingdom; given him battle at Kienton; and now theſe rebels being recruited, and poſſeſſed of London, he was courteouſly invited to return to his parliament, that is, into the power of that army.

"That ſince the traiterous endeavours of theſe deſperate men could not ſnatch the crown from his head, it being defended by the providence of God, and the affections and loyalty of his good ſubjects, they had requeſted him to deliver it up, and put his own life, together with the lives, liberties, and fortunes of all his good ſubjects, into their mercileſs hands: that he thought proper to give no other anſwer to that part of their petition; but as he imputed not that affront to both his houſes of parliament, nor to the major part of thoſe who were then preſent there, but to that dangerous party which his majeſty and the kingdom muſt deteſt, ſo he would not take advantage of it: that if they would really purſue the courſe their petition delivered at Colebrook pointed out, he would perform all he then promiſed; whereby the hearts of his diſtreſſed ſubjects might be raiſed by the hopes of peace, without which neither religion, the laws, nor the liberties of the kingdom, could be ſettled and ſecured."

A negotiation was, however, opened at Oxford; and the earl of Northumberland, with four members of the lower houſe, repaired thither as commiſſioners. In this treaty the king ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on the re-eſtabliſhment of the crown in its legal powers, and on the reſtoration of his conſtitutional prerogative. The parliament ſtill required new conceſſions, and a farther abridgment of legal authority, as a more effectual remedy to their fears and jealouſies. Finding the king ſupported by more forces, and a greater party than they had ever imagined, they ſeemingly abated ſomewhat of the exorbitant conditions they had formerly claimed; but their demands were ſtill too great for an equal treaty. Beſides other articles, to which a complete victory alone could entitle them, they required the king, in expreſs terms, to aboliſh epiſcopacy; a demand which they had only inſinuated before; and deſired that all other eccleſiaſtical controverſies ſhould be determined by their aſſembly of divines. They alſo deſired the king to acquieſce in their ſettlement of the militia, and to confer on their adherents the entire authority of the ſword. And in anſwer to the king's propoſal, that his magazines, towns, forts, and ſhips, ſhould be reſtored to him; the parliament required, that they ſhould be put into ſuch hands as they could confide in. And having now, in the eye of the law, been guilty of treaſon in levying war againſt their ſovereign, their fears and jealouſies muſt, on that account, have multiplied extremely, and have rendered their perſonal ſafety ſtill more incompatible with the authority of the monarch. The conferences therefore proceeded no farther than the firſt demand, and the parliament's commiſſioners returned ſuddenly to London.

Beſides the military operations between the principal armies, which lay in the heart of England, each county, each town, and almoſt each family, was divided within itſelf; and the moſt violent convulſions ſhook the whole kingdom. The two noblemen in the north, on whom Charles principally relied, were the earls of Newcaſtle and Cumberland. The latter ſoon reſigned his command, but the former aſſociated with the northern counties, where the inhabitants were well diſpoſed to join the royal party; and on account of their being ſituated near the borders of Scotland, were much better provided with arms than the other parts of the kingdom. Newcaſtle therefore ſoon raiſed an army of eight thouſand men, but ſo pompouſly divided, and ſubdivided into regiments, ſquadrons, and companies, that it appeared to conſiſt of thrice the number. The chief adherents to the parliament, among whom were the lord Fairfax, and his ſon Sir Thomas Fairfax, were proclaimed traitors. Lord Fairfax had received a commiſſion to command the parliament's forces in Yorkſhire; but perceiving the people in general were prepoſſeſſed in favour of the king, he was obliged to act only on the defenſive. He attempted to prevent the earl of Newcaſtle from paſſing the river Tees, but his detachment was overpowered, and Newcaſtle marched directly to York, where he was received in triumph by Sir Thomas Glemham, the deputy governor. During theſe tranſactions, the queen and Goring landed at Burlington-bay, with a conſiderable quantity of arms, ammunition, and ſome money. The king's affairs in the north were now in a proſperous condition. He had a ſtrong garriſon in Newcaſtle. The regiments that were raiſed againſt him in Richmondſhire and Cleveland had diſbanded of themſelves. The earl of Newcaſtle had garriſoned Newark, in Nottinghamſhire. A detachment from his army, under the command of Mr. Cavendiſh, had made themſelves maſters of Grantham, in Lincolnſhire, and taken three hundred priſoners, with all their arms and ammunition.

A family difference had, for ſome time, ſubſiſted between the houſes of Huntingdon and Stamford; and colonel Haſtings, a younger brother of the former, had oppoſed with ſucceſs, in Leiceſterſhire, the lord Grey, ſon to the earl of Stamford. The city of Litchfield itſelf was without fortifications; but the cloſe, built by one of its biſhops, was capable of making a good defence, and had been ſeized for the king by a party of loyaliſts. Lord Broke, one of the moſt zealous parliamentarians in England, was ordered to attack this ſtrong retreat. He accordingly advanced to Litchfield, at the head of a conſiderable detachment, and entered the city without oppoſition the king's party retiring into the cloſe. While Broke was concerting the proper diſpoſitions for beſieging the place, he was killed by a muſket-ball, and by his death the parliament loſt one of the moſt inveterate enemies Charles had in the nation. This event inſpired his ſoldiers with a deſire to revenge the death of their leader. They ſoon made themſelves maſters of the place, and took the whole party priſoners. The earl of Northampton, who commanded the garriſon of Banbury, was advancing to the relief of Litchfield; but in his march threw himſelf into Stafford, in order to prevent the town from being fortified by Sir John Gell, one of the parliament's generals. Gell abandoned the place at his approach; but being joined by Sir William Brereton, he advanced againſt Stafford. Northampton, who knew nothing of the junction, marched immediately out of the town, in order to fight Gell. The conteſt was very ſharp; and though the royaliſts were far inferior in number, Gell's cavalry were totally routed, but the brave earl of Northampton loſt his life in the action. This misfortune ſo greatly intimidated his forces, though they had greatly the advantage, that they retreated to Stafford. The parliamentarians loſt a conſiderable number of men, and eight pieces of cannon.

But the moſt memorable actions of valour, during the winter ſeaſon, were performed in the weſt. Sir Ralph Hopton, at the head of a ſmall troop, being obliged to retire into Cornwall, before the earl of Bedford, who commanded a ſuperior army in Devonſhire, he was joined by the militia, and the whole country reduced to peace and obedience under the king. But the loyaliſts were not contented with the advantages they had gained in Cornwall; they were deſirous of carrying the war into Devonſhire, and reducing that county alſo to ſubjection. Purſuant to this reſolution, Sir Bevil Granville, the moſt popular man in that county, Sir Ralph Hopton, Sir Nicholas Stanning, Arundel and Trevannion, undertook, at their own expence, to raiſe an army for the king; and their great intereſt in Cornwall ſoon enabled them to effect their purpoſe. Hopton had been as forward as any man in the parliament for oppoſing the king's meaſures; but being perſuaded of his majeſty's good intentions, and ſeeing no end of oppoſition but in rebellion, he joined the royal party, and received a commiſſion from the marquis of Hertford, to act for Charles in the weſtern counties. Hopton had ſerved many years abroad with great applauſe, and was therefore complimented with the principal command of the army. Their ſucceſs was ſo rapid, that the parliament was alarmed, and ſent orders to Ruthven, governor of Plymouth, to march with all the forces of Dorſet, Somerſet, and Devon, and reduce the whole county of Cornwall to obedience. He obeyed the order, and was ſoon after followed by the earl of Stamford, with a conſiderable reinforcement. Ruthven having entered Cornwall by means of ſome bridges thrown over the Tamar, he marched with the utmoſt expedition, in order to bring on an action with the royaliſts before he was joined by Stamford's forces, and obtain alone the honour of that victory which he looked for with aſſurance. The royaliſts were equally impatient to bring the affair to a deciſion, before Ruthven's army received ſo conſiderable a reinforcement. The battle was fought on Braddock down, and victory declared for the royaliſts, though greatly inferior in numbers. Hopton had made a very artful diſpoſition for the engagement. He concealed two field-pieces behind his ranks, which opened at every diſcharge. Theſe pieces did great execution among the enemy, and ſoon put them into diſorder. The advantage was immediately perceived by Hopton, who led his forces to the charge, and obtained a complete victory. The rebels loſt above two thouſand five hundred men, together with all their artillery and baggage. Ruthven, with a few broken troops, the poor remains of his army, fled to Saltaſh; but that town being taken by Hopton, he eſcaped with ſome difficulty, and almoſt alone, into Plymouth. The earl of Stamford, informed of Ruthven's defeat, retired to Taviſtock with great precipitation. But he was ſoon after obliged to abandon that town by Sir John Berkley, who took poſſeſſion of Taviſtock for the king.

A.D. 1643. But notwithſtanding theſe advantages, the loyaliſts were greatly diſtreſſed for want both of money and ammunition; and this obliged them to conclude a neutrality with the parliamentary party in Devonſhire. But as ſoon as the ſpring advanced, the commons diſapproved of the treaty, and the war recommenced, with the appearance of every diſadvantage to the royal party. Stamford, who commanded the parliament's army, was at the head of a body of near ſeven thouſand men, well ſupplied with money, proviſions and ammunition. Deſirous of retrieving the honour he had loſt when driven from Taviſtock, he advanced againſt the royaliſts, who were not half his number, and oppreſſed by every kind of neceſſity. Deſpair, blended with their natural valour, now determined them to make one noble effort againſt the enemy. Stamford was encamped on the top of a hill near Stratton; and it was determined to attack him, in four diviſions, by five in the morning, on the ſixteenth of May. One of the diviſions was commanded by lord Mohun and Sir Ralph Hopton; another by Sir Bevil Granville and Sir John Berkeley; a third by Stanning and Trevannion; a fourth by Baſſet and Godolphin. The royal forces preſſed, with the utmoſt valour, four ways up the hill, and were as obſtinately oppoſed by their enemies. For ſome time the battle continued doubtful, till word was brought to the chief officers of the royal forces, that all their ammunition was ſpent, except four barrels of powder. This defect they determined to ſupply with valour, but at the ſame time to conceal it from the ſoldiers. Orders were therefore given to advance, without firing, to the top of the hill, where they would be on equal ground with the enemy. The courage of the officers was ſo well ſeconded by the ſoldiers, that the royaliſts continually gained ground. Major-general Chidley, who commanded the parliament's forces, for Stamford kept at a diſtance, did every thing becoming a good officer; and when he ſaw his men recoil before the royaliſts, he advanced in perſon at the head of a ſtrong detachment of pikes, and piercing into the thickeſt of the enemy, was overpowered, and taken priſoner. This incident determined the fate of the battle. His men began to give ground apace; ſo that the four parties of royaliſts approaching nearer and nearer, as they aſcended the hill, they at laſt met together on the plain at the top, where they ſignalized their victory with mutual ſhouts and congratulations.

The parliament were now ſufficiently alarmed by this ſeries of ſucceſs in the weſt; and the king ordered the marquis of Hertford, who had raiſed about three thouſand forces in Wales, to join the Corniſh loyaliſts, and puſh their conqueſts ſtill farther in the weſtern counties. In his march he attempted to ſurprize Cirenceſter, but failed in the attempt, through ſome unavoidable accidents of the roads and weather. But as that town was of the utmoſt advantage to the king, prince Rupert undertook that ſervice; and marching with the utmoſt expedition, took the place by ſtorm, cutting to pieces a whole regiment of the parliament's forces, taking eleven hundred priſoners, about four thouſand ſtands of arms, the enemy's whole magazine, and a very valuable booty.

But the advantages gained by the royal party in the weſt were in ſome meaſure balanced by the ſucceſs of the parliamentary army commanded by the earl of Eſſex, who had now taken the field, and laid ſiege to Reading. His army conſiſted of twenty thouſand men. The town was but indifferently fortified, and defended by a garriſon of three thouſand foot and three hundred horſe, commanded by Sir Richard Aſton and colonel Fielding. The largeneſs of the place, the weakneſs of the fortifications, and particularly the great conſumption of powder neceſſary for making a vigorous defence, and with which Charles was very ill provided, had occaſioned a motion in the royal council for abandoning the place, and removing the magazines to Oxford: but before this could be effected, the town was inveſted by the enemy. The approaches, however, were carried on with ſo little judgment, that it was plain the place would not have been taken, had the fortifications been properly conſtructed. The enemy, however, enjoyed great advantages from the ſituation of the place, their cannon playing directly into the town, by which means ſeveral of the garriſon were killed, and Sir Richard Aſton dangerouſly wounded. The diſabling of this able commander was of the utmoſt importance, as the king was now advancing, at the head of his army, to relieve the town. For while he was on his march, the garriſon, under Fielding, who had now ſucceeded to the command, after killing a great number of the enemy in their ſallies, thought proper to capitulate, by which the town was delivered up to the parliament's army. By the articles of the capitulation, the whole garriſon were to march out with the honours of war, and be at full liberty to join the royal army; but all deſerters were to be given up to the enemy. The laſt condition was thought ſo ignominious and prejudicial to the king's affairs, that Fielding was tried by a court-martial, and condemned to loſe his head for granting it. Charles, however, afterwards remitted his ſentence.

But though Eſſex had ſucceeded in his enterprize, and though his army, during the ſiege, had been fully ſupplied with every neceſſary from London; yet the hardſhips which the ſoldiers ſuffered from the inclemency of the weather, had weakened them to ſuch a degree, that they were no longer capable of undertaking any new enterprize: ſo that no action happened, for ſome time, between the two armies, though encamped in the neighbourhood of each other. Eſſex at laſt made a motion towards Oxford, and fixed his head-quarters at Thame, on the borders of Buckinghamſhire, hamſhire, in order to over-awe that county, which now began to arm in favour of the king. Colonel Urrey, a Scots officer, had been preferred to the command he held under Eſſex, on the preſſing inſtances of the commons; but now thinking the poſt he enjoyed adequate to his merit, he threw up his commiſſion; and preſenting himſelf in his regimentals before prince Rupert, offered to conduct a detachment of the royal army to a place where they might, with great eaſe, beat up the enemy's quarters. Rupert readily embraced the propoſal, and Urrey performed the ſervice with great courage and ſucceſs, killing and taking priſoners a whole regiment of the parliament's horſe, beſides diſperſing other detached parties, and returned to Oxford with a large body, and a conſiderable number of priſoners. Animated by this ſucceſs, he propoſed a ſtill more daring attempt to prince Rupert, that of ſurpriſing the enemy's head-quarters; offering, at the ſame time, that the prince ſhould enjoy all the honour of the enterprize, while he himſelf ſerved as a volunteer. Nothing could be more agreeable to the daring ſpirit of prince Rupert than expeditions of this kind. He embraced the offer with great avidity; and putting himſelf at the head of a ſmall detachment of horſe, marched with ſo much expedition, that he ſurpriſed and cut in pieces two of the enemy's regiments, one of horſe and the other of foot, quartered at Wickham, together with another very conſiderable party lying at ſome diſtance. The ſtrength of the prince's detachment rendered it highly imprudent to make any farther attempt, as the enemy was, by this time, ſufficiently alarmed; and he accordingly began his march back to the royal army. But Eſſex, who was now informed of the ſucceſs that had attended Rupert, and exaſperated at ſo daring an inſult, ſent a party of his horſe to intercept his retreat, at a bridge which the royaliſts were obliged to paſs. The troops deſigned for this expedition were ſeen by Rupert, as he was marching over a plain called Chalgravefield, towards a lane which led to the bridge. He immediately perceived the diſadvantage of being attacked in the defile, gave immediate orders for his forces to halt, and drew up his party on the plain. Aſhamed of having been diſcovered, the parliament's forces advanced againſt the prince with great intrepidity; but being unable to ſupport the furious charge of Rupert, they were all cut off, or taken priſoners, before the earl of Eſſex could bring up the infantry to their aſſiſtance, and Rupert returned with his priſoners to Oxford. The famous Hambden, who commanded a regiment of foot in the neighbourhood, had joined the party ſent to intercept Rupert, as a volunteer, and ruſhed into the thickeſt of the battle. One of the priſoners, after the action was over, informed Rupert, that he was confident Mr. Hambden was wounded; for he ſaw him, contrary to his uſual cuſtom, ride off the field before the battle was over; his head hanging down, and his hands leaning on his horſe's neck. The ſoldier was not miſtaken: news arrived the next day, that he had received a brace of piſtol bullets in his ſhoulder, and that the bone was ſhattered. He languiſhed eight days, and then paid the debt of nature, ſincerely lamented even by his enemies. He was, doubtleſs, one of the greateſt men that age produced. His prodigious abilities, his unſullied virtues, his unſhaken integrity, have been juſtly celebrated by writers of all parties. But he had unhappily imbibed the moſt violent prejudices againſt Charles, and eſteemed him as a prince wholly unworthy of any truſt or confidence from his people. But ſurely an attempt to annihilate monarchy, to ſubvert the ancient conſtitution of his country, and to ſpread the horrors of a civil war over every part of the kingdom, was carrying oppoſition to a very blameable extreme; eſpecially when there was the greateſt reaſon to believe, that his antipathy to the king was not founded upon truth; and that the arbitrary proceedings of that prince proceeded rather from neceſſity, and a natural deſire of ſupporting the prerogative which had been tranſmitted to him from his anceſtors, than from any ambitious deſigns of eradicating the liberties of the people. Perhaps Hambden himſelf never intended to carry oppoſition to this dreadful height. It is more than probable, that he, as well as many others in the oppoſition, never imagined that the king could have found ſo many reſources; and that he muſt have been obliged, even before the ſword of civil diſcord had made any progreſs in depopulating the kingdom, to ſubmit to the conditions offered by the parliament. Perceiving himſelf deceived in the reſiſtance he imagined Charles could make, he endeavoured to repair the dreadful conſequences of his miſtake, by puſhing on the war with more vigour and ſpirit than ever. He well knew that a deciſive victory only could now protect his party from the indignation of an enraged ſovereign; and was therefore deſirous of purſuing, with the utmoſt intrepidity, the only meaſures that could reſtore peace to his country. When the king was informed of Hambden's misfortune, he was ſo ſenſibly affected with the fate of that great man, though one of his capital enemies, that he made an offer of his own ſurgeons to attend him; but it was too late. Before the meſſenger arrived, Hambden had been ſeized with a violent fever, and was paſt all hopes of recovery.

While the two principal armies continued in their quarters near the city of Oxford, Sir William Waller was ſent, at the head of a large body of forces, into the weſt, with orders to incorporate among his troops the poor remains of the parliament's army that had eſcaped from the battle of Stratton. Waller was a man of great ſpirit and fortune: he had already diſplayed his great abilities as a commander, by reducing Portſmouth, and defeating lord Herbert. His great reputation brought in vaſt numbers of volunteers, and he advanced into the weſt with the utmoſt celerity. But before he reached the place of action, prince Maurice, and the marquis of Hertford, had joined Hopton with a conſiderable reinforcement, ſo that the army of the royaliſts now amounted to near ſeven thouſand men. They were well provided with artillery, and other neceſſaries, and greatly elated with their late ſucceſs. But the diſpoſition of the weſtern forces, which had chiefly been diſciplined by Hopton, were very different from the troops under prince Maurice and the marquis of Hertford. They were very regular and tractable in their quarters; they paid punctually for every thing, as far as their money would extend, and treated thoſe who did not join them with great humanity and tenderneſs. They never levied money upon the inhabitants but with apparent reluctance, and with promiſes to repay it as ſoon as the circumſtances of the times would permit. This abſtinence was blended with the utmoſt courage, and a conſciouſneſs of their being the chief ſupports of the royal cauſe in that part of the kingdom. Maurice ridiculed this behaviour; and his troops having been accuſtomed to live at free-quarters, looked upon the ſobriety and regular conduct of the others as a reproach to themſelves. It was fortunate for Charles, that notwithſtanding this difference in the diſpoſition of his ſoldiers, all of them were united in the common principle of ſupporting the crown; and their reputation was very great, even with the parliamentary party.

It is therefore no wonder that they made a very rapid progreſs, Taunton, Bridgewater, and Dunſtarcaſtle made no reſiſtance, and gentlemen of known fidelity to the king were appointed governors. Sir William Waller had now reached Bath, where he continued ſome time, recruiting his army; and frequent ſkirmiſhes happened between the two parties, which generally terminated in favour of the royaliſts. At laſt the two armies met at Lanſdown near Bath, and fought a pitched battle, with great loſs on both ſides, but without any deciſive event. The gallant Sir Bevil Granville fell in the action, and Hopton was greatly hurt by the blowing up of ſome powder. After this engagement the royaliſts marched to the eaſtward, in order to join the king at Oxford: but Waller hung on their rear, and greatly infeſted their march till they reached the Devizes. Reinforced with additional troops which flocked to him from all quarters, he ſoon ſo greatly ſurpaſſed the royaliſts in number, that they durſt no longer continue their march, or expoſe themſelves to the hazard of an action. It was therefore reſolved, that prince Maurice, and the marquis of Hertford, ſhould proceed with the cavalry, and, after procuring a reinforcement from the king, haſten back to the relief of their friends in the Devizes. Waller was confident of taking this whole body of infantry, now abandoned by their principal ſupport, that in a letter he wrote to the parliament, he informed them that the work was done, and that he would inform them, by the next poſt, of the number and quality of the priſoners. But the king, even before Hertford's arrival, hearing of the great difficulties to which the weſtern army was reduced, had prepared a ſtrong body of horſe, and immediately diſpatched them under the command of lord Wilmot. Waller, inſtead of endeavouring to prevent the junction of this reinforcement with the foot in the Devizes, which he might eaſily have done by continuing the blockade of the place, drew off his troops, thinking himſelf ſure of the victory, and that a deciſive action would totally ruin the king's affairs. He was miſtaken. The infantry, relieved from deſpair, advanced with the greateſt alacrity to join Wilmot, and a general action ſucceeded on Roundway-down, about two miles from the Devizes. After a ſhort but ſharp conflict, Waller's army was totally defeated, few of them eſcaping either death or captivity. Waller himſelf, with the poor remains of his numerous army, fled to Briſtol, and carried thither the firſt news of his own defeat. The royaliſts became maſters of the whole train of artillery, ammunition, and baggage of the parliament's army, with ſo inconſiderable a loſs on their ſide, that it hardly deſerves to be mentioned.

This event together with the late ſucceſs of prince Rupert, and the death of Hambden, ſo diſcouraged Eſſex, that quitting Thame and Ayleſbury, where he had hitherto lain, he retreated to London, at the head of a broken and diſheartened army, which, but a few months before, he had led into the field in ſo flouriſhing a condition. In the mean time the forces that had defeated Waller, reduced Bath, and then marched to form the ſiege of Briſtol, in conjunction with the troops under prince Rupert. Briſtol was conſidered as one of the principal places poſſeſſed by the parliament: it was very rich, and garriſoned by two thouſand five hundred foot, a regiment of horſe, and another of dragoons. Nathaniel Fiennes, ſon to lord Say, commanded the forces, and many of the citizens took up arms, and joined the garriſon. The fortifications were, however, incomplete and irregular, which induced prince Rupert to reſolve to ſtorm the city. Accordingly the aſſault was begun in four different places, and after a deſperate engagement, the ſuburbs were taken. But ſtill the garriſon were maſters of the town, and the entrance was rendered more difficult by the ruins of the houſes that were demoliſhed in the late attempt; as well as by the loſs ſuſtained by the royaliſts. It was even propoſed not to make any farther attempt, when, to the great joy of the whole army, the beſieged beat a parley. The articles of the capitulation were ſoon ſettled, by which the garriſon were allowed to march out with their arms and baggage, leaving their cannon, ammunition, and colours. The moſt wealthy inhabitants of Briſtol, fearing the city would fall into the hands of the loyaliſts, embarked the greateſt part of their wealth on board their ſhips, in order to ſend it to London; but prince Rupert, informed of their deſign, ſeized the ſhips, and by that means became maſter of a very rich booty.

The taking of Briſtol was of great importance to Charles, though his loſs was very conſiderable. Near five hundred excellent ſoldiers periſhed in the aſſault, among whom were ſeveral officers of note. The king, however, to ſhew that he was not intoxicated with good fortune, publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he renewed his proteſtation lately made with ſuch ſolemnity at the head of his army, and declared his earneſt deſire of concluding a peace, upon the re-eſtabliſhment of the conſtitution; offering to grant a general pardon, and bury all that was paſt in eternal oblivion. But the factious inhabitants of London were ſo far from thinking, that the king's late ſucceſſes gave him a title to talk of peace, that they ran into greater violences than ever. Sir William Waller was now returned to the capital, and by his ſpirited harangues kept alive that enthuſiaſm, which a turn of fortune ſeemed to have depreſſed. The leaders of the houſe of commons ſecretly promoted theſe furious diſpoſitions of the people, though they pretended they were very deſirous of peace. The lords made no ſecret that they were determined to ſend propoſitions to the king, and his majeſty's late manifeſto, occaſioned by his ſucceſſes in the weſt, was repreſented even by ſome conſiderable members among the commons, as a mark of royal clemency, and a proper baſis for a treaty. On the fifth of Auguſt the lords ſent down to the commons the following propoſitions to be tranſmitted to the king.

1. "That both armies be immediately diſbanded, and his majeſty be intreated to return to his parliament, upon ſuch ſecurity as ſhould be thought ſatisfactory.

2. "That religion might be ſettled by the advice of a general ſynod of divines, in ſuch a manner as his majeſty, with the conſent of both houſes of parliament, ſhould appoint.

3. "That the militia both by ſea and land, ſhould be ſettled by a bill; and the militia, forts, and ſhips of the kingdom, put into ſuch hands as the king ſhould appoint with the approbation of both houſes of parliament; his majeſty's revenue be abſolutely and totally reſtored to him: only deducting ſuch part as had been expended for the maintenance of his children.

4. "That all the members of both houſes, who had been expelled only for abſenting themſelves, ſhould be reſtored to their ſeats.

5. "That all delinquents before the year 1641, ſhould be delivered up to the juſtice of parliament, and a general pardon for all others, on both ſides, granted.

6. "That an act of oblivion ſhould be paſt for all former acts of hoſtility."

The commons took immediately theſe propoſitions into conſideration, and the article relative to the king's revenue, was agreed to; but it being late on Saturday night when this reſolution paſſed, the houſe was adjourned till Monday morning, when all the members in and about London attended, and, there is the greateſt reaſon to believe, that had the parliament been left to themſelves, they would have laid a ſure foundation for the ſalutary work of peace. But this was prevented by the leaders of the faction, who had hitherto rendered abortive every attempt for putting a period to the miſeries of civil diſcord. The two houſes were ſurrounded by the populace, who in a very clamorous and threatening manner, demanded that no terms of accommodation ſhould be accepted. In the midſt of this confuſion, Mr. Hollis produced a letter from Eſſex, informing the houſe, that the king's forces had taken Doncaſter and Weymouth. But this was far from diſcouraging the faction; the tumults continued to increaſe, till the lords, in a conference with the commons, plainly told them, that unleſs care was taken to ſuppreſs the violent proceedings of the populace, they muſt and will adjourn their houſe, till they could meet and deliberate with freedom, and without danger to their perſons. An order was accordingly ſent to Pennington, the factious lord-mayor, ordering him to ſuppreſs theſe tumults.

mults. But many of the members, thinking their lives in danger, had retired from the houſe, and the propoſitions for a peace were rejected by a majority of ſeven. They now liſtened to no propoſal from the lords that tended to put a period to the horrors of a civil war, and appointed committees to ſit in every hall of the city, to receive ſubſcriptions for raiſing men and horſes for the defence of their religion, their laws, and their liberties. The lords were highly exaſperated at theſe proceedings, eſpecially as they ſaw, that, notwithſtanding the late order, no care was taken to ſuppreſs the tumults, and that a party of the trained bands were ſuffered to attack and murder ſeveral women who had loudly clamoured for peace. The earls of Northumberland, Bedford, Clare, Holland and Portland, with the lords Conway and Lovelace, left the houſe and retired to the king, who received them with favour.

During theſe tranſactions in the parliament, it was propoſed in council, that the royal army ſhould march directly to London, where every thing was in confuſion, and where it was hoped, either by an inſurrection, by victory, or by treaty, a ſpeedy end might be put to the civil diſorders, which now threatened the kingdom with deſtruction. Had this motion been carried, in all probability, the conſternation of the party at the approach of the royal army would have been fatal to their cauſe; but it was thought by the majority of the council, that the great number and force of the London militia would render the attempt too dangerous. Glouceſter, lying within twenty miles of the army, offered an eaſier, and, at the ſame time, a very important conqueſt. It was the only garriſon now poſſeſſed by the parliament in thoſe parts. Should the undertaking be ſucceſsful, the advantages would be very great; the whole courſe of the Severn would be under his majeſty's command; the rich malecontent counties in the weſt, being deprived of all aſſiſtance, might be obliged to pay high contributions, as an atonement for their diſaffection; an open communication would be preſerved between Wales and theſe new conqueſts; and one half of the kingdom being entirely free from the influence of the parliament, might be united into a compact body, give the king a great ſuperiority, and be employed with ſucceſs in reducing the reſt of England to obedience. Theſe reaſons induced the king to embrace a reſolution that proved fatal to the royal party.

The garriſon of Glouceſter, conſiſting of about fifteen hundred regular troops, beſides the citizens who took up arms on this occaſion, was commanded by one Maſſey, an intrepid ſoldier of fortune; but his not being infected with the enthuſiaſm of the age, induced Charles to think that he would ſoon liſten to terms of accommodation. He was deceived; Maſſey was reſolute to preſerve an entire fidelity to his maſters; and though no enthuſiaſt himſelf, he well knew how to employ, to great advantage, that fanatical ſpirit, with which his whole garriſon, and the greater part of the inhabitants, were infected. The king ſent a ſummons to the governor to ſurrender, giving him two hours to return an anſwer; but before half the time was expired, two citizens appeared at the head quarters, dreſſed in the moſt uncouth manner, while their countenances diſplayed all the marks of that enthuſiaſtic ardour which had been ſo fatal to the peace of the three kingdoms. Without being aſked the purport of their meſſage, without exhibiting the leaſt appearance of duty or good manners, they ſaid, in a pert, ſhrill, undiſmayed accent, that they brought an anſwer from the godly city of Glouceſter; and, after making ſeveral inſolent and ſeditious replies to ſome queſtions that were aſked them, they delivered the following anſwer in writing: “We the inhabi-“tants, magiſtrates, officers, and ſoldiers, within “the garriſon of Glouceſter, unto his majeſty's gra-“cious meſſage, return this humble anſwer: That “we do keep this city, according to our oaths and “allegiance, to and for the uſe of his majeſty and “his royal poſterity: and do accordingly conceive “ourſelves wholly bound to obey the commands of “his majeſty ſignified by both houſes of parliament; “and are reſolved, by God's help, to keep this city “accordingly.” All negotiations were now at an end, and the ſiege was puſhed with great intrepidity. Sir William Vavaſour lay, with his Welſh forces, on the weſt and north-weſt ſides of the town; Ruthven, earl of Brentford, was poſted on the ſouth; and Sir Jacob Aſhley on the eaſt, where the king himſelf had his head quarters.

It is impoſſible to expreſs the conſternation that ſeized the inhabitants of London, when the news arrived that Glouceſter was inveſted. The whole city was in confuſion, and the people thought they ſaw the royal army already thundering at their gates. Had even a party of the king's forces appeared in this moment of diſtraction, the conſequences might have been fatal to the whole party. But the ſiege of Glouceſter demanded the king's whole attention, and in a few days the citizens recovered from their conſternation. But the arbitrary proceedings of the parliament exaſperated many who had before joined them; and a combination was formed in London, which required all the abilities of the leaders to ſuppreſs.

Edmond Waller, ſo well known for his poetical writings, was a perſon of very conſiderable fortune, and equally remarkable for his talents and elegance of manners. He was a member of the lower houſe, and had heartily joined in the meaſures that had been purſued for reducing the prerogative of the crown within proper bounds; but ſeeing no end of the encroachments of the commons, he exerted all his powers to ſtop the career of faction, and uſed the utmoſt boldneſs in his ſpeeches in blaming the violent counſels by which the members were governed. But finding all his eloquence in the houſe was exerted in vain, he determined, if poſſible, to form a party in the city, that might oblige the parliament to accept of reaſonable conditions, and reſtore peace to the nation. All the eminent perſons in and about London had formed the ſame deſign, and highly approved the ſentiments of Waller, the charms of whoſe converſation, joined to his character of courage and integrity, had procured him many friends. Theſe all joined in wiſhing that ſome expedient could be found for ſtopping the impetuous career of the parliament, and bringing about a peace on equal terms. Tomkins, his brother-in-law, and Chaloner, the intimate friend of Tomkins, had for ſome time entertained the ſame ſentiments; and informed Waller, that the ſame deſire of peace among all men of ſenſe and moderation prevailed in the city. It was therefore thought very eaſy to form a ſtrong combination, for refuſing, by mutual concert, the illegal taxes impoſed upon the people by the parliament, without the royal aſſent. Pleaſed with the idea of reſtoring peace to their country, by obliging the parliament to accept of reaſonable terms of accommodation, they applied themſelves aſſiduouſly to form liſts of perſons whom they conceived would join them in their deſign; and ſoon had the pleaſure of ſeeing them contain a very conſiderable and very reſpectable number. But, unfortunately for them, a ſervant belonging to Tomkins, who had imbibed the fanatical ſpirit of the times, overheard their converſation, and informed Pym of their deſign. Waller, Tomkins, and Chaloner, were immediately ſeized, and tried by a court-martial. They were all found guilty, and Tomkins and Chaloner ſuffered death on gibbets erected before their own doors; but the ſentence of Waller was reſpited, and he afterwards obtained a pardon, on paying a fine of ten thouſand pounds. The following vow and covenant were alſo taken as a teſt by the lords and commons, and likewiſe impoſed on their army, and upon all perſons who lived within their quarters.

“I, A. B. in humility and reverence of the divine Majeſty, declare my hearty ſorrow for my own ſins, and the ſins of this nation, which have deſerved the calamities and judgments which now lie upon it; and my true intention is, by God's grace, to endeavour the amendment of my own ways: and I do farther, in the preſence of Almighty God, declare, vow, and covenant, that, in order to the ſecurity and preſervation of the true reformed proteſtant religion, and liberty of the ſubject, I will not conſent to the laying down of arms, ſo long as the papiſts, now in open war againſt the parliament, ſhall, by force of arms, be protected from the juſtice thereof; and that I do abhor and deteſt the ſaid wicked and traiterous deſign lately diſcovered; and that I never gave, or will give, my aſſent to the execution thereof; but will, according to my power and vocation, oppoſe and reſiſt the ſame, and all other of the like nature: and in caſe any other ſimilar deſign ſhall come to my knowledge, I will make ſuch timely diſcovery, as I ſhall conceive will be moſt conducive to the prevention thereof: and whereas I do, in my conſcience, believe, that the forces raiſed by the two houſes of parliament, are raiſed and continued for their juſt defence, and for the defence of the true proteſtant religion, and liberty of the ſubject, againſt the forces raiſed by the king; I will, according to my power and vocation, aſſiſt the forces raiſed and continued by both houſes of parliament, againſt the forces raiſed by the king without their conſent; and will likewiſe aſſiſt all other perſons, that ſhall take this oath, in what they ſhall do in purſuance thereof; and will not, directly or indirectly, adhere to, or willingly aſſiſt, the forces raiſed by the king, without the conſent of both houſes of parliament: and this vow and covenant I make, in the preſence of Almighty God, the ſearcher of all hearts, with a true intention to perform the ſame, as I ſhall anſwer at the great day, when the ſecrets of all hearts ſhall be diſcloſed.”

The framing of this ſolemn vow and covenant was one of the laſt ſervices which Pym did for his party. He died ſoon after, and lived not to ſee the dreadful ſcenes that ſoon ſucceeded, together with the deſtruction of that very faction he had ſo long and ſo ſtrenuouſly ſupported. Thoſe oaths and covenants were the laſt, and indeed the moſt ſucceſsful efforts of the commons. Nor were they contented with taking the oath themſelves; they ſent the following inſtructions for adminiſtering it to the people in every part of the kingdom.

1. “That a ſufficient number of copies of the vow and covenant be ſent down to the deputy-lieutenants and committees of parliament in the different counties, and that a certificate be required from them of the day on which they were received.

2. “That the ſaid deputy-lieutenants do, in ſix days at fartheſt, diſperſe the ſaid copies to every pariſh church and chapel in their reſpective counties, to the miniſters, church-wardens, or other perſons, as the deputy-lieutenants ſhall appoint to receive the ſame.

3. “That the miniſters of the ſeveral churches or chapels ſhall give public notice upon the firſt Lord's day after their receipt of ſuch copies, what day the ſaid vow and covenant ſhall be taken, in their ſeveral pariſhes; the time not to exceed the ſeventh day after ſuch notice.

4. “That before the day ſo appointed, the conſtables of every place, within the ſaid pariſhes, ſhall deliver to the miniſters the names, fairly written, of all men, above the age of fifteen, reſiding in their ſeveral towns or villages; and the church-wardens of every pariſh ſhall, before the day ſo appointed, provide a regiſter-book, in the beginning of which the vow and covenant ſhall be fairly written; wherein every man, after he hath taken that vow and covenant, ſhall write his name, or ſet his mark to his name written by ſome other perſon.

5. “That this vow and covenant ſhall be taken by all men in the church, within the ſeveral pariſhes where they reſide, in preſence of the miniſters, church-wardens, ſideſmen, and conſtables of the ſaid pariſh, or two of them at leaſt, jointly with the miniſter: the parties ſtanding up, and either audibly pronouncing all the words of the ſame; or elſe after ſome perſon hath ſolemnly read over the whole, and taken it in their ſight and hearing, they ſhall declare their aſſent to the ſame.

6. “That if any reſiding in the pariſh do not come and take the ſaid vow and covenant on the day firſt appointed, then the miniſters ſhall appoint another day, at no great diſtance: and the church-wardens are to go to the houſes where they reſide, and give them perſonal notice; and if they be not at home, to leave notice with ſome perſon in the houſe of the day appointed for their taking it: if they refuſe it, they may be returned as obſtinate.

7. “The miniſters of the ſeveral pariſhes ſhall, within twenty days after their receipt of the vow and covenant, make a true certificate of the names of all ſuch as, in their pariſhes, do not take it, to ſuch perſon as ſhall be appointed for that purpoſe; who ſhall ſpeedily return them to the deputy-lieutenants, or committees of parliament in that county, or any three of them; together with the names of all ſuch miniſters as do not ſend in their certificates within the twenty days; and of theſe the deputy-lieutenants, or committees, are to make duplicates, keeping one part with them, and ſending the other ſealed to the clerk of the houſe of commons.

8. “That the deputy-lieutenants and committees of parliament do immediately diſarm, or cauſe to be diſarmed, all ſuch as ſhall refuſe to take the ſaid vow and covenant; and if it can be proved, that they had then in their cuſtody any arms which they did not deliver up, they ſhall be immediately committed to priſon.

9. “That no ſoldiers inliſted ſhall receive any part from the ſtate, till they have, in the preſence of their commander, and ſome miniſter, taken the vow and covenant.”

During theſe tranſactions in parliament, the ſiege of Glouceſter was carried on with great fury; and Maſſey, ambitious of ſaving the place, and having under his command a garriſon ready to ſacrifice their lives in ſupport of their religion, had hitherto maintained his poſt with ſuch courage and capacity, that he had greatly retarded all the advances of the royaliſts. By ſudden and frequent ſallies, he infeſted them in their trenches, and often gained conſiderable advantages. He diſputed every inch of ground; and elated with former ſucceſſes, refreſhed the vigour and alacrity of their courage. But notwithſtanding all his intrepidity, he ſaw his garriſon reduced to the laſt extremity; and failed not, from time to time, to inform the parliament, that unleſs he was ſpeedily relieved, he muſt, from extreme want of proviſions and ammunition, be obliged to ſurrender.

It was now neceſſary for the commons to exert their whole power and authority, in order to repair their loſſes, and put themſelves in a poſture of defence. They well knew, that if Glouceſter fell into the king's hands, it would be very difficult to ſupport themſelves againſt a victorious army; eſpecially as they had very lately found, that very great diſſentions prevailed among the people, even in the capital itſelf. They applied themſelves particularly to recruit the army of Eſſex, and render it capable of facing the royaliſts. They excited their preachers to renew their declamations againſt the cauſe ſupported by his majeſty; and even had recourſe to the expedient of impreſſing men into their ſervice, though they had ſo loudly exclaimed againſt that practice when exerciſed by the king, and even very lately aboliſhed it by a bill for which they had ſo ſtrenuouſly contended. They alſo prevailed upon the city to ſend four regiments of its militia to the relief of Glouceſter; an event expected with the utmoſt anxiety.

An army of fourteen thouſand men being at laſt raiſed and properly equipped, Eſſex put himſelf at their head, and marched with the utmoſt expedition through Bedford and Leiceſter. He was greatly inferior to the royaliſts in cavalry; and prince Rupert had been detached, at the head of a flying party to haraſs him in his march; but Eſſex, by the mere force of conduct and diſcipline eluded all the efforts of Rupert, and paſſed over thoſe open champaign counties, without any material loſs. On his approaching the city, the king was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, ſo that Eſſex entered Glouceſter without oppoſition. He found on his arrival, that the garriſon was reduced to the utmoſt extremity, and that had his march been deferred one day longer, and the royaliſts made another attack, the garriſon muſt have ſubmitted, for they had only one barrel of powder remaining, and their proviſions were wholly conſumed. The country people ſupplied both the army and garriſon with plenty of neceſſaries, which they had carefully concealed from the royaliſts, pretending that their ſtock was entirely exhauſted.

There is great reaſon to believe that Charles intended to give Eſſex battle if he returned by the ſame rout, and for that purpoſe continued for ſome time at Sudley-caſtle, and thence removed to Eviſham. But Eſſex wiſely declined an engagement in an open country were the king's cavalry under ſo intrepid a leader muſt have a deciſive advantage. He lay five days at Tewkeſbury, which was his firſt ſtage after leaving Glouceſter; and ſeemed, by ſome preparations, to continue his rout to Worceſter. But by a forced march during the night he reached Cirenceſter, and obtained the double advantage of paſſing unmoleſted through an open country, and of ſurprizing a convoy of proviſions, eſcorted by three hundred royaliſts. Eſſex now directed his march towards London, through the northern parts of Wiltſhire, where he thought the king's horſe could act only with the leaſt advantage. But by the indefatigable activity of prince Rupert, his rear was attacked at Awborn-chaſe, with ſo much ſucceſs, that great numbers of his ſoldiers fell in the action. At laſt he reached Newbury; but was ſurprized to find, that the king, by forced marches had arrived before him, and was already in poſſeſſion of the place. An action was now unavoidable, and the neceſſary preparations were made for the approaching conflict by the leaders of both armies.

The battle was fought with deſperate valour and a ſteady bravery on both ſides. Eſſex's horſe were ſeveral times broke by the king's, but his infantry ſtood firm; and beſides keeping up a continued fire, preſented an invincible barrier of pikes againſt the furious attacks of prince Rupert, and thoſe gallant troops of gentry who chiefly compoſed the royal cavalry. The London militia on this occaſion behaved with remarkable valour; and tho' taken ſo lately from their ordinary occcupations, equalled the moſt veteran ſodiers. They had been trained by Skippon, and the enthuſiaſm with which they were inſpired, rendered them ſtrangers to fear. The engagement continued in all its fury till night put an end to the ſlaughter, and left the event undecided. Eſſex, who had done more than he intended, renewed not the action, but purſued his march towards London, which he reached in ſafety. His rear indeed was once put into confuſion by the king's cavalry, but no material conſequences enſued; Rupert with all his intrepidity could not ſtop the army of Eſſex, ſo as to bring on a ſecond engagement. The king followed the parliamentary army, and took poſſeſſion of Reading, where he eſtabliſhed a garriſon.

The loſs ſuſtained on both ſides in the battle of Newbury was not ſo great as might have been expected from the length of the action, which began at ſix in the morning and continued till night: not more than two thouſand men being ſlain in the field of battle. Among thoſe who fell on the part of the royaliſts were the earls of Sunderland and Carnarvon; two noblemen of great worth and abilities. But what rendered the loſs irreparable, was the death of Lucius Cary, lord viſcount Falkland, ſecretary of ſtate. He was one of the moſt learned perſons of his age, and ſtood foremoſt in the liſt of patriots, while he was perſuaded that the prerogatives of the crown incroached on the liberties of the ſubject. But when the royal power was confined within bounds; when the liberty of a ſubject had nothing to fear from the hand of authority, he embraced the defence of thoſe limited powers which were ſtill left to monarchy, and without which he was perſuaded the Engliſh conſtitution could not ſubſiſt. He was, however, penetrated with the miſeries of his country, and dreaded the ſucceſs of his own party almoſt as much as that of the parliament. Perſuaded that an advantageous peace could only be attained when the forces of both parties were nearly balanced, he was very deſirous of opening a negotiation and ſettling the articles of a laſting peace on the ſolid baſis of the Engliſh conſtitution. On the morning of the battle in which he fell, he had taken ſome care in dreſſing himſelf, and told his acquaintance that his motives for doing it were, his being unwilling the enemy ſhould find his body in a ſlovenly indecent ſituation. "I am weary of the times," added he, "and foreſee much miſery to my country; but "believe I ſhall be out of it ere night." He fell in the thirty-fifth year of his age.

Tho' the royal forces in the north were greatly ſuperior to thoſe of the parliament, yet they did not make that progreſs which might have been expected. The popularity of the earl, now erected marquis of Newcaſtle, was very great in the north; but he was oppoſed by two men, who about this time began to render themſelves remarkable for their valour and military conduct. Theſe were Sir Thomas Fairfax, ſon to the lord of that name, and Oliver Cromwell. The former had obtained ſome advantages over the royaliſts, eſpecially at Wakefield; and the latter obtained a victory at Gainſborough, over a party commanded by the gallant Cavendiſh, who periſhed in the action. Cromwell by a painful obſervance of the duties of the field, and a remarkable zeal for the cauſe, was daily riſing in preferment. He had never ſeen any foreign ſervice, and if we believe his cotemporaries, his courage was not natural, but acquired by experience and reaſon. As he was a conſummate judge of human nature, he began now to put in practice his favourite ſcheme, that of inſpiring all whom he commanded, with an enthuſiaſm, that might more than balance all the ſentiments of honour, loyalty and duty in the other party. He ſucceeded, and the regiment he commanded became famous for a ferocious courage, founded on fanaticiſm, that nothing could withſtand. But notwithſtanding the great abilities of Sir Thomas Fairfax and Cromwell, the advantages were on the ſide of the royal party in the north. They gained a complete victory over Fairfax at Atherton Moor, and diſperſed his whole army. But the fortreſs of Hull greatly prevented the progreſs of the royaliſts, and it was determined to beſiege the town. Newcaſtle accordingly ſat down before it with an army of fifteen thouſand men. Hotham was no longer governor; both he and his ſon had entered into a coreſpondence with the royaliſts, and had fallen victims to the ſeverity of the parliament. Sir Thomas Fairfax now commanded in that town, and by his military conduct and valour rendered all the attempts of Newcaſtle abortive, and he was obliged to raiſe the ſiege.

The ſucceſſes of both armies being thus nearly equal, no proſpect of peace appeared unleſs the Scots could be engaged to join in the war, it being concluded that their weight muſt turn the ſcale of the party they favoured. The commons had been early in their applications to the Scottiſh leaders; they had ſent Pickering as their agent in Scotland, to carry on the negotiations. He repreſented the great danger that muſt attend the form of religion eſtabliſhed in their country, if the royal party prevailed; and conjured them to ſuccour their diſtreſſed brethren in England. The marquis, now duke of Hamilton, and the earl of Montroſe had waited upon the queen at York, and laid before her the danger that threatened the kingdom from the negotiation of Pickering. Hamilton was for temporizing, but Montroſe was of very different ſentiments, and urged the neceſſity of having recourſe to more violent methods, in order effectually to prevent the Scottiſh parliament from joining with the commons of England. But prepoſſeſſed in favour of Hamilton, Charles intruſted him and his friends with the affairs of Scotland; and at the ſame time earneſtly requeſted that they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to prevent the Scottiſh court from engaging in any negotiation with the committees which he underſtood the Engliſh parliament intended to ſend into that kingdom. If the duke of Hamilton and his brother the earl of Lanerk were ſincere in their attachment they undertook more than they were able to perform. A parliament or convention of the ſtates was called, tho' expreſsly againſt the kings conſent. This meaſure was indeed chiefly effected by the Scots commiſſioners, who after concluding the late treaty in England, had entered into a cloſe correſpondence with the leaders of the parliament at London. The negotiation had indeed been carried on with ſo much ſecrecy, that when it was firſt mentioned in the houſe of commons, it created a general conſternation. There is ſomething extremely ſhocking in the idea of calling in a foreign enemy; but the deſperate ſtate of their affairs rendered it neceſſary. The earl of Rutland and the lord Grey of Warke, were named as commiſſioners for the houſe of lords; but the former had intereſt ſufficient to get himſelf excuſed, and the latter, tho' conſidered as an unſhaken friend to the cauſe of the parliament, ſo reſolutely declined the ſervice, that he was ſent to the tower for his diſobedience. Sir William Armyn, and Sir Henry Vane the Yonger, at laſt undertook the ſervice, and were aſſiſted by the ſame fanatical divines, who promiſed to bring over to their intereſt the Scotiſh clergy, on whoſe aſſiſtance the ſucceſs of the negotiation in a great meaſure depended. Montroſe ſent timely information to the king, of the intrigues of the Engliſh parliament, and offered, on receiving a commiſſion for that purpoſe, to declare the convention of the ſtates, traitors to their country. Had this been done immediately, the attempts of the commons would, in all probability, have been rendered abortive; but the king liſtened ſo much to the counſels of Hamilton, that Montroſe and his friends were neglected till affairs became deſperate, and it was then too late. Hamilton indeed pretended, that he had done every thiug in his power to prevent the Scots from agreeing with the Engliſh commiſſioners; but that all his endeavours were in vain. The truth is, a large arrear was ſtill owing by the Engliſh parliament to the Scottiſh covenanters, and this muſt have been loſt if the former had been ruined. The Scotch forces in Ireland had done nothing to anſwer the great expectations conceived of them; and tho' their general, the earl of Leven, had engaged they ſhould never join the king, yet as the parliament was unable to ſupply Leven with money, it is hard to ſay what courſes the ſoldiers might follow, when pinched by neceſſity. Leven and his forces were therefore recalled from Ireland in order to prevent their inliſting in that kingdom, and paſſing over into England. Add to this, that the great ſpirit of Montroſe, his virtuous popularity, his numerous dependents, and the inflexibility of his principles, rendered him now ſo formidable, not only to the covenanters, who were directed by Argyle, but alſo to the moderate party headed by the duke of Hamilton, that a coalition took place between theſe two parties againſt Montroſe and the royaliſts. It hapened to the Scots, as to a people wanton with liberty, who having nothing to wiſh for, had a thouſand things to fear. Hamilton, with all his moderation, made no ſecret of his diſliking the revival of what he called hierarchical tyranny in Scotland, and conſequently he was united with the covenanters in the main principle of oppoſition to Charles. For tho' the true motives of it were ambition, and an inordinate deſire of poſſeſſing the revenues of the church, yet religion was the avowed pretence. the Engliſh commiſſioners improved all the jealouſies the Scots entertained with regard to the king's intentions. They laid before the convention the ſteps they had already taken for an entire uniformity of eccleſiaſtical government between the two kingdoms; they invited him to ſend members to the aſſembly of divines, then ſitting at Weſtminſter, for introducing a farther reformation of religion, and offered to proceed as far as the low condition of their affairs would admit, in diſcharging the arrears due to the Scottiſh army. But at the ſame time, they mentioned the neceſſity of ſecuring all thoſe invaluable bleſſings by the Scots preventing the ruin of the Engliſh parliament, which could only be effected by imimmediately raiſing an army for their aſſiſtance.

The proſperous condition of the royal affairs in England, added to the inviolable fidelity uſed by Charles in his conceſſions to the Scots, muſt have rendered abortive this rebellious propoſition, had not ſome of the king's beſt friends been intimidated by a charge ſent down againſt them by the Engliſh parliament, for holding a correſpondecne with the queen. Their letters had been intercepted by Fairfax, who forwarded them to London, whence they were ſent to Scotland by the parliament. At the ſame time the king's friends were diſunited among themſelves. The duke of Hamilton and his brother, the earl of Lanerk finding they had been deceived by the covenanters, would willingly have joined Montroſe and the declared royaliſts; but that nobleman now conſidered them as the worſt of traitors. He imputed all the aſcendency the king's enemies had obtained in Scotland, to their counſels, and rejected, with indignation, all advances towards an accommodation. It is certain the Scots in general were at this time well affected to his majeſty's perſon; nor did Montroſe over-rate his own abilities, when he made an offer to the queen of taking the field againſt thoſe noblemen who had voted for calling a convention of the ſtates without the king's permiſſion. His enemies were ſo ſenſible of this, that they offered to give him the ſecond command in their armies; a propoſal which he artfully eluded; and notwithſtanding all the provocations he had received preſerved an unſhaken loyalty. Recourſe was had to the ſame principles which had been before ſucceſsful, that of undermining the civil authority by means of religion. They perceived unſurmountable difficulties ſhould they make their firſt attack upon the ſtate; but they knew that treaſon would find a ready admiſſion thro' the doors of the church.

The aſſembly of divines in Scotland was ſitting when the Engliſh commiſſioners arrived; and perhaps never were there ſeen together ſuch a number of men ſo groſsly ignorant, and ſo impiouſly arrogant, tho' dignified with a ſacred function, and concealed under the diſguiſe of public zeal. The epiſcopal clergy, who had a principal ſhare in the government when the alteration in religion took place, had either been ſequeſtered, or enjoyed very little credit with the covenanters, and every vacancy that happened had been filled with the weakeſt and moſt violent men their country produced. Henderſon, their moderator, in any other company of clergymen would have made but a contemptible figure, while Rutherford, Gilleſpie, and the other leading members of the aſſembly, by their writings and deportment, rendered it juſtly a queſtion whether they were more fit for the diſcipline of a ſchool, or that of a mad-houſe. Tho' Argyle, Loudon and other great men, who had done ſo much for public liberty, had induſtriouſly encouraged this ignorance and frenzy in their teachers, they now began to feel the inconveniencies of both. The weakeſt minds are ſuſceptible of ambition; the luſt of power is common to the wiſe and the fooliſh. The enthuſiaſtic teachers were ſoon ſenſible of their own importance; and the torrent of zeal they poured out againſt popery, prelacy, and the like unmeaning words, grew more ungovernable, and ſwept before it all conſiderations of duty, loyalty, national independence, and public ſafety. When the Engliſh commiſſioners preſented their letters and credentials from the Weſtminſter divines, they were received as angels ſpeaking from heaven; and without conſulting any thing but their own frantic zeal, they propoſed that a new league and covenant ſhould be taken by the ſubjects of both kingdoms. Not contented with the eſtabliſhment of preſbyterian diſcipline in their own country, they indulged an ardent paſſion for propagating, by every method, that mode of religion in the neighbouring kingdoms. Perſuaded, in the fervency of their zeal, that, by ſupernatural aſſiſtance, they ſhould be enabled to carry their triumphant covenant to the gates of Rome itſelf, their joy was unbounded when a proſpect opened of rendering it prevalent in England.

Vane, who in eloquence, addreſs, capacity, as well as in art and diſſimulation, was not ſurpaſſed by any perſon, even of that age ſo famous in active talents, framed this ſolemn league and covenant, which effaced all the former proteſtations and vows taken in both kingdoms, and long maintained its credit and authority. By this inſtrument they ſolemnly engaged themſelves to purſue the univerſal extirpation of popery and prelacy in England, "as well as in Scotland, leſt they ſhould be partakers of other men's ſins;" and undertook to purſue to extremity all incendiaries and malignants; terms which they extended as far, and to whom they pleaſed: and vowed an eternal adherence to a firm peace and union between the two kingdoms. They alſo vowed to preſerve the reformed religion eſtabliſhed in the church of Scotland; but, by the artifice of Vane, no declaration more explicit was made with regard to England and Ireland, than that theſe kingdoms ſhould be reformed, according to the word of God, and the examples of the pureſt churches. The Scots zealots, indeed, deemed this expreſſion entirely free from ambiguity; they regarded their own model as the only one which correſponded, in any degree, to ſuch a deſcription. Guthrie, afterwards biſhop of Dunkeld, was the only member in the aſſembly of divines that perceived the ambiguity, or, at leaſt, that had the courage to hint at what afterwards happened, namely, the danger that an independent party might afterwards root out preſbytery, as well as prelacy, unleſs the aſſembly declared, in expreſs terms, what plan of church-government they intended both nations ſhould follow. His ſpeech, however reaſonable in itſelf, ſerved only to draw upon him an enormous load of public reproach; and the work of the zealots was hurried on ſo faſt, that the new ſolemn league and covenant was voted unanimouſly.

The convention of the ſtates applauded the piety of the aſſembly; and, in the height of their zeal, ordered every one to ſwear to this covenant, under the penalties of being puniſhed as enemies to religion, his majeſty's honour, and the peace of his kingdoms; of having their goods and eſtates confiſcated; of being rendered incapable of enjoying any benefit or office within the kingdom; of being cited before the next parliament, as enemies to religion, the king, and the ſtate; and of receiving what farther puniſhment his majeſty and the parliament ſhould inflict upon them.

The natural reſult of this covenant was a treaty with the Engliſh parliament; by which the Scots engaged to raiſe an army of ſixteen thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe. Deſirous that the ſword ſhould carry conviction to all refractory minds, they prepared themſelves, with great alacrity, to their military enterprizes. Their levies were ſoon completed. The hopes of good pay and warm quarters, added to a favourable diſpoſition for the cauſe, induced numbers to enliſt; ſo that their army was ready, by the end of the year, to enter England, under their old general the earl of Leven.

Perceiving the tempeſt that was gathering in the north, Charles endeavoured to ſecure himſelf by every expedient in his power. Ireland ſeemed to promiſe aſſiſtance. He accordingly concluded a ceſſation of arms with the papiſts: and the duke of Ormond ſent over conſiderable bodies of his forces to England, by which means the royal army was greatly augmented. The ſucceſs of prince Maurice in the weſt alſo tended to raiſe the ſpirits of the king's party. He had formed the ſiege of Exeter, which was defended by the earl of Stamford, who was ſoon obliged to ſurrender the city. This was an important acquiſition; but Maurice was ſo pleaſed with his new conqueſt, and the daily additions he received of men and money from the neighbouring counties, that he ſtayed too long at Exeter, without ſending any aſſiſtance to colonel Digby, who had beſieged Plymouth, a place of great importance. The royaliſts were, indeed, for ſome time, perſuaded, that the town would be delivered up to him, by Sir Alexander Carew, the governor; but the deſign was diſcovered, and Carew ſent priſoner to London. Digby, however, made himſelf maſter of mount Stamford, and had certainly taken Plymouth, had prince Maurice come in time to his aſſiſtance. But the prince, deceived by the negotiation with Carew, inſtead of marching to Plymouth, led his forces to Dartmouth, and, after a tedious ſiege, reduced the town. He then marched to Plymouth, and joined Digby; but it was now too late. The garriſon, before his arrival, had received a reinforcement of ſix hundred men from Portſmouth, under the command of an intrepid and experienced officer, who made ſo noble a defence, that prince Maurice, after ſuſtaining a conſiderable loſs, was obliged to raiſe the ſiege.

It is impoſſible, in a general hiſtory, to enumerate all the warlike operations of this buſy year. A war extended over the whole kingdom, left hardly room for any man to continue neuter, however agreeable to his wiſhes. Every county became a ſcene of horror and of blood. Not only forts and caſtles, but alſo the ſeats of the nobility and gentry, ſuſtained long ſieges. Each action, each ſiege, and almoſt each ſkirmiſh, did honour to ſome particular family; though, in ſuch a multitude, many particulars that well deſerved to be tranſmitted to poſterity, are forgotten, and ſwept away among the refuſe of things. But upon the whole, notwithſtanding the exploits of Eſſex, Cromwell and Fairfax, the affairs of the king were in a much better ſituation than they were at the cloſe of the preceding campaign. Lord Clarendon tells us, that he had now five armies in the field. The principality of Wales, an inconſiderable part of it excepted, was at his devotion. Plymouth, Poole, and Lyme, were the only places of ſtrength in the weſtern counties poſſeſſed by the parliament. Hull was the only conſiderable place they held in Yorkſhire; and Nantwich, in Cheſhire. But, on the other hand, the parliament had received infinite encouragement. The earl of Eſſex had diſtinguiſhed himſelf, by his military talents, above either his rivals or his enemies. He was entirely poſſeſſed of the affections of his own ſoldiers, and therefore capable of executing the moſt dangerous ſervice. The earl of Mancheſter was the idol of the aſſociated counties, and even many of the royaliſts held him in great eſteem. Though almoſt a ſtranger himſelf to the military ſcience, yet Cromwell, perhaps the beſt ſoldier of the age, ſerved under him with ſo much ſucceſs, that the ſcale of war where he fought was greatly turned in favour of the parliament. The conduct, courage, and reputation of the elder and the younger Fairfax, did honour to the cauſe they had embraced. They loſt no credit when vanquiſhed, nor committed any acts of cruelty when victorious. This moderation prevented many in the north, who favoured the royal cauſe, from exerting themſelves with that vigour they would otherwiſe have done. Sir William Waller continued ſtill the idol of the London populace, though his actions, ſince the battle of Lanſdown, deſerved very little applauſe. Many other officers diſtinguiſhed themſelves in ſupporting the ſame cauſe, and the parliament prudently rewarded even their miſcarriages, when they were aſſured of their good intentions, and that they had done every thing in their power to deſerve ſucceſs.

But the eyes of all parties were now principally turned towards Scotland, it being chiefly from that kingdom they expected deliverance or feared deſtruction. It is almoſt incredible with what ſeverity the divines in that kingdom proceeded againſt all who refuſed their covenant. Thoſe preachers and profeſſors of the goſpel of peace, iſſued the moſt peremptory orders for ſeizing the goods, collecting the rents, and apprehending the perſons of the royaliſts. Nor were they contented even with this unjuſt ſeverity, dictated by their fanatical ſtrain of devotion, they gave a commiſſion to the ſoldiers in general, to put to death all who refuſed to take the covenant, and made any reſiſtance to their being ſent to priſon. So ſhamefully were the precepts of the moſt benevolent religion wreſted to ſerve the purpoſes of fanaticiſm and ambition!

There ſtill remained in the Engliſh parliament ſome members, who, though they had been induced either by private ambition or by their zeal for civil liberty, to concur with the majority, ſtill retained an attachment to the hierarchy, and to the ancient modes of worſhip. But in the preſent danger, which threatened their cauſe, all ſcruples were laid aſide; and the covenant, by whoſe means alone they could expect to obtain ſo conſiderable a reinforcement as an acceſſion of the whole Scottiſh nation, was received without oppoſition. The parliament therefore having firſt ſubſcribed it themſelves, ordered it to be received by all who acknowledged their authority. This cauſed great rejoicings among the Scots. They highly applauded themſelves in being the happy inſtruments of extending their mode of worſhip, and diſſipating that profound darkneſs in which, they fancied, all the neighbouring nations were involved. Happy people, ſaid the zealots, you will no longer ſuffer thoſe badges of popery, the ſurplice, the tippet, and the corner-cap, to defile your characters.

The French ambaſſador had offered the mediation of his maſter to put an end to the horrors of civil diſcord, by concluding a laſting peace. Before the parliament had acquired the aſſiſtance of the Scots, they appeared to liſten to his propoſals; but he was now given to underſtand that his offers were rejected. They were, however, ſtill diſtreſſed for money: they had ſent a large ſum to Scotland to put that army in motion, and the city ſeemed not forward to ſupply their wants. Eſſex relapſed into his former indifference, and ſeemed very deſirous of putting an end to the war. He was far from being pleaſed with the ſteps taken by the parliament for introducing a foreign army, which muſt greatly increaſe the diſtreſſes of his country, already much too great; eſpecially as his own troops were in great want of neceſſaries. He therefore ſent a meſſage to both houſes, acquainting them, that if his army, which lay at St. Alban's, was not ſpeedily ſupplied, he muſt throw up his commiſſion. Fairfax and lord Gray made ſimilar complaints, and diſplayed, in pathetic language, the diſtreſſes of their troops. Anſwers were immediately diſpatched, promiſing them relief, as ſoon as the neceſſary ſupplies could be raiſed: but they rejected every offer for putting an end to the war; and as a finiſhing blow to all terms of accommodation, formal preparations were made for the trial of Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury.

A.D. 1644. The unfortunate primate ſtill continued in priſon, and had been for ſome time deprived of his eſtate and goods by the violence of the commons. Though it is certain that no ſubject had more largely contributed to the errors of government, yet his enemies, however keen and artful in their reſentments, found inſurmountable difficulties in forming a charge which could amount to high treaſon. His firmneſs had not forſaken him in his confinement; he ſtill continued his oppoſition to the parliament, and obſtinately refuſed to collate a perſon to a living, when recommended to him by the faction. But ſtill his caſe was very different from that of the judges, becauſe it was next to impoſſible to convict him legally of what he had ſaid and recommended at the council-board, in which his chief crimes conſiſted. This did not, however, prevent the faction from treating him with the utmoſt ſeverity. His books and papers were ſeized by an order from both houſes; and his famous diary printed and publiſhed. But notwithſtanding all the violence of his proſecutors, the articles againſt Laud were very defective, and they were obliged to have recourſe to the ſame method uſed before in the caſe of Strafford, that of accumulated treaſon; though it was confeſſed, that no article, ſingly conſidered, amounted to treaſon. The charge againſt him, when properly reduced, conſiſted of three general heads. 1. "A traiterous endeavour to ſubvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and to introduce arbitrary and tyrannical government. 2. A traiterous endeavour to ſubvert God's true religion as by law eſtabliſhed, and to ſet up popiſh ſuperſtition and idolatry in its ſtead. 3. An attempt to ſubvert the rights of parliament, and the ancient courſe of parliamentary proceedings." The moſt trifling allegations were brought to ſupport this general charge. The moſt bitter ſpeeches were made againſt him, and ſome of them delivered in the coarſeſt expreſſions. But notwithſtanding all the ſpirit exerted againſt the primate, the lords proceeded very ſlowly in his trial; while he defended himſelf with ſo much vigour, reaſon and eloquence, that the proſecution was for ſome time at a ſtand. His ruin was, however, determined, and every expedient was to be tried to complete it. The populace were no ſooner informed, that it was doubtful whether the lords would find him guilty, than petitions were ſigned by a great number of citizens, for bringing him and the biſhop of Ely to juſtice. This produced ſo great a ferment, that the earl of Pembroke, a violent enemy to Laud, intimated to them, that if they delayed any longer to give the ſatisfaction expected by the commons, the citizens would aſſemble and demand juſtice, as they did in the caſe of Strafford. Mr. Strode, one of the managers of the proſecution againſt the archbiſhop, threw out a menace of the ſame kind, at the bar of the houſe of lords; but upon their reſenting it, he declared he had not done it in conſequence of any commiſſion from the commons, and that he meant not any affront to the peers. The lords were ſatisfied with this apology, and he was diſmiſſed without cenſure. The lords were, however, greatly intimidated, and the greater number attended not the ſervice of the houſe. The primate's enemies took advantage of this ceſſion, and when no more than fourteen peers were in the houſe, Laud was voted guilty of endeavouring to ſubvert the laws, overthrow the proteſtant religion, and lay aſide the uſe of parliaments. But none of theſe articles, nor even all of them conjoined, were found by the judges to amount to high treaſon by any known eſtabliſhed law of the land; and the lords declared themſelves of the ſame opinion in a conference with the commons. Diſappointed in their expectations of capitally convicting Laud, his enemies appointed a faſt to be held, in order to rouſe the ſpirit of the populace. A petition againſt delinquents was preſented to the lower houſe, and every ſymptom of a dangerous convulſion appeared. The commons were, however, obliged to have recourſe to their legiſlative authority, and paſs an ordinance for taking away the life of this aged prelate. But notwithſtanding the low condition into which the houſe of peers had fallen, there appeared ſome intention of rejecting this ordinance, and the popular leaders were again obliged to apply to the multitude, and to extinguiſh, by threats of new tumults, the ſmall remains of liberty poſſeſſed by the upper houſe. Apprehenſive of the dangerous conſequences that might follow their attending their duty, and determined not to vote againſt the dictates of their conſciences, only ſeven peers were in the houſe when the important queſtion was decided.

The primate, who had long expected the fatal ſentence, ſunk not under its terrors. His fears diſſipated in proportion as the fatal hour, that was to put a period to his mortal exiſtence, approached. "No man (ſaid he) can be more willing to ſend me out of life, than I am deſirous to go." He behaved upon the ſcaffold with great firmneſs and decency, laid his head on the block with calmneſs and reſignation, and it was ſevered from his body by one blow of the executioner.

Laud had enjoyed many ſad hours of leiſure during his impriſonment, to reflect, that the meaſure he had dealt to others was meted out to himſelf. He was an eminent inſtance that a great ſcholar may be a weak man, and a favourite miniſter a poor politician; that miſtaken zeal is ſometimes as fatal to the cauſe it would ſupport, as premeditated treachery; and that nothing can more irritate the people of England, than to ſee religion affecting to hold the reins of government, and government actuated by the caprices of eccleſiaſtical authority. However miſtaken, he was doubtleſs ſincere, and actuated by religious motives in all his purſuits. It was this that ſupported him in the dreadful hour of trial, and rendered his laſt moments remarkably tranquil and compoſed. He ſuffered in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age.

While preparations were making for opening the campaign, the king ſummoned the members of both houſes who adhered to his intereſt to meet at Oxford. He hoped, by this meaſure, to avail himſelf of the name of a parliament, ſo paſſionately cheriſhed by the Engliſh nation. The houſe of peers was ſo full, that though many lords were employed in different parts of the kingdom, it contained more than double the number of members that voted at Weſtminſter. But the houſe of commons did not amount to above one hundred and fifty, not more than half the other houſe of commons. The ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the king; and the aſſembly, in order to enable him to recruit his army with more ſucceſs, granted him the ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds, to be levied by way of loan upon the ſubject. The king accordingly circulated privy-ſeals, counterſigned by the ſpeakers of both houſes, requiring the loan of particular ſums from ſuch perſons as lived within the places ſubject to his authority.

As the king, in all his offers for peace, required nothing more than the re-eſtabliſhment of the laws and conſtitution, and the ſame rights which had even been enjoyed by his predeceſſors, every diſcourſe of peace, and every diſcuſſion of the terms on which that bleſſing could be obtained, tended greatly to promote his intereſt; eſpecially as he offered, in order to facilitate ſo valuable an end, to paſs an univerſal act of oblivion, and to grant a toleration or indulgence to tender conſciences. On the other hand, the parliament ſtudiouſly avoided, as much as poſſible, all advances towards negotiation; becauſe the terms on which they were willing to conclude a peace, were of too exorbitant a nature for a general diſcuſſion. They were unwilling to expoſe to the eyes of the public their pretenſions, though they well knew their partizans were blinded with the thickeſt veil of religious prejudices. Senſible of their advantages, the parliament at Oxford wrote the following letter to the earl of Eſſex, the only channel by which it could be conveyed to the commons at Weſtminſter; Charles having declared that they were no longer a free parliament, and conſequently entitled to no authority.

"My lord,

"His majeſty having, by his proclamation, ſummoned all the members of both houſes of parliament to attend him at Oxford; we whoſe names are underwritten, are here met and aſſembled, in obedience to his majeſty's commands. His majeſty was pleaſed to invite us, in the ſame proclamation, by theſe gracious expreſſions, that his ſubjects ſhould ſee how willing he was to receive advice, for the preſervation of the religion, laws, and ſafety of the kingdom, and, as far as in him lay, to reſtore it to its former peace and ſecurity (his chief and only end) from thoſe whom they had truſted, though he could not receive it in the place where he appointed. This moſt gracious invitation hath not only been made unto us, but ſeconded and heightened by ſuch unqueſtionable demonſtrations of the deep and princely ſenſe which poſſeſſes his royal heart of the miſeries and calamities of his poor ſubjects, in this unnatural war, and of his moſt entire and paſſionate affections to redeem them from that ſad and deplorable condition, by all ways poſſible, conſiſtent either with his honour, or with the future ſafety of the kingdom, that as it were impiety to queſtion the ſincerity of them, ſo were it great want of duty and faithfulneſs in us (his majeſty having declared, that he called us to be witneſſes of his actions, and privy to his intentions) ſhould we not teſtify, and witneſs to all the world the aſſurance we have of the piety and ſincerity of both. We being entirely ſatisfied of this truth, cannot but confeſs, that, amidſt our higheſt affections, in the deep and piercing ſenſe of the preſent miſeries and deſolations of our country, and thoſe further dangers threatened from Scotland, we are at length erected into ſome chearful and comfortable thoughts, that poſſibly we may yet (by God's mercy, if his juſtice have not determined this nation, for its ſins, to total ruin and deſolation) hope to be the happy inſtruments of our country's redemption from the miſeries of war, and reſtitution to the bleſſings of peace.

"And we being deſirous to believe your lordſhip, however engaged, a perſon likely to be ſenſibly touched with theſe conſiderations, have thought fit to invite you to that part in this bleſſed work, which is only capable to repair all our miſfortunes, and to buoy up the kingdom from ruin; that is, by conjuring you, by all the obligations that have power upon honour, conſcience, or public piety; that laying to heart, as we do, the inward bleeding condition of your country, and the outward more menacing deſtruction by a foreign nation, upon the very point of invading it, you will co-operate with us to its preſervation, by truly repreſenting to, and faithfully and induſtriouſly promoting with thoſe by whom you are truſted, this following moſt ſincere, and moſt earneſt deſire of ours; that, they joining with us in a right ſenſe of the paſt, preſent, and more threatening calamities of this deplorable kingdom, ſome perſons be appointed on either part, and a place agreed upon, to treat of ſuch a peace, as may yet redeem it from the brink of deſolation.

"This addreſs we ſhould not have made, but that his majeſty's ſummons, by which we are met, moſt graciouſly proclaiming pardon to all without exception, is evidence enough, that his mercy and clemency can tranſcend all former provocations; and that he had not only made us witneſſes of his princely intentions, but honoured us alſo with the name of being ſecurity for them. God Almighty direct your lordſhip, and thoſe to whom you ſhall preſent theſe our moſt real deſires, in ſuch a courſe as may produce that happy peace, and ſettlement of the preſent diſtractions, which is ſo heartily deſired and prayed for by us, and which may make us, Yours, &c."

This letter was ſubſcribed by the prince of Wales, the duke of York, and forty-three noblemen, and ſent by a trumpeter to the earl of Eſſex. But that nobleman, however diſguſted with the furious meaſures of the parliament, and however deſirous of a reaſonable peace, was ſtill more reſolute to preſerve an honourable fidelity to the truſt repoſed in him. He therefore, in his anſwer to the earl of Forth, the king's general, obſerved, that as the paper ſent him neither contained any addreſs to the two houſes of parliament, nor any acknowledgment of their authority, he could not communicate it to them.

Deſirous, however, of making another attempt for bringing about a peace, Charles determined to have recourſe to the parliament at Weſtminſter. A ſafe conduct was accordingly demanded from Eſſex for two perſons to treat upon an accommodation. Eſſex readily complied, and the king accordingly ſent the following meſſage for concluding a treaty of peace.

“Out of our moſt tender and pious ſenſe of the ſad and bleeding condition of this our kingdom, and our unwearied deſires to apply remedies, which, by the bleſſing of God, may recover it from utter ruin; by the advice of the lords and commons of parliament, aſſembled at Oxford, we do propoſe and deſire, that a convenient number of fit perſons may be appointed and authoriſed by you, to meet, with all convenient ſpeed, at ſuch place as you ſhall nominate, with an equal number of fit perſons, whom we ſhall appoint and authoriſe, to treat of the ways and means to ſettle the preſent diſtractions of this our kingdom, and to procure a happy peace; and particularly how all the members of both houſes may ſecurely meet in a free and full convention of parliament, there to treat, conſult, and agree upon ſuch things as may conduce to the maintenance and defence of the true reformed proteſtant religion, with due conſideration to all juſt and reaſonable eaſe of tender conſciences; to the ſettling and maintaining our juſt rights and prerogatives; of the rights and privileges of parliament; the laws of the land; the liberty and property of the ſubject; and all other expedients that may conduce to the bleſſed end of a firm and laſting peace, both in church and ſtate, and a perfect underſtanding between us and our people; wherein no endeavours of ours ſhall be wanting. And God direct your hearts in the ways of peace.

The commons were very unwilling to open any negotiation for a peace; and, at the ſame time, thought it would be imprudent to lay aſide the propoſal, leſt the people ſhould imagine they were determined to reject every offer for an accommodation. After long debates in the upper houſe, the peers ſent the following paper to the commons: “That the lords have obſerved in this letter from his majeſty, among other things, that what is propoſed in it is by the advice of the lords and commons of parliament aſſembled at Oxford, the very ſame title given to this parliament; which puts them at Oxford on an equality with us, though they are perſons who have, contrary to their duty, deſerted the parliament, and have contributed to the maintenance of the war againſt it, and therefore are, and may be juſtly excluded.

“Their lordſhips further obſerve, that though there are in the letter ſome general words, for religion, eaſe of tender conſciences, his majeſty's juſt prerogatives, rights and privileges of parliament, laws of the land, and liberty and property of the ſubjects; yet the only expedient offered for theſe ends is to treat, how the members of both houſes may ſecurely meet in a full and free convocation of parliament; whereof no other concluſion can be made, than that this is not a full and free convention of parliament; and that to make a full and free convention, the preſence of thoſe at Oxford is neceſſary.

“Their lordſhips therefore offer it to the houſe of commons, to deſire their concurrence herein, that a letter may be written, in very plain and humble language, to his majeſty; repreſenting to him, among other things, that the continuance of this parliament here is eſtabliſhed by a law paſſed by himſelf; in which (as in all other laws of the kingdom) he is ſworn to maintain, as we are ſworn to our allegiance; that we muſt in duty, and are bound and reſolved, with our lives and fortunes, to defend and preſerve the juſt rights and full powers of this parliament; that as we have uſed all means for a juſt and ſafe peace, ſo we will never be wanting to do our utmoſt for the procuring of it; and as the only means by which we can hope to effect ſo deſirable an end, we do humbly and earneſtly deſire his majeſty to come to his parliament by ſuch a day as ſhall be named; and that if he will not, we muſt uſe ſuch means, and make ſuch proviſion for the preſent and future preſervation of religion and of the kingdom, as, in the wiſdom of the two houſes, ſhall be thought fit and neceſſary.

“Their lordſhips deſire, that this letter may be ſpeedily diſpatched; and alſo, that a declaration to the kingdom upon this, and the former letter from Oxford, be drawn up and publiſhed, to undeceive the people of the artifices they contain, under the pretence of peace, to ſet up another parliament; and that if the houſe of commons approve thereof, it may be referred to the committee of the two kingdoms, to prepare both for the two houſes.”

The commons were of the ſame opinion with the lords; and a letter was accordingly diſpatched to the king at Oxford, refuſing to open any negotiation, unleſs he would acknowledge them to be the only parliament: and the king, who knew what ſmall hopes there appeared of any accommodation, refuſed to abandon the pretenſions he had aſſumed, nor acknowledge the two houſes at Weſtminſter more openly for a free parliament.

The great ſums of money that had been ſent from England to Scotland, and the flattering aſſurances the Scots had received, that they ſhould now be entitled to all the privileges of Engliſhmen, had the deſired effect; and the Scottiſh army marched for England with great alacrity. But notwithſtanding all theſe advantages, the rebellion in that country was far from being general. Some of their greateſt men were ſo thoroughly convinced of the good intentions of Charles, that they refuſed to accept of any command raiſed againſt the royal party in England. But the clergy and populace were of a very different opinion; they made no ſcruple of ruſhing into the field without provocation, and in a quarrel in which they had no concern. Had they known their true intereſts, they ought rather to have joined the oppoſite party, as the ſureſt means of eſtabliſhing the liberties and privileges they enjoyed on a ſolid foundation. The Scottiſh army was in excellent order, and conſiſted of eighteen thouſand foot, three thouſand horſe, and ſix hundred dragoons, all of them commanded by their own countrymen. A committee of the Engliſh, as well as their own parliament, attended them as field deputies, and they entered England on the nineteenth of January. They paſſed the Tyne on a bridge of boats, and ſummoned the town of Newcaſtle, which had been fortified by the care and vigilance of Sir Thomas Glenham, to ſurrender. They did not, however, make any attempt upon the place, becauſe the marquis of Newcaſtle lay at Durham with an army of fourteen thouſand men. Nor did they continue idle; they made themſelves maſters of the caſtles of Wark and Morpeth; and fortified a ſmall ſea-port town called Blyfnock, for the conveniency of receiving proviſions. They were, however, ſoon reduced, by a great want of forage and other neceſſaries; and the expedition would probably have been rendered abortive, had not the marquis been obliged to march back to the defence of York.

Colonel Bellaſis, whom he had left with a conſiderable body of troops, was totally routed at Selby by Sir Thomas Fairfax. This misfortune obliged Newcaſtle to abandon Durham. Afraid of being incloſed between two armies, he retreated to York; and the Scottiſh general having joined Fairfax, they blocked up that city. But as the combined forces were not numerous enough to inveſt ſo large a place divided by a river, they contented themſelves with preventing any reinforcement of troops from joining the marquis. Some time before Newcaſtle's retreat, another party of the parliament's forces, under the command of Meldrum, had beſieged Newark, a place of the utmoſt importance to the royaliſts, as it kept open a communication between the king's ſouthern and northern quarters. Prince Rupert was, therefore, ordered to attempt the relief of that fortreſs. Rupert was at Cheſter when he received the order, but aſſembling immediately his troops, which amounted to about ſeven thouſand men, he advanced with ſuch expedition to Newark, that he ſurprized Meldrum's army, and after killing about five hundred men, he diſarmed the reſt, and ſeized all their cannon, carriages, and baggage. This defeat ſtruck terror into the garriſons of the neighbouring towns, and Gainſborough, Lincoln, Slyford, and ſeveral other places were abandoned by the parliament's forces. The prince alſo relieved Latham-houſe, which had been beſieged by a body of two thouſand men, and gallantly defended for eighteen weeks, by the counteſs of Derby. He took Bolton by ſtorm, put the garriſon to the ſword, and marched to Liverpool, which made no reſiſtance. His army was now increaſed to ten thouſand men, full of ſpirits, and fluſhed with victory.

While the prince continued at Liverpool, the earl of Mancheſter made himſelf maſter of Lincoln, and joined the Scots and the army of Fairfax before York. That city, though vigorouſly defended by Newcaſtle at the head of his army, was ſoon reduced to extremities; and the parliament's generals after enduring the hardſhips of a winter's campaign, and ſuffering great loſſes from ſkirmiſhes with the enemy, flattered themſelves that all their labours would now be crowned with ſucceſs. But they were ſoon alarmed with the news that prince Rupert was approaching. That intrepid general, having joined Sir Charles Lucas, who commanded Newcaſtle's cavalry, haſtened to the relief of York, at the head of an army of twenty thouſand men. The combined army immediately raiſed the ſiege, and retreated to Marſton-moor, in order to give battle to the royaliſts. Prince Rupert, informed of their intention, approached the city by another quarter, and interpoſing the river Ouſe between him and the enemy, ſafely joined his forces with thoſe of Newcaſtle. The marquis endeavoured to perſuade him, that, having ſo ſucceſsfully effected his purpoſe, he ought to be contented with the preſent advantage, and leave the enemy, now much diminiſhed by their loſſes, and diſcouraged by their ill ſucceſs, to diſſolve by thoſe mutual diſſentions, which had taken place among them. Had Rupert liſtened to this advice, he had, in all probability, triumphed over the enemy without ſtriking a blow. The Scots had found themſelves greatly diſappointed during their march, in which they thought to have met with little or no reſiſtance. They had expected the plunder of the richeſt counties in England, and their generals thought of nothing leſs than of making the Engliſh officers ſerve under them. In all theſe particulars they were deceived, and their rough, vexatious manners, rendered them exceſſively odious to the Engliſh commanders. Their avarice was inſatiable, and all their words and conduct ſhewed that good pay and the hopes of plunder, were the chief motives that excited them to undertake the expedition. When theſe failed, and when they found that the money granted by the parliament was not ſo punctually paid as it had been liberally voted, they began to talk of returning to their own country to defend it againſt the attempts of Montroſe, who was then in arms, and acting under the king's commiſſion. They would infallibly have carried this deſign into execution, had it not been for the hopes of an engagement, when they flattered themſelves of acquiring riches by plundering the baggage of the enemy. But when prince Rupert reached York, by taking a different rout, they became more ſullen than ever. Mancheſter, Fairfax and Cromwell, were, by no means, fond of their company, while this moroſe, diſcontented humour prevailed; they would have thought it leſs diſhonourable to have ſubmitted to a generous enemy, than to be inſulted by their own needy mercenaries. Newcaſtle was no ſtranger to theſe diviſions among them, and urged the propriety of continuing quiet in their quarters and ſuffer their enemies to periſh by their own diſſentions. But theſe arguments were urged in vain; fighting was the element of prince Rupert. He entertained the moſt invincible contempt of the Scots; and he had a few days before received a letter from the king, containing little leſs than a poſitive command to fight them upon almoſt any terms, even after he had relieved York. But the greateſt misfortune was a miſunderſtanding between the prince and the marquis of Newcaſtle, whoſe characters agreed only in perſonal courage, and a ſtrong attachment to the king's ſervice. The marquis loved fighting; but hated the fatigues of war; the prince loved both. The marquis had ſerved the king with his perſon and fortune, the prince with his perſon only. The marquis truſted greatly to King, his lieutenant-general; the prince ſurveyed and directed every thing in his own perſon. The marquis was fond of ſtate and ceremony; the prince deſpiſed both; and each was jealous of the great merits of the other, with regard to the favour of the ſovereign, who equally loved and honoured them both.

When Rupert entered York, he took upon himſelf the command of the whole army, and told the marquis, that he intended the next day, the ſecond of July, to draw out the garriſon and give battle to the enemy. The officers who could uſe the greateſt freedom with the prince, uſed every argument in their power to diſſuade him from this reſolution; but all their attempts were in vain; the prince continued fixed to his purpoſe; and the marquis, that he might not incur the leaſt imputation of fear, ſubmitted to the order; but at the ſame time reſolved to ſerve under the prince in no other capacity, than that of captain of his own troop of horſe.

The enemy, not imagining the prince would hazard a battle in his ſituation, were filing off towards Tadcaſter, Cawood, and Selby, in order to cover the eaſt-riding of Yorkſhire, and render it more difficult for the royaliſts to obtain ſupplies, when they were agreeably ſurprized to perceive, that the prince, by the diſpoſitions he was making, intended to fight them. They immediately recalled all their advanced parties, and formed the line of battle. While theſe diſpoſitions were making in the parliamentary army, the garriſon of York were ſo diſcontented at the behaviour of the prince towards their favourite general, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty the marquis and general King perſuaded them to march out of the city and join the royal army. This junction being compleated, the prince formed his line of battle. He himſelf commanded the right wing, which conſiſted of five thouſand horſe. The generals Goving and Potter, commanded the main body; and Sir Charles Lucas and colonel Henry, the left wing: the whole army conſiſted of ſeventeen thouſand foot, nine thouſand horſe, and a train of twenty-five pieces of cannon. The parliamentary army were, at leaſt, equal to that of the prince in number. Sir Thomas Fairfax and colonel Lambert, commanded the right wing, in which the Scottiſh cavalry was poſted. His father, the lord Fairfax, and general Leven, commanded the main body; and the earl of Mancheſter, aſſiſted by Cromwell, the left wing. Before the battle began the marquis of Newcaſtle and his friends again deſired the prince to ſuſpend the action; aſſuring ing him, that they hourly expected a reinforcement of three thouſand men from the north, and that Montroſe was actually on his march, at the head of an army, to join them from Scotland. But the prince was deaf to every argument; he would liſten to nothing but that of fighting the enemy immediately. The battle was begun by prince Rupert, who charged, with his uſual fury, the left wing of the parliament army, where Cromwell conducted the choiceſt troops, enured to danger under that determined leader, animated by zeal, and confirmed by the moſt rigid diſcipline. This body ſtood firm, and charged in their turn with ſo much impetuoſity, that the cavalry of the royaliſts gave way; and the infantry that ſtood next to them, was alſo borne down, and put to flight. Newcaſtle's regiment alone, reſolute to conquer or periſh, obſtinately kept their ground, and maintained, by their dead bodies, the ſame order in which they had firſt been ranged. Sir Thomas Fairfax and colonel Lambert, alſo broke through the royaliſts; and tranſported by the fury of purſuit, ſoon reached their victorious friends, who were alſo in purſuit of the enemy. But this indiſcreet impetuoſity had nearly proved fatal to the parliamentary army. Sir Charles Lucas, who commanded in the right wing, perceiving that the tempeſt was paſt, reſtored order to his broken troops, and made ſo furious an attack on the parliamentary cavalry, that they were thrown into diſorder, puſhed upon their own infantry, and the whole wing put to flight. Animated with this ſucceſs, the royaliſts flattered themſelves that the difficulty was over, and were on the point of ſeizing the carriages and baggage of the enemy, when Cromwell appeared in his return from purſuing the broken forces of the other wing. Both parties ſeemed aſtoniſhed when they perceived that another battle muſt be fought before the victory, which each thought their own, could be obtained. The charge was again renewed with its former fury, and the balance of victory for ſome time ſuſpended: but after the utmoſt efforts of courage by both armies, the parliamentary forces prevailed. Rupert's whole army was puſhed off the field of battle, and his train of artillery taken by the enemy. About four thouſand of the royaliſts were ſlain, and fifteen hundred taken priſoners, among whom were Sir Charles Lucas, and ſeveral other perſons of note. Not above three hundred ſoldiers fell on the parliament's ſide, among whom were a Scotch lord, and a lieutenant-colonel.

Enraged to find all his ſucceſsful labours rendered abortive by one act of fatal temerity, the marquis of Newcaſtle determined to paſs over to the continent, and abandon a party where he met with ſuch unworthy treatment. Munificent and generous in his expences; polite and elegant in his taſte; courteous and humane in his behaviour; the marquis had brought a great acceſſion of friends and of credit to the cauſe he embraced: but he was now loſt to the royal party. He repaired immediately to Scarborough with a few friends, where he found a veſſel ready to ſail, and which landed him ſafely in France. He continued abroad till the reſtoration; and, tho' reduced to neceſſity, he ſcorned to acknowledge the uſurped authority of thoſe who aſſumed the government of England, and enjoyed his opulent fortune.

The reſolution of Rupert was equally precipitate. For though the cavalry of the royaliſts was, in a manner, ſtill entire, and though the greater part of the infantry had eſcaped into York, he determined to abandon that city, and march his army towards Oxford, which was ſtill in the king's poſſeſſion. Rupert had no ſooner left the city of York, than it was beſieged by the parliament's army. Glenham, who commanded the garriſon, made a brave defence, but was at laſt obliged to capitulate on honourable terms. Lord Fairfax was made governor, and a thouſand horſe were ſent into Lancaſhire to join the parliamentary forces in that quarter, and watch the motions of prince Rupert.

The king's forces in the ſouthern quarters wore alſo a melancholy aſpect in the beginning of the year; but they were conducted with greater abilities and greater ſucceſs. Apprehenſive that the parliamentary forces would attempt the ſiege of Oxford, Charles ſent the queen to Exeter, where he hoped ſhe might be delivered unmoleſted, of the child of which ſhe was now pregnant, and alſo eſcape eaſily into France if preſſed by the forces of the enemy. Eſſex and Waller, who commanded the two armies of the parliament, received orders to join their forces and march towards Oxford; and if they found the king continue in that city to beſiege it, and by one deciſive blow put an end to the war. Charles ordered a rendezvous of his forces at Marlborough, and after proroguing his parliament at Oxford, came in perſon to the camp, and reviewed his army, which conſiſted of ſix thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe. As ſoon as the armies under Eſſex and Waller began their march towards Oxford, Charles drew his garriſon out of Reading, and demoliſhed the fortifications; the place being in no condition to ſtand a ſiege, if attacked by ſo powerful a force. It is not eaſy to ſay what might have been the conſequence had the junction between the forces of Eſſex and Waller been effected, as they amounted to upwards of twenty thouſand men; but theſe two generals hated each other ſo heartily, that they always found means to evade the orders of the parliament. Eſſex took poſſeſſion of Abingdon, the place being unaccountably abandoned by the king's forces. Waller, at the ſame time, marched his forces to Farnham; ſo that nothing hindered the two armies from joining: for the royaliſts having abandoned Reading and Abingdon, the parliamentary army became maſters of Berkſhire, and the king was obliged to retreat to the northward of Oxford. It was now thought, that the condition of Charles was deſperate; for Eſſex having gained the paſs of Anſlow-bridge, and Waller that of Newbridge, their armies were between him and Oxford, the only place of ſtrength he was poſſeſſed of in the ſouthern quarters. Charles retreated to Worceſter, and it was expected at London, that the king muſt either deliver himſelf up to Eſſex, or throw himſelf into the hands of the parliament. Poſſibly this might have been the caſe, had a good underſtanding prevailed between the parliament's generals; but their diſſentions gave Charles an opportunity of gaining two days march of Eſſex, who now ordered Waller to purſue him, and took upon himſelf to proſecute the weſtern expedition, originally aſſigned to the other. Waller complained loudly of Eſſex for uſurping his command, and produced his orders from the parliament; but Eſſex was abſolute, and threatened to try Waller by a court martial, if he refuſed to obey.

Charles had now refreſhed his army at Worceſter; but fearing to be ſhut up in that city by Waller, who had now reached Eviſham, retired with his army to Bewdley, and directed his courſe towards Shrewſbury. Waller, who expected a large reinforcement, marched forwards, extending his quarters by degrees along the eaſt ſide of the Severn, till he placed himſelf between the king's army and Shrewſbury. This was the very thing the king deſired; for returning upon his own foot-ſteps he reached Oxford; and having reinforced his army from that garriſon, marched, in his turn, in queſt of Waller.

After ſeveral marches and counter-marches, the two armies faced each other at Cropedy-bridge, near Banbury, but the Cherwell ran between them. On the twenty-ninth of June, Waller, who had now received conſiderable reinforcements, drew up his army in order of battle, but in ſo advantageous a ſituation, that Charles made a feint of marching towards Daventry, leaving a party of cavalry to guard Cropedy-bridge. This motion drew Waller from his advantageous poſt; and perceiving that the king's van was at a conſiderable diſtance from their rear, he attacked the party at Cropedy-bridge, at the head of fifteen hundred horſe, a thouſand foot, and eleven pieces of cannon. The poſt was ſoon abandoned by the royaliſts; but his detachment had no ſooner paſſed the bridge, with an intention to fall upon the rear of the king's army, than they were attacked, repulſed, and purſued with conſiderable loſs. Stunned and diſpirited by this blow, the army of Waller melted away by deſertion; and the king thought he might ſafely leave it, and march to the weſtward againſt Eſſex, who had obliged prince Maurice to raiſe the ſiege of Lyme, and made himſelf maſter of Weymouth and Taunton.

Charles received ſo many reinforcements during his march, that he now appeared in the field with an army ſuperior to that of the enemy. Prince Maurice hovered round the camp of Eſſex, with a flying army of four thouſand horſe and foot, cut off his convoys, and perpetually haraſſed his rear during his march. Eſſex was now greatly diſtreſſed, and knew not what courſe to purſue: he was incapable of fighting the royal army, and had no place of ſtrength whither he might retreat till he received reinforcements. A council of war was called, when lord Robarts propoſed their marching into Cornwall. He obſerved, that the greater part of the inhabitants of that county was well affected to the parliament, and would join their army as ſoon as the troops appeared among them; that there was the greateſt reaſon to think the king would not attempt to follow them into Cornwall, becauſe he muſt by that means be expoſed to the danger of putting himſelf between two fires, as it was more than probable Sir William Waller would ſoon be in a condition to follow him, and haraſs his rear. Theſe reaſons had the deſired effect, and a reſolution was taken of marching directly into Cornwall.

The king followed the parliament's army, and it was propoſed, in a council of war, to attack Eſſex in his camp; but Sir Richard Granville being daily expected from the weſtern parts of Cornwall with a conſiderable body of forces, it was thought more expedient to cut off his proviſions, and force him to ſurrender at diſcretion. Eſſex informed the parliament of his danger, and deſired that a body of troops might be ſent to fall upon the king's rear. General Middleton received a commiſſion to execute that ſervice, but he came too late. The army of Eſſex, cooped up in a narrow corner at Leſtithiel, deprived of all forage and proviſions, and ſeeing no proſpect of ſucceſs, was reduced to the laſt extremity. The king preſſed upon them on one ſide; prince Maurice on another; Sir Richard Granville on a third; and Sir Jacob Aſhley on a fourth. Eſſex, Robarts, and ſome of the principal officers, eſcaped in a boat to Plymouth: Balfour, with his horſe, paſſed the king's guards in a thick fog, and got ſafe to the garriſons of his own party. Skippon, who commanded the foot, had no method of eſcaping; he was therefore obliged to capitulate; by which it was agreed, that they ſhould deliver up their arms, artillery, baggage and ammunition. This was accordingly performed; and the ſoldiers being conducted to the parliament's quarters, were diſmiſſed.

Charles acquired great reputation, even among his enemies, for his conduct in this campaign; and indeed it muſt be owned, that it fell little ſhort of the beſt generals of that age. After his affairs were, in all appearance, deſperate, he had reduced two ſtrong armies of his enemies, commanded by their beſt officers, to the very ſituation which he himſelf had dreaded but a few weeks before. He triumphed over thoſe very perſons whom it was thought almoſt impoſſible for him to eſcape. Middleton attempted to intercept the king's proviſions, and was, in ſome attempts, ſucceſsful; but Sir Francis Doddington watched him ſo narrowly, that, after many bloody ſkirmiſhes, he was obliged to retire to Sherborne.

But notwithſtanding theſe ſucceſſes in the weſt, the king's affairs were in great diſorder, both in the midland counties and the north. He therefore ſtaid no longer than was neceſſary to recruit and refreſh his army, after their long and tedious marches. When he reached Chard, in Somerſetſhire, he publiſhed a proclamation, wherein he declared, that he was ſo deſirous of reſtoring the public tranquillity, that he was determined to march to the neighbourhood of London, in order to open a negotiation with the parliament, and invited all his loyal ſubjects to aſſiſt him in procuring ſo deſireable an end. On the ninth of October, he received a petition from the gentlemen and freeholders of Somerſetſhire, for liberty to wait upon his majeſty nearer London, to become petitioners to the parliament, and requeſt them to embrace his majeſty's offers of peace; adding, that if their petition was refuſed, they would ſpend their lives and fortunes in his majeſty's defence.

During the king's ſtay in the weſt, colonel Gage, one of the royal officers in Oxford, undertook the difficult ſervice of relieving Baſing-houſe, belonging to the marquis of Wincheſter, which colonel Norton, at the head of a large detachment of the parliament's forces, had beſieged upwards of three months. Gage had above forty miles to march from Oxford, and his route lay near the garriſons of Abingdon and Reading. He, however, performed the taſk with great applauſe; for though his party was not ſtrong enough to raiſe the ſiege, yet he found means to throw into the houſe a large convoy of ammunition and proviſions. He afterwards returned to Oxford without ſuffering any loſs. The town of Banbury, and the caſtle of Dennington, were both relieved; and the king's army, after driving Waller out of Andover, marched unmoleſted to Newbury.

The parliament were alarmed; and it was determined to oppoſe the king with very numerous forces. They had now armed anew the ſubdued forces of Eſſex, and ordered Mancheſter and Cromwell to march with their recruited troops from the eaſtern aſſociation. All theſe forces, joining with thoſe of Waller and Middleton, formed an army far ſuperior to that of the king, and advanced to give him battle. Newbury was a ſecond time the ſcene of the bloody animoſities between the Engliſh. In this battle both parties were guilty of overſights. The king quitted his advantageous ſituation, and drew his army out into Speen-field, ſituated between Newbury and Dennington-caſtle, thinking that he could there be attacked only in front. But in a council of war held at Cheveley, it was reſolved, that Waller, aſſiſted by the London brigade, and the forces of Eſſex, ſhould take poſſeſſion of Speen-hill; that the earl of Mancheſter ſhould advance to Shaw; that the former ſhould begin the attack, and the latter, on a ſignal given, force the paſs at Shaw, by which the king's diſpoſitions muſt be broken. This was, however, a very dangerous ſervice, as Charles was in poſſeſſion not only of Dennington, near which Skippon, who commanded Waller's infantry, muſt paſs, but alſo of Doleman-houſe, which was fortified, and flanked Mancheſter's forces. Waller, however, with the officers under him, acted with great intrepidity and ſucceſs. They made a large circuit to avoid the fire of Dennington-caſtle, but their rear ſuffered very conſiderably by a ſally made from the garriſon. After eſcaping this danger, they attacked the king's troops about three in the afternoon on the twenty-ſeventh of October, and not only drove them from their works, but alſo took nine pieces of cannon. In this attack the ſoldiers of Eſſex, exhorting one another to repair their broken honour, and revenge the diſgrace at Leſtithiel, charged with the utmoſt fury, and ſome of the cannon they recovered, being the ſame they had loſt in Cornwall, could not forbear embracing them with tears of joy. But the earl of Mancheſter had not the ſame ſucceſs in attacking the paſſage at Shaw: for though he paſſed the Kennet on the left, and ſeemed at firſt to have the advantage; yet Goring, putting himſelf at the head of Cleveland's brigade, drove him back with great ſlaughter; and another perſon attempting to take Doleman-houſe, was obliged to retire with conſiderable loſs; and night coming on before the action on that ſide could be renewed, put an end to the battle.

This was one of the moſt obſtinate engagements that happened during the whole courſe of the civil war. Both ſides had committed overſights, and both endeavoured to repair them by performing wonders; and the field muſt have been more bloody, had not darkneſs intervened, and ſtopped the ſlaughter. Charles, however, feared that a ſecond engagement would be fatal to his army, and determined to avoid it. He therefore left his baggage and cannon in Dennington-caſtle, and immediately retreated to Wallingford, and thence to Oxford. Soon after his arrival, he was joined by prince Rupert, at the head of a conſiderable body of cavalry, and a good train of artillery. Strengthened by this reinforcement, he ventured to advance towards the enemy, now employed in the ſiege of Dennington-caſtle. Eſſex, detained by ſickneſs, had not joined the army ſince his misfortune in Cornwall. Mancheſter, who commanded in his abſence, though his forces were much ſuperior to thoſe of the king, declined an engagement, notwithſtanding the preſſing ſollicitations of Cromwell, who conjured him not to neglect ſo favourable an opportunity of putting an end to the war. The king, therefore, carried off his artillery from Dennington-caſtle, in the face of the enemy, and by that means ſufficiently repaired the honour that had been loſt by his retreat from the battle of Newbury. But this was not all the advantage Charles gained by this action; it excited animoſities between Mancheſter and Cromwell, equal, at leaſt, to thoſe that before ſubſiſted between Eſſex and Waller, and which had proved ſo favourable to his majeſty. The battle of Newbury put an end to the campaign, and both armies were ſoon after diſtributed into winter quarters.

But though the military operations were over for a ſeaſon, the conteſts between the different generals increaſed when they repaired to London: the whole city and parliament were agitated by their mutual reproaches and accuſations. Theſe, indeed, owed their riſe to a party, which had been ſome time formed in the parliament, but which the dread of the royal power had hitherto ſuppreſſed. The great ſucceſs of the parliament's armies now called them into action. This party were called independents, a ſect hitherto blended with the preſbyterians, and acquired diſtinction only from the deſtruction of monarchy. Enthuſiaſts by ſyſtem, infatuated with the idea of religious perfection, and believing that they were all ſupernaturally inſpired, they would admit of neither rites, nor biſhops, nor miniſters. They pretended that the holy ſpirit, by its inward communications, placed both poor and rich upon a level, and made the ignorant equal to the learned. They hated royalty no leſs than hierarchy. The object of the puritans was to reſtrain, theirs to annihilate the prerogative; and adding a profound policy to their abſurd reveries, they executed what others thought impoſſible. Cromwell, who was at the head of the independents, had a capacity adapted to the greateſt enterprizes, the ardour of an enthuſiaſt, the daring ſpirit of the leader of a party, the diſſimulation of a hypocrite, the talents of a general, and the genius and addreſs of a ſtateſman. He declaimed, with great violence, in the houſe of commons, againſt the conduct of Mancheſter, whom he accuſed of not puſhing the war with the neceſſary vigour; eſpecially of neglecting, at Dennington-caſtle, the opportunity of totally defeating the royal army. "I ſhewed " him evidently (ſaid Cromwell) how this ſucceſs " might be obtained; and only deſired leave, with " my own brigade of horſe, to charge the king's " army in their retreat, leaving it in the earl's " choice, if he thought proper, to remain neuter, " with the reſt of the forces: but notwithſtanding " all my importunity, he poſitively and obſtinately " refuſed his conſent; and gave no other reaſon but " that, if we met with a defeat, there was an end of " our pretenſions; we ſhould all be rebels, and trai- " tors, and be executed and forfeited by the law."

Theſe harſh cenſures provoked Mancheſter, who, in his turn, accuſed Cromwell with ſeditious ſpeeches, which tended to ruin the parliament. He told the houſe, that a ſcheme having been propoſed, which it ſeemed improbable the parliament would agree to, Cromwell inſiſted upon it, and ſaid, "My lord, if " you will ſtick firm to honeſt men, you ſhall find " yourſelf at the head of an army, which will give " law both to king and parliament. This diſcourſe " (continued Mancheſter) made the greater im- " preſſion upon me, becauſe I knew the lieutenant- " general to be a man of very deep deſigns; and he " has even ventured to tell me, that it never would " be well with England till I was Mr. Montague, " and there was not a lord or peer in the kingdom." The ſharpneſs of theſe diſputes alarmed the independents; they perceived that they muſt now carry their ſcheme into execution, or abandon all thoughts of effecting it; and accordingly they formed the reſolution of new-modelling the army. Their maxim was, that he who draws his ſword againſt the king ſhould throw away the ſcabbard. They were for deciſive actions, and officers that would heſitate at no enterprize. They were, indeed, far inferior in number, both in the parliament and in the kingdom, to the preſbyterian party, but they had addreſs ſufficient, in the end, to carry their deſign into execution.

A ſolemn faſt, by their influence, was voted, in order to implore the aſſiſtance of heaven. Some of the moſt furious preachers lamented the diſſentions in parliament, and charged the members with intereſted views. They complained of the perfidious remiſſneſs of the leaders, who, inſtead of putting a ſpeedy end to the war, ſought only, by prolonging it, to enrich themſelves with the ſubſtance of the people. They intreated the Lord to raiſe up men more worthy to be the inſtruments of his providence. The day following, theſe diſcourſes were repreſented by the independent party in parliament, as the manifeſt inſpiration of the Holy Spirit. The neceſſity of finding ſome remedy for theſe diſorders was inſiſted on. The members were conjured to diveſt themſelves of all perſonal intereſt and lucrative employments. Cromwell remarked, that ſince the commencement of the war, a number of able officers had been formed, who were capable of conducting the moſt dangerous expeditions; that the troops wanted a reform on a new plan, and the ſucceſs would depend on the extirpation of abuſes. Theſe repreſentations produced the deſired effect. A committee was appointed to frame what was called the "Self-denying Ordinance," by which the members of both houſes were excluded from all civil and military employments, except a few officers who were ſpecified. This ordinance gave occaſion to the moſt furious debates, and, for ſome time, rent both the parliament and city into factions. It was obſerved by the independent party, that the diſcipline of the army did not correſpond to the merit of the officers, nor were there any hopes, till the preſent vices and diſorders, which prevailed among the ſoldiers, were repreſſed by a new model, that the forces of the parliament would ever be attended with ſignal ſucceſs in any undertaking. The preſbyterians, on the contrary, repreſented, that beſides the ingratitude of diſcarding, by fraud and ſubtlety, ſo many noble perſons, by whom the parliament had been hitherto chiefly ſupported, they would find it extremely difficult to ſupply the place of men, now formed by experience to command and authority: that the rank alone, poſſeſſed by ſuch as were members of either houſe, prevented envy, retained the army in obedience, and gave weight to military orders: that greater confidence might ſafely be repoſed in men of family and fortune, than in mere adventurers, who would be apt to entertain ſeparate views from thoſe embraced by the perſons who employed them. But notwithſtanding theſe reaſons, which were urged with great force and eloquence, the bill paſſed both houſes of parliament. Eſſex, Warwick, Mancheſter, Denbigh, Waller, Brereton, and many others, reſigned their commiſſions, and received the thanks of parliament for their ſervices. But at the time when the other officers reſigned, care was taken to ſend Cromwell, at the head of a body of horſe, to the relief of Taunton, beſieged by the royaliſts, ſo that he kept both his commiſſion and his ſeat in parliament, notwithſtanding he had himſelf been one of the principal promoters of the Self-denying Ordinance.

A.D. 1645. Sir Thomas Fairfax was now appointed general, and it was voted to increaſe the army to twenty-two thouſand men. Fairfax was equally eminent for courage and for humanity; but he was entirely governed by Cromwell, who was in fact the commander of the army. The new model was introduced with all the diſpatch the importance of the cauſe required. Such officers only were appointed as the independents could confide in. A rigid diſcipline increaſed the religious fervor of the ſoldiers. Excited by the example, and the exhortations of their officers, who ſerved them for miniſters, they paſſed in prayer, in conference, and in ſpiritual lectures, all the time they could ſpare for amuſement or repoſe. Their inflamed imagination raiſed them above the character of humanity. Dangers and death were nothing to men in a ſtate of ſpiritual extacy; they ſeemed the avenues to heaven. In the royal army, on the contrary, there was nothing but licentiouſneſs and diſorder. The ſoldier inſtead of pay, ſubſiſted by committing every ſpecies of robbery. The officer ridiculed the enthuſiaſm of the parliamentarians, without reflecting on the effects it would produce. This contraſt indicated the moſt fatal events; nor were theſe at a conſiderable diſtance.

While Fairfax and Cromwell were employed in new modelling the army, the negotiations for a peace were carrying on between the king and parliament, but with very little hopes of ſucceſs. The conferences were opened at Uxbridge; Charles having retracted his former declaration, that the two houſes at Weſtminſter were not a free parliament. But it ſoon appeared that peace was ſtill at a conſiderable diſtance; the demands of the parliament amounting to nothing leſs than a total abolition of monarchy. The ceſſation of arms with the Iriſh was to be declared null and void; and after the catholics in that kingdom ſhould be ſubdued, the parliament was to nominate the governor and magiſtrates of that kingdom. It was required that the whole military power ſhould be given up to the parliament for ſeven years; and that afterwards, inſtead of returning to the king, it ſhould be regulated by a bill. The parliament were not contented with a toleration in religion; they demanded a total abolition of epiſcopacy, and a ſubſcription to the covenant throughout the kingdom. Even the principal officers of the crown, and the judges, were to be nominated by the parliament, and the power of making war and peace was wholly to depend upon their determinations. Charles offered that the militia ſhould be intruſted, during three years, to twenty commiſſioners nominated either by common agreement between him and the parliament, or the one half by him and the other by the parliament. And after the expiration of that term, he inſiſted, that he ſhould be again reinſtated in his conſtitutional authority over the militia. With regard to religion Charles agreed, that indulgence ſhould be granted to tender conſciences, in reſpect to ceremonies; that the biſhops ſhould exerciſe no act of juriſdiction or ordination, without the conſent and council of ſuch preſbyters as ſhould be choſen by the clergy of each dioceſe; that they ſhould reſide conſtantly in their dioceſe, and be obliged to preach every ſunday; that pluralities ſhould be aboliſhed; that abuſes of every kind in the eccleſiaſtical courts ſhould be redreſſed; and that a hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be levied from the biſhops eſtates and the chapter lands, for payment of the debts contracted by the parliament.

With regard to the affairs in Ireland Charles was willing to make any conceſſions, that did not tend to the prejudice of his proteſtant ſubjects. And it muſt be owned, that notwithſtanding the unpopular conduct of the king with regard to his granting the ceſſation to the Iriſh rebels, he was more defenſible than the parliament. The charge againſt him conſiſted "in his having encouraged the two houſes, to undertake the war, and his ſubjects to contribute money for carrying it on, and even putting it out of his power to treat with or pardon the rebels, without the conſent of the parliament; by which means the rebels had been reduced to the laſt extremity, when the king granted them a ceſſation, and had ſent for ſome of the beſt regiments employed againſt them in Ireland to make war againſt his parliament." But it was well known that the war in that kingdom had been ſhamefully neglected by the parliament, and that the army had been ſo ill paid, that the ſoldiers were ready to diſband; that the face of the country lay uncultivated; that the officers of the army through mere want were ready to join the enemy, or to return to England; that no more than one hundred and ſeventy barrels of powder remained in the magazine of Dublin for the ſupply of the army, and that the forces in general were reduced to the laſt extremity for want of proviſions; that all the repreſentations of the king's ſubjects had been diſregarded and unanſwered by the parliament; that the money raiſed for the ſupport of Ireland, had been employed in England againſt the king; and, that the houſe of commons had plainly told the proteſtant governors of Ireland, that they muſt expect no farther ſupply from England, unleſs they would exchange the native commodities of Ireland for the ſtores that ſhould be ſent them; a thing impoſſible to be done, all the commodities of that kingdom being in the hands of the rebels. Add to this, that the Engliſh parliament were themſelves reduced to ſuch neceſſities for money, that the agents of the proteſtant army in Ireland, were told, by one of the principal members of the Iriſh committee, that if five hundred pounds would ſave Ireland, it could not be advanced. Of four hundred thouſand pounds raiſed for the ſupport of the army, near one half had been employed in maintaining the civil war in England; and of all the troops raiſed for that ſervice not more than ſix regiments of foot, and a thouſand horſe had actually landed in Ireland from England, all the reſt having been employed againſt the king; great part of the Scottiſh forces had alſo been recalled and ſent into England on the ſame ſervice. Though theſe were undeniable facts, and tho' Sir Philip Percival, who had ſuffered greatly in the king's ſervice, juſtified the ceſſation, by the ſtrongeſt arguments of neceſſity; yet the king's commiſſioners found the prejudices of the public extremely ſtrong both againſt the ceſſation, and the peace which was then negotiating at Oxford. The king's commiſſioners were not, however, intimidated; they ſpoke with ſuch force upon the ſubject, that the parliamentary commiſſioners were greatly diſappointed in their hopes of expoſing the king: they were even apprehenſive of having the odium of not ſupporting the Iriſh war, thrown upon themſelves; it being certain that Charles had in his hands the moſt convincing evidences of the facts advanced by his commiſſioners. The votes of the parliament had, indeed, been very pathetic with regard to the cruelty of the Iriſh rebels, and the miſeries ſuffered by the proteſtants in that kingdom; but hardly any thing had been done conformable to theſe reſolutions. It is not ſufficient to weep over the miſeries of a diſtreſſed people, without affording them the neceſſary aſſiſtance. But what rendered it impoſſible to conclude the treaty was a farther demand made by the parliament, by which the king was to except from the general pardon, forty of the moſt conſiderable of his Engliſh ſubjects, and nineteen of his Scots, together with all popiſh recuſants in both kingdoms, who had carried arms in his defence. It was alſo demanded that forty-eight more, with all the members who had ſat in either houſe at Oxford, all lawyers and divines who had embraced the king's party, ſhould be rendered incapable of any office, be forbid the exerciſe of their profeſſion, be prohibited from coming within the verge of the court, and forfeit the third of their eſtates to the parliament.

The negotiation at Uxbridge being broken off, each party prepared to decide the important conteſt by the ſword. On the third of April, Fairfax repaired to the rendezvous of his troops at Windſor, where, by the great care and aſſiduity of Skippon, his ſerjeant-major, he found the army in excellent condition. Cromwell, having joined him from Saliſbury, was diſpatched with a party of horſe into Oxfordſhire, to prevent the junction of a large body of cavalry, detached from prince Rupert's army in Worceſterſhire, with the king's forces, quartered in the neighbourhood of Oxford. He was fortunate enough to meet, at Iſlip-bridge, five of the beſt regiments in the royal army, commanded by the earl of Northampton, and gained a complete victory, took two hundred men priſoners, and four hundred horſes. He then ſummoned and took Blechington-houſe, commanded by colonel Windebank, who was afterwards ſhot at Oxford, for delivering up the place. His next attempt was againſt another party of the royaliſts poſted at Brampton-buſh, under the command of Sir William Vaughan, whom he defeated and took priſoner, with two hundred of his men and ſeveral officers.

Taunton was ſtill beſieged by the royaliſts, and the garriſon was now reduced to ſuch extremity, that they had, for ſome time, ſubſiſted on the moſt nauſeous food. It was defended by colonel Blake, and attacked by Goring and Sir Richard Granville: but the latter being wounded, his command was given to Sir John Berkeley, whom the troops refuſed to obey; and a difference happening between general Goring and the council in the weſt, the ſiege was raiſed at the approach of the parliamentary army.

Cromwell, after his ſucceſsful encounters with the royaliſts, ſummoned Farringdon-houſe to ſurrender. But colonel Bruges, who commanded the garriſon, inſtead of complying with the demand, ſallied out at the head of his troops, and Cromwell was defeated, though he had been joined by a ſtrong party of foot from Abingdon, under the command of major-general Brown. In the mean time prince Rupert defeated Maſſey, governor of Glouceſter, and joined the king at Oxford. Soon after Goring defeated a body of Cromwell's horſe, and brought his forces to the royal camp. The king's army now conſiſted of above ſix thouſand horſe and five thouſand foot, and it was expected that the latter would, in a few days, be double their number.

Fairfax had, by orders of the parliament, advanced to the relief of Taunton, and it was now imagined that his forces were ſo fatigued by long marches, that it would be eaſy for the king, whoſe army conſiſted chiefly of horſe, to overtake him before he could join Cromwell, and force him to a battle. Had this advice been followed, it is more than probable Fairfax had been defeated, which would have proved deciſive in the king's favour; but unfortunately for Charles it was neglected, and Goring was detached with a ſquadron of horſe to watch his motions. He was met by Cromwell at Redcot-bridge, but had the good fortune to defeat that able general.

By this time the king had taken the field at the head of his army, and directed his march towards Warwickſhire, in order to relieve Cheſter, which had been for ſome time beſieged by Brereton; but on the approach of the royal army, he drew off his forces, and retired toward Lancaſhire. Charles therefore changed his rout, and determined to attack the town of Leiceſter, which was very ſtrong and defended by a good garriſon: but by the remarkable bravery of his troops, the place was carried by ſtorm, and the governor, with all his garriſon, conſiſting of fifteen hundred men, were made priſoners of war. Could the king have reſtrained the exceſſes of his ſoldiers, this acquiſition would have proved of the utmoſt importance; but the diſorders they committed after they were maſters of the town, did more prejudice to his affairs, than all the plunder they acquired, tho' it was very rich, did him ſervice. Beſides the priſoners, he took about a thouſand horſes, fourteen pieces of cannon, and a great quantity of ammunition and military ſtores.

The parliament was greatly alarmed at the loſs of Leiceſter. They preſſed the Scots to quicken their march to the ſouthward, and Fairfax, being now joined by Cromwell and Brown, was ordered to block up Oxford. But thoſe meaſures were greatly embarraſſed by the backwardneſs of the Scots, who had retreated into Weſtmoreland, and by the bad condition of Fairfax's army, after its fatiguing march into the weſt. Fairfax, however, obeyed his orders, and ſat down before Oxford on the twenty-third of May; though he was apprehenſive the king would ſoon return, and ſhut him up between his army and the town, which was ſtrong and well garriſoned. On receiving advice that the king was marching to relieve Oxford, Fairfax was ordered to leave the command of the blockade to general Brown, and watch the motions of the royal army; it being ſtrongly ſuſpected, that inſtead of marching to Oxford, the king intended to fall upon the aſſociated counties. It ſoon appeared that this opinion was well founded; and orders were immediately diſpatched for raiſing the blockade of Oxford, and giving the king battle, if he continued to advance. Colonel Vermuyden, who had been ſent to join the Scots, finding they were retreated into Weſtmoreland, returned to the ſouthward, and put himſelf between the royal army and the aſſociated counties. Borſtal-houſe had been, for ſome time, beſieged by Skippon, but made ſo brave a defence, that he was obliged to draw off his forces. He joined Fairfax on the ſixth of June, and the next day the whole army reached Sherington, in order to defend the aſſociated counties; certain advices having been received that the king had directed his march towards Northampton. The parliament at Weſtminſter were very uneaſy, not from the ſucceſs of Charles, but from the reproaches of the expelled members, who beheld the progreſs of the king with infinite pleaſure. For Goring had now cooped up Welden, who had been detached by Fairfax to Taunton, between his army and the walls of that place, and advice was every hour expected that both Welden and the town had ſurrendered. Charles had, however, ſeen his error, and repented his having ſent Goring into the weſt; but he ſtill had it in his power to rejoin him, or to retire either to Leiceſter or Worceſter, where he might have recruited and refreſhed his army, while that of the parliament was haraſſed with fatiguing marches.

But inſtead of purſuing any of theſe prudent meaſures, a fatal reſolution was taken to fight Fairfax. This was principally owing to the ungovernable ardor of prince Rupert, who excited the impatient humour of the nobility and gentry, of which the army was full, by urging the many difficulties under which the royaliſts laboured, and from which they could be relieved by nothing but a victory. The king's forces lay about Daventry in Northamptonſhire, where he waited five days in expectation of engaging Fairfax, of whoſe marches he was totally ignorant. At laſt certain advice arrived, that the parliament's general, who had now been joined by all his parties, was advanced to Wooton, and that his head quarters was within ſix miles of that of the king. It was not even now too late for Charles to decline an engagement ment without any injury to his reputation. He might have taken poſſeſſion of a ſtrong camp upon Burough-hill, where the forces of Fairfax could not have attacked him, and where he might have waited till joined by a party of twelve hundred horſe, detached into Leiceſterſhire; or even till Goring returned from his expedition againſt Welden's army. But theſe advantages were neglected, and the royal army advanced againſt that of the parliament.

The forces, which on both ſides were nearly equal, were drawn up in Naſeby field, the ſpot on which the bloody conteſt between the king and his parliament was decided. The right wing of the royaliſts was commanded by prince Rupert, the left by Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and the main body by the king in perſon. In the parliament's army, Cromwell commanded the right wing, Ireton, his ſon-in-law, the left, and Fairfax, aſſiſted by Skippon, the main body. The parliament's army had the advantage of the ground and ſituation: their front extended ſomewhat farther than the king's; and a party of their dragoons poſſeſſed themſelves of ſome hedges, which flanked prince Rupert's horſe. The charge was begun by prince Rupert, with his uſual celerity and uſual ſucceſs. Ireton made a ſtout reſiſtance; and even after he was run through the thigh with a pike, ſtill maintained the combat till he was taken priſoner; but all his courage was not ſufficient to ſupport the dreadful charge of the prince; his whole wing was broke, and purſued with the moſt precipitate fury, by that violent commander. He was even ſo inconſiderate, as to loſe time in ſummoning and attacking the artillery of the parliament, which had been left with a ſtrong guard of infantry. The king led on his main body with great intrepidity, and with all the conduct of a prudent general. The conteſt was here very ſharp. Fairfax and Skippon nobly ſupporting the great reputation they had acquired. The latter being dangerouſly wounded, was deſired by Fairfax to leave the field; but he declared he would continue there as long as any ſoldier would ſtand his ground. But notwithſtanding all the intrepidity of theſe two generals, the infantry in the center was broke; and Fairfax's own regiment, commanded by Sir Charles Doyley, was the only body of foot that kept their ground. Fairfax, however, with great preſence of mind, brought up the reſerve, and renewed the combat. In the mean time, Cromwell attacked the left wing of the royal army with ſuch intrepidity, that they could not ſupport the charge; they were broken, and purſued about a quarter of a mile, when Cromwell, who improved by his prudence the advantage he had gained by his valour, detached a party to prevent their rallying, while he himſelf turned back upon the king's infantry, and threw them into the utmoſt confuſion. One regiment only maintained its order unbroken, though twice deſperately aſſaulted by Fairfax. But the third attempt proved deciſive: Doyley charged them in front, while Fairfax attacked them in the rear. The gallant regiment was now broken, and partly diſperſed. Senſible, when it was too late, of his error, prince Rupert abandoned his fruitleſs attempt upon the enemy's artillery, and joined the king, whoſe infantry was now totally defeated. Charles did all in his power to animate this body of cavalry to exert that valour they had already diſplayed; he called aloud to them, "One charge more, and we recover the day." But they ſaw too evidently the diſadvantages under which they laboured, to obey even the command of their ſovereign. The king was obliged to quit the field, and leave the victory to the enemy. He retreated firſt to Leiceſter, and then to Litchfield.

The number of the ſlain in the parliament's army was greater than that in the king's; they loſt a thouſand men, he not above eight hundred. But Fairfax took four hundred officers and five thouſand men priſoners. He alſo took twelve pieces of cannon, two mortars, eight thouſand arms, forty barrels of powder, and a hundred colours, together with the king's equipages and cabinet, in which were copies of his letters to the queen, which the parliament afterwards ordered to be publiſhed. In a word, this victory was at once the greateſt and moſt complete of any gained by the parliament during the whole courſe of the civil war.

But though this defeat was dreadful, it was the infatuation of Charles in following the worſt councils, that rendered it deciſive. He had ſtill a fine body of two thouſand horſe, and a thouſand foot, in Wales, under general Gerrard. Goring was at the head of an army before Taunton, little inferior to that the king had loſt at Naſeby, and the routed horſe were every day coming in to ſome of the royal garriſons. But a flood of misfortunes were now to be poured on the head of this unfortunate prince: his enemies conquered his towns, garriſons and armies, almoſt as faſt as a traveller could paſs from one to the other. The lord Loughborough ſurrendered Leiceſter to Fairfax, without ſtipulating any other condition, than that of obtaining quarter for himſelf and his garriſon. But Fairfax being no ſtranger to the wretched condition of Taunton, ſent a meſſenger to the parliament for inſtructions concerning his march into the weſt. In the mean time, he paſſed from Leiceſter to Lutterworth, and proceeded, without any interruption, to Dorcheſter. The miſeries of civil diſcord had, for ſome time, been ſo ſeverely felt by the inhabitants of the weſtern counties, eſpecially thoſe of Devon, Dorſet, and Wilts, that they had formed a ſcheme of neutrality, under the title of Club-men. Their declared intention was to reſiſt either party who ſhould attack them, and to mediate fair conditions between the king and his parliament. This aſſociation was now ſo ſtrong, as to be formidable to both parties, who equally complained of their ſufferings from the Club-men. Soon after Fairfax reached Dorcheſter, Mr. Hollis, a gentleman of Dorſetſhire, with ſeveral other leaders of the Club-men, waited upon him with the following articles and requeſts. "That the aſſociates provide arms, ſet watches, be quiet with thoſe that excite no diſturbance, ſeize all diſorderly ſoldiers, and ſend them to the neareſt garriſons: not to deny quarters and contributions proportioned to their abilities: till their petitions be delivered, not to favour either party, nor to protect any not aſſociated. To requeſt the renewal of a treaty, with a ceſſation of arms, and alſo that the garriſons in Dorſet, Devon, and Wilts, be put into their hands, till the king and parliament agree about their diſpoſal: that they be freed from all charges, except the maintenance of thoſe garriſons: that all laws, not repealed, be in force, and executed by the ordinary officers: that all perſons who deſire it, might be at liberty to lay down their arms; and that others who have abſented themſelves from their houſes may have free liberty to return." The general told them, that he greatly approved of their endeavours to bring about a peace; but not of the ceſſation of arms, or of diſbanding the ſoldiers; but promiſed to protect them from being plundered, and required them to diſcontinue their meetings. Perhaps he would not have diſmiſſed the leaders of the Club-men on ſuch eaſy terms, had he not been very deſirous of proſecuting his favourite ſcheme, the relief of Taunton, the parliament having conſented to his leading the army into thoſe parts, where the royaliſts were ſtill powerful, and capable of making a gallant reſiſtance.

But feuds and animoſities had, for ſome time, prevailed among the officers, and threatened inevitable ruin to the royal party. Goring was capable of performing all that could be required from the braveſt and vileſt of mankind: his abilities were equal to his ambition, which ſoared above all his maſter could beſtow. His abilities were ſufficient to clothe vice with every advantage; his eloquence to delude caution into ruin. His heart, inſenſible either to the happineſs or miſeries of others, laid not a check on his career of wickedneſs. His profligacy, his intemperance, his riots, his overſights and his negligence, rendered it problematical for what end nature had beſtowed her gifts on a perſon who diſgraced them; and why fortune courted a man ſo ungrateful to her favours. The hopes of victory could not reſtrain him from debauchery, nor the fear of infamy deter him from treachery. His ſerving the royal party was not in him the reſult of principle, but of accident; and when oppoſed by the king's council, it cauſed him more pains to diſappoint, than it would have done to have executed the excellent diſpoſitions laid down by himſelf for the ſervice of his maſter. This was the true reaſon for his ſtrange behaviour before Taunton. The ravages and barbarities of his ſoldiers had rendered him ſo diſagreeable to the royal party in the weſt, that he knew they had done him ill offices with his maſter, and was reſolved the ſervice ſhould ſuffer. He was accordingly ſo negligent in guarding the paſſages to Taunton, that the beſieged received frequent relief from the adjacent country, and even his chief officers were ſuffered to have interviews with thoſe of the enemy. This at once prolonged the ſiege, and diſcouraged the infantry ſo greatly, that they mouldered away; and when Fairfax advanced to relieve the place, Goring found himſelf under a neceſſity, wantonly occaſioned by his own negligence, of raiſing the ſiege. He retired to Lamport, an open town in Somerſetſhire, where he was defeated by Fairfax, who killed three hundred of his men, and took fourteen hundred priſoners.

Fairfax now ſat down before Bridgewater, a ſtrong and important town in that country. The place was defended by colonel Windham, at the head of a garriſon of two thouſand ſix hundred men. For ſome time, the beſieged made a ſtout reſiſtance; but the outer town being taken by ſtorm, Windham capitulated, and delivered up the place to Fairfax; by which the whole garriſon were made priſoners of war. The taking of Bridgewater was a dreadful blow to the royaliſts, becauſe it was conſidered as impregnable; and the king's friends had laid up in it, as a ſure repoſitory, their treaſure and moſt valuable effects.

Charles was now retreated to Cardiff, in South Wales, where he had leiſure to reflect on his fallen condition; and, perhaps, ſaw it more clearly, and felt it more ſenſibly, than any man of his party. But when he was the ſport of fortune, he ſeemed regardleſs of her frowns. When his beſt friends, even thoſe who had been moſt forward in adviſing war, now preſſed him to accept of peace on almoſt any conditions, Charles declared himſelf of a different opinion. He admitted, indeed, that he had nothing but ruin to himſelf, his cauſe, and his family, before his eyes; but, at the ſame time, declared, that he would neither ſacrifice his conſcience, injure his ſucceſſor, nor forſake his friends. He told prince Rupert, who was one of the party for peace, that if his caſe was to be viewed by a politician, it would appear next to frenzy for him to decline any terms; but as a king, a chriſtian, and a gentleman, low as his fortunes were, he would grant no other terms than what he had offered at Uxbridge; and theſe he knew would not be accepted.

The Scots having taken Carliſle, which had, for eleven months, been bravely defended by Sir Thomas Glenham, marched to the ſouthward, and ſat down before Hereford; but they were ſo diſguſted by the treatment they had received in England, that the ſiege advanced very ſlowly. They complained loudly of the want of money, proviſions and artillery, which had been promiſed them by the parliament, but the promiſe had never been performed. Charles being therefore in no great pain with regard to the fate of Hereford, directed his courſe to the northward; and, after very fatiguing marches, reached Doncaſter, where he was joined by a body of three thouſand men; it being the peculiar fate of that prince to acquire more friends by his misfortunes than by proſperity. It required, indeed, all his fortitude to ſupport the ſhocks of ill fortune, by which he was every day aſſailed. The caſtles of Scarborough, Skipton, Sandal, and Pontefract, after making a noble oppoſition, were obliged to ſurrender to the parliament; but their garriſons joined the royal army.

The king was now very deſirous of puſhing forward into Scotland, to join Montroſe, who, at the head of a handful of naked, half-armed highlanders, had cut in pieces ſeveral armies of regular veterans, commanded by officers of experience, and ſupported by the whole ſtrength of the kingdom. The Scottiſh army before Hereford were alarmed at his ſucceſs; and general Leſley, at the head of all the cavalry and dragoons, marched directly towards Scotland. Immediately after his departure, the earls of Leven and Callender, who commanded at the ſiege of Hereford, drew up a kind of manifeſto, enumerating the difficulties and diſappointments they had met with, and urging the neceſſity of ſaving their own country from the deſtruction with which it was threatened by Montroſe. They accordingly raiſed the ſiege of Hereford, and began their march to the northward. Leſley, informed of the king's intention, marched with ſo much expedition, that he reached Rotherham, and ſecured the paſs at Ferrybridge, before the king was informed of the route he had taken; while Pointz, one of the parliament's generals, took poſt, with a ſtrong body of horſe, in the neighbourhood of Worceſter. It being now impoſſible for Charles to lead his army into Scotland, he directed his march towards the eaſtern aſſociated counties, with ſo much ſucceſs, that he took Huntingdon, defeated ſeveral parties of the enemy, and returned to Oxford with a conſiderable booty.

In the mean time, Fairfax made himſelf maſter of Bath and Sherborne-caſtle, and prepared for beſieging Briſtol; an enterprize, which, from the ſtrength of the garriſon, and the great reputation of prince Rupert the governor, was deemed of the laſt importance. But ſo ſtrangely precarious in moſt men is the quality of military courage! a weaker defence was not made by any town during the whole war. The general expectations were here totally diſappointed. The lines were no ſooner taken by ſtorm, than the prince capitulated, and delivered up the city to Fairfax. Charles, who, on receiving advice that Fairfax determined to beſiege Briſtol, had collected all his forces to relieve the city, was aſtoniſhed at ſo unexpected an event, which was hardly leſs fatal to his party than the battle of Naſeby. Exaſperated at the behaviour of Rupert, he inſtantly recalled all his commiſſions, and ſent him a ſafe conduct to paſs over to the continent.

Every thing now portended the ruin of the royal party. The king marched to the relief of Cheſter, which was beſieged by Jones, at the head of a ſtrong detachment of the parliament's forces. Pointz followed him cloſe; and on his arrival in the neighbourhood of Cheſter, attacked his rear, and forced him to give battle. The action was very ſharp, and victory ſeemed to incline to the royaliſts, till Jones fell upon their troops on the other ſide, and put them to flight, with the loſs of ſix hundred ſlain, and a thouſand priſoners. The king fled, with the remains of his broken army, to Newark, and thence eſcaped to Oxford, where he ſhut himſelf up during the winter.

Fairfax and Cromwell, having now no powerful army to oppoſe them, divided their forces. Cromwell, at the head of four regiments, marched to the Devizes, and ſoon obliged the garriſon to capitulate. Berkeley-caſtle was taken by colonel Rainſborough, but the garriſon, conſiſting of five hundred men, were ſuffered to march out without their arms. Cromwell's detachment being now ſtrengthened by three regiments of horſe, he marched to Wincheſter, and ſat down before the caſtle, which was defended by lord Ogle, at the head of a numerous garriſon; but after a vigorous defence, he was obliged to capitulate on honourable conditions. Cromwell's next expedition was againſt Baſing-houſe, which, under the brave marquis of Wincheſter, had already repelled ſo many deſperate attacks of the enemy. But it could not reſiſt the impetuoſity of Cromwell; he took it ſword in hand, put the garriſon to the ſword, and ſent the marquis, with a few of the principal officers, priſoners to London. Langford-houſe alſo, four days after, ſhared the ſame fate.

The army of Fairfax was attended with the ſame rapid ſucceſs. Tiverton was taken, the general laid ſiege to Exeter, and forced the royaliſts, with the prince of Wales at their head, to retreat behind the Tamar. Fairfax therefore became maſter of the whole country to that river, and extended his line to Totneſs, which he now took poſſeſſion of. This ſucceſs ſo greatly alarmed the royaliſts, who had formed the blockade of Plymouth, that they retired behind the Tamar in great diſorder, leaving all their artillery and ammunition in the hands of the enemy.

A. D. 1646. Fairfax was now at liberty to purſue the deſign he had formed againſt Dartmouth, which, with the aſſiſtance of a ſquadron of the parliament's ſhips, under the command of admiral Batten, he took by ſtorm on the eighteenth of January. One hundred and twenty pieces of cannon, a thouſand priſoners, a hundred horſes, with proportional arms and ammunition, with two ſmall ſhips of war belonging to the king, fell into the hands of Fairfax. Among the priſoners were the earl of Newport, colonel Seymour, and a great number of inferior officers. Poudram-caſtle next fell into the hands of the victorious Fairfax, who now laid cloſe ſiege to Exeter. Lord Hopton, who commanded the royal army, conſiſting of eight thouſand men, advanced to relieve the place. The two armies met at Torrington, where Hopton was defeated, all his foot diſperſed, and he himſelf, with his horſe, obliged to retire into Cornwall, Fairfax purſued his victory with ſo much vigour, that he incloſed the royaliſts at Truro, and forced the whole army, conſiſting of five thouſand men, chiefly cavalry, to ſurrender upon terms. The ſoldiers delivering up their horſes and arms, were permitted to diſband, and received twenty ſhillings each to carry them to their own houſes. Such of the officers as deſired it, were granted paſſes to retire beyond the ſeas: the others, having promiſed never more to bear arms againſt the parliament, received a free pardon, on paying compoſitions proportioned to their abilities. Fairfax now returned to the ſiege of Exeter, and, after making himſelf maſter of that city, which completed the conqueſt of the weſt, marched his victorious army to the middle of the kingdom, and fixed his quarters at Newbury. The prince of Wales had the good fortune to eſcape when the royal army was incloſed at Truro; and, purſuant to the repeated orders of his father, paſſed over into the iſles of Sicilly, thence to Jerſey, and afterwards to Paris, where he joined the queen, who had fled thither from Exeter, when the earl of Eſſex commanded the parliament's forces in the weſt.

Nor was Charles more ſucceſsful in other parts of the kingdom. Hereford was taken by ſurprize; Cheſter ſurrendered: Lord Digby, who had attempted, at the head of twelve hundred horſe, to force his way into Scotland, and join Montroſe, was defeated at Sherburn in Yorkſhire, by colonel Copeley; his whole force was diſperſed, and he himſelf obliged to fly, firſt into the Iſle of Man, and thence into Ireland. The town and caſtle of Chepſtow were delivered up to the parliament; the counties of Pembroke and Carmarthen were reduced by Laughern: Shelford and Wyverton houſes were taken, and even the undaunted counteſs of Derby was obliged to ſurrender Latham-houſe. And, to put a final period to the hopes of the royaliſts, news arrived, that Montroſe himſelf, after the moſt aſtoniſhing ſucceſs, was totally defeated, and obliged to fly, with his broken forces into the mountains.

Such was in general the ſtate of affairs when the inclemency of the ſeaſon put an end to the rage of war. It would have been endleſs to have mentioned all the ſmaller actions and ſkirmiſhes, the ſieges of caſtles, and the taking of houſes, that happened during this whole campaign, ſo fatal to the royal party. The genius of Cromwell ſhone in its full luſtre; he was the ſupport of the independents, while his amazing ſucceſs awakened the jealouſy of the preſbyterians. He flew from poſt to poſt with amazing expedition; the news of one conqueſt hardly arrived before another was finiſhed; the ſhouts of victory in his troops were blended with the ſinging of pſalms, and the conſultations for battle and deſtruction were always preceded by the exerciſes of praying and preaching. That artful general always took care to keep the minds of his ſoldiers warm either by the heat of battle, or the force of enthuſiaſm: he was at once their martial and their ſpiritual leader. Every county was a bloody ſcene of action, and on almoſt every gentleman's eſtate, encounters happened, which exceeded in fury, thoſe of any foreign war. The numbers that fell in the more diſtinguiſhed battles were inconſiderable when compared with the total, that were ſlain in thoſe leſſer ſkirmiſhes. "To the work of the Lord diligently," was now become the watch-word of the independents, and implied, that no quarter ought to be given to the royaliſts, and that the war ſhould be carried on without regarding the few decencies which had hitherto been preſerved towards his majeſty and the chief nobility of the kingdom.

The eſcape of the king from Newark to Oxford was, however, a great diſappointment to the independents. Not that they had the leaſt apprehenſion of his recovering any power that could renew their alarms; but they feared, what afterwards happened, that he would make another attempt to conclude a peace with the parliament. As ſoon as the king knew that the prince of Wales had made his eſcape, he demanded, from the two houſes, a ſafe conduct for the duke of Richmond, the earl of Southampton, Mr. Aſhburnham and Mr. Palmer, to repair with his propoſitions, to Weſtminſter. The commons had for ſome time been employed in debating on the ſituation of public affairs. The preſbyterians thought that matters had now exceeded the criſis they propoſed, and perceived that both they and the parliament were on the point of receiving law from the independents and the army; and therefore, that it was more adviſeable for them to conclude a peace with his majeſty, than become the dupes of that violent party. And as they had hitherto maintained a conſiderable majority in the houſe, they now determined to make uſe of it for ſettling the peace of the kingdom; but at the ſame time, they well knew that the utmoſt caution would be neceſſary to enſure ſucceſs. They were aware that the independent party would derive great advantages from the London populace, if the commons gave any countenance to a treaty. It was therefore agreed to frame a ſet of articles which were to be ſent to his majeſty, and, after being approved by him, to have the ſanction of an act of parliament. Thoſe articles were founded on the demands before made at Uxbridge, but with an addition of the following particulars: "That their general, Sir Thomas Fairfax, ſhould be created a baron, and have five thouſand pounds a year ſettled on him for life: That lord Fairfax, his father, ſhould be made an earl: That lieutenant-general Cromwell ſhould be made a baron, and enjoy two thouſand five hundred pounds a year: That the earls of Northumberland, Eſſex, Warwick, and Pembroke, be created dukes: That Denzil Hollis be made a baron, Sir William Waller a baron, and enjoy an annuity of two thouſand five hundred pounds a year: That Sir Arthur Haſlerig be made a baron, with two thouſand pounds per annum: That Sir Henry Vane, and Sir Philip Stapleton, be created barons, and the latter enjoy two thouſand pounds a year: That Sir William Brereton have one thouſand five hundred, and major general Skippon one thouſand pounds per annum."

It was imagined by the preſbyterian party, that their thus liberally providing for the friends of the independent party, as well as their own, would be a means of ſuppreſſing the violence of the faction, if it was poſſible to ſatiate the avarice and ambition of their leaders. They therefore gave no anſwer to the king's meſſage, which alarmed Charles, who ſent a very pathetic letter to the commons, but received no reply; the commons were buſy in forming their propoſitions. In the mean time, the differences which every day increaſed between the parliament and the Scots, gave his majeſty ſome hopes, that a rupture between them would be the conſequence, which could not fail of being advantageous to his affairs.

After the defeat of Montroſe in Scotland, all the foot, and part of the Scottiſh horſe, were ſtarving in England; nor did they receive one ſhilling but what they raiſed by contributions. It was, however, at laſt voted, that they ſhould be paid thirty-one thouſand pounds per month, provided they would return to the ſouthward, and lay ſiege to Newark, which was likely, at that time, to prove the hotteſt ſervice in England. But the anſwer of the Scots was ſo unſatisfactory, that they were required to give a poſitive and ſpeedy anſwer; and, in the mean time, ſeveral ſtrong reſolutions were made by the parliament, if they refuſed to undertake the ſiege.

The marquis of Argyle was now at the head of thoſe violent covenanters in Scotland, whoſe characters nearly reſembled thoſe of the independents in England. He had been defeated by Montroſe, who had ſuffered his forces to live at free quarters on his eſtates. At the ſame time, he was hated by the Hamilton party, ſo that he was under a kind of neceſſity of oppoſing all offers of accommodation with the king. The duke of Hamilton, on the other hand, ſaw himſelf without abilities to ſerve his ſovereign, unleſs he would grant all that was demanded of him with regard to religion. Beſides theſe two, there was a third party in Scotland, conſiſting of the earls of Callender, Traquair, Morton, Roxborough, and ſeveral others, who cheriſhed the genuine ſentiments of public liberty, and ſincerely wiſhed that ſome method might be found for reſtoring Charles to all his juſt rights, both in England and Scotland, under proper reſtrictions and ſecurity; but they were at once too weak and too wiſe to attempt any thing themſelves, unleſs properly aſſiſted. There was, however, one principle, in which all the three parties agreed, that the return of their army into Scotland, before the large arrears due to the troops from the Engliſh parliament, muſt be attended with the ruin of their country, and the deſtruction of their civil liberty. They perceived it would be impoſſible to find ſubſiſtence for a ſmall body of horſe under Leſley; and had therefore ſent the greater part of them back to England, reſerving one regiment only.

Charles made another effort for negotiating a peace with the parliament, and deſired to have a perſonal treaty with the two houſes. He offered to come to London, on receiving a ſafe conduct for himſelf and his attendants, and to commit the truſt of the militia to ſuch perſons againſt whom there could be no juſt exception. But they abſolutely refuſed him acceſs; and even iſſued orders for ſeizing his perſon, if he attempted to viſit them. At laſt they told the king, that they were preparing ſome bills, and his paſſing them would be the ſureſt indication of his deſire of reſtoring peace to this diſtracted country. About this time, an action, which happened in Ireland, ſerved to augment the calumnies that were propagated to the diſadvantage of the king, and which he had always conſidered as the greateſt miſfortunes he had yet experienced.

Deſirous of concluding a final peace with the Iriſh rebels, and of obtaining their aſſiſtance in England, he commiſſioned Ormond, the lord-lieutenant, to promiſe them an abrogation of all the penal laws that had been enacted againſt the catholics. But as ſome agent was thought neceſſary to conduct the negotiation, lord Herbert, lately created earl of Glamorgan, was conſidered as a perſon proper for this undertaking, as he was a catholic, and allied to the beſt families in Ireland. Glamorgan was ſtrictly enjoined not to conclude any thing with the rebels without the approbation of Ormond, and to conſult him in every ſtep of his negotiations. Had theſe inſtructions been carefully obſerved, the king had received the reinforcement he ſo greatly wanted, without giving his enemies the opportunity of loading him with reproaches. But bigotted to his own religion, and paſſionately deſirous of ſerving his maſter effectually, he ſecretly, of himſelf, without communicating any part of the negotiation to Ormond, concluded a peace with the council of Kilkenny, by which it was agreed, that the Iriſh ſhould enjoy all the churches they had ever poſſeſſed ſince the beginning of their inſurrection; on condition, that they ſhould aſſiſt the king of England with a body of ten thouſand men. Great ſecrecy was obſerved in concluding this treaty, and it was at laſt diſcovered by accident. The titular archbiſhop of Tuam being killed in a ſally made by the garriſon of Sligo, the articles of the treaty were found among his baggage, and ſeveral copies of them were ſent over to the Engliſh parliament. Perſuaded that this incident would excite the loudeſt clamour againſt the king, the lord-lieutenant and lord Digby committed Glamorgan to priſon, charged him with high-treaſon for his temerity, and maintained that he had acted entirely without authority from his majeſty. The king alſo diſavowed the treaty, and declared that he had no authority to conclude any thing without the privity and approbation of the lord-lieutenant. The parliament, however, loſt not ſo fair an opportunity of reviving the old clamour with regard to the king's deſire of favouring the abominations of popery, and accuſed him of delivering the whole kingdom of Ireland to that hated ſect.

The parliament, when they aboliſhed epiſcopacy, did not immediately regulate the affairs of the church. At length that great work was finiſhed, and a preſbyterian government, with all its congregations and aſſemblies, was eſtabliſhed. The elders of each pariſh joined with the miniſters, were to preſide in all ſpiritual matters, in that congregation; and the general aſſembly over thoſe of the whole kingdom. That aſſembly of their clergy had already voted, that preſbytery was of divine right; but the parliament refuſed their aſſent to that opinion, becauſe they imagined it would be productive of a ſpiritual authority equal at leaſt, if not ſuperior, to that before enjoyed by the biſhops. The clergy of all ſects of chriſtians, under pretence of keeping the ſacraments from being profaned, had aſſumed the power of the keys, or the right of fulminating excommunications. The parliament thought proper to ſet limits to this power, which they conſidered as dangerous to liberty. They paſſed an ordinance, by which all the caſes in excommunication ſhould be uſed; they admitted appeals to be made to the parliament from all eccleſiaſtical courts; and appointed commiſſioners to take cognizance of ſuch caſes as fell not within their ordinance. The zealots were highly offended at the parliament, for intermixing ſo much civil with eccleſiaſtical authority; they conſidered it as a profanation of religion.

But what gave them the higheſt offence, was the propenſity ſhewn by many of the members to allow a toleration to all religious ſectaries. This excited an univerſal clamour among the preſbyterians, who loudly exclaimed againſt what they termed a moſt ſcandalous meaſure. "What!" ſaid they, "ſhall we make a Noah's ark of the church? make it a receptacle for all unclean beaſts? We are obliged by the covenant to oppoſe hereſy and ſchiſm. No "political reaſons can counterbalance this duty." The diſpute grew very warm between the preſbyterians and independents, the former oppoſing, and the latter ſupporting the reaſonableneſs of admitting a toleration in religion; and the king might have profited by it, if their hatred to him had not united thoſe whom their religious opinions had divided.

The king was not diſpleaſed at theſe diſputes in the parliament; but he ſoon perceived, that if it were poſſible for him to derive any advantage from the miſunderſtandings of his parliament, it would come too late. Fairfax was approaching, at the head of a powerful and victorious army, to beſiege him in Oxford, whence it would be impoſſible for him, after the city was inveſted, to make his eſcape. He could not bear the thought of being made a captive, and led in triumph through the ſtreets of his capital, amidſt a prejudiced and inſolent populace, and a rude, enthuſiaſtic ſoldiery, who hated his perſon, and deſpiſed his dignity. The Scots army had now inveſted Newark, and ſeemed to open the only aſylum to majeſty in diſtreſs. He imagined that the Scots had not yet loſt all attachment to their ſovereign; and that, as zealous preſbyterians, they would not willingly ſubmit to the independents. Montreville, the French miniſter, deſirous of ſerving the king, had ſollicited the Scots generals and commiſſioners to give protection to their diſtreſſed ſovereign; and having received many general profeſſions and promiſes, he tranſmitted theſe, poſſibly with ſome exaggeration, to the king, who now determined to throw himſelf into the arms of his Scottiſh ſubjects.

The utmoſt ſecrecy was, however, obſerved in this tranſaction; and that no interruption, ſufficient to occaſion a diſcovery, might happen, orders were given at every gate in Oxford to admit three perſons to paſs without being examined. Theſe precautions being taken, Charles, attended only by Dr. Hudſon and Mr. Aſhburnham, paſſed about midnight through that gate which leads to London. The king, in the dreſs of Aſhburnham's ſervant, with a portmanteau behind him, paſſed through Henley, and Harrow on the Hill. He once entertained ſome thoughts of entering the capital, and throwing himſelf into the arms of the parliament; but this deſign appearing too dangerous, he purſued his firſt intention; and, after paſſing through many croſs roads, reached the Scottiſh camp before Newark. The ſurprize of their generals and commiſſioners was prodigious: they pretended to do him homage, and paid him every external mark of reſpect; but were determined to make him a captive. They allotted him a guard, under pretence of protection and eſteem, but in reality to ſecure his perſon.

Newark ſtill made a noble defence againſt the Scots, who now applied to the king for orders to the governor to ſurrender the place. He readily obeyed, and the gates were opened to the enemy. Soon after the king's arrival, the Scots had informed the parliament of their being in poſſeſſion of the king's perſon; but hearing that the commons intended to demand him, and that the army of Fairfax was already in motion towards their camp, they thought proper to retire towards the frontiers of their own kingdom, and encamped at Newcaſtle, a place of great ſtrength. This motion was not diſagreeable to Charles; he imagined it was taken merely for the protection of his perſon; and flattered himſelf, that by the junction of his friends with the Scots, he ſhould be once more in a condition of facing the enemy, and, poſſibly, of reſtoring peace to his exhauſted kingdoms.

But Charles well knew that the Scots would never heartily concur in promoting his intereſt, unleſs he could gain the favour of their miniſters: he was therefore very attentive to their long and enthuſiaſtic ſermons, and ſeemed very deſirous of their inſtructions. But he ſoon perceived that the covenanting zealots were by no means his friends. One of their preachers, after bitterly reproaching him, in the harſheſt terms, for his conduct, gave out that pſalm, which, in the Engliſh tranſlation, begins, "Why boaſteſt thou thyſelf, thou tyrant, that thou canſt do miſchief?" The king ſtood up, and called for that pſalm which begins, "Have pity upon me, O Lord, for men go about to devour me." The good-natured audience ſhewed that they were penetrated with the ſight of majeſty in diſtreſs, and ſung the pſalm called for by the king. Pity, for once, triumphed over enthuſiaſm.

Charles was now required to iſſue orders to the governors of all his garriſons, to ſurrender the places they defended to the parliament. The king made no oppoſition: he perceived he could hope for no effectual aſſiſtance from the Scots, and knew that any farther oppoſition would only tend to exaſperate ſtill more the party that was formed againſt him. Fairfax carried thoſe orders into execution, and granted the garriſons honourable terms: he even prevented, as far as in his power, any inſults from being offered to the unfortunate royaliſts. The capital, with all the other forts garriſoned by the king's party in Ireland, were alſo delivered up to the parliament's officers: and Montroſe, after experiencing a great variety of good and bad fortune, threw down his arms, and retired to the continent.

All oppoſition on the part of the royaliſts being now ceaſed, it was thought that no time ſhould be loſt in ſettling the diſtracted ſtate of the kingdom. But this was not eaſy to be performed. The ſtrength of the independent party in parliament was greatly increaſed, and the army was at the devotion of Cromwell; but both began to entertain jealouſies of the Scots. It was therefore voted, "that there is no farther occaſion for the Scottiſh army to continue in England. And, that one hundred thouſand pounds be raiſed, and one moiety thereof paid to the Scots, on their delivering up all the towns they have garriſoned in England, except Berwick, and the other on their return to Scotland." At the ſame time, they ordered the Scots commiſſioners to deliver to the houſe an account of the arrears due to their army, that they might be diſcharged according to the treaty between the two kingdoms.

The propoſals for eſtabliſhing a peace were now laid before the king, and appeared to be ſuch as might be expected by a captive entirely at the mercy of an inexorable conqueror. The parliament demanded, before any treaty was ſigned, that the king ſhould give the royal aſſent to the following bills. "1. To recall all proclamations publiſhed againſt the parliament, and their actions. 2. To ſign the covenant, and paſs an act for its being taken by the whole kingdom. 3. An act to aboliſh the hierarchy. 4. To confirm the aſſembly. 5. An act for ſettling religion according to the plan eſtabliſhed by both houſes of parliament. 6. To confirm unity and uniformity in religion. 7. An act againſt jeſuits, papiſts, &c. 8. An act for educating the children of papiſts in the proteſtant religion. 9. An act for penalties againſt catholics. 10. An act againſt ſaying maſs in any place within the kingdom. 11. The ſame to be extended to Scotland, if the parliament of that kingdom think proper. 12. An act for the due obſervation of the Lord's day, againſt pluralities, nonreſidents, and for regulating the univerſities. 13. An act for veſting the militia in the parliament for twenty years; for empowering the commons to raiſe what money they thought neceſſary, and for confirming the privileges of London with regard to their own militia. 14. An act to render void all honours and titles conferred ſince the great ſeal was carried from the parliament, and that no peers be admitted but by conſent of both houſes. 15. An act to confirm the treaty between England and Scotland, and for appointing conſervators of the peace. 16. An act to eſtabliſh the declaration of both kingdoms, publiſhed on the thirtieth of June, 1643, with the qualifications of exception from pardon, with regard to ſeveral perſons, both Engliſh and Scots, and the name of thoſe rendered incapable of any office, and ſuch as have deſerted the parliament. 17. An act to render void the ceſſation concluded with the Iriſh rebels, for leaving the conduct of the war in that kingdom to the care of the parliament, and for ſettling religion there in the ſame manner as in England. 18. An act for veſting the government of the Tower and their own militia in the magiſtrates of London, and for confirming their charters. 19. A bill for confirming all grants and proceſſes iſſued under the parliament's great ſeal, and for rendering void all thoſe of any other."

Charles, though no ſtranger to the ſubſtance of theſe propoſals, told the meſſengers, that as they tended to introduce ſuch important innovations in the conſtitution, it was highly reaſonable he ſhould be allowed a proper time for deliberation. They replied, that he muſt give his anſwer in ten days. The king complained, that the terms made uſe of were not defined, and deſired to know their meaning. The meſſengers told him they had no power to debate, and that he muſt give a poſitive anſwer. Upon this the king delivered a paper, in which he complained of the limited powers of the commiſſioners, and demanded permiſſion to come to London and treat with his parliament in perſon. He added, that as he never could condeſcend to paſs bills abſolutely deſtructive of that juſt power with which he was entruſted by God and the laws of the kingdom, ſo he would chearfully give his aſſent to ſuch as were reaſonable, and really tended to promote the peace and happineſs of his ſubjects. He therefore conjured them as chriſtians, and as men who deſire to leave a good name behind them, that they would receive his anſwer in ſo favourable a manner, that the iſſues of blood may be ſtopped, and the dreadful diſtractions of this unhappy kingdom fully ſettled.

This paper was conſidered by the parliament's commiſſioners as no ſatisfactory anſwer, and they made ſome difficulty of receiving it. It, however, produced no effect; and the king was given to underſtand, that if he refuſed to comply with their demands, they would ſettle the kingdom by their own authority. But two difficulties ſtill continued to be removed; to prevail upon the Scots to deliver up the king, and to ſettle the payment of the arrears of their army.

Both theſe particulars cauſed very long debates in the parliament. The Scots pretended, that as Charles was king of both nations, they were equally intitled with the Engliſh to vote on the queſtion relative to the diſpoſal of his perſon; and that where the titles of both are equal, and the ſubject indiviſible, the preſent poſſeſſor was intitled to the preference. On the contrary, the Engliſh maintained, that as the king was in England, his perſon could not be diſpoſed of by any foreign nation. But though they differed ſo widely with regard to the diſpoſal of his majeſty's perſon, they agreed in impoſing on him ſuch rigorous conditions, that Charles, notwithſtanding his deplorable ſituation, refuſed to accept them. They did not, indeed, wiſh he ſhould recover his freedom; they never intended to blend lenity and tyranny together in ſo inconſiſtent a manner. The Scots, however, determined not to deliver up the king to the Engliſh parliament, but keep him as a pledge for their arrears, which, in the preſent diſtracted ſtate of the nation, they were unlikely to obtain by any other means. According to their own account, the ſum amounted to no leſs than two millions; for as the parliament had paid them very little money, the contributions they had levied, and the price of their living at free quarters, were all the deductions to be made out of the whole pay due to them, ever ſince they firſt entered England. This ſum was, however, conſidered as very exorbitant by the parliament; and the demand occaſioned very long and ſevere debates. At length the Scottiſh commiſſioners agreed to accept of four hundred thouſand pounds, in lieu of all demands; one half to be paid immediately, and the other in leſs than a year.

As the delivering up the king's perſon was conſidered as the principal condition of this infamous bargain, the money was raiſed with great alacrity. The Scottiſh parliament had indeed voted, that the king ſhould be protected, and his liberty be made one of the conditions of the treaty; but they were obliged to retract their reſolution on the interpoſition of the general aſſembly, who declared, "that as Charles had refuſed to take the covenant when tendered to him, it became not the godly to concern themſelves about his fortune." This reſolution, however, was not ſufficient to diſturb the tranquillity of the king's mind, ſo greatly had he profited in the ſchool of adverſity. He was playing at cheſs when he was informed of the final reſolution of the Scots to deliver him into the hands of the Engliſh parliament; but he continued his game without interruption; nor could any perſon in company perceive that the letter he peruſed brought any advice of conſequence.

The parliament had now ſurmounted every difficulty; the whole power of the nation was in their hands. Fairfax, the unhappy, the unwilling inſtrument of the miſeries of his country, was now in London, and complimented by the parliament in terms which can with propriety be uſed only to the divine Being. Lenthall, the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, told him, that he was "the Almighty who came riding on the wings of the wind." Fairfax deſpiſed and deteſted ſuch groſs flattery; but he was not proof againſt the arts of Cromwell. The army was now modelled in ſuch a manner, that they no longer conſidered themſelves as the ſervants of the parliament, but rather as its maſters; and Cromwell pointed out to Fairfax, with great juſtice and candour, the diſtractions that every where prevailed, both in church and ſtate. Scarcely two divines could agree in a ſtandard of faith, or two ſtateſmen on the ſame ſcheme of meaſures neceſſary to be purſued. Hence he concluded, that the army was now the ſole principle of unity, the center to which all lines muſt point. The ſoldiers, he ſaid, were the choſen people of God, and had within them that unerring light of grace, which ſoared above all ſublunary inſtitutions, and corrected all human errors. He meant, however, only thoſe ſoldiers under the command of Fairfax and himſelf; for there were beſides two armies, one under Maſſey, governor of Glouceſter; and the other under Mitton, in Wales. Maſſey's ſoldiers felt the infirmities of human nature; they were diſtreſſed with cold, hunger, and the want of every neceſſary comfort of life. They therefore preſented ſeveral ſtrong petitions to the parliament, enumerated their ſervices, and aſked that relief to which as ſervants, as men, and as chriſtians, they were ſo juſtly entitled. But all their petitions and remonſtrances were in vain; they were threatened with being ſent to Ireland, and in the mean time ſuffered to live at free quarters, that the diſbanding of them, which was now determined, might appear the leſs unpopular, though they were paid but a ſmall part of their arrears.

The independents had ſtrongly oppoſed the treaty with the Scots, and were for demanding the perſon of his majeſty at the head of the army, and driving them out of the kingdom by force. Every vote, therefore, in their favour, was ſtrenuouſly debated; but the preſbyterians having, as yet, the majority, carried their point; and the meaſure for ſending the Scots into their own country, by an amicable treaty, was adopted. This being ſettled, it was voted, that Holmby-houſe, in Northamptonſhire, ſhould be the place for receiving his majeſty; and a committee of lords and commons, with a party of the army, were appointed to attend him thither from Newcaſtle; but, at the ſame time, they declared, that nothing ſhould be done towards ſettling the peace, till the Scottiſh forces had paſſed the Engliſh borders. When the Engliſh commiſſioners arrived in the Scottiſh camp, and were permitted to kiſs the king's hands, he received them with the ſame grace and chearfulneſs, as if they had travelled on no other errand, but that of paying their court to him. His majeſty was allowed only nine ſervants to attend him; and though he was treated by the commiſſioners with all the external marks of reſpect, he was not ſuffered to have any intercourſe with his friends. Some weeks before the king was delivered into the hands of the parliament's commiſſioners, the earl of Eſſex paid the debt of nature. This was a ſevere blow both to the king and preſbyterian party. Senſible of the deplorable ſtate of the nation, to which, from miſtake rather than deſign, he had ſo greatly contributed, he determined to exert all his power to bring about a peace, and reſtore the tranquillity of the nation; but death put a final period to his deſign, deprived the preſbyterians, or moderate party, of a popular leader, and ſo greatly leſſened the power of the houſe of peers, that it was almoſt annihilated.

A. D. 1647. While the king continued at Holmby-houſe, the nation began to be very uneaſy at the ſituation of public affairs. The houſe of commons had either by themſelves, or their committees, diverted the ordinary courſe of laws, even in matters of private property; but they had often declared, that as ſoon as the neceſſity of the times would permit, the courts of judicature ſhould reſume their ancient functions. The lords did not fail to put them in mind of thoſe declarations, but very little more was done than that of appointing ſome lawyers to go the circuits, and entering into a debate about the neceſſity of conſtituting new judges. A committee of the commons had ſat, at Goldſmith's-hall, ever ſince the beginning of the civil war, with almoſt unlimited power; and to them was committed the care of the greater part of the landed eſtates in the kingdom, being ſequeſtered for the adherence of their owners to the royal cauſe. The lords were of opinion, that the public diſtractions of the nation could not be compoſed, unleſs thoſe ſeverities were laid aſide, and more lenient methods purſued; and began to exert themſelves with regard to the committee at Goldſmith's-hall. But this was a power the commons were determined to ſupport, and not to ſuffer their proceedings to be examined. They therefore made an apology in favour of their committee, and plainly told the lords, that many of their houſe had petitioned for, and obtained large ſums from that committee; particularly the earl of Northumberland ten thouſand pounds; the earl of Kent, and the lord Gray of Warke, four thouſand pounds each; the lord Say two thouſand pounds, and the earls of Lincoln, Denbigh, and Stamford, fifteen hundred pounds each.

But the greateſt grievance conſiſted in the army, which, though there was not now the ſhadow of an enemy in the field, was ſtill kept up to the great terror of the preſbyterian party, who were therefore determined to take the firſt favourable opportunity of reducing that alarming inſtrument of the independents. The army had for ſome time been greatly neglected, and had preſented many petitions to the parliament for their arrears, which were not only diſregarded, but an order had been made by both houſes, that no part of the army ſhould be quartered within twenty-five miles of London.

In the mean time the nation laboured under every ſpecies of oppreſſion. The public diſtractions had diſcouraged trade, manufactures, and agriculture in England, and the public now reflected, in all the bitterneſs of ſpirit, on the bleſſings of tranquillity they formerly enjoyed, and which they now ſaw no hopes of returning. The preſbyterians were deſirous of diſmiſſing the army, even without rewarding them for their former ſervices. Cromwell very juſtly oppoſed their deſign by obſerving, that the parliament had nothing to ſupport the authority they had acquired but the army. On the twenty-ſeventh of February a motion was made in the houſe with regard to the reduction of the forces, and carried by a majority of two only. It was then reſolved to begin with reducing the cavalry, and it was determined that four thouſand horſe and one thouſand dragoons would be ſufficient for the ſervice of the whole kingdom. They next proceeded to conſider how the forces and garriſons of the kingdom ſhould be diſpoſed of and provided for; and the queſtion was put, "whether there ſhould be a number of foot kept up at the pay of the kingdom, more than will be ſufficient for the keeping ſuch garriſons as ſhall be continued." This queſtion paſſed in the negative, notwithſtanding the independents exerted all their intereſt to procure a larger number. It was ſoon after voted, "that three thouſand horſe, nine hundred foot, and twelve hundred dragoons, ſhould be ſent over to Ireland." But the moſt violent queſtions carried againſt the independents, were, "That no officer ſhould command under Fairfax, above the degree of a colonel; and that no member of parliament ſhould have the command of any garriſon or fort in England." They next voted, "That ſuch perſons as ſhall be employed as officers in the garriſons, or forces that ſhall be kept up in the kingdom, under the command of Sir Thomas Fairfax, ſhall conform to the eſtabliſhment of the church, eſtabliſhed by both houſes of parliament."

Theſe votes being directly levelled againſt the independents in the army, and who were the moſt active perſons in it, it is no wonder that Cromwell and his party determined to attempt the independency of the army upon the ruins of the parliament. This was no difficult taſk for Cromwell to perform, by giving the officers a very unfavourable opinion of the houſe of lords, who were daily ſending meſſages to the commons concerning the danger of the kingdom from the army. Mancheſter had indeed given the houſe a very unfavourable opinion of Cromwell's intentions, and the artful methods he made uſe of to gain an aſcendant over the army. The preſbyterians in the army equally hated Cromwell, and had already voted, that the Scottiſh forces in Ireland ſhould be ſent back to their own country, and that the war in that kingdom ſhould be proſecuted by the Engliſh forces only. This vote greatly alarmed the army; they well knew, that if they were once ſent into Ireland, their petitions and remonſtrances would have little weight: the parliament would leave them to earn a wretched ſubſiſtence with their ſwords in oppoſing the Iriſh rebels. The arrears due to the army were already very conſiderable, amounting to no leſs than three hundred and thirty-one thouſand pounds. A petition was therefore preſented to Sir Thomas Fairfax, by the officers of the army, in which they enumerated the hardſhips to which they muſt be reduced if their arrears were any longer deferred. Fairfax laid the petition before the parliament; but received only a harſh anſwer. The parliament even threatened to proceed againſt the promoters of the petition as enemies to the ſtate and diſturbers of the public peace.

As the army had certainly ſome reaſon for their petition, it is no wonder that the declaration of the parliament tended to increaſe rather than leſſen the mutinous diſpoſitions of the ſoldiers. They lamented, that they who had ſo long expoſed themſelves to every danger in order to eſtabliſh the liberty of the ſubject, ſhould themſelves be deprived of the privileges of Engliſhmen, and even denied the privilege of repreſenting their grievances. The commons, fearful of the conſequences of exaſperating the army, ſent commiſſioners, at the head of whom were Cromwell and Ireton, to the head quarters at Saffron-Walden, to make propoſals for entering into the Iriſh ſervice. But inſtead of inliſting, the generality abſolutely rejected the terms, and deſired an indemnity, ratified by the king, for any illegal actions, of which, during the courſe of the war, they might have been guilty; together with ſatisfaction for arrears, freedom from preſſing, relief for widows and maimed ſoldiers, and pay till diſbanded. They expreſſed no diſſatisfaction againſt Skippon, who was appointed to command the troops in Ireland, but diſcovered a much ſtronger deſire of ſerving under Fairfax or Cromwell. The commiſſioners, who were in reality the ſole cauſe of all the diſcontents in the army, failed not to foment the diſorders they were ſent to appeaſe.

A military parliament, in oppoſition to that at Weſtminſter, was immediately formed, conſiſting of two houſes. The principal officers compoſed a council, or houſe of peers; while two private men, or inferior officers, choſen from each troop or company, under the title of agitators, formed the lower houſe. This eſtabliſhment afforded an eaſy method for the leaders to augment the mutinous diſpoſition of the army, without the leaſt danger of being diſcovered. At the ſame time, the general humour that then prevailed in the nation for forming plans for imaginary republics, was, in ſome meaſure, gratified. Their firſt reſolutions ſufficiently indicated the conſequences that would ſoon enſue from their deliberations. They voted, that the offers of the parliament were not ſatisfactory; that eight weeks pay (which was all, they ſaid, the parliament promiſed) was but a ſmall part of fifty-ſix weeks, which they pretended was their due: that no viſible ſecurity was given for the remainder; and that having been declared public enemies by the commons, there was ſufficient reaſon to fear, that unleſs the declaration was recalled, they might be hereafter proſecuted as ſuch. Cromwell, in order to carry on his ambitious deſigns under the impenetrable veil of hypocriſy, had taken care to repair to London before theſe violent reſolutions were taken, in order, as he pretended, to lay the increaſing diſcontents of the army before the parliament.

Alarmed at theſe rebellious diſpoſitions of the ſoldiers, the parliament determined to make one vigorous effort more, in order to ſupport their authority: They voted, that all the troops that refuſed to inliſt for Ireland ſhould be diſbanded in their quarters. But this reſolution was hardly paſſed by the commons, before the new parliament in the army ordered a general rendezvous of all the regiments, in order to concert meaſures for ſupporting their common intereſts. A plan ſecretly ſuggeſted by Cromwell, decided the victory in their favour. Not a moment was to be loſt; both the magiſtracy and the militia of London had declared for the parliament; ſome of the beſt officers in England, and even the general himſelf, were for ſupporting the ſame authority; the ſources of money were almoſt exhauſted, and the ſoldiers had no other alternative than that of ſubduing the parliament, or ſubmitting implicitly to their authority.

The king was ſtill at Holmby-houſe, and guarded by a party of ſoldiers under the command of colonel Graves, who was ſuppoſed to be in the intereſt of the commons. It was, however, determined to ſeize the king's perſon, and conduct him to the army. A party of five hundred horſe, commanded by one Joice, originally a taylor, but now advanced to the rank of cornet, accordingly marched for Holmby-houſe. The guard made not the leaſt oppoſition; Joice came into the king's preſence, armed with piſtols, and bluntly told his majeſty he muſt go with him immediately. "Whither?" ſaid the king. "To the army;" replied Joice. The king aſked by what authority he acted, and required to ſee his warrant. Joice pointed to one of the ſoldiers he had brought with him, tall, handſome and well accoutered. "Truly," ſaid the king, ſmiling, "your warrant is written in very legible characters; it may be read without ſpelling." In the mean time the parliament's commiſſioners, perceiving the guard made no oppoſition, ſent an officer to know who commanded the party upon duty. He was anſwered, "That they all commanded." The commiſſioners now came into the room, and aſked Joice if he had any orders from the parliament? He ſaid, "No." "Have you any from the general?" "No." "By what authority do you act in this manner?" He pointed, as before, to the ſoldier. "We will write to the parliament," ſaid they, "to know their pleaſure." "You may if you pleaſe," replied Joice, "but in the mean time the king muſt immediately go with me." He added, that he had no deſign to inſult the perſon of his majeſty, but would conduct him with ſafety to their head quarters.

All reſiſtance was in vain, and the king, after protracting the time as much as poſſible, ſtepped into his coach, and was carried to the army, who were then haſtening to their rendezvous on Triplo-heath, near Cambridge.

Fairfax, who was totally a ſtranger to the whole tranſaction, knew not how to behave on this occaſion. No body could be found who gave the orders, which were merely verbal; and while they were employed in tracing them to their ſource, Cromwell arrived from London and finiſhed the debate. He juſtified the conduct of Joice, by aſſerting that Graves intended to carry his majeſty to London the next day, where a treaty was intended to be ſigned between him and the parliament, and the poor ſoldiers left to ſhift for themſelves, or perhaps be treated with greater ſeverity. Fairfax was however far from being convinced of the propriety of Joice's conduct. He thought he had gone too far; but conſented that the king ſhould be carried back to Holmby-houſe, and reſide there under a guard of his own officers and ſoldiers. But Whalley, a creature of Cromwell, being appointed to command the detachment, conducted his majeſty to Newmarket, inſtead of Holmby-houſe.

The parliament were ſtruck with aſtoniſhment when they were informed of this daring inſult on their authority. The city was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion; diſtraction ſeemed painted in every countenance. Many of the preſbyterian members, terrified at the power of the army, either abſented themſelves from the houſe, or joined with the independents in paſſing ſuch reſolutions as might tend to allay the ferment raiſed among the ſoldiers. They voted that the army ſhould receive their full demands, and that both officers and ſoldiers ſhould receive a reaſonable gratuity, beſides their pay; but, at the ſame time, they voted, that the king ſhould be conducted back to Holmby-houſe; while the lords preſſed ſtrongly that he ſhould be carried to Oatlands. The army, however, put a negative upon both; and Joice openly avowed in the preſence of the king, Fairfax and Cromwell, that what he had done was the ſenſe of the whole ſoldiery, and that though he had undertaken to act in that manner without a written order from his commander, he had done no more than his duty. Both the council of officers, and houſe of agitators were wholly moved by the direction of Cromwell, who thus conveyed his will to the whole army. He had conducted himſelf in parliament with ſuch profound diſſimulation and refined hypocriſy, that he even deceived thoſe, who had long made it a practice to deceive others. Whenever any intelligence of diſorders in the army arrived, he appeared agitated in the moſt violent manner with the paſſions of grief and anger. He wept bitterly; he lamented the misfortunes of his country: he adviſed the moſt violent meaſures for ſuppreſſing the mutiny; and by giving theſe precipitate counſels, he at once ſeemed to prove his own ſincerity, and inflamed thoſe diſcontents of which he intended to make his own advantage. He appealed to heaven and earth, that his devoted attachment to the parliament had rendered him ſo odious in the army, that his life was expoſed to the utmoſt danger while he continued among them. Theſe aſſeverations produced the deſired effect, and he had now, by his profound and artful conduct, attained a ſituation, where he could cover his enterprizes from the eye of the public; and by ſeeming either to obey the commands of his ſuperior officer, or yield to the motions of the ſoldiers, could, with eaſe and ſecrecy, pave the way to his future greatneſs.

When Fairfax drew up the whole army on Triplo-heath, the ſoldiers ſeemed more diſſatisfied than ever; there was not one among them who was ſatisfied with the laſt votes of parliament. The preſbyterian party were now ſufficiently alarmed, and immediately applied to the city for protection. Their requeſt was granted, and two regiments of militia marched to Weſtminſter for that purpoſe. This imprudent meaſure ſerved only to increaſe the ferment already too violent in the army. It was pretended that the parliament itſelf was under reſtraint; and that it was therefore neceſſary for them to march into the neighbourhood of the capital, in order to reſtore liberty to the members. Fairfax, who ſolemnly diſclaimed all intentions of breaking with the parliament, was pleaſed with what he conſidered as an inſtance of the ſoldiers duty, and gave orders for the army to march towards London. Deſtitute at once of talents for cabal, and of penetration to diſcover the cabals of others, Fairfax had given his confidence entirely to Cromwell; who, by the moſt ſpecious pretences, the appearance of an open ſincerity, and a ſcrupulous conſcience, impoſed on the eaſy nature of this brave and virtuous general.

On the twelth of June advice arrived in London, that the army had advanced to St. Albans. The city had already armed their militia, drawn out their artillery, poſted their guards, and diſplayed the ſame warlike appearance as in the beginning of the war againſt the king. But the enemy they were now to encounter was of a very different kind; and they were ſo greatly terrified with the names of Fairfax and Cromwell at the head of a powerful and victorious army, that on their approach, the warlike order of the militia ſubſided; letters full of civility and profeſſions of eſteem paſſed between the magiſtrates and the general, who ſtill continued to advance, notwithſtanding repeated meſſages were ſent by the parliament, enjoining the general not to lead his army nearer than within forty miles of London. The parliament now found it neceſſary to ſubmit, and endeavour, by complaiſance, to ſtop the fury of the enraged army. Their firſt indication was their ordering the vote, which declared the military petitioners public enemies, to be erazed from their journal-book.

The tyranny exerciſed by the parliament had rendered them very unpopular: from being once the idol of the nation, they were now become the object of general hatred and averſion. They experienced the meaſures they had ſo lately adopted in their uſurpations upon the crown. The army roſe every day in their demands. One claim was no ſooner granted, than another ſtill more enormous and exorbitant was made: they ſeemed determined never to be ſatisfied. At firſt they only pretended to petition the parliament for what concerned themſelves as ſoldiers: they next inſiſted on a vindication of their character: they then thought it neceſſary that their enemies ſhould be puniſhed; and at laſt they claimed the right of modelling the government, and ſettling the nation. In theſe exorbitant demands, they preſerved, in words, the utmoſt deference and reſpect to the parliament, while in actions they inſulted them in the groſſeſt manner. They did not pretend to accuſe the whole aſſembly; their petitions were levelled againſt evil counſellors only, by whom they ſaid it was ſeduced and betrayed.

On the ſixteenth of June, they charged with high treaſon, as enemies to the army, and evil counſellors to the ſtate, the following eleven members: Denzil Hollis, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Lewis, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir William Waller, Sir John Maynard, major-general Maſſey, Mr. recorder Glyn, colonel Walter Long, colonel Edward Harley, and Mr. Anthony Nicholls. Theſe members, who were the leaders of the preſbyterian party, they inſiſted ſhould be immediately ſequeſtered from parliament, and committed to priſon. The commons replied, that a general charge was not ſufficient for them to proceed to ſuch extremities. It was anſwered, that ſuch a charge was thought ſufficient in the caſes of Strafford and Laud. Such is, generally, the caſe of contending parties, in the alternate uſurpations of authority; they indulge themſelves in the ſame exceſſes they had condemned in their adverſaries.

It was in vain for the accuſed members to appeal to the people; the parliament was no longer conſidered as the defender of laws, and the reſtorer of liberty. It had exerciſed a power more arbitrary than that which had given occaſion to its enterprizes againſt the crown. The exciſe on liquors and proviſions, with a great variety of other impoſts, had alienated the minds of the people, who had before been wholly ſtrangers to ſuch burthens. Immenſe ſums (which, according to ſome authors, amounted to forty millions) levied in five years, gave ample occaſion for complaints, eſpecially when compared with the ſmall ſubſidies paid before the civil war. The commiſſioners, who were intruſted with the diſpoſal of this money, gave no account of it. The epiſcopal clergy, cruelly perſecuted, without any other cauſe than their adherence to the principles of the church of England, were become an object of pity rather than hatred. In the room of the courts of high-commiſſion and ſtar-chamber, aboliſhed with ſo much juſtice and ſpirit, tribunals by no means leſs odious were eſtabliſhed in every county.

The general charge againſt the eleven members was ſucceeded by a declaration ſigned by Fairfax and his officers, aſſerting their right of keeping their arms, till they ſaw the purpoſes for which they firſt took them up fully anſwered. The paper was drawn up in a very maſterly manner, and contained the following demands: “That both houſes be immediately purged of ſuch miniſters who ought not to have a ſeat in that aſſembly: that thoſe perſons who have abuſed the confidence of the parliament and army, and endangered the kingdom, may be ſpeedily diſabled from doing any farther miſchief: that ſome interval of time may be appointed for the continuance of this, as well as of future parliaments, and that new elections be ſucceſſively made according to the bill for triennial parliaments: that proviſion be made to prevent future parliaments from being diſſolved at the king's pleaſure, without their conſent, but ſuffered to ſit their proper time: that the right of the people to repreſent to the parliament their grievances, by way of petition, may be vindicated: that the diſcretionary powers given to country-committees during the war, may be taken away, as they are now no longer neceſſary: that the people may be ſatisfied with regard to diſburſements of the money levied on the nation: that public juſtice being ſatisfied by a few examples of the moſt exceptionable perſons, ſome courſe may be taken, by a general act of oblivion, that all apprehenſions of a future war may be entirely removed.”

Terrified at theſe demands of the army, the city of London ſent a deputation to St. Albans, diſclaiming any intention to raiſe forces for oppoſing the army. This timidity of the citizens greatly intimidated the preſbyterian party, which now became contemptible in the eyes of the ſoldiers. The proſecution againſt the eleven commoners was puſhed with great violence; and the members themſelves, unwilling to give occaſion to freſh diſcords, begged leave to retire from the houſe; and the army, for the preſent, ſeemed ſatisfied with this mark of ſubmiſſion.

Having thus completely ſubdued the parliament, and no ſigns of reſiſtance appearing in the city, the army, at the deſire of the commons, retired farther from the capital, and fixed their head quarters at Reading, carrying the king with them. He had experienced much greater lenity ſince he had been with the army than before: he enjoyed not only his favourite diverſions, but his favourite mode of worſhip, ſhip, and the converſation of his favourite friends. His children were once allowed to viſit him, and paſſed a few days at Caverſham-houſe, where he reſided. This interview was remarkably tender and affecting: no man ever loved his family more ſincerely than Charles. Cromwell, who was preſent at this interview of the royal family, confeſſed he had never beheld ſo tender a ſcene.

The chiefs of the army ſeemed to pay their court to his majeſty. Fairfax declared he intended to force the parliament to moderate their demands, and to reſtore him to his juſt rights. Cromwell and Ireton went ſtill farther; they profeſſed a reſpect, and even a veneration for his perſon, and actually imparted to him propoſals, to which they promiſed to procure the agreement of the army, and to which he might aſſent with little or no violence to his conſcience. All the agitators, except thoſe infected with the principles of levelling, made the ſame profeſſions, and were even friendly enough to put him upon his guard againſt thoſe officers whoſe ſincerity they ſuſpected. The parliament, afraid of his forming ſome accommodation with the army, addreſſed him with far more reſpect than formerly: they even invited him to reſide at Richmond, and contribute his aſſiſtance to the ſettlement of the nation. Charles flattered himſelf, that the preſent ſcene of diſtractions, oppreſſions and terror, would induce the people to reflect on that ancient form of government, under which they and their anceſtors had ſo long enjoyed happineſs and tranquillity.

Courted by both parties, the king hoped he ſhould ſoon be reſtored to his juſt rights, and once more hold the ſceptre of his anceſtors. The independents, however, ſeemed to be moſt in his intereſt. He had ſufficiently experienced the rigour of the parliament: they pretended wholly to annihilate his authority: they had confined his perſon. In both theſe particulars he had received more indulgence from the army. None of his friends were excluded from his preſence. And in the propoſals ſent him by the council of officers for the ſettlement of the nation, they inſiſted neither on the abolition of epiſcopacy, nor on the puniſhment of the royaliſts; two points to which the king had the greateſt reluctance. They alſo inſiſted, that a period ſhould be put to the preſent parliament; a meaſure which Charles had extremely at heart. He hoped, by gratifying a few particular men, to draw over the whole army to his intereſt. Accordingly he offered to inveſt Cromwell with the order of the garter, create him earl of Eſſex, and give him the command of the army. Ireton was to be lord-lieutenant of Ireland. But notwithſtanding theſe favourable appearances, the king was ſtill ſenſible that they were but ambiguous proofs of the army's affection to his perſon and cauſe; he feared they were only intended to procure the countenance of him and his friends to favour their deſigns in effectually humbling the parliament. On the other hand, he reflected, that the independents, being the profeſſed patrons of the liberties of the people, could not ſurely act ſo contrary to their own principles, as to deny that liberty to their king. What they demanded for their own conſciences, they could not, with the leaſt appearance of reaſon, deny to his.

The militia of London had lately been put under the command of preſbyterian officers, and the army now determined to place it in the hands of the independents. This, together with the unſettled ſtate of public affairs, occaſioned petitions to be ſent to the parliament from all ranks and degrees of people. The garriſons in the country, being neglected and ill paid, began to mutiny, and ſend petitions to both houſes for redreſs. The Welſh forces were actually in arms againſt the parliament. The northern army had impriſoned Pointz, their old, brave, and ſucceſsful general. Many of the ſoldiers who had engaged to go to Ireland, retracted their promiſe, and offered their ſervice to Fairfax. Thoſe who had inliſted under the parliament, amounting to ſeveral thouſands, held nightly meetings to conſult the moſt proper meaſures to be purſued at this alarming criſis. Theſe diſorders were wholly occaſioned by the army of Fairfax, who had engroſſed to themſelves all the money that had been raiſed. The people no longer paid any reverence to the parliament. Multitudes of young men and apprentices flocked to Weſtminſter with petitions, ſome for the old committee of militia, and others againſt it; but all of them ſpeaking in the ſtrain of ſupreme authority, as if both the parliament and army had been their ſervants. The artful Cromwell enjoyed this ſtorm, which he perceived would ſoon ſweep before it all the obſtacles that oppoſed his ambition. One day the mob of the independents, the next that of the preſbyterians, prevailed. The parliament was no longer guided by thoſe able men who could direct the tumult, and turn confuſion to their own advantage; the populace were now maſters, and the parliament had no will of its own.

It ſeemed, therefore, abſolutely neceſſary for the army to march to London, as the parliament was entirely directed by a ſeditious multitude. Accordingly the troops began their march from Reading towards the capital. When they reached Hounſlow-heath, they were drawn up, and exhibited a very formidable appearance. They were twenty thouſand ſtrong; and determined, without any regard to laws or liberty, to purſue whatever meaſures their generals ſhould think proper. Here they were met by the ſpeakers of the two houſes, Mancheſter and Lenthall, attended by eight peers, and about ſixty commoners; who having ſecretly left the city, preſented themſelves, with their maces, and all the enſigns of their dignity; and complaining of the violence exerciſed by the citizens, applied to the army for defence and protection. They were received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy; the ſame reſpect was paid them as to the parliament of England; and the army, being provided with ſo plauſible a pretence, advanced to chaſtiſe the rebellious city, and to reinſtate the violated parliament in all their liberties and privileges.

On the thirtieth of July, the parliament met, purſuant to their prorogation; and it being now abſolutely neceſſary for them either to reſign their whole authority, or oppoſe the violent deſigns of the army, they reſolved upon the latter. Accordingly they choſe two new ſpeakers, lord Hunſdon and Henry Pelham. Vigorous meaſures were immediately purſued. One of their firſt votes was to require the general not to advance nearer than thirty miles of London, or, if already advanced, to retire to that diſtance. They renewed their former orders for inliſting troops, and appointed Maſſey their commander. They ordered the artillery to be drawn out, and the trained bands to man the lines. The whole city was in a ferment; every corner reſounded with military preparations. But the terror of an univerſal pillage, and even maſſacre, had ſeized the timid inhabitants: confuſion was painted in every countenance. When any intelligence arrived that the army halted, or ſeemed to make preparations for a retreat, the cry of "One and all" ran with alacrity from ſtreet to ſtreet among the citizens. When news came of their advancing, the cry of "Treat and capitulate," was equally loud and vehement. All was uproar, confuſion, and diſmay.

Next day the lords and commons voted, "that his majeſty be deſired to come to London, and there treat with both houſes of parliament and the commiſſioners of Scotland for a ſafe and honourable peace." But the affairs of the parliament were now in ſuch confuſion, that this vote, which was ſent to Fairfax, was diſregarded, and the army continued ſtill to approach nearer to the capital. Rainſborow having been detached over Kingſton-bridge, at the head of a ſtrong party, preſented himſelf before Southwark, and was gladly received by ſome ſoldiers quartered there for its defence, and who were reſolved not to ſeparate their intereſts from thoſe of the army. It was now abſolutely neceſſary for the city to capitulate, though nothing better than the following diſhonourable conditions could be obtained: "That they ſhould deſert the intereſt of the impeached members, recall their declaration lately publiſhed, relinquiſh their militia, deliver up all their forts and line of communication to the army, together with the Tower of London, and all the magazines of arms and military ſtores depoſited in that fortreſs; diſband all their forces, and drive all the reformadoes out of the line; withdraw all their guards from the houſes of parliament, and receive within the lines ſuch forces as the army ſhall think neceſſary; demoliſh their works, and ſuffer the whole army to march through the city."

Theſe terms were complied with: the army marched in triumph through the city; but preſerved the greateſt order, decency, and the appearance of humility. The two ſpeakers were conducted to Weſtminſter, and took their ſeats without the leaſt oppoſition. The eleven impeached members, being accuſed of exciting the late tumult, were expelled, and moſt of them retired beyond the ſeas. Seven peers were impeached: the lord mayor, one of the ſheriffs, and three aldermen, ſent to the Tower: ſeveral citizens and officers of the militia committed to priſon; and every act of the parliament annulled, from the day of the tumult till the return of the ſpeakers. The lines of communication were levelled; the militia reſtored to the independents; and regiments were quartered in Whitehall and the Mews. Every thing being completed, the parliament and city entirely reduced to ſervitude, and the ſword alone giving law to the ſtate, a day was appointed for a ſolemn thankſgiving to God for the reſtoration of liberty.

The army now lay in the neighbourhood of Putney, greatly diſtreſſed for want of money, and threatening every moment to break into the city, and become their own pay-maſters. Fairfax, who was ſtill the tool of Cromwell, though his intentions were ſincere with regard to the peace and happineſs of his country, found the utmoſt difficulty in reſtraining the impatience of the ſoldiers, and the ſpirit of levelling which was now diffuſed among the troops, by means of the agitators. The general council of the army was now applied to in the ſame manner as the parliament had been formerly; nor did the commons venture to paſs any vote of importance without knowing the ſenſe of the officers. The preſbyterian party, however, ſtill gave the generals great uneaſineſs on the popular topic of ſending relief to Ireland; and ſome votes paſſed for ſending ſeven or eight regiments over to that diſtreſſed kingdom, which the officers of the army did not think prudent to oppoſe. Cromwell, however, found a pretence, from the want of money, to render the whole ineffectual for the preſent. Even that daring leader himſelf found ſome difficulty of rendering the reſentment of the agitators abortive; he was obliged to chaſtiſe ſome of them with his own hand, and to order others to be tried by a court-martial.

The leaders of the army, who now, in reality, governed the nation, carried the king to Hampton-Court, where he reſided, for ſome time, with all the appearance of dignity and freedom. He poſſeſſed ſo remarkable an equanimity of temper, that, during all the variety of fortune which attended him, no change was perceived either in his countenance or behaviour. Though a priſoner in the hands of his moſt inveterate enemies, he ſupported, towards all that approached him, the majeſty of a monarch. His manner, which was not in itſelf popular or gracious, now appeared truly amiable, from its meekneſs and equality.

While the king continued at Hampton-Court, the parliament again preſented him with nearly the ſame conditions which they had offered him at Newcaſtle. The army alſo offered him propoſitions for a peace. Charles ſeemed to prefer the latter, and deſired the parliament to take the propoſals of the army into conſideration, and make them the foundation of the public ſettlement. The offers of the army were to the following purpoſe:

"That there be biennial parliaments, each to ſit one hundred and twenty days, and after that time to be adjournable or diſſolvable at the king's pleaſure: that this biennial parliament may appoint committees to ſit during the interval for ſuch purpoſes as ſhall be thought neceſſary: that the king, with the advice of the council of ſtate, may call a parliament extraordinary during the intervals, with proper limitations of meeting and diſſolving: that the biennial parliament be never interrupted: that a better proportion be obſerved in elections; all counties to have a number of members proportional to the taxes they pay to the public: that no poor boroughs ſend any more repreſentatives to parliament: that effectual proviſion be made for the freedom of elections; and that the parliament only have power to give directions for that purpoſe: that liberty be allowed for entering diſſents in the houſe of commons; and no member be cenſured for what he ſhall ſay in parliament, but by the houſe itſelf: that the judicial power of the lords and commons be eſtabliſhed without appeal, and the king rendered incapable of pardoning offenders condemned by them, without their conſent: that the peers have no juriſdiction over the commons without the concurrence of that houſe, and the members judged only by thoſe of their equals: that grand-jurymen be choſen by the ſeveral parts and diviſions of each county reſpectively, and not left to the diſcretion of any under ſheriff; and that theſe grand-jurymen at each aſſize preſent the names of perſons to be made juſtices of the peace; and at the ſummer aſſizes, the names of three perſons, out of whom the king ſhall chuſe one for ſheriff.

"That, for the future ſecurity of parliament and the militia in general, an act be paſſed for veſting in both houſes, or perſons whom they ſhall appoint, the power of the militia by land and ſea, during ten years: that it ſhall not be exerciſed by the king, nor by any perſon appointed by him, during the ſaid interval; nor afterwards, but by the advice of the parliament, council of ſtate, or the parliamentary committees during the receſs: that both houſes raiſe and diſpoſe of money for ſuch forces as ſhall be thought neceſſary, for the payment of the public debts, and for the uſes of the kingdom: that theſe ten years ſecurity may be rendered firmer, it ſhall be provided, that none who have carried arms againſt the parliament, during the late war, be capable of any office or truſt during five years, without conſent of parliament; nor ſit as members thereof, till after the ſecond biennial parliament.

"That, in order to reſtore peace to the kingdom of Ireland, commiſſioners for the admiralty, together with an admiral and vice-admiral, be appointed, with ample powers to execute fully theſe offices, and that ſufficient pay be provided for the ſervice: that the forces in pay be commanded by a lord-general: that commiſſioners be appointed to diſcipline the militia in every county; and alſo a council of ſtate to ſuperintend the powers given to theſe commiſſioners: that the ſaid council have the ſame power with the king's privy-council, but not to make war or peace without conſent of parliament: that this council of truſty and able perſons do continue in office during their good behaviour, but not above ſeven years: that a ſufficient pay be provided for the ſtanding forces; the eſtabliſhment to continue till two months after the meeting of the firſt biennial parliament.

"That an act be paſſed for diſpoſing of the great offices of ſtate for ten years by the lords and commons in parliament, and by the committees in the intervals, in ſubmiſſion to the approbation of the next parliament; and after the expiration of that term, they ſhall name three, out of whom the king ſhall appoint one, to fill up any vacancy.

“ That all the peers created ſince the great ſeal was carried to Oxford on the twenty-firſt of May, 1642, be diſabled from ſitting and voting in parliament.

“ That an act be paſſed to annul all the acts; declarations, &c. againſt the parliament and their adherents; and to confirm the ordinances for indemnity.

“ That an act be paſſed to make void all grants paſſed under the great ſeal, ſince the twenty-firſt of May, 1642; and to confirm and render thoſe valid that paſſed under the great ſeal made by authority of parliament.

“ That the treaties between England and Scotland be confirmed, and that conſervators be appointed for preſerving the peace between the two kingdoms.

“ That the ordinance for taking away the court of wards and liveries be confirmed; but the king's revenue to be made up ſome other way, and the officers of thoſe courts to have reparation.

“ That an act be paſſed, declaring the ceſſation of arms in Ireland to be void, and leaving that war to the proſecution of the parliament.

“ That a bill be paſſed for taking away all coercive power, authority and juriſdiction of biſhops, and all other eccleſiaſtical officers, extending to civil penalties upon any, or to repeal all laws whereby the civil magiſtracy hath been, or is bound, upon any eccleſiaſtical cenſure, to proceed, ex officio, unto any civil penalties againſt any perſons ſo cenſured.

“ That all the penal laws, or clauſes, enjoining the uſe of the common-prayer, and for impoſing penalties for not coming to church, be repealed; and that ſome proviſion be made for diſcovering of recuſants.

“ That the taking of the covenant be not enforced upon any perſon, and that all ordinances enjoining it be repealed.

“ That theſe particulars being provided for, his majeſty, his queen, and their royal iſſue, be reſtored to a condition of honour and freedom in this nation, without diminution of their perſonal rights, or farther limitation of the exerciſe of their power.

“ That a certain number of perſons, not exceeding five for the Engliſh, beſides the Iriſh rebels, be reſerved to the judgment of the parliament; and that the grievances of the people, with regard to the abuſes of lawyers, impriſonments for debts, regulations of aſſeſſments, and removing the diſputes about tithes, aſſerting the people's rights in petitioning, and various other grievances, be redreſſed.”

Theſe offers of the army were certainly more reaſonable, and better calculated to form a ſolid foundation for peace, than thoſe of the parliament. But ſome event, or the ambitious deſigns of Cromwell, rendered the whole ſcheme abortive. Several writers have aſſerted, that the daring uſurper really intended to make a private bargain with the king; a meaſure which carried the moſt plauſible appearance, both with regard to his own ſafety and advancement; but that he found inſuperable difficulties in reconciling to it the wild humours of the army. Others ſay, that a diſcovery made by Cromwell prevented his cloſing with the king, and determined him to purſue the ambitious ſcheme he had formed of becoming himſelf the deſpotic maſter of the whole kingdom.

In the memoirs of lord Broghill we meet with the following ſtory, which deſerves ſome attention, as it agrees very well with the character of Cromwell. It is related in the following manner, by Mr. Maurice, chaplain to Roger, earl of Orrery. “ Lord Orrery, in the time of his greatneſs with Cromwell, juſt after he had ſo ſeaſonably relieved him in great diſtreſs at Clonwell, riding out at Youghall one day with him and Ireton, they fell into diſcourſe about the king's death. Cromwell thereupon ſaid more than once, that if the king had followed his own judgment, and had been attended by none but truſty ſervants, he had fooled them all; and that once they had a mind to have cloſed with him, but, upon ſomething that happened, fell off from that deſign. Orrery, finding them in good humour, and being alone with them, aſked, if he might preſume to deſire to know, why they would once have cloſed with his majeſty, and why they did not? Cromwell very freely told him he would ſatisfy him in both his queries. The reaſon, ſaid he, why we would have cloſed with the king was this: we found that the Scotch and preſbyterians began to be more powerful than we, and were like to agree with him, and leave us in the lurch. For this reaſon we thought it beſt to prevent them, by offering firſt to come in upon reaſonable conditions: but while our thoughts were taken up with this ſubject, there came a letter to us from one of our ſpies, who was of the king's bedchamber acquainting us, that our final doom was decreed that very day; that he could not poſſibly learn what it was, but we might diſcover it, if we could but intercept a letter ſent from the king to the queen, wherein he informed her of his reſolution; that this letter was ſown up in the ſkirt of a ſaddle, and the bearer of it would come with the ſaddle upon his head, about ten o'clock that night, to the Blue Boar in Holborn, where he was to take horſe for Dover. The meſſenger knew nothing of the letter in the ſaddle, though ſome in Dover did. We were at Windſor, continued Cromwell, when we received this letter, and immediately upon the receipt of it, Ireton and I reſolved to take one truſty fellow with us, and go in troopers habits to that inn. We did ſo, and leaving our man at the gate of the inn, (which had a wicket only open to let perſons in and out) to watch and give us notice when any man came in with a ſaddle, we went into a drinking-ſtall. We there continued drinking canns of beer, till about ten o'clock, when our centinel at the gate gave us notice, that the man with the ſaddle was come. We roſe up preſently, and juſt as the man was leading out his horſe ſaddled, we came up to him with drawn ſwords, and told him, we were to ſearch all that went in or out there; but as he looked like an honeſt man, we would only ſearch his ſaddle and ſo diſmiſs him. The ſaddle was ungirt; we carried it into the ſtall where we had been drinking, and ripping open one of the ſkirts, we there found the letter we wanted. Having thus got it into our hands, we delivered the man (whom we had left with our centinel) his ſaddle, told him he was an honeſt fellow, and bid him go about his buſineſs; which he did, purſuing his journey without more ado, and ignorant of the harm he had ſuffered. We found in the letter, that his majeſty acquainted the queen, that he was courted by both factions, the Scots preſbyterians and the army, and that thoſe who bade the faireſt for him, ſhould have him: but yet he thought he ſhould cloſe with the Scots ſooner than with the other. Upon this we returned to Windſor; and finding we were not likely to obtain good terms from the king, we from that time vowed his deſtruction.”

Whether this ſtory be true or falſe, it is certain that the behaviour of the officers of the army was about that time greatly altered towards his majeſty. Cromwell indeed pretended, that he was obliged to act in a very different manner from what he had hitherto done. He ſaid that the agitators had rendered him odious to the army, and had repreſented him as a traitor, who, for the ſake of private intereſt, was ready to betray the cauſe of God to the great enemy of piety and religion. At the ſame time he pretended that deſperate projects were formed, and that he, feared all the authority of the officers would not be ſufficient to prevent theſe violent enthuſiaſts from executing their bloody purpoſe.

Charles was now ſufficiently alarmed, and juſtly concluded, that if theſe aſſertions were true, it would be unſafe for him to ſtay any longer at Hampton-court; if they were not true, they could be thrown out for no other reaſon than that of making him a cloſe priſoner. At all events therefore he determined to attempt his eſcape before he was deprived of the few remains of liberty he ſtill enjoyed. He was confirmed in this reſolution by the looks, the geſtures, and the expreſſions that dropt from the officers and ſoldiers at Hampton-court, as he walked about the gardens and village. He underſtood that this alteration was owing to his not embracing the army's propoſitions without reſerve, and his not excluding the Scots and parliament from the negotiation.

Determined to take this imprudent ſtep, and without forming any rational ſcheme for the diſpoſal of his perſon, Charles effected his eſcape from Hampton-court in a dark ſtormy night with more eaſe than could have been expected. He had no other attendants in his flight than Sir John Berkley, Mr. Aſhburnham, and Mr. Legg, all gentlemen of his bedchamber. The difficulties they encountered on the way, and in paſſing through the foreſt in a diſmal night, muſt have diſcouraged any perſon, but one in Charles's ſituation, who thought no danger ſo dreadful as that he had eſcaped. Early in the morning he reached Tichfield, a ſeat belonging to the earl of Southampton, where the counteſs dowager reſided, a woman of great honour, to whom the king knew he might ſafely intruſt his perſon. But he could not hope to continue long concealed at Tichfield: and it was not eaſy to determine what meaſure it was moſt prudent to embrace. Hammond, a creature of Cromwell's, and who had married a daughter of the famous Hambden, was governor of the Iſle of Wight, which lay in the neighbourhood of Tichfield. Very little ſurely could be expected from a man devoted to the chiefs of the army, yet, becauſe he was nephew to Dr. Hammond, the king's favourite chaplain, it was thought proper to have recourſe to him in this alarming exigence. Aſhburnham and Berkley were accordingly diſpatched, with orders not to inform Hammond where the king was concealed, unleſs he would promiſe not to deliver him up to any perſon whatever; or if he could not protect him, to reſtore him to his liberty. The very nature of the negotiation itſelf ſufficiently demonſtrates that the king was under the greateſt anxiety of mind when he ſent his ſervants into the Iſle of Wight: for what ſecurity could be expected from Hammond? or how could Cariſbrook-caſtle, weak and unprovided with military ſtores, be ſufficient to defend the perſon of his majeſty againſt the joint efforts of the parliament and army? Notwithſtanding this, had Aſhburnham, who alone was acquainted with Hammond, acted conformable to the inſtructions he had received, he might, at leaſt, have eſcaped the ſnare into which he fell. But without exacting any promiſe from Hammond, he treacherouſly, or at leaſt imprudently, brought the governor to Tichfield; and Charles, diſtracted and amazed at this wrong ſtep of his ſervant, paſſed over with Hammond to the Iſle of Wight, and was received at Cariſbrook-caſtle with great appearances of reſpect.

The king's departure from Hampton-court was not diſcovered for near an hour after; when ſome perſons entering his chamber, found on the table ſeveral letters directed to the parliament, to the general, and to the officer who had atended him. The parliament was confounded with the news of the king's eſcape, and voted it high-treaſon, and death without mercy, in any one to conceal his perſon. But they were ſoon relieved from their terror, by letters from Hammond; on the receipt of which it was reſolved, that the king ſhould be confined in Cariſbrook-caſtle, and none of his friends or adherents be either ſuffered to viſit him, or even continue on the iſland.

The king being thus in a place of ſafety, and the parliament incapable of reſiſting the army, Cromwell applied himſelf ſeriouſly to quell the diſorders among the troops, which had been at firſt artfully fomented by himſelf, but which were now riſen to a height that ſeemed to threaten the deſtruction of all order and government. The members of the republic eſtabliſhed in the army, thought themſelves fully qualified to ſettle the kingdom, and various ſchemes for that purpoſe were every day debated by theſe military legiſlators. It was on all hands determined to aboliſh royalty, and ſet nobility aſide: all ranks of men were to be levelled, and an univerſal equality of property, as well as of power, was to be introduced among mankind. They ſaid that the ſaints were the ſalt of the earth; that an entire equality had place among the elect; and that the moſt common centinel, if enlightened by the holy ſpirit, was entitled to the ſame reſpect as the greateſt commander, and equally capable of executing all the offices of government. Cromwell found it was high time to put a period to thoſe enthuſiaſtic opinions, which would otherwiſe deſtroy his whole ambitious ſcheme of power. He accordingly iſſued orders that the meetings of the agitators ſhould be diſcontinued. But they did not, in this reſpect, chuſe to pay an implicit obedience to their general. They had taſted the ſweets of power, and were unwilling to reſign it. They ſecretly continued their meetings, and made no difficulty of aſſerting, that their own officers, as well as the church and ſtate, ſtood in need of a reformation. Several of the regiments were ſo heated with theſe enthuſiaſtic ideas, that they joined in preſenting ſeditious remonſtrances to their general: they even appointed ſeparate places of rendezvous; and every thing ſeemed to threaten an univerſal anarchy and confuſion. The reſolution of Cromwell only was able to put a ſtop to this alarming appearance of the commencement of the moſt dreadful diſorders. He choſe the time of a review for ſtriking terror into the levellers; and as ſoon as the troops were drawn up in order, Cromwell ſeized the ring-leaders in the preſence of their companions; held a council of war upon the ſpot; and cauſed one of the mutineers to be ſhot directly. Struck with terror at the boldneſs of the action, the reſt of the levellers threw down the ſymbols of ſedition, which they had carried before them, returned immediately to their duty, and readily ſubmitted to the uſual diſcipline.

While Cromwell was employed in quelling the diſorders of the army, a committee of lords and commons, with the earl of Denbigh at their head, was ſent to the king with four bills, to which he was deſired to give the royal aſſent. The firſt was for ſettling the militia of the kingdom; the ſecond for recalling all declarations, oaths and proclamations againſt the parliament, and their adherents; the third for diſabling thoſe lords, created ſince the great ſeal was carried to Oxford, from ſitting and voting in the houſe of peers; and the fourth for giving power to both houſes of parliament to adjourn themſelves as they may think proper. The king was required to give his anſwer in four days; but the Scottiſh commiſſioners preſented a ſtrong remonſtrance againſt the four bills, and inſiſted on a perſonal treaty with his majeſty at London. This occaſioned great uneaſineſs to the independents at Weſtminſter, and ſeveral ſpirited papers paſſed between them. The Scots reproached the Engliſh parliament with having broken all the fundamental articles of the agreement between the two kingdoms. This breach gave great pleaſure to the king, and the Scots were indeed now ſo well diſpoſed to ſerve him, that they offered, if he would make his eſcape to Berwick, to ſupport him with the whole force of their kingdom. Whether this quarrel induced Charles to flatter himſelf that the parliament would be obliged to offer him more reaſonable conditions, or whether he hoped that the army would inſiſt upon more equitable terms, is uncertain, but the king thought proper to reject the bills.

Cromwell having reduced the agitators to obedience, now determined to carry the ambitious ſcheme he had formed into execution. He did not however think proper to intruſt the whole of his deſign to any but Ireton, and two or three particular favourites.

From the ſuggeſtion of Ireton, Cromwell called at Windſor a ſecret council of the chief officers of the army, in order to deliberate of the moſt proper methods for ſettling the kingdom, and the future diſpoſal of the king's perſon. Before the council began, Cromwell poured out devout prayers, when the minds of the members were ſufficiently elevated by enthuſiaſtic raptures, the conferences were begun, and the black deſign of bringing the king to juſtice, and puniſhing their ſovereign, under the ſanction of a judicial ſentence, was firſt propoſed, and reſolved to be carried into execution.

A. D. 1648. When the committee from the Iſle of Wight reported to the houſe, that the king had abſolutely refuſed to paſs their bills, inſiſting, that all the terms on both ſides ſhould be adjuſted, before any conceſſions ſhould be inſiſted on; the republican party took fire at this refuſal: they openly inveighed, in the moſt virulent terms, againſt the perſon and government of the king, whoſe name hitherto, in all debates, had been mentioned with ſome degree of reverence. Sir Thomas Worth had the boldneſs to move, that the king ſhould be removed, and committed cloſe priſoner to ſome inland caſtle; that articles of impeachment ſhould be drawn up againſt him, he himſelf deprived of all ſhare in the adminiſtration, and a new form of government eſtabliſhed. This motion was ſeconded by Cromwell and Ireton with great warmth, but in general terms. The former deſired them to ſettle the nation without having any farther recourſe to the king, who had rejected all their propoſitions; promiſing that the army, who had hitherto defended the parliament at the expence of their blood, would ſtill continue, with fidelity and courage, to protect them againſt all oppoſition, in this vigorous meaſure. "But," added he, with a ſtern look, "teach them not, by your neglecting your own "ſafety, and that of the kingdom, (in which theirs "too is involved) to imagine themſelves betrayed, "and their intereſt abandoned to the rage and malice "of an irreconcileable enemy, whom, for your ſake, "they have dared to provoke. Beware," he cried, raiſing his voice, and clapping his hand on his ſword, "beware, leſt deſpair cauſe them to ſeek ſafety by "ſome other means, by adhering to you, who know "not how to conſult your own ſafety; and how de"ſtructive ſuch a reſolution in them will be to you "all, I tremble to think, and leave you to conſider."

The houſe well knew that it was much eaſier for Cromwell to execute than to utter a menace, and ſhuddered at the thought. The queſtion, therefore, of no more addreſſes being preſented to his majeſty, was carried by a majority of forty-nine. This vote, in reality, dethroned the king, and formally overturned the whole conſtitution. But it was not enough to reſolve on ſo violent a meaſure; it was determined to ſupport it by a declaration equally violent. The king was accuſed of the blackeſt crimes, however improbable; in order, by blaſting his fame, to prevent the populace from uniting in his favour. Not only government, but even ſociety itſelf, ſeemed to be overturned. The people looked with contempt upon the parliament, and with execration upon the army. One John Lilburn, an active, reſolute fellow, whoſe conduct is ſtill a paradox, had been committed to the Tower by the houſe of lords, but releaſed by the commons, and re-committed by the peers. Being afterwards queſtioned by the commons for ſome incendiary practices, he boldly diſowned the authority that had committed him; upon which he was ſent to the ſame priſon by the commons themſelves. His cauſe now became the cauſe of the people; and the nation was filled with petitions and counter-petitions, each wilder than the other, all of them in the wrong, and all dictated by ignorant, headſtrong fanatics. Cromwell enjoyed theſe national clamours; his whole ſcheme depended on preventing the people from uniting againſt the army.

Hammond now received orders to treat the king with great ſeverity. All his ſervants were removed, his correſpondence with his friends cut off, and no perſon allowed to viſit him. An old, decrepid man, employed to kindle his fire, was the beſt company he enjoyed during the interval of this rigorous confinement, which laſted ſeveral months. At the ſame time, new proſecutions were carried on againſt his friends. Hollis and Maynard, together with moſt of the eleven commiſſioners lately impeached by the army, had reſumed their ſeats in the houſe, and ſpoke with great boldneſs and freedom againſt the violent meaſures purſued by the independents. It was therefore neceſſary to ſilence theſe oppoſers, whoſe ſpeeches had the moſt alarming effect among the people. Their impeachments were accordingly re-aſſumed, and a vote paſſed for rendering them incapable of ever ſitting again in that parliament.

The mutinies and ſpirit of levelling, which ſtill prevailed among the ſoldiers, notwithſtanding the attempts of Cromwell to reduce them to obedience, afforded now the only gleam of hope to the royaliſts. The Scots indeed, who were highly exaſperated at the meaſures purſued by the independents, were proceeding vigorouſly in their levies for invading England; but their late conduct had been ſo deteſtable, that very few of the royaliſts joined them. But amidſt this gloomy night of deſpair, a gleam of hope unexpectedly appeared, which ſeemed to revive the ſpirits of his majeſty's friends. For though Cromwell was maſter of the king's perſon, the general, the parliament, the city, and the army, the nation, in general, thought as freely as ever, and beheld, with impatiience and indignation, the handful of fanatics who held them in chains. But great art was requiſite to unite into one common cauſe ſo many people differing in their principles, their characters, their actions, and their intereſts. The greater part of the preſbyterians were now well diſpoſed to join the royaliſts; and were headed by the earl of Holland, Sir William Waller, the generals Payer and Laughern, and other officers and perſons of diſtinction, who had ſignalized themſelves againſt the king. General Goring, the earl of Norwich, lord Capel, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Liſle, and a few others, directed the royaliſts, and undertook to raiſe the ſouthern provinces; while Sir Marmaduke Langdale engaged for the northern, together with Berwick and Carliſle. The Scots were to be commanded by the duke of Hamilton, and the Welſh by Laughern and Poyer. But the chief dependence of the royal party reſted on an intrigue now carrying on for putting the fleet under the command of the prince of Wales. The ſeamen had been, for ſome time, neglected, ſo that very little art was neceſſary to prevail upon them to deſert a party that ſeemed to treat them with contempt. Seventeen ſhips, lying in the mouth of the river, declared for the king; and putting Rainſborough, their admiral, aſhore, ſailed over to Holland, and took on board the prince of Wales.

The firſt who declared themſelves were Langhorne and Poyer, who having a conſiderable body of Welſh troops under their command, diſplayed the royal ſtandard, and were joined by great numbers of perſons. They were already maſters of Chepſtow, Pembroke, and ſeveral other places of ſtrength in that country, and their army exhibited a formidable appearance. Hales, a young gentleman of fortune in Kent, put himſelf at the head of the royaliſts in that county with ſurprizing ſucceſs. Sandwich, Dover, Graveſend, Canterbury, and almoſt every place of ſtrength in the county, declared for the king. Lord Capel, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Liſle, and other gentlemen of fortune, excited commotions in Eſſex; while the earl of Holland raiſed forces in Surry. Pomfret-caſtle, in Yorkſhire, was ſurpriſed by Maurice. Langdale and Muſgrave were in arms, and maſters of Berwick and Carliſle, in the north.

The Scots were impatient to enter England, but their march was delayed by the oppoſition made by the general aſſembly. The parliament had voted to raiſe an army of forty thouſand men, and to call over a conſiderable body under Monro, who commanded the Scots forces in Ireland. The rigid preſbyterians, headed by Argyle, dreaded the ſucceſs of Hamilton. They ſaw, that if his army proved victorious, the natural conſequence would be the reſtoration of monarchy, before preſbytery was eſtabliſhed in England. They conſidered all attempts to join the king, before he had ſubſcribed the covenant, as no other than ſapping the very foundations of chriſtianity. They were, indeed, highly offended with the independents, who profanely called their covenant an almanack out of date, and claimed an unbounded liberty of conſcience, which the preſbyterians regarded with horror. But they hated the king more than they abhorred toleration, and thundered out anathemas againſt all who paid obedience to the parliament. Thus the two ſupreme tribunals in the kingdom directly oppoſed each other. One threatened the people with eternal torments if they aſſiſted the royal party in England; the other pronounced againſt them the ſentence of impriſonment, baniſhment, and military execution, if they refuſed.

Amidſt ſuch jarring intereſts it is no wonder that the levies went on very ſlowly. The royal party in England exclaimed loudly of theſe delays, which they attributed to a refined policy in the Scots; as if their intentions were that all the king's party ſhould firſt be ſuppreſſed, and the victory be entirely owing to the preſbyterians. Hamilton, with much better reaſon, complained of the precipitate meaſures of the Engliſh royaliſts, who, by their ill-timed inſurrections, forced him to march his army before his levies were completed, or his preparations in ſufficient forwardneſs. The Scottiſh parliament, not intimidated by the violent meaſures of the general aſſembly, reſolved to ſend three demands to the Engliſh parliament, and if they were refuſed, to order their army to march immediately and join the royal party. Their firſt demand was, the eſtabliſhment of the preſbyterian religion in England. This they well knew would be rejected by the independents, and flattered themſelves that this refuſal would render the king's cauſe more popular in Scotland. Their ſecond demand was, that Charles might come to ſome of his own houſes in the neighbourhood of London, with honour, freedom, and ſafety, in order to the eſtabliſhment of a ſafe and equitable peace. And their laſt, that the army of Fairfax might be diſbanded, and the Engliſh parliament reſtored to its freedom. The meſſenger who carried theſe demands was limited with regard to time, and during the interval, the Scottiſh forces were recalled from Ireland, and the earl of Inchiquin, at the head of the Engliſh troops in that kingdom declared for the king. No ſatisfactory anſwer being returned to the demands of the Scottiſh parliament, Hamilton publiſhed a ſpirited declaration, and numbers of the royal party prepared to join his army, as ſoon as he had paſſed the Engliſh borders.

The ſword of civil diſcord, which had hardly been ſheathed, was again drawn, and ſeemed to threaten the whole kingdom with deſtruction. The parliament at Weſtminſter beheld theſe commotions with terror, and ſhuddered for the event. The independents in the army quartered in the neighbourhood of London, made no ſecret of their deſign to plunder the capital as ſoon as the Scottiſh forces entered England, in order to prevent the citizens from joining their preſbyterian brethren. This declaration ſtruck the wealthy inhabitants with horror. The whole city was in a ferment, and the people ſo much exaſperated, that they attacked and overpowered a party of the trained bands, and advanced in a body to Whitehall, where they were met by Cromwell, at the head of two regiments of horſe, who drove them back into the city; but thinking it would be imprudent to purſue the blow, the tumult increaſed to ſo violent a degree, that the lord-mayor was obliged to take ſhelter in the city. The next morning Cromwell perſuaded Fairfax to give him leave to enter the city with two regiments of horſe. This produced the deſired effect. Struck with terror at the appearance of that victorious general, the people diſperſed, and tranquillity was once more reſtored in the capital. This was the only attempt made by the Londoners in ſupport of the royal cauſe: the terror of the army kept the citizens in ſubjection. They were obliged to bear the humilitating yoke of being governed by the dregs of the people; and to ſee hypocrites exerciſing iniquity under the maſk of religion.

On the eighth of May advice arrived that the royaliſts were in motion, and that the number of forces in Wales was daily increaſing. The eſtabliſhment of the army at this time, was twenty-ſix thouſand men; but by inliſting ſupernumaries, the regiments were greatly augmented, and in general conſiſted of more than double their ſtated compliment. Cromwell was ordered to march into Wales, at the head of two regiments of horſe and three of foot, to relieve colonel Horton, who commanded in that principality, while Fairfax himſelf undertook the ſervice in the north. Laughern, who had formed an engagement with the Scots, declared himſelf too ſoon; for before Cromwell reached the borders of Wales, and even before Laughern had procured arms for his men, Horton found means to put himſelf between the horſe and foot of Laughern's army. A battle enſued, in which the Welſh forces were completely routed; and major-general Stradling, with twenty-ſix captains, one hundred and fifty ſubalterns, and near three thouſand ſoldiers were made priſoners. This defeat, however, did not ſubdue the whole party; they were ſtill maſters of ſeveral ſtrong places, and ſeemed determined to defend them to the laſt extremity. Cromwell therefore ſat down before Chepſtow-caſtle; but finding it too well fortified to be ſoon reduced, he left a ſmall party to block up the fortreſs, and marched with the main body of his forces into Pembrokeſhire. On the eleventh of June he took the town and caſtle of Pembroke, and obliged Laughern and Poyer to ſurrender at diſcretion. Chepſtow ſoon after fell into his hands, by which the principality of Wales was ſufficiently reduced, and Cromwell made diſpoſitions for leading his forces into the north, in order to oppoſe the Scots and royaliſts; the inſurrections in Kent, Surry, and Suffolk, not ſuffering Fairfax to march into that country as he at firſt intended.

Petitions from ſeveral counties were now preſented to parliament in favour of the king, and the inhabitants of Surry were ſo highly exaſperated at not receiving an immediate anſwer, that they attacked and killed ſeveral of the ſoldiers who were guarding the parliament. The Kentiſhmen, who were now on their march towards London, in order, as they pretended, to preſent a petition to the parliament, made choice of the earl of Norwich for their general. The commons were alarmed, and the earl of Pembroke was diſpatched with terms to the inſurgents. He offered indemnity to all who ſhould lay down their arms, and free liberty to preſent their petition, after they had delivered up the towns, magazines, and ſtores they had ſeized. His offers were rejected, and the Kentiſhmen marched to Blackheath, where they drew up their forces, and prepared to make an attack upon the capital, perſuaded that the citizens would open their gates upon the firſt ſummons. By this time Fairfax had collected his army, and the Kentiſhmen were informed by the parliament, that they muſt treat with their general. This greatly diſpirited the inſurgents, and perceiving no motion was made by the citizens in their favour, they retreated with great precipitation to Maidſtone, where a party of them was attacked and cut to pieces by Fairfax. The earl of Norwich now thought that a fair opportunity now offered of giving the parliament's general the ſlip, and of advancing again towards the capital, fully perſuaded that the citizens, being now delivered from the terrors of the army, would declare in his favour. He accordingly returned with the main body of his forces to Blackheath, where he hoped to be joined by the inhabitants of Suſſex and Surry. But he was deceived in all his expectations; and a ſudden panic ſeizing his ſoldiers, they deſerted their general, and returned to their reſpective habitations. Upwards of two thouſand of them, however, ſtill kept together, and it was determined, if poſſible, to paſs over into Eſſex, where they were informed the county was in arms for the king, under the command of lord Capel, Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Liſle, and other officers of courage and experience. Not more than a thouſand of them paſſed the river, where they were obliged to cut their way through a regiment belonging to the Tower-Hamlets, and afterwards to ſkirmiſh with the parliament's forces, during their march to Chelmsford, where they were joined by lord Capel, and the other officers already mentioned. Their army now amounted to three thouſand men; but being in no condition to fight Fairfax, they purſued their march to Colcheſter, made themſelves maſters of the place, and took the parliament's committee priſoners.

During theſe tranſactions Fairfax croſſed the Thames with his army at Graveſend, and marched with great expedition to Colcheſter, from a perſuaſion that the town was wholly deſtitute of fortifications, and that the royaliſts, who had retired thither, muſt ſurrender at diſcretion. He was miſtaken. The enemy made a noble defence: few ſieges in hiſtory are ſo remarkable as that of Colcheſter. Fairfax in perſon led his troops to the charge, which was at once both brave and deſperate, but they were beaten off with loſs by the beſieged. The charge was again and again repeated, but without ſucceſs; and Fairfax, unwilling to expoſe his troops to inevitable deſtruction, changed the ſiege into a blockade.

The nation was now wholly in a blaze, which could only be quenched by the blood of its inhabitants. Beſides Kent, Eſſex, Wales, and the northern counties, the Corniſh men were in arms; but were ſoon defeated at Penzance by Sir Hardreſs Waller, who afterwards took poſſeſſion of Exeter. The inhabitants of Rutlandſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Nottinghamſhire, and the neighbouring counties, alſo took up arms, and were defeated by colonel Waite, near Stamford. Sir John Owen renewed the war in Wales, and beſieged Carnarvan-caſtle, but his forces were routed, and he himſelf taken priſoner by colonel Carter. The moſt determined enemies of the parliament were thoſe who, in the beginning of the war, had been the moſt active againſt Charles. They were therefore conſidered as apoſtates by the army, and puniſhed with much greater ſeverity than even the royaliſts themſelves.

The removal of the army from the capital, though not ſufficient to induce the city to declare in the king's favour, tended greatly to inſpire the preſbyterians in parliament with freſh vigour. They recovered ſo much ſpirit from the inſurrections, which afforded ſufficient employment for the forces under Fairfax and Cromwell, that they determined to make another attempt to conclude a peace with his majeſty. On the twenty-third of May, ſeveral perſons who had been ſent to the tower by the independents were ſet at liberty by the commons, and it was voted, that the numerous impeachments againſt the leaders of the preſbyterian party ſhould be laid aſide, and that the members of both houſes ſhould attend their duty in parliament. On the twenty-ſixth of May, the guards from the army were diſcharged from attending the parliament, and a party of the city militia ordered to attend; and it was voted, that the king be deſired to ſettle the preſbyterian government of the church for three years. New propoſitions for ſettling the kingdom were ſent to his majeſty, and every thing ſeemed to wear the aſpect of a ſpeedy peace. The people had indeed ſo ſeverely felt the weight of parliamentary authority, that they would have been glad to ſee the king replaced on the throne without ſubſcribing any terms; and the preſbyterians in parliament plainly ſaw, that this would be the conſequence, ſhould the Engliſh and Scots who had declared for the king, unite their forces. They knew that ſuch an union would encourage, not only the moſt timorous among the people, but alſo many of the reduced officers and ſoldiers to declare for the royal cauſe. They were therefore deſirous of preventing an incident which muſt have been pregnant with the moſt dreadful conſequences to their party; and accordingly raiſed every oppoſition in their power to the meaſures of the Scottiſh parliament. At the ſame time they ſent five peers and ten commoners to Newport in the Iſle of Wight, in order to treat with his majeſty. He was allowed to ſummon ſeveral of his friends and old counſellors, that he might have their advice in this important tranſaction.

Perhaps no ſight was ever more moving and mortifying than the appearance and ſituation of Charles, when he entered the apartment where the parliament's commiſſioners were aſſembled. The moment his ſervants had been removed, he laid aſide all care of his perſon, and had ſuffered his hair and beard to grow, and to hang diſhevelled and neglected. His hair was become almoſt entirely grey; either from the decline of years, or from that load of ſorrows under which he laboured, and which, though borne with almoſt unexampled conſtancy, had preyed greatly on his heart. But though he had paid no attention to his perſon, he had aſſiduouſly cultivated the talents of his mind. His faculties were ſtrong and active, his judgment clear and penetrating, his prudence and patience invincible. He ſuffered not the ſmalleſt ſpark of the indignation he felt at his unworthy treatment to eſcape him. The parliamentary commiſſioners would not ſuffer any of his council to be preſent; they refuſed to enter into debate with any but himſelf. He alone during the tranſactions of of two months, was obliged to ſupport the argument againſt fifteen men of the greateſt parts and capacity in both houſes; and no advantage was ever obtained over him. This was indeed the ſcene in which, of all others, he was qualified to excel. His conception was quick, his underſtanding penetrating, his elocution chaſte, his manner commanding; theſe accompliſhments rendered him capable of triumphing in all diſcuſſions of cool and temperate reaſoning. The parliamentary commiſſioners, who were before ſtrangers to the king's abilities, were aſtoniſhed. "The king is much changed," ſaid the earl of Saliſbury to Sir Philip Warwick; "he is extremely improved of late." "No," replied Sir Philip; "he was always ſo: but you are now at laſt ſenſible of it."

The firſt propoſition the commiſſioners preſented him was that for revoking all his proclamations and declarations againſt the parliament and their adherents, and acknowledging that they had taken up arms in their own defence. This was touching Charles in the ſenſible part. He made no difficulty of granting the former, but for ſome time oppoſed the latter with all the ſtrength of reaſoning. But the commiſſioners refuſed to recede the leaſt from their propoſition. It could not indeed be expected they would conſent to give up this part of the article, notwithſtanding what has been ſaid to the contrary by hiſtorians. The king, during the whole courſe of the war, had aſſerted, that the parliament and their adherents were fundamentally in the wrong, and had they not obtained from him an acknowledgement, that he himſelf was ſo, what ſecurity could they expect hereafter; as no conſequences could be valid from erroneous premiſes? But Charles was now in their power, nor were the commiſſioners to be diverted from their purpoſe by his moſt pathetic repreſentations of the wounds ſuch a conceſſion muſt inflict, both upon his judgment and his conſcience. But finding that peace could be obtained on no other terms, he yielded to neceſſity. It was however agreed, that no part of any of the propoſitions ſhould be binding, prejudicial, or made uſe of, unleſs the treaty was finally concluded.

The next propoſition was that which regarded the abrogation of epiſcopacy and the liturgy of the church of England, and the total alienation of all church lands. This demand brought on a ridiculous diſpute between the king and ſome ignorant preſbyterian teachers, with regard to the divinity of epiſcopal government. Charles, even by his enemies, is allowed to have obtained the victory: but the more important part of the queſtion, the policy, or rather the neceſſity of it, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, was never debated. He at laſt conſented to ſuſpend epiſcopacy for three years, and, at the expiration of that period, to name twenty divines, who ſhould conſult with others named by the parliament, with regard to the future form of church-government; that all who were willing might take the covenant, and uſe the directory of the preſbyterians, provided he himſelf was at liberty to uſe the common prayer book in his own chapel; and that money ſhould be raiſed on the ſale of the church-lands, and only the old rents reſerved to the owners and their ſucceſſors.

The future diſpoſal of the militia, was the next ſubject of debate. The parliament required not only to have an unlimited power of raiſing what men they thought proper, both for the land and ſea-ſervice, and of employing them as they pleaſe during twenty years, but alſo that of paſſing bills to pay them, which were to have the force of laws, even though the king ſhould refuſe the royal aſſent. Charles oppoſed theſe exorbitant demands with all the force of reaſon and eloquence; but all his endeavours were in vain: the commiſſioners had no power to recede one title from their inſtructions. Even this did not diſcourage the king from purſuing the work of peace: he granted their demands; but at the ſame time, he laid the three following demands before the commiſſioners, that they might be communicated to the parliament. 1. That he ſhould be reſtored to his liberty. 2. That he ſhould enjoy his revenue. 3. That an act of oblivion ſhould be paſſed. Theſe demands were ſent to the parliament, where it was voted that they ſhould be granted, on the king's conſenting to the deſires of the two houſes.

The affairs of Ireland now came upon the carpet, and the commiſſioners inſiſted that the peace made with the rebels ſhould be declared void. Charles, who thought no conceſſion too great for obtaining the bleſſings of peace, remitted all the affairs of Ireland to be determined by his parliament.

With regard to the other points of the treaty, they admitted of leſs debate. Charles agreed that taxes ſhould be levied for the payment of the army, and for diſcharging the debts of the public; that all the chief officers of ſtate ſhould be nominated by the parliament for ten years; that the militia of the city of London, the government of the Tower, and the appointing the chief officers in theſe departments, ſhould be conſigned to the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, for ten years; and that the king ſhould receive one hundred thouſand pounds a year, as a compenſation for giving up the court of wards.

The time taken up in theſe debates rendered it neceſſary either to break off the treaty, or allow the commiſſioners a longer time to complete it, ſeveral of the king's conceſſions, particularly that relating to religion, having been voted unſatisfactory. The latter was choſen, and the time was enlarged to fourteen days longer. The parliament now demanded, that the earl of Newcaſtle, the lord Digby, lord Biron, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Sir Richard Granville, Judge Jenkins, Sir Francis Doddington, and Sir John Winter, ſhould be excepted from pardon, both with regard to lives and eſtates. This was a demand which Charles abſolutely refuſed; he declared he would never agree to give up his friends to puniſhment. The ſevere repentance, which he had undergone for abandoning Strafford, had, doubtleſs, confirmed him in the reſolution never again to be guilty of a ſimilar error. He, however, conſented, that the royaliſts ſhould pay ſuch compoſitions, as they and the parliament ſhould think reaſonable; he only begged that they might be as moderate as poſſible: he alſo offered, that the perſons excepted by the parliament ſhould be baniſhed for a limited time.

The king wrote a letter to the prince of Wales, in which he related the whole of this tranſaction, and accompanied his narrative with many wiſe and pathetic reflections and advices. The concluſion of this letter is remarkable: "By what has been ſaid, you ſee how long I have laboured in the ſearch of peace. Do not you be diſheartened to tread in the ſame ſteps. Uſe all worthy means to reſtore yourſelf to your rights, but prefer the way of peace: ſhow the greatneſs of your mind to conquer your enemies rather by pardoning than by puniſhing. If you ſaw how unmanly and unchriſtian this implacable diſpoſition is in our ill-wiſhers, you would avoid that ſpirit. Cenſure me not for having parted with ſo much of our rights: the price was great, but the commodity was, ſecurity to us, peace to my people; and I am confident, that another parliament will remember, how uſeful a king's power is to a people's liberty; of how much power I diveſted myſelf, that I and they might meet once again in a parliamentary way, in order to ſettle the bounds of prince and people. Give belief to my experience, never to affect more greatneſs or prerogative than what is really and intrinſically for the good of the ſubject, not the ſatisfaction of favourites. If you thus uſe it, you will never want means to be a father to all, and a bountiful prince to any, whom you incline to treat with extraordinary favour. You may perceive, that all men intruſt their treaſure where it returns them intereſt; and if a prince, like the ſea, receive and repay all the freſh ſtreams which the rivers intruſt with him, they will not grudge, but pride themſelves, to make him up an ocean. Theſe conſiderations may make you as great a prince as your father is a low one; and your ſtate may be ſo much the more eſtabliſhed as mine hath been ſhaken. For our ſubjects have learned, I dare ſay, that victories over their princes are but triumphs over themſelves, and ſo will more unwillingly hearken to changes hereafter. The Engliſh nation are a ſober people, however at preſent infatuated. I know not but this may be the laſt time I may ſpeak to you or the world publickly. I am ſenſible into what hands I am fallen; and yet, I bleſs God, I have thoſe inward refreſhments, which the malice of my enemies cannot diſturb. I have learned to buſy myſelf by retiring into myſelf; and therefore can the better digeſt whatever befalls me; not doubting but God's providence will reſtrain our enemies power, and turn their fierceneſs into his praiſe. To conclude, if God give you ſucceſs, uſe it humbly, and be ever far from revenge. If he reſtore you to your right on hard conditions, whatever you promiſe, keep. Theſe men that have violated laws which they were bound to preſerve, will find their triumphs full of trouble. But do not you think any thing in the world worth attaining by foul and unjuſt means."

Notwithſtanding it was ſo evidently the intereſt both of the king and parliament to finiſh this treaty while Cromwell and Fairfax were employed againſt the royaliſts and Scots, yet the fear of the army on the one hand, and of the king's inſincerity on the other, continued to have ſo great an effect on many of the members, that they ſtrengthened the hands of the independents, till it was too late to prevent inevitable ruin. The inſurrections were every where quelled before the treaty was finiſhed; and the army had leiſure to carry into execution the violent and ſanguinary projects they had formed.

Cromwell, after reducing the inſurgents in Wales, marched with great expedition in order to meet the Scottiſh army, who, under Hamilton, had entered

England, and were advancing forward without meeting with any oppoſition. But religious diſputes rendered their expedition abortive, and deſtroyed that cauſe they entered England to ſupport. They refuſed to join the royaliſts, becauſe they had not taken the covenant: ſo that the two armies purſued the ſame route, but at ſome diſtance; nor could even the approach of the parliamentary army under Cromwell, oblige the bigotted covenanters to conſult their own ſafety, by a cloſe union with the royaliſts. The two armies, commanded by Hamilton and Longdale, amounted to twenty thouſand men; yet theſe not being joined, Cromwell ventured to attack them at the head of eight thouſand only. He fell upon the royaliſts by ſurprize near Preſton in Lancaſhire, and though they made a brave reſiſtance, were almoſt entirely cut to pieces. Cromwell had now an opportunity of taking vengeance on the Scots, whom he had long deteſted. He attacked Hamilton, put his army to the rout, and purſued the fugitives to Utoxeter, where the Scottiſh general ſurrendered himſelf priſoner. No forces now remained in the field to oppoſe the march of Cromwell, who, purſuing his victory, marched into Scotland, and having joined Argyle, and ſuppreſſed the earl of Laneric and Munro, he placed the power in the hands of the violent party among the preſbyterians.

The ſiege of Colcheſter was now drawing to a criſis. The garriſon, after enduring the utmoſt extremity of famine, were at laſt obliged to capitulate. No terms could, however, be procured from Fairfax: he inſiſted on their ſurrendering at mercy; and gave ſuch an explanation of that term, as to reſerve to himſelf the power of putting them all to the ſword if he thought proper. The officers of the garriſon were very unwilling to ſurrender unleſs they were promiſed, that their lives ſhould be ſafe, and endeavoured to perſuade the ſoldiers to make one glorious attempt on the enemy, and either cut themſelves a paſſage, or ſell their lives as dear as poſſible. But they had ſuffered too much during the ſiege; ſo that this propoſal, which would perhaps have been embraced at firſt with alacrity, was now refuſed: and they ſurrendered the town to Fairfax.

Ireton, to whom Cromwell in his abſence had conconſigned over the government of the paſſive general, perſuaded him to take an unmanly revenge on the principal officers who had made ſo noble a defence; though that circumſtance ſhould have recommended them to the regard of every lover of military greatneſs. Accordingly Sir George Lucas, and Sir George Liſle were ſeized, and ordered to be ſhot immediately. Exaſperated at ſo ungenerous an action, lord Capel reproached Ireton with this unmanly behaviour in the boldeſt terms, and challenged him, as they were all engaged in the ſame honourable cauſe, to execute on all the ſame impartial vengeance. Lucas was firſt ſhot, and was ſo far from being intimidated, that he gave, himſelf, the orders to fire, with the ſame alacrity, as if he had been at the head of his own platoon of ſoldiers. Liſle ran and kiſſed the dead body, and then preſented his own breaſt with the ſame undaunted reſolution. The lords Goring, Capel and Loughborough, with the other officers of diſtinction, eight lieutenant-colonels, nine majors, thirty captains, ſixty-five gentlemen, ſeventy-two lieutenants, ſixty-one enſigns, one hundred and eighty-three ſerjeants, and three thouſand and ſixty-ſeven private men, were ſent to different priſons.

The ſiege of Colcheſter put a period to what was called the ſecond civil war; and all England was once more reduced to the power of the parliament. Fairfax led his army back to St. Albans, and renewed his complaint of the want of pay for his ſoldiers. The army alſo renewed their cabals, and almoſt every corps petitioned the general that juſtice might be executed upon criminals. Ireton's regiment, in particular, demanded, that the ſame fault might have the ſame puniſhment, from the king to the commoner; and that all ſuch might be proceeded againſt as traitors, who ſhould ſpeak in behalf of the king, till he was acquitted of the charge of innocent blood. Theſe demands ſo plainly indicated the dreadful cataſtrophe which ſoon after followed, that all who wiſhed well to his majeſty, both in and out of parliament, adviſed him to make his eſcape, which was conceived to be very eaſy: But Charles having given his word to the parliament not to attempt the recovery of his liberty during the treaty, and three weeks after; he could not be prevailed upon to hazard the reproach of violating his promiſe.

On the twentieth of November, colonel Ewer, at the head of ſeven other officers, preſented a remonſtrance from the council of the army to the parliament. It began with a demand that the treaty with the king ſhould be laid aſide, and that the prince of Wales and duke of York, ſhould be declared incapable of government; that the army be ſatisfied out of the eſtates of the delinquents; that juſtice be done to the capital cauſes of the war; that a period be put to the preſent parliament; that there be a more equal repreſentation of the people in the houſe of commons; that all who had borne arms for the king, ſhould be diſabled either for voting or being elected to ſerve in parliament; that the ſupreme power of government ſhould be veſted in the repreſentatives of the people, among whom there ſhould be a liberty of entering diſſents; that all future kings ſhould be elected by the people, but without any negative voice; that all matters of general ſettlement ſhould be eſtabliſhed by the general contract of the people; but that none ſhould have a ſhare in it who ſhould oppoſe the matter of this remonſtrance.

We ſhall not be ſurprized at the demands contained in this paper, which was intended to aboliſh the houſe of peers, and introduce a new ſcheme of government, when it is remembered, that the army had ſpoke the ſame language almoſt two years before; that many of the independent members had adopted it in their ſpeeches; and that nothing but the late unexpected commotions, could have prevented Cromwell and his friends from carrying it before into execution.

This violent proceeding did not, however, intimidate the parliament. Though they well knew that they were in no condition to withſtand the force of the army, yet they were determined to oppoſe them to the utmoſt of their power, and rather bring on a violent ſubverſion of government, than give their conſent to ſuch ſanguinary meaſures. They accordingly reſolved to pay no regard to the remonſtrance of the army. But this oppoſition tended only to haſten the execution of the project formed by the council of officers. Hammond received an order from Fairfax to attend him, and to reſign to colonel Ewer, the cuſtody of the king's perſon. In this emergency, Charles conſulted his friends, who were permitted ſtill to remain about his perſon, and all of them adviſed him to make his eſcape, which was ſtill very practicable. But Charles, from a delicacy in point of honour, thought his royal word ſo far engaged, that he refuſed to conſent, and ſtill continued under the fatal deluſion, that the preſervation of his perſon was neceſſary both to the parliament and the army. But the earl of Lindſay, with great judgment, replied, "Take heed, ſir, leſt you fall into ſuch hands as will not ſteer by the rules of policy. Remember Hampton-court, where your eſcape was the beſt ſecurity." Charles, however, continued obſtinate; and the next morning the officers of the army, detached for that purpoſe, ruſhed into his apartment, and carried him over to Hurſt-caſtle, where he was again made a cloſe priſoner, and none of his friends ſuffered to viſit him.

In the mean time the parliament voted that the ſeizing the king's perſon was done without their knowledge and conſent; and ſent a meſſage to the general, to know by what authority that enterprize was undertaken. They alſo iſſued orders that the army ſhould not advance any nearer to London. They next voted, “That the anſwers of the king to the propoſitions of both houſes are a ſufficient ground for the houſe to proceed upon for the ſettlement of the peace of the kingdom.” It was alſo propoſed by Hollis, the preſent leader of the preſbyterians, a man of the moſt unconquerable intrepidity, that the generals and principal officers of the army, ſhould be traitors to their country by the parliament, for their diſobedience and uſurpations.

Theſe ſpirited proceedings brought matters to a criſis. The general marched the army to London, and placing guards in Whitehall, the Mews, St. James's, Durham-houſe, Covent-garden, and Palace-yard, ſurrounded the parliament. The next day, when the commons were to meet, colonel Pride, formerly a dray-man, blocked up the paſſage to the houſe at the head of two regiments; and being directed by the lord Gray of Groby, he ſeized, in the paſſage, forty-one members of the preſbyterian party, and ſent them to a low room, which paſſed under the denomination of hell, whence they were afterwards carried to ſeveral inns. Beſides theſe, above one hundred and ſixty members more were excluded, and none ſuffered to enter the houſe but the moſt furious and moſt determined of the independent party, which was ſo ſmall, that their number did not exceed ſixty. This egregious invaſion of the rights of parliament, was generally known under the name of “colonel Pride's purge;” ſo ready were the people to turn into ridicule the dethroning a party who had governed the nation with a rod of iron, and overturned the conſtitution of their country.

Cromwell, who was then in London, was thoroughly ſenſible of the deſpotic part the commons had acted, and well knew they were as much deſpiſed as the army was feared in every part of the kingdom. Colonel Whaley preſented, at the bar of the houſe, a paper, entitled, “The humble propoſals and deſigns of his excellency the lord Fairfax, and the general council of officers, in order to a ſpeedy proſecution of juſtice, and the ſettlement formerly propounded by them.” This paper, after reproaching the parliament and their proceedings, with all the bitterneſs of uſurped authority, demanded, “That the ſecluded members, together with major Brown, might be ſecured and brought to juſtice: and that all thoſe who refuſed to vote againſt the late Scottiſh engagement, as well as thoſe who concurred in the vote of yeſterday, with regard to the king's conceſſions being a ſufficient ground for proceeding to a ſettlement, ſhould be immediately ſuſpended the houſe: and that all thoſe who concurred not in theſe votes, ſhould acquit themſelves by a proteſtation.” And, to complete the triumph of the army, Fairfax marched a large detachment into the city, and ſeized all the money at Goldſmith's-hall, amounting to twenty thouſand pounds. He alſo ſecured the money in Haberdaſhers and Weavers halls, in order to pay the army part of their arrears.

The ſecluded members having publiſhed a paper containing a narrative of the violent manner in which they had been prevented from entering the houſe, together with a proteſtation againſt all acts, which ſince that moment had been tranſacted by the commons, the paper was voted to be falſe, ſcandalous, and ſeditious, tending to deſtroy the viſible and fundamental government of the kingdom, and therefore ought to be ſuppreſſed. While the commons were employed in paſſing this vote ſo contrary to what every member in the houſe knew to be true, the army preſented a ſcheme of government in conſequence of their former declarations and remonſtrances. But it was ſo wild and impracticable, and was ſo ſtrongly tinctured with that fanatical ſpirit ſo prevalent throughout the kingdom, that it is probable Cromwell ſuffered them to form ſo ridiculous a ſcheme, merely to keep them in employment.

The conduct of the parliament itſelf was equally mean and inconſiſtent. The commons had voted, that the lords Capel, Goring, and Loughborough, the earl of Holland, Sir Henry Linden, major general Laughern, and Sir John Owen, ſhould be baniſhed the kingdom: this vote they now revoked, declaring that it was deſtructive of the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom. In the ſame manner they repealed a vote whereby the duke of Hamilton was fined a hundred thouſand pounds; together with all thoſe that had the leaſt tendency to conclude a peace with his majeſty. At the ſame time they ſent a committee to the general to know the reaſon why the members were reſtrained from coming to the houſe by the ſoldiers. The general anſwered, that he would conſider the matter; but deſired they would not give themſelves the trouble of ſending any more meſſages to him on that ſubject. But notwithſtanding this inſolent anſwer, the commons committed to priſon Sir John Clotworthy, Sir William Waller, the generals Maſſey, Brown, and Copley, with other leaders of the preſbyterian party.

The only difficulty Cromwell had to ſurmount in order to bring on the cataſtrophe of this deteſtable tragedy, conſiſted in diſguiſing its horrid form from Fairfax. The force that had been laid upon the parliament, and the army continuing almoſt ſingle, in oppoſition to the whole nation, together with ſome tenderneſs for the king, ſtartled Fairfax. He began to fear he had gone too far; nor could all the arts of Cromwell quiet the fears with which his breaſt was agitated. The ſoldiers themſelves proved aukward executioners of Cromwell's vengeance; they had ſuffered ſeveral of the ſecluded members to eſcape; and about ſixteen of them were ſet at liberty by Fairfax. This ſeemed to be a kind of apology for the force put upon the houſe: but Cromwell prevented him from going any farther, by procuring a multitude of addreſſes from independents reſiding in various parts of the kingdom.

Nothing now remained than the laſt act of that bloody tragedy, which rendered the leaders of the independents deteſtable in the eyes of all Europe. Terror and aſtoniſhment had already ſeized the whole nation. Every man was fearful of being trodden under foot in this dreadful contention for power. Many began to withdraw with their effects to the continent, in order to ſeek in foreign countries that peace which was baniſhed from their own. Public credit hardly ſubſiſted, and the commerce of the kingdom, both foreign and domeſtic, was ſtagnated, and anarchy and confuſion ſeemed to threaten the whole nation with deſtruction.

In the midſt of this confuſion, the king was ordered to be brought under a ſtrong guard to Windſor, by colonel Harriſon, the ſon of a butcher, and the moſt furious enthuſiaſt in the whole army. Charles himſelf was now convinced, that the period of his life was approaching; but could not be perſuaded that they intended to proceed againſt him by a formal trial, and make him fall a victim to what they called, the ſtroke of juſtice. He every moment expected a private aſſaſſination, a cataſtrophe ſo frequent with dethroned princes: there was not an inſtance to be found in hiſtory where a ſovereign was put to death by the laws of his country. Harriſon aſſured him that his fears were groundleſs, and that whatever was intended againſt him would be done before the ſun. On his arrival at Windſor, all ſymbols of ſovereignty were withdrawn, and his attendants had orders to treat him in no other manner than that of a private gentleman.

On the twenty-fifth of December, a committee was appointed by the commons to bring in a charge againſt the king, and other capital offenders. This committee was impowered to take informations with regard to facts, on which the charge againſt the king was to be founded; and on the twenty-eighth an ordinance for trying the king was brought into the houſe of commons, by Scot an independent member. This ordinance met with very little difficulty in the houſe. Some ſpeeches were indeed made againſt it, but they ſeemed rather calculated to ſave appearances, than prevent the ordinance from receiving the ſanction of the commons.

A. D. 1648-9. On the ſecond of January the ordinance was carried up to the peers by lord Gray of Groby. The upper-houſe had long been conſidered as of little weight in the legiſlature, and ſince the king's impriſonment had become totally contemptible. It happened however to be fuller than ordinary when the ordinance was preſented: ſixteen of the peers were aſſembled. When the charge againſt the king was read, every member was filled with aſtoniſhment: it was conceived in the following terms. "That Charles Stuart had acted contrary to his truſt in departing from his parliament, ſetting up his ſtandard, making war againſt them, and thereby been the occaſion of much bloodſhed and miſery to the people, whom he was ſet over for good; that he had given commiſſions to Iriſh rebels, and was ſince the occaſion of a ſecond war; that he had invaded the rights of the ſubject, and endeavoured to deſtroy the fundamental laws and liberties of this kingdom." The peers looked upon each other with aſtoniſhment, and ſeemed deprived of the power of ſpeech. The earl of Mancheſter firſt broke the awful ſilence, in a ſpeech at once pathetic and conſtitutional. He affirmed it to be a palpable abſurdity to ſay, "that the king could be a traitor againſt the parliament." The earl of Northumberland declared, that the far greater part of the people of England were far from being ſatisfied whether the king or parliament were the firſt aggreſſors; and that even if it ſhould be granted that the king firſt began the war, there was no law in being, that declared, ſuch an action to be treaſon; and for the parliament to declare it treaſon before the matter of fact was proved, and without any law to countenance ſuch a proceeding, would be highly unreaſonable." All the reſt of the lords were of the ſame opinion, and the vote of the lower houſe was rejected without one diſſenting voice. They alſo adjourned themſelves for ten days, in order to embarras the commons, not imagining they would dare to proceed without their concurrence.

They were fatally miſtaken. The commons were not to be ſtopped by ſo ſmall an obſtacle. They immediately voted to proceed to the trial of the king without the conſent of the houſe of lords. Their reſolutions were couched in the following terms.

"Reſolved, that the commons of England in parliament aſſembled do declare, that the people are, under God, the original of all juſt power.

"That the commons of England, in parliament aſſembled, being choſen by and repreſenting the people, have the ſupreme power in this nation.

"That whatſoever is enacted or declared for law, by the commons, in parliament aſſembled, hath the force of law; and all the people of this nation are included thereby, although the concurrence of the king and the houſe of peers, be not had thereunto."

Theſe votes being paſſed, the ordinance for the trial of the king was again read, and aſſented to unanimouſly. Nothing leſs could be expected; the balance of government had been long deſtroyed, and the quarrel now was only about its ſpoils. The parliament had before declared, that they had a right to impoſe laws without the conſent of the king; and the army had juſt as much right to give law to the poor remains of a parliament that now aſſumed the legiſlative power.

As it would have been an inſult on the common ſenſe of the nation even to offer a vindication of theſe violent meaſures on the principles of reaſon; recourſe was had to the ridiculous pretenſions of ſupernatural aſſiſtance. A woman of Hertfordſhire, illuminated by prophetical viſions, deſired admittance to the council of war, and aſſured them of her being informed by a revelation, that their meaſures were conſecrated in heaven, and ratified by a celeſtial ſanction. The leaders of the independent party alſo augmented their pretences to ſanctity. "Should any one have voluntarily propoſed," ſaid Cromwell one day in the houſe, "to bring the king to puniſhment, I ſhould have regarded him as the greateſt traitor; but ſince providence and neceſſity have caſt us upon it, I will pray to God for a bleſſing on your councils, though I am not prepared to give you any advice on this important occaſion. Even I myſelf," added he, "when I was offering up petitions for his majeſty's reſtoration, felt my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, and conſidered this ſupernatural movement as an anſwer, which heaven, having rejected the king, had ſent to my ſupplications." Under ſuch fanatical pretenſions the leaders of the independents endeavoured to ſanctify their ſanguinary deſigns, and conceal from the people their thirſt of power. It was not ſufficient to ſacrifice the conſtitution of their country to their ambition, heaven itſelf muſt be brought to applaud their meaſures!

The fate of the king was now to be precipitated on many accounts. The army might feel remorſe if the fervours of fanaticiſm were ſuffered to ſubſide. The people might recover from their conſternation. The Scots might interpoſe. Foreign nations might declare in the king's favour. The ſtates-general had already named an ambaſſador to negotiate a peace between his majeſty and the parliament. The court of France appeared to be deeply concerned at the fate of Charles; the king of Denmark was fitting out armaments for his relief; and all Europe beheld his fate with pity and indignation. Cromwell knew this, and ſat late every night in conſultation with his officers. He had too ſound a judgment to think of entering upon any vindication of the late proceedings: he knew they would not ſtand the teſt of reaſon; and thought it would be more eaſy to juſtify the blow after it was given than before.

On the ſixth of January information was brought to the houſe, that the king might eaſily make his eſcape; and Fairfax was ordered to confine him more cloſely, and not to ſuffer any of his friends to viſit him; and on the thirteenth of January it was voted to leave the king's name out of all public papers. Nor was the government of the city of London leſs unhinged than the conſtitution. The independent faction, in the name of the common-council, preſented an addreſs to parliament, without the conſent of the lord-mayor and aldermen, who had all of them abſented themſelves. The addreſs was, however, voted to be regular, and the thanks of the houſe were accordingly returned. No member was found intrepid enough to oppoſe theſe proceedings, Cromwell having made no ſecret of his intention to expel every one who voted againſt the meaſures he propoſed. The whole kingdom beheld theſe proceedings with ſilent horror. The queen wrote to the parliament in favour of her huſband, and deſired leave to attend him, but this letter was inhumanly thrown aſide by the commons.

Prynne, who had ſuffered ſo deeply by the tyranny of the ſtar-chamber, was the only man in England who dared to face this conflagration of rebellion. He had been elected a member of parliament, and was ſo honeſt as to ſpeak, vote, and write, agreeable to his own opinion; and had been, with other members, excluded from his ſeat in the houſe, and kept priſoner at a common inn. But though his perſon was confined, he wrote ſtrongly in defence of the principles he profeſſed. He appealed to the public againſt the proceedings of the independent faction, and boldly printed a pamphlet, intituled, "A brief memento to the preſent unparliamentary junto to depoſe and execute Charles Stuart, their lawful king." This pamphlet gave ſo much offence to the party, that a committee was appointed to demand of Prynne, whether he would own it. Prynne readily replied, "I will give no anſwer till I am commanded by a lawful authority." The preſbyterian members approved this anſwer, and made another faint attempt to try their ſtrength with the army, but were defeated.

Had they now quitted the houſe, they had done ſome ſervice to their country, by depriving the party of their countenance; for though they were always ready to oppoſe the independents, they were always overborne by a majority; and the people, who had no opportunity of knowing what paſſed in the houſe, conſidered every tranſaction as an act of the whole parliament. Whereas by abſenting themſelves, few or none would have acted as a parliament, except thoſe who ſet their hands to the warrant for the execution of their ſovereign.

No long time was neceſſary for adjuſting all the circumſtances of the trial, and conſtituting what was termed "the high court of juſtice." It conſiſted of one hundred and thirty-three perſons, as named by the commons, but never more than ſeventy met: ſo difficult was it found, notwithſtanding the blindneſs of prejudice, and the allurements of intereſt, to prevail upon perſons of any name or character to engage in ſo criminal a meaſure. It may, perhaps, be thought ſtrange, that as a great number, nearly the majority, of the commiſſioners, who were empowered to act on this occaſion, deteſted the guilty deſigns of the court, they did not attend, and endeavour to prevent the ſentence. But the truth is, they were intimidated by the fierceneſs of the army. They knew, that if any difficulty occurred in completing this ſanguinary meaſure, the independent faction among the officers would purge the court, as it had already done the parliament. The twelve judges were at firſt appointed in the number; but on their affirming, that it was contrary to all the ideas of Engliſh law to try the king for treaſon, by whoſe authority all accuſations for that crime muſt neceſſarily be conducted; their names, as well as thoſe of ſome peers, were afterwards ſtruck out. Cromwell, Ireton, Harriſon, and the chief officers of the army, moſt of them of very mean birth, were judges, together with a few of the members of the lower houſe, and ſome citizens of London. Bradſhaw, a lawyer, was choſen preſident; Coke was appointed ſollicitor for the people of England; and Doriſlaus, Steel and Aſke, were named aſſiſtants.

Fairfax now ſeemed as one awakened from a lethargy, and ſtartled at the guilt that was every day committing under the ſanction of his name. He never, knowingly to himſelf, had profeſſed independency, though he had in fact been the tool of Cromwell to eſtabliſh it. His wrong notions, with regard to the army, occaſioned all his miſcarriages. He was perſuaded that the profeſſion of a ſoldier ought to be governed by ſeverer maxims and principles of honour than thoſe that fell within any civil ſyſtem; and was always jealous of government, becauſe he feared it wanted to make a property of the army. After he was made general in chief, he conſidered himſelf as anſwerable to the ſoldiers, with regard to their treatment from the parliament. Such military notions, greatly augmented by religious ſincerity and fervour, rendered it very eaſy for Cromwell to mould Fairfax to his purpoſes; and it happened, that, in ſome particulars, he had juſtice on his ſide. The parliament had, for inſtance, violated ſeveral articles of capitulation granted by the army, which Fairfax conſidered as highly criminal. They had engroſſed into their hands immenſe ſums from ſequeſtrations, delinquencies, and taxes; while the ſoldiers, who had given them all their power, were actually left to ſtarve, or to live upon free quarter. Theſe were undoubted truths; and Cromwell perſuaded Fairfax, that the hardſhips of the ſoldiers proceeded from the notorious avarice and wicked policy of the members. The former induced them to evade all demands of money; the latter to abandon the ſoldiers, ſo that they were obliged to live upon free quarter, whereby they were become hateful, and an intolerable burden to the people. Fairfax being once convinced of theſe truths, was led to believe every thing that was reported of the parliament; and his ill opinion was increaſed on ſeizing, in the cuſtody of their committees, when he marched his troops into the city, more money than would have been ſufficient to quiet the clamours of his ſoldiers. But when his troops were ſatisfied, and his preſbyterian friends laid before him the conſequences that muſt reſult from the ſcheme formed by the army, he was ſtruck with horror at the proſpect, and would fain have prevented the dreadful effects of that power he had been ſo inſtrumental in obtaining.

At the firſt meeting of the high court of juſtice, which ſat in Weſtminſter-hall, an incident happened which deſerves to be recorded. Lady Fairfax, the daughter of Horace lord Vere of Tilbury, having been ſeduced by the violence of the times, ſeconded all the ardour of her huſband againſt the royal cauſe; but being now convinced of her error, ſhe joined with her huſband in bewailing the miſeries which threatened her country, and joined the friends of Fairfax in diſſuading him from being preſent at the trial. Curioſity, however, prompted her to attend; and when her huſband's name was called in reading over the liſt of commiſſioners, a voice was heard from one of the ſpectators, ſaying aloud, "He has too much wit to be preſent." And when the charge was read againſt the king, in the name of all the people of England, the ſame voice exclaimed, "Not a tenth part of them." Orders were now given to Axtel, the officer who guarded the court, to fire into the box whence the voice proceeded; but the ſoldiers being informed that it was their general's lady, they refuſed to obey. This circumſtance ſufficiently proves, that Fairfax was now convinced of his having been abuſed, and that Cromwell was then conſidered as the hypocrite, who had inſtigated the army to inſiſt on this deteſtable trial.

It is not eaſy to form a more affecting idea than was now exhibited in the high court of juſtice; the delegates of a free people ſitting in judgment on their ſupreme magiſtrate, and trying him for his miſgovernment and breach of truſt; and the pomp, the dignity, and the ceremony, were equal to the conception. The charge againſt the king was read by the ſollicitor, in the name of the commons; in which it was declared, "That Charles Stuart, being admitted king of England, and intruſted with a limited power; yet, nevertheleſs, out of a wicked deſign to erect an unlawful and tyrannical government, had traitorouſly and maliciouſly levied war againſt the preſent parliament, and the people, whom they repreſented; and was therefore impeached as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable enemy to the commonwealth."

Charles, even in this hour of diſtreſs, loſt not the majeſty of a king. On the preſident's telling the king, that the court expected his anſwer; he aſked by what authority he was brought thither? This queſtion had been expected by Cromwell, and the preſident, by his direction, anſwered, "In the name of the commons of England." The king denied the authority of the court, and refuſed to ſubmit to their juriſdiction. He obſerved, that being born their lawful hereditary king, all his ſubjects united could have no power to bring him to a trial; that having often expoſed his life in defence of the liberties and fundamental laws of the kingdom, he would not now deſert them, but was ready, in this laſt and moſt ſolemn ſcene, to ſeal with his blood thoſe precious rights for which he had ſo long, though in vain, contended: That in the court which pretended to ſit in judgment on his actions, he could not perceive the leaſt appearance of the upper houſe, ſo eſſential a member of the conſtitution; and had learned from ſufficient authority, that the commons, with whoſe power the court pretended to be inveſted, had been ſubdued by lawleſs force, and entirely deprived of their liberty: That thoſe who arrogated the power of being his judges were born his ſubjects, and ſubjects of thoſe laws, which declare, "That the king can do no wrong;"

but that without having recourſe to that general maxim, which ſcreens even the worſt of princes, he was ready to juſtify his conduct by the evidence of reaſon: and that if he were called upon in another manner, he ſhould be deſirous of demonſtrating to them and all the world, the juſtice of that war he was unfortunately, and contrary to his inclinations, engaged in his own defence: but in his preſent circumſtances he muſt not enter on the apology he was ſo deſirous of making, leſt, by ratifying an authority, no better founded than that of robbers and pirates, he ſhould be conſidered as the betrayer of that conſtitution he was ſo deſirous of eſtabliſhing even by his blood."

This anſwer had no effect. Bradſhaw, in the moſt attrocious and inſolent language told him, that the court over-ruled his objections, and derived their authority from the people, the only ſource of genuine power. Thrice was Charles brought before the court, and as often denied their juriſdiction. The commiſſioners therefore proceeded to examine ſome witneſſes, who depoſed that the king had appeared in arms againſt the troops of the parliament. Upon which, after another inſolent ſpeech made by Bradſhaw, ſentence of death was pronounced againſt him. The king, during his laſt appearance before the court, ſeemed very deſirous of being admitted to a conference with the two houſes of parliament; but this was denied. The independents intended not to gratify any requeſt he might make; they had already determined to aboliſh the power of the houſe of peers, and it would have been dangerous on this occaſion to acknowledge them as a branch of the legiſlature. Their denial was accompanied with the moſt brutal inſolence. The ſoldiers were ſuffered to uſe every mark of diſreſpect, and ſome of them even ſpit in his face. But even this inſult could not ſhake the tranquillity of his ſoul, a ſentiment of piety was the only effect it excited. He was more nearly affected by the ardent prayers and wiſhes offered up for his ſafety by the people who thronged about him, and which even the rod of lawleſs power was not ſufficient to reſtrain.

The ambaſſadors of France, Holland and Scotland interpoſed to ſtop theſe horrid proceedings, but in vain. Every nation in Europe exclaimed againſt this example as the moſt egregious inſult on law and juſtice. But all their exclamations and interpoſitions had no effect: the fate of the king was fixed and irrevocable. Four of the chief and moſt illuſtrious friends of his majeſty, Richmond, Holland, Southampton and Lindſey, repaired to the houſe of commons, and repreſented, that, in quality of his counſellors, they alone were guilty of the meaſures imputed to him as crimes; and deſired to ſave, by their own puniſhment, that precious life, which the commons themſelves were ſo much intereſted to defend. This generous offer had no other effect than that of increaſing the animoſity of the court. For the more bad men ſee their conduct reproached by the virtue of the good, the more eager they are to conſummate their baſe deſigns.

The ſhort interval of time between his ſentence and execution, was employed by the king in meditating thoſe eternal truths which elevate the ſoul above the evils of mortality. All his family that remained in England were allowed to viſit him. The duke of Glouceſter was little more than an infant; but the advanced judgment of the princeſs Elizabeth, notwithſtanding her tender years, rendered her ſenſible of all the miſeries ſhe was doomed to ſuffer. The king, after giving her the moſt prudent advice, and endeavouring to fortify her mind with pious conſolations, charged her to tell the queen, that he had never during the whole courſe of his life failed in conjugal fidelity towards her, not even in thought; and that his tenderneſs for her ſhould only end with his life. Holding the duke of Glouceſter on his knee, he ſaid, "Now they will cut off thy father's " head." So unexpected a ſentence ſeemed greatly to affect the child, who looked ſtedfaſtly upon him. " Mark! child what I ſay; They will cut off my " head, and perhaps make thee a king: But mark " what I ſay: Thou muſt not be a king, as long " as thy brothers Charles and James are alive. They " will cut of thy brothers heads when they can " catch them! And thy head too they will cut off " at laſt! And therefore I charge thee do not be " made a king by them!" The duke replied, fetching a deep ſigh, "I will be torn in pieces firſt." The king's eyes were filled with tears of joy and admiration at hearing ſo determined an anſwer from one of ſuch tender years.

Every night during this awful interval, the king ſlept ſound as uſual, though the noiſe of workmen, employed in framing the ſcaffold, reſounded continually in his ears. The morning of the fatal day he roſe early; and calling Hubert, one of his attendants, bade him employ more than uſual care in dreſſing him, and preparing him for ſo great and joyful a ſolemnity, which would put a final period to all his ſorrows and to all his cares. Biſhop Juxon, a man endowed with the ſame mild and ſteady virtues by which the king himſelf was ſo much diſtinguiſhed, aſſiſted him in his devotions, and paid the laſt duties to his ſovereign and his friend.

The ſcaffold was erected in the ſtreet before Whitehall, it being intended by making choice of a ſpot, adjoining to his own palace, to diſplay in a more evident manner, the triumph of popular juſtice over the power of royalty. When the king came upon the ſcaffold, he found it ſo ſurrounded with ſoldiers, that he could not expect to be heard by any of the people: He therefore addreſſed his diſcourſe to the few perſons who were about him, particularly to colonel Tomlinſon, whom his virtues had reclaimed from an enemy to a friend. He proteſted his innocence, but, at the ſame time, acknowledged that his death was juſt in the eyes of the ſupreme Being, and that he was puniſhed for not having oppoſed an unjuſt ſentence, (meaning undoubtedly that of Strafford;) he generouſly forgave his enemies, and exhorted them and the whole nation, to live in obedience to his lawful ſucceſſor. Having finiſhed his ſpeech, he laid his head on the block with the greateſt decency and compoſure, and it was ſevered from his body by one blow of the executioner, who performed the bloody office in a vizor.

Fairfax was abſent during the trial. He attempted by his influence to ſtop the execution, but not been able able to ſucceed, he reſolved to ſave the king by force. Cromwell and Ireton were no ſtrangers to his reſolution, and requeſted him to have recourſe to prayer at a time when they ſtood ſo much in need of ſupernatural aſſiſtance. The fanatic Harriſon was ordered to join with him in this pious office, and he took care to prolong the farce, till a perſon came and whiſpered him, that the king was no more. Then riſing with the air of a prophet, he aſſured Fairfax, that the lord had heard their prayers, and made known his holy will in a very marvellous manner.

The nation, too long the dupe of hypocriſy, began to awake from its error. Never monarch, in the full triumph of ſucceſs and victory, was more dear to his people, than this unhappy prince was now rendered by his miſfortunes and magnanimity, his patience and piety. Each now reproached himſelf either with active diſloyalty, or with a too indolent defence of his cauſe. The very pulpits, which had formerly thundered out the moſt violent imprecations and anathemas againſt him, were now bedewed with the tears of ſincerity. His very enemies allow, that if temperance, chaſtity, regularity and piety can form a complete moral character, that of Charles may be deemed faultleſs. But he loved power to exceſs; and in order to retain it, he gave up a miniſter whom he loved and eſteemed, and made conceſſions which he diſdained and deteſted. Charles was, however, early and ſecretly ſenſible, that there was the ſame deſtination between power and prerogative, as between poſſeſſion and a claim, and by endeavouring to render them inſeparable, he forfeited both. By flying to fortify his prerogative before it was attacked, he pointed out to his enemies the places where it might be aſſaulted with moſt ſucceſs; and his timorous friends drew him off from his defence, where he might have made a ſucceſsful ſtand. Their fears of his being torn in pieces if he did not paſs the bills that depoſed him, were vain and chimerical; conſcience and guilt had magnified their danger. When he began to grant, he found no end of conceſſions, nor means of reſiſtance when he was perſuaded to deny. In proſperity he was ſurrounded by harpies, who dreaded the vengeance of the public, and placed both his perſon and his crown between them and the ſtroke of juſtice. His friends wiſhed to have the extent of his prerogative defined, that it might be known; his creatures to keep it concealed, that it might be dreaded; and his enemies to ſee it reduced, that it might be ruined. In a word, the character of this prince, like that of all other men, was mixed; but his virtues greatly predominated; and he certainly merited the eſteem and affections of his ſubjects. In times of happier tranquillity he would have reigned with glory, and with the confidence of his ſubjects; but he wanted that political ſagacity, which can adapt itſelf to critical circumſtances and events; and he was led too eaſily by counſels inferior to his own.

The death of Charles was not more deſtructive to his family than to the conſtitution. For ſeveral days, even before his condemnation, the commons were employed in preparing acts for aboliſhing monarchy, and erecting a republican government on its ruins; and on the very day of his execution they publiſhed the following proclamation:

“ Whereas Charles Stuart, king of England, being, for the notorious treaſons, tyrannies and murders, committed by him in the late unnatural and cruel wars, condemned to death; whereupon, after execution of the ſame, ſeveral pretences may be made, and claims ſet on foot to the kingly office, to the apparent hazard of the public peace; for prevention whereof be it enacted and ordained by this preſent parliament, and by the authority of the ſame, that no perſon or perſons whomſoever, do preſume to proclaim, declare, or publiſh, or any ways promote Charles Stuart, the ſon of the ſaid Charles, commonly called the prince of Wales, or any other perſon, to be king, or chief magiſtrate of England, or of Ireland, or of any of the dominions belonging to them, or either of them, by colour of inheritance, ſucceſſion, election, or any other claim whatſoever, without the free conſent of the people in parliament firſt had, or ſignified by a particular act or ordinance for that purpoſe; any ſtatute, law, uſuage, or cuſtom to the contrary hereof, in any wiſe notwithſtanding.

“ And be it farther enacted and ordained, and it is hereby enacted and ordained, that whoſoever, contrary to this act ſhall proclaim, publiſh, or any way promote the ſaid Charles Stuart the ſon, or any other perſon, to be king, or chief magiſtrate of England, or of Ireland, or of any of the dominions belonging to them, or to either of them, without the ſaid conſent in parliament ſignified as aforeſaid, ſhall be deemed and adjudged a traitor to the commonwealth, and ſhall ſuffer the pains of death, and ſuch other puniſhments as belong to the crime of high-treaſon. And all officers, as well civil as military, and all other well-affected perſons, are hereby authorized and required to apprehend all ſuch offenders, and to bring them in ſafe cuſtody to the next juſtice of peace, that they may be proceeded againſt accordingly.”

An act was alſo paſſed “ for repealing ſeveral clauſes in the act of parliament of the 25th of Edward III. intitled, A declaration which offences ſhall be adjudged treaſon; and of one clauſe in the act of the firſt of Edward VI. intitled, Statutes concerning treaſons, &c. repealed; and of one clauſe in the act of the third of James, intitled, an act for diſcovering and repreſſing recuſants; and of part of an act made in the firſt year of queen Mary, intitled, A repeal for certain treaſons, felonies, and premunire; and for repealing the act of the eleventh year of Henry VII. intitled, None that ſhall attend upon the king, and do him true ſervice, ſhall be attainted or forfeit any thing; and of one clauſe in the act of the firſt year of Elizabeth, intitled, An act for reſtoring to the crown the ancient juriſdiction over the ſtate, eccleſiaſtical and ſpiritual; and of ſix ſeveral clauſes in a ſtatute paſſed in the fifth year of Elizabeth, intitled, An act for the aſſurance of the queen's power over all eſtates; and of an act paſſed in the ſeventeenth year of king James, touching the taking the oath of obedience to the king.”

Another proclamation was alſo publiſhed, ordering, “ That all courts of law, juſtice, or equity, and in all writs, grants, patents, commiſſions, indictments, informations, ſuits, returns of writs, and in all fines, recoveries, exemplifications, recognizances, proceſſes, and proceedings at law, juſtice, or equity, within the kingdoms of England and Ireland, dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, inſtead of the name, ſtile, title, and teſt of the king heretofore uſed, the name, ſtile, and teſt of Cuſtodes libertatis Angliæ authoritate parliamenti, ſhall be uſed, and no other. And the date ſhall be the year of our Lord, and no other: And that all duties, profits, penalties, iſſues, fines, amerciaments, and forfeitures whatſoever, which heretofore were ſued for in the name of the king, ſhall from henceforth be proſecuted, ſued for and recovered in the name of Cuſtodes libertatis Angliæ authoritate parliamenti, and no other; and in all, or any of the proceedings aforeſaid, where the words were, juratores pro domino rege, it ſhall from henceforth be juratores pro republicâ; and where the words, in any of the proceedings aforeſaid uſed to be, contra pacem dignitatem, vel coronam noſtram, that from henceforth theſe words, contra pacem publicam, inſtead of them, or any of them, ſhall be uſed.”

When the peers met on the ſixth of February, purſuant to their adjournment, they entered upon buſineſs, and ſent down votes to the commons; but the latter deigned not to take the leaſt notice of them. A few days after, the lower houſe paſſed a vote “ that no more addreſſes ſhould be made to the houſe of peers, nor any more received from them; that the upper houſe was uſeleſs and dangerous, and ſhould therefore be aboliſhed.” They formed a new great ſeal, on which that aſſembly was repreſented, with this legend, “ On the firſt year of freedom, by God's bleſſing, reſtored 1648. The king's ſtatue in the Exchange was thrown down, and theſe words engraved on the pedeſtal, “ Exit tyranus, Regum ultimus,” the tyrant, the laſt of kings, is gone.

Charles left ſix children; three ſons, Charles, born in 1630; James, duke of York, born in 1633; Henry, duke of Glouceſter, born in 1641: and three daughters, Mary, princeſs of Orange, born in 1631; Elizabeth, born in 1635; and Henrietta, afterwards dutcheſs of Orleans, born at Exeter in 1644. Elizabeth did not long ſurvive her father; his tragical end ſo deeply affected her, that ſhe died of grief.

A few days after the execution of Charles, a book was publiſhed, intituled, “ Icon Baſilikè,” ſaid to have been written by that prince. This work, ſo full of piety, meekneſs and humanity, publiſhed at ſo critical a juncture, excited, in a moſt remarkable manner, the compaſſion of the people for their murdered prince. The ſale of it was ſo rapid, that it paſſed through fifty editions in leſs than a year. Some have not even ſcrupled to aſcribe to that work the ſubſequent reſtoration of the royal family. It operated, ſays Milton, like the will of Cæſar, when read by Mark Anthony to the tumultuous Romans. It was, doubtleſs, the beſt proſe compoſition in the Engliſh language, at the time of its publication.

Some have denied the compoſition to have been the king's: but the arguments brought to prove, that theſe elegant meditations really flowed from the royal pen, ſeem much the ſtronger; and it is now the general opinion, that they were actually written by the king.

The Republic, or, Commonwealth, of England.

A.D. 1649. THE monarchical government of England being thus deſtroyed, and the whole conſtitution overturned, it became neceſſary to eſtabliſh another in its room, and that of a republic, or commonwealth, was choſen. But the nation was ſo far from being unanimous, that it was divided into ſeveral parties, whoſe animoſity was the greater, as they were almoſt all of them under the influence of enthuſiaſm. Some were for having no form of human government, becauſe Chriſt, whoſe ſecond coming they ſaid was at hand, would be the ſole governor of the world. Others aſſerted, that there was neither moral nor natural law remaining; and that the elect, under the direction of the Holy Spirit, were above human obligations. The preſbyterians and royaliſts, though of oppoſite principles, were equally offended. Theſe factions, however, gave no uneaſineſs to Cromwell; he knew, that when the baſis of government is deſtroyed, the ſword alone muſt give law to the people. He was maſter of the army, and on that foundation he determined to build his future greatneſs.

During the continuance of theſe diviſions in the ſtate, the trials of the duke of Hamilton, the earls of Norwich and Holland, the lord Capel, and Sir John Owen, came on before the high court of juſtice, where they were all found guilty, and received ſentence of death. Hamilton and Capel made their eſcape, but were retaken: the former might have ſaved his life, but was honeſt enough to refuſe it, as it was only offered at the expence of his honour. Great intereſt was uſed to ſave them all. Capel had joined early in the oppoſition to the king; Hamilton had ſerved the parliament; and Holland had been, by turns, the friend and the ſlave of the faction: the other two had no merits to plead, either towards the party, or their perſons; yet the three former ſuffered, whilſt the two latter were ſaved. Hamilton died becauſe he refuſed to betray his friends; Holland, on account of his apoſtacy, in deſerting the cauſe he had long defended; and Cromwell honeſtly ſaid, that Capel had ſo many virtues, that his life was incompatible with the ſafety of the faction.

The ſettlement of the government now became a ſerious affair with the party; and after long debates and conſultations, it was reſolved that a council of ſtate ſhould be eſtabliſhed, conſiſting of thirty-eight members, who were to be intruſted with the following powers: to command and ſettle the militia of England and Ireland: to fit out ſuch a navy as they ſhould think proper: to appoint magazines and ſtores, and diſpoſe of them; and to ſit and execute the powers with which they were intruſted for one year.

Cromwell acted with great prudence in erecting this council of ſtate; becauſe their powers being limited with regard to time, it was impoſſible for them to make any ſucceſsful oppoſition to the ambitious ſchemes he had formed, and ſeveral of the members were his own friends and creatures. In the mean time, a kind of anarchy prevailed in the kingdom. The landmarks of the conſtitution being removed, no man knew upon what foundation his property ſtood; and moſt of the judges, together with many ſheriffs and juſtices of the peace, refuſed to act under the new government. Cromwell was not diſpleaſed at their refuſal, becauſe it enforced the neceſſity of keeping up a numerous army, and of proceeding by martial inſtead of municipal law. Hewſon, one of the colonels, very properly obſerved, that the ſoldiers could hang twenty with leſs difficulty than the magiſtrates could hang one. This introduction of martial law rendered Cromwell abſolute in the government: he took poſſeſſion of the king's rooms of ſtate at Whitehall; he diſpoſed of civil property by his warrant; and he had his officers always at command, to preſent to the houſe ſuch forms and alterations, both in the civil and military departments in government; and whatever he pleaſed to preſcribe, were always approved of by the commons and the council of ſtate. He met, however, with a ſtrong oppoſition from lieutenant-colonel Lilburn, a very abuſive and turbulent man, and he was ſent immediately to priſon. The women aſſembled in troops, and demanded his enlargement. They were told to take care of their families, and leave the government of the ſtate to the men. The preſbyterians, the peers, and the ſecluded members, alſo joined in the oppoſition, and filled the kingdom with the boldeſt invectives againſt the new government; and ſome had even the boldneſs to diſperſe papers, proclaiming the prince of Wales to be king of England, under the title of Charles II. an appellation by which we muſt now diſtinguiſh him.

The Scottiſh commiſſioners had entered a ſtrong proteſt againſt the proceedings of the commons, with regard to the trial of the late king, and had now received orders to quit England, without taking leave of the faction. They accordingly wrote a ſpirited letter to the commons, who voted, that it was a ſcandalous and reproachful libel againſt the juſt proceedings of the parliament, intended to lay the foundations for a new and bloody war; and that all who ſupported them ſhould be conſidered as traitors and rebels to their country. But Cromwell, willing to avoid, if poſſible, a rupture with Scotland at that critical conjuncture, procured a vote in parliament on the twenty-eighth of February, that the commiſſioners ſhould be ſent to Scotland under a guard. The fate of that kingdom itſelf was now deplorable. Rent with factions, and diſtracted with fanatical enthuſiaſm, no meaſures founded on reaſon and the rules of policy could be taken. The body of the people abhorred the Engliſh faction, who had put their king to death, and were unanimous for proclaiming his ſon, and placing him on the throne of his anceſtors; but they differed with regard to the terms on which the ſovereignty ſhould be offered. The violent preſbyterians headed by Argyle, were for obliging him to obſerve every article of the covenant, and even previous to their ſending any invitation, to oblige him to ſign it, to ſubmit implicitly to their church cenſures, to renounce the ſins of his father's houſe, the iniquity of his mother, and to ſubmit to ſeveral other mortifications, that even a private gentleman would have refuſed. The covenanting royaliſts as well as the epiſcopalians, were for proclaiming the king without obliging him to ſign any conditions. The earls of Lauderdale and Laneric, now duke of Hamilton, were at this time with Charles at the Hague, where he kept up the appearance of a court, though his affairs were in a deſperate condition. The prince and princeſs of Orange wiſhed well to his intereſt, but the ſelfiſh maxims of the Dutch republic, rendered it impoſſible to ſerve him effectually. The higheſt expectations were formed of Charles, who was now about nineteen years of age. He had behaved with the utmoſt tenderneſs towards his father and his family; he had, with a prudence far above his years, reconciled to his ſervice all the different members of his council; and had ſhewn great ſpirit on all occaſions, as well as a cloſe application to buſineſs. He had hitherto enjoyed very few opportunies of improving himſelf by reading, and the perſons intruſted with his education by his father, were but ill qualified to improve him by their converſation, and ſtill leſs by their inſtructions.

The ſtates-general had given frequent intimations that their affairs would not permit them to come to a rupture with the ruling powers of England, and Charles knew not where to retire for protection. During this diſagreeable ſuſpence, the gallant marquis of Montroſe appeared, with magnificent equipages, and a ſmall number of choſen friends, at the court of Charles. His ſentiments were very different from thoſe of the other counſellors. He thought all treaties with rebels to be diſhonourable; that the king ought to throw himſelf upon the friendſhip of his brother monarchs and the affections of his loyal ſubjects; undertaking himſelf, with very ſmall aſſiſtance, of ſeating him on the Scottiſh throne. The great actions Montroſe had already performed, his majeſtic deportment, and his unmerited ſufferings for the royal cauſe, inſpired all who approached him with impreſſions of awe, of love, and of pity. Though he was almoſt ſingle in his ſentiments, none ventured to oppoſe him; and his own countrymen regarded him as the guardian genius of injured majeſty.

Plainer declarations of their deſire that Charles ſhould leave the Hague being now made by the States-general, it was reſolved in council that the king ſhould retire into France. He was received with great politeneſs in all the towns of Flanders through which he paſſed, and with as much ſtate by the young king of France, as if he had been actually in poſſeſſion of the Engliſh crown. But theſe civilities flowed entirely from a commiſeration of his miſfortunes, which was ſo ſtrong with the public that cardinal Mazarine, and the queen regent of France did not think fit to reſtrain it. No effectual aſſiſtance was, however, to be expected; an aſylum was all that could be brought to promiſe.

The affairs of Ireland ſeemed to diſplay a dawn of ſucceſs to the royal cauſe; the marquis of Ormond was at the head of a conſiderable party devoted to Charles; and though the Iriſh, at the inſtigation of the pope's nuncio, had again took up arms againſt the Engliſh, they were now ſincerely united with the royaliſts. Had Charles appeared at the head of his army, there is no doubt but the whole kingdom would have declared in his favour; but his preſence and the want of money, were great obſticles to the ſucceſs of Ormond. He, however, made himſelf maſter of Drogheda, with other conſiderable garriſoned towns, and laid ſiege to Dublin, where Jones, the general of the parliament's forces had been obliged to ſhut himſelf up.

The Engliſh government was now ſufficiently alarmed, and Cromwell, at his own requeſt, was appointed to command the troops intended to be ſent againſt the royaliſts in Ireland. Prince Rupert, ever ſince the fleet deſerted to the prince of Wales, had commanded a conſiderable ſquadron, and taken ſeveral rich prizes. Dunkirk and Oſtend alſo ſwarmed with privateers, that acted under commiſſions granted by Charles. The natural remedy for this evil was to fit out a ſuperior fleet; but it was not eaſy to determine who was to command it. The earl of Warwick, the ſucceſsful admiral of the parliament, though a violent preſbyterian, was not an independent, and he had lately been diſguſted with the government, on account of their putting his brother, the earl of Holland to death, notwithſtanding he had exerted all his intereſt to ſave him. After long debates and conſultations, it was determined to put the affairs of the admiralty into commiſſion, and the command of the fleet was given to Blake, Popham, and Dean. The navy was ſoon in ſo reſpectable a condition, that the Engliſh channel was cleared of thoſe privateers that had ſo greatly obſtructed the commerce of the kingdom, and prince Rupert himſelf was blocked up in the harbour of Kinſale, by a ſquadron under the command of Blake and Dean.

It ſeemed to be a paradox in politics for Cromwell to undertake to head the expedition againſt the Iriſh in perſon, before the affairs of government were ſettled upon ſome ſolid baſis. But his conduct was directed by wiſe maxims. He knew that power could only be maintained by the ſame meaſures by which it had been acquired. The dangerous ſpirit of levelling was far from being deſtroyed in the army; and this, with all other cautions, could only be cured by finding full employment for the ſoldiers. Cromwell promiſed himſelf great advanttges from the ſpirit and temper of his ſoldiers returning from foreign conqueſt, when they had loſt all tenderneſs for their mother-country, and regarded no will but that of their general. He was ſenſible that it was abſolutely neceſſary to reduce Ireland, as it lay very convenient for receiving aſſiſtance and ſupplies from the Roman catholic powers, particularly from Spain, whoſe friendſhip the parliament had as yet great reaſon to diſtruſt. Beſides theſe motives Cromwell flattered himſelf with extending the fame of his military atchievements, and of revenging himſelf on the marquis of Ormond, and other royaliſts in Ireland, who had accuſed him of being the ſole cauſe of the king's death.

But before Cromwell led his troops againſt the Iriſh, he was determined to deſtroy that ſpirit of levelling which was now ſo common in the army, and which, if not cruſhed in the bud, muſt undermine the baſis of his authority. The writings of Lilburn, and his aſſociates, who were all unanimous in their hatred of Cromwell, had greatly encouraged the ſpirit of levelling; and ſome examples of ſeverity made at London, blew the ſcattered ſparks into a flame. One Thompſon, a bold, intrepid trooper, headed the levellers, who appointed their rendezvous to be held at Banbury in Oxfordſhire. Some of the regiments that had been appointed to go to Ireland, mutinied about the ſame time, particularly thoſe commanded by Ireton, Scroop, and Reynolds. Thompſon ſoon found himſelf at the head of two hundred horſe, and expected daily to be joined by ſo large a body of mutineers, as would enable him to ſet the government at defiance.

Cromwell artfully prevailed upon Fairfax to accompany him in the diſagreeable ſervice of reducing the levellers. They reached Banbury ſoon enough to prevent the mutineers from uniting into a body, and Fairfax directing his march to Burford, made four thouſand of them priſoners. This ſucceſs rendered the whole deſign of the levellers abortive, Thompſon himſelf being killed in the conflict.

The mutiny being quelled, the parliament paſſed an act declaring it treaſon in any one "to affirm that the preſent government is tyrannical, uſurped or unlawful, or that the commons in parliament are not the ſupreme authority; or to endeavour to alter the preſent government; or to affirm the ſame of the council of ſtate; to contrive the death of the general or lieutenant-general of the army; to raiſe a mutiny among the ſoldiers; to join with thoſe that invade England or Ireland; to level war againſt the parliament; to counterfeit the great ſeal; or to kill any member of parliament, judge, or miniſter of juſtice."

The houſe of commons now exerciſed all the powers of royalty both legiſlative and executive. The earl of Pembroke was mean enough to ſit in the houſe as a commoner, and to give Whitlock, keeper of the great ſeal, the ſame precedency as the chancellors enjoyed over noblemen in the times of monarchy. All foreign princes, though they deteſted the principles, dreaded the power of the new government. Even Chriſtiana, queen of Sweden, herſelf, who had loudly exclaimed againſt the faction, received with kindneſs colonel Potley, who was ſent by the parliament to reſide at her court. In a word, every thing ſmiled on the new eſtabliſhment. The royal arms were taken down from all public offices and courts of juſtice, the royal titles eraſed out of public writings; and it was declared by the parliament and council of ſtate, "That the people of England, and all the territories and dominions thereunto belonging, are, ſhall be, and are hereby conſtituted, made, and declared, a commonwealth, and free ſtate, and ſhall ſo be governed by the ſupreme authority, the repreſentatives of the people in parliament, and by ſuch as they ſhall conſtitute as officers for the good of the people, and that without any king, ſingle perſon, or houſe of lords." The new-coined money was alſo ſtruck with the arms and titles of the Commonwealth of England.

About the middle of May, the army under Cromwell was ready to embark for Ireland. The news of this expedition determined the king, who was now heartily tired of the court of France, to retire to Jerſey, the only ſpot he now inherited of all his large paternal dominions, and where he had already been proclaimed by the loyal governor, Sir George Carteret. This was, doubtleſs, placing his fortune on a very ſlender foundation; but it was the wiſeſt meaſure he could purſue in this critical conjuncture, when the courts of France and Spain, notwithſtanding all their pretended deteſtation of the rebels proceedings, only ſought to make the beſt advantage they could of their being poſſeſſed of his perſon. The king of Denmark, and a few of the German princes, were, indeed, ſincere in their endeavours to ſerve him; but they wanted money to fit out a fleet ſufficient to face that of the Engliſh.

The ſiege of Dublin was carried on with great vigour by the marquis of Ormond, and the garriſon was now reduced to great diſtreſs. Cromwell knew the importance of ſaving the capital, and ſent over immediately three thouſand of his beſt troops, who landed under the favour of a ſquadron commanded by Sir George Aſkew, juſt at a time when Jones was going to capitulate. This reinforcement, together with a large quantity of proviſions and ſtores landed at the ſame time, animated with new vigour the parliamentary garriſon. They made a furious ſally upon the royaliſts, drove them from their trenches, and obliged them to retreat over the river with great precipitation. Ormond now fortified his camp, and reſolved to wait the arrival of ſome reinforcements he every day expected.

But the fortune of Cromwell bore down all oppoſition. Being inveſted with the ſole command, both civil and military, in Ireland, the very magic of his name brought thouſands of ſoldiers to his ſtandard; ſo that in a few days after his coming to his camp, he found himſelf at the head of a large army of veterans, from whoſe courage and experience he promiſed himſelf a plentiful harveſt of glory. His military cheſt was well furniſhed with money, his ſoldiers with arms, and his camp with artillery, ſtores and proviſions; while the confidence of the ſoldiers in the abilities and intrepidity of their general, rendered them almoſt invincible.

Cromwell's ſituation was now very different from what it had been before. He was at the head of a great and independent army, and entering upon a boundleſs career of conqueſt; while Fairfax, who was above him in commiſſion, was little better than the cypher of a general. and hardly preſerved the reſpect due to his great rank and ſervices. Nor did the policy of Cromwell terminate here; he left the minds of the principal officers full of diſcontents againſt both the parliament and council of ſtate, with regard to their impracticable ſchemes of government, and wild notions relative to their own importance in the ſtate.

Having received his commiſſion for three years, while that of the council of ſtate was only for one, he thought himſelf in no danger of ſeeing any formidable combination formed againſt him between the civil and military powers, the only thing he had to dread. He therefore embarked his forces at Milford-haven; but, for want of a ſufficient number of tranſports, he was obliged to leave three regiments behind him. He landed at Dublin, after a ſhort paſſage, at the head of fifteen thouſand men, and immediately diſpatched a letter to England for a reinforcement. This was a caution very unuſual with Cromwell, and ſeems to prove that he entertained not the beſt opinion of the parliament.

Ormond had made Sir Arthur Aſton, who formerly commanded at Reading, governor of Drogheda, one of the ſtrongeſt places in Ireland, and garriſoned the place with the flower of his troops, hoping it would be able to hold out for a month at leaſt; during which he propoſed to march his army from the neighbourhood of Dublin, in order to recruit his forces. But before Ormond could aſſemble his different diviſions, Drogheda was inveſted with an army of twelve thouſand men. Cromwell knew that the royaliſts depended chiefly on the defence of this place, and therefore exerted all his power to take it. The garriſon made a very obſtinate defence, but the town was at laſt taken by ſtorm; and every one that appeared in arms put to the ſword. This ſucceſs was chiefly owing to the perſonal courage of Cromwell, who perceiving his men diſheartened by the gallant reſiſtance of the garriſon, and the death of colonel Caſtle, one of their beſt officers, repaired to the breach, and led his troops to the attack with ſo much fury, that the Iriſh were ſeized with a panic, and acted with a deſpondency that would have diſhonoured women; they made no farther reſiſtance, but tamely ſuffered themſelves to be put to death by the ſwords of the Engliſh, who conſidered it as impiety to ſuffer any of them to live. The whole war, indeed, was carried on with a cruelty which reflects eternal diſgrace on the victors: the Iriſh were treated with infernal barbarity; no quarter was given them, either by ſea or land; and they were generally excepted out of all capitulations and treaties.

The loſs of Drogheda ſo intimidated the royaliſts, that they abandoned Trym and Dundalk. Tenalis was taken by ſtorm; Wicklow ſubmitted; and Cromwell marched his army into Munſter, where he met with very little oppoſition. The dreadful execution at Drogheda ſtruck all his oppoſers with deſpair. Lord Inchiquin's officers and ſoldiers deſerted in great numbers; and the city of Cork was baſely ſurrendered by the governor, when Cromwell was in no condition to have undertaken the ſiege.

But notwithſtanding Cromwell's ſucceſs, a very ſtrong ferment was excited againſt his principles in the Engliſh parliament. Fortunately for him, the marquis of Ormond, by forming a kind of coalition with the Iriſh papiſts, and taking many of them into his ſervice, rendered the royal cauſe in Ireland unpopular, even among the Engliſh preſbyterians, and tended to increaſe the importance of Cromwell's ſucceſs. They, however, took advantage of his abſence, to paſs ſome votes in parliament for moderating the exceſſive ſeverities propoſed againſt the delinquents. The army remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt theſe proceedings, but in vain; even their threats were diſregarded.

The loyaliſts ſtill continued under the infatuation, that they ſhould yet be able to reſtore the king to his rights, and place him on the throne of his anceſtors. They were even weak enough to imagine, that the ſpirit of levelling, which ſtill continued in the army, might be uſeful to their cauſe; and accordingly diſperſed themſelves in different parts of the nation, joined the levellers, and ſpirited them up againſt the government. The effects of this prepoſterous conduct were ſome childiſh inſurrections, in which ſeveral of them periſhed for a cauſe they, in their hearts, deteſted.

Colonel Pride, who had been remarkably active in all the mad, fanatical actions of the times, now became became the head of a party, who inſiſted, that to put any man to death for theft only, was abſolutely murder. This ridiculous opinion was carried to ſuch a height, that they preſented petitions to the council of ſtate againſt all executions of that kind; and ſuch regard was paid to their interceſſions, that the lord mayor and his independent brethren were empowered to change the ſentence of death into that of baniſhment, and many felons were accordingly ſent to the American colonies. Notwithſtanding theſe eccentric proceedings, the reins of government were, in the main, held with ſo ſteady a hand, that no convulſions ſhook the public tranquillity.

The Scots, from a retroſpective view of the diſtractions that had prevailed in England ſince the captivity of the king, were very deſirous of being again governed by a prince deſcended from their ancient kings. The demerits of the firſt Charles were almoſt forgotten, and his ſon had done nothing to induce them to believe he inherited his father's inflexibility with regard to religion. Even the marquis of Argyle, and his violent covenanters, were not averſe to monarchical government, provided their king embraced their tenets of religion. Argyle well knew that the reſtoration of Charles was incompatible with the engagements he had entered into with Cromwell, on whom he chiefly depended for protection againſt the ſeveral factions formed in his country: but he hoped, that if Charles was reſtored, he would be nothing better than the ſhadow of a king, a mere name without authority; or that ſome incident might happen to prevent his landing in Scotland, notwithſtanding the preſſing invitations he had received from the inhabitants of that kingdom. The ſpies maintained by Cromwell at the court of Charles, informed him thoroughly of the ſtate of parties formed among the king's friends; and that he wiſhed rather to be reſtored by Montroſe, and the epiſcopal royaliſts, than by either the preſbyterian or independent party.

Convinced that Ireland could now afford him no aſſiſtance, Charles turned his whole thoughts towards Scotland, as the only part of his dominions where he could hope to be protected. The terms offered by the rigid covenanters were, indeed, highly diſagreeable; but he thought proper to open a conference with Winram, who had been ſent from Scotland to Jerſey with the following propoſitions: 1. "That the king ſhould ſign the covenant, and paſs an act for giving liberty to all that pleaſed to ſign it, and for ratifying all that had been done in Scotland on that ſubject. 2. That he ſhould give the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts which had been ratified in the two laſt ſeſſions of the Scottiſh parliament; and that the kings of Scotland ſhould, for the future, have no negative voice in that aſſembly. 3. That he ſhould recall his commiſſions given to Montroſe, for raiſing forces to be ſent into Scotland, and put a final ſtop to his proceedings. 4. That he ſhould put away all papiſts from about his perſon, and let known proteſtants only have ſeats in his council. 5. That ſome place, either in or near Holland, ſhould be appointed to treat with commiſſioners from the ſtates of Scotland, who would be ſent thither, where every thing ſhould be provided neceſſary for him and his train to reſide in a legal manner. 6. That a ſpeedy anſwer ſhould be given to theſe deſires."

Theſe offers were the mildeſt ever ſent by the Scottiſh government: they were afterwards loaded with many odious particulars with regard to the beſt friends of the royal family in both kingdoms, and with many intolerable particulars with regard to the perſon of Charles himſelf. In matters of religion, the young king was the very reverſe of his father. He conſidered the different forms of worſhip and church-government among chriſtians, as ſo many different faſhions of the ſame cloak. He was, indeed, fondeſt of epiſcopacy, but merely becauſe he thought it better adapted to monarchy. His education had not greatly contributed to fix his principles with regard to any one ſect. During his infancy, he had been chiefly inſtructed by the perſons about the queen, who treated the church of England with more contempt than even preſbytery itſelf. They ridiculed, in private, the moſt celebrated divines of the Engliſh court; while the pomp of their own worſhip, and the irregularity of their lives, implanted prejudices in the mind of Charles which were never obliterated, though they ſeldom carried him farther than to prefer the form of worſhip practiſed in the Roman to that uſed in the Engliſh church. But though he was not ſtrongly prejudiced againſt any religion, yet every thing contributed to give him the greateſt averſion to the covenant. He, however, determined to receive the Scottiſh commiſſioners, and the city of Breda was appointed for that purpoſe.

A. D. 1650. During this interval, Montroſe haſtened his preparations for landing in Scotland, and determined to exert all his power to place the king on the throne of his anceſtors, without his ſigning any conditions. He had been encouraged by great promiſes of aſſiſtance from the courts of Denmark and Sweden, where many excellent Scotch officers, well affected to the king, had ſerved with great reputation; but his impatience and loyalty would not ſuffer him to remain any longer inactive; and he landed, in the beginning of April, in the northern parts of Scotland, accompanied by a ſmall number of German ſoldiers. He had flattered himſelf with being joined by many of his countrymen, but he was diſappointed; no forces appeared to join his ſtandard, and he was ſoon after ſurpriſed and taken priſoner by his countrymen. The fanatical Scots looked upon this great man only in the light of an impious, excommunicated perſon, who was a rebel to the covenant. He ſuffered the moſt horrid indignities, and was condemned to be hanged. The ſentence ran, that his head ſhould be nailed to the door of the priſon, his legs and arms fixed up in the four principal towns of the kingdom, and his body interred with malefactors, unleſs his repentance induced the Scottiſh divines to take off the excommunication. "I am more proud," ſaid he, to the preſbyterian miniſters, "to have my head nailed to the place mentioned in the ſentence, than I ſhould be to have my picture hung up in the king's chamber. Far from being diſturbed at having my legs and my arms ſent to the four principal towns in the kingdom, I wiſh I had limbs enough to diſperſe through all the towns in Chriſtendom, in teſtimony of the cauſe for which I am condemned." In the evening, he put theſe ſentiments into verſe; and died as he had lived, like a hero. He was in the flower of his age when the jaws of fanaticiſm ſnatched him from his king and his country.

During theſe tranſactions in Scotland, the conferences were opened at Breda. Charles diſputed every propoſition offered by the Scottiſh commiſſioners, till he was informed of the defeat and death of Montroſe, when he no longer made any oppoſition, but agreed at once to all their demands. The treaty being thus concluded, Charles embarked on board a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips, and purſued his voyage towards Scotland. Before they reached their intended port, the Scottiſh commiſſioners produced freſh articles, by which they inſiſted on ſtill greater ſacrifices than any Charles had hitherto made. This gave Charles ſo much uneaſineſs, that he threatened to land in Denmark, rather than make ſuch degrading ſubmiſſions. His wiſeſt counſellors were, however, of a different opinion; and Charles, fearing he might be intercepted by ſome of the parliament's ſhips, purſued his courſe, and landed ſafely in an obſcure part of Scotland.

The king was immediately given to underſtand that he muſt expect no aſſiſtance in that kingdom unleſs he ſigned the covenant, and diſmiſſed from his preſence all perſons who were obnoxious to their parliament. Charles was obliged to comply. The Scotch covenanting royaliſts retired from the ſtorm.

Some of the Engliſh fled back to the continent; and others were lodged in houſes of the king's friends, but at a diſtance from his perſon. Buckingham alone, for whom the king entertained the ſincereſt friendſhip, was ſuffered to be with him. Notwithſtanding theſe precautions, the people in general ſhewed a ſurprizing alacrity for his ſervice; they flocked to his ſtandards in every part of the kingdom. Argyle was careful that Charles ſhould want nothing of the reſpect or attendance that had been paid to his anceſtors, and endeavoured to give him juſt notions of his own intereſt; but, at the ſame time, ſuffered him to exerciſe no perſonal acts of power, or to have any voice in the management of public affairs.

This exterior appearance of royal honours had, however, a ſurprizing effect on the courts of Europe, as well as on the minds of all his friends both at home and abroad. Every corner of England was filled with reproaches againſt the parliament, and in ſome places inſurrections actually happened which were not ſuppreſſed without difficulty. Charles, before he left Holland, had ſigned many commiſſions for agents and officers to act for him in England, and theſe were ſo active, and their endeavours ſo imprudently bold, that the council of ſtate thought no time ſhould be loſt in recalling the general from Ireland. Cromwell had by this time ſo fully eſtabliſhed his reputation, that he very readily accepted the invitation, and having made Ireton his deputy, he returned to England. He was received by the parliament with all the honours due to his eminent ſervices, and as no time was to be loſt, the affairs of Scotland were immediately taken into conſideration. The preſbyterian party had made ſeveral attempts to open a correſpondence with their brethren in Scotland; but their meſſengers had always been intercepted by the troops quartered on the borders.

Cromwell was deſirous of heading the troops intended againſt Scotland; but Fairfax, who had ſtill great intereſt both in the army and parliament, was an obſtacle that was not eaſily removed. Cromwell was unwilling to truſt either his principles or ambition in the Scottiſh war; and he accordingly procured a vote in parliament that both himſelf and Fairfax ſhould command againſt the Scots; and that Fairfax ſhould receive a new commiſſion from the houſe for that purpoſe. In the mean time the council of ſtate received orders to prepare every thing neceſſary for the immediate march of the army. Fairfax, however, thought proper to refuſe the offer, and to reſign his commiſſion. This was, in reality, what Cromwell wanted; he had now no ſuperior in the army, and he feared no oppoſition in parliament. He, however, thought proper to publiſh a declaration in order to remove the ſcruples of the preſbyterians, who loudly exclaimed againſt the intended invaſion of Scotland. This paper declared, that though it was intended to carry the Engliſh arms into Scotland, a defenſive war only was deſigned; and that this method was taken merely to prevent an invaſion of England.

Cromwell left London on the twenty-ninth of June, and directed his march towards the borders of Scotland. He conſidered fighting and beating the Scots as nearly the ſame thing, and thought the whole difficulty conſiſted in bringing on a general engagement. But though he looked with contempt upon the forces of Scotland, he knew that it was abſolutely neceſſary to drive Charles out of that kingdom; becauſe while he reſided there in a royal capacity, his party in England continued to encreaſe, many of them having already joined him in Scotland, and others were preparing to raiſe an inſurrection in England as ſoon as his army ſhould paſs the borders.

Argyle, in the mean time continued to be extremely jealous of the royal party, who were for reſtoring the king upon his own terms. This he knew was inconſiſtent with his own ſafety, and the civil and religious liberties of his country. He endeavoured to give Charles right notions both with regard to government and his own intereſt; but the heart of the young king was already debauched, and his prejudices againſt the covenanters, had taught him to conſider them only as a company of mad enthuſiaſts. The king was indeed charmed with the politeneſs of Argyle's behaviour, his elegant manners, and inſtructive converſation; but he could not digeſt his confinement; nor did Argyle think it prudent to truſt him with the management of himſelf. But the mortifications he met with from Argyle were nothing when compared to thoſe he was obliged to ſuffer from the zealots. The general aſſembly, and afterwards the committee of eſtates together with the army, who were entirely governed by the aſſembly, publiſhed a declaration, in which they proteſted, “ That they did not eſpouſe “ any malignant quarrel or party, but fought merely “ on their former grounds or principles; that they “ diſclaimed all the ſins and guilt of the king and his “ houſe; nor would they own him or his intereſt, “ otherwiſe than with a ſubordination to God, and “ ſo far as he owned and proſecuted the cauſe of “ God, and acknowledged the ſins of his houſe, and “ of his former ways.”

This declaration wanted no comment. The king knew he was entirely at their mercy, and muſt ſubmit to every thing they propoſed. He iſſued a declaration in the very terms they required; he gave thanks for the merciful diſpenſations of providence, by which he was recovered from the ſnare of evil councils, had attained a full perſuaſion of the righteouſneſs of the covenant, and was induced to caſt both himſelf and his intereſt wholly upon God. He deſired to be deeply humbled and afflicted in ſpirit, becauſe of his father's following evil councils, oppoſing the covenant, and the work of reformation, and ſhedding the blood of God's people in every part of his dominions. He lamented the idolatry of his mother, and the toleration of it in his father's houſe: a matter of great offence, he ſaid, to all the proteſtant churches, and a great provocation to him who is a jealous God, viſiting the ſins of the fathers upon the children. He profeſſed that he would have no enemies but the enemies of the covenant; and that he deteſted all popery, ſuperſtition, prelacy, hereſy, ſchiſm and profaneneſs; and was reſolved not to tolerate, much leſs to countenance, any of them in any part of his dominions. He declared that he would neither love nor favour any who have ſo little conſcience as to follow his intereſts, in preference to the goſpel and kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt. And he expreſſed his hope, that whatever ill ſucceſs his former guilt might have drawn upon his cauſe, yet having now obtained mercy to be on God's ſide, and to acknowledge his own cauſe ſubordinate to that of God, the divine providence would crown his arms with victory.”

Having obtained this victory over the king, and placed the crown in ſubordination to the altar, the Scottiſh clergy pointed their ſpiritual inſtruments againſt the invaders of their country. They repreſented Cromwell as an incarnate devil, and his ſoldiers as ſo many monſters of blood and cruelty, who were ordered to put all the Scots to the ſword without any regard to age, condition, or ſex. This had the deſired effect. The ſouthern parts of Scotland were in an inſtant depopulated, the inhabitants flying to the northward for ſhelter and protection. Cromwell was aſtoniſhed when he paſſed the borders to find he was going to enter a deſolate wilderneſs, where it would be impoſſible to procure proviſions for his army. He was, indeed, attended by a fleet, but ſupplies from them were difficult and precarious. The only method that ſeemed to offer ſucceſs was to publiſh a declaration, that he was not come to deſolate the country, but to ſupport them in their civil and religious rights and privileges. He alſo was very careful to treat all the Scots that fell into his hands with unuſual kindneſs. But all his attempts to gain the favour of the inhabitants were in vain: they fled from him, as from a peſtilence, and he advanced towards Dunbar under infinite difficulties. For by this time a conſiderable party of Scots, had put themſelves between his fleet and army, ſo that he ſaw himſelf in danger of periſhing by famine.

The Engliſh army conſiſted of about eighteen thouſand men; and that of the Scots, which was commanded by general Leſley, of about twenty thouſand, beſides a vaſt multitude of irregulars. But Cromwell's were the beſt troops in the world, while the Scottiſh army was compoſed of men differing in their principles, aukward in their exerciſes, their arms neither well formed for offence or defence, yet full of preſumption, partly from an idea of their own valour, but chiefly from the enthuſiaſtic aſſurances of their preachers.

The Scots were poſſeſſed of Edingburgh caſtle, and their army poſted ſo advantageouſly near that city, that it could not be attacked. Cromwell ſaw this and was fearful for the event; he perceived only but a diſmal proſpect of famine; for the ſtormy weather prevented him from receiving any proviſions from his ſhips. He ſtill endeavoured by acts of humanity to the Scots who fell into hands, and by doing juſtice to his own ſoldiers, who were fond of plundering the country, to make a party among the enemy; but without ſucceſs; and their preachers began already to triumph from the pulpits, that the Engliſh army was on the point of being deſtroyed.

Finding all his attempts abortive Cromwell advanced towards the Scottiſh camp, and endeavoured, by every expedient, to provoke Leſley to a battle; but the Scotchman well knew, that though his army was much ſuperior in numbers, his forces were far inferior to the Engliſh in diſcipline and experience; and therefore carefully kept himſelf within the intrenchments of his camp. He, however, endeavoured to confirm the ſpirits of his ſoldiers by ſmall ſkirmiſhes with the enemy, and was generally ſucceſsful. His army increaſed daily both in numbers and courage. The king came to the camp, and having exerted himſelf in one of theſe rencounters, gained extremely on the affections of the ſoldiery, who were far more deſirous of ſerving under a young prince of ſpirit, than a committee of preaching gownſmen. This produced a fatal effect, they cauſed the king to leave the camp; and at the ſame time purged the army of near four thouſand malignants, whoſe zeal for the royal cauſe had led them to attend their prince, and were all of them ſoldiers of credit and experience. They ſaid they had no need of the aſſiſtance of the ungodly, their army being entirely compoſed of ſaints, who could not be conquered by the arm of fleſh.

Cromwell deſpairing of being able to bring the cautious Leſley to a battle, retired to Dunbar. Leſley followed him, and encamped on the heights of of Lammermure, which overlook that town. The Engliſh general hoped he ſhould now be able to accompliſh his purpoſe of forcing the Scots to leave the heights; but he ſoon perceived, that this was impoſſible, and that Leſley had taken poſſeſſion of all the difficult paſſes between Dunbar and Berwick. Theſe diſcoveries almoſt drove Cromwell to deſpair. His army was in the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of proviſions, and he was on the point of forming a reſolution of embarking all his foot and artillery, and of breaking through with his horſe, the different poſts poſſeſſed by the enemy in his route to Berwick. The madneſs of the Scottiſh miniſters prevented him from putting this reſolution into practice; and of loſing at once all the honours he had acquired in ſo many glorious campaigns.

The enthuſiaſtical miniſters in Scotland had been, according to their expreſſion, wreſtling day and night with the Lord in prayer, and now fancied they had obtained the victory. Revelations, they ſaid, had been made them from heaven, that the ſectarian and heretical army, together with Agag their leader, would be delivered into their hands. The ſoldiers catched the flame of enthuſiaſm, and forced their general, notwithſtanding all his remonſtrances, to deſcend into the plain, and gather the laurels of victory promiſed their miniſters by the voice of heaven. Cromwell could hardly believe his eyes when he firſt perceived the Scottiſh camp in motion, and ventured to foretel, without any revelation from above, that the Lord had delivered his enemies into his hand.

The engagement began in the morning of the third of September, and ſoon became general, but the diſpute was unequal. The Scots, though more than double the number of the Engliſh, were ſo far from ſtanding the ſhock of Cromwell's veterans, that they ſuffered themſelves to be cut to pieces, almoſt without reſiſtance. One regiment of Highlanders only made a proper reſiſtance: they were very little affected with the enthuſiaſm of their brethren, and did not rely on the miraculous interpoſition of heaven for aſſiſtance. They exerted their whole power, and for ſome time ſtopped the career of the Engliſh. But being abandoned by their friends, they were obliged to ſubmit to ſuperior force, and leave the field of battle to the enemy.

Cromwell's victory was complete; upwards of four thouſand Scots were ſlain on the field of battle, and ten thouſand taken priſoners; together with all their colours, arms, ammunition, tents and baggage. The Engliſh general purſued his advantage, and took poſſeſſion of Edinburgh and Leith; while the remnant of the Scottiſh army fled to Stirling. The approach of winter, and an intermitting fever, with which he was ſeized, prevented Cromwell from advancing farther into the kingdom.

He now boldly attacked the Scottiſh divines with their own weapons, and publiſhed ſeveral letters in which he openly defended the independent principles; and aſked them, with an air of triumph, whether the Lord had not declared againſt them? They replied, that the Lord had only hid his face for a time from Jacob; but would ſoon ariſe to vindicate the cauſe of his people. Cromwell retorted their arguments with great force, and was certainly more than a match for them in the argument. "You ſay," ſaid this artful leader, "you have not ſo learned Chriſt, as to hang the equity of your cauſe upon events. We could wiſh that blindneſs had not been upon your eyes to all thoſe marvellous diſpenſations which God hath lately wrought in England. But did not you ſolemnly appeal and pray? Did not we do ſo too? And ought not we and you to think, with fear and trembling, of the hand of the great God, in this mighty and ſtrange appearance of his, inſtead of lightly calling it an event? Were not both your and our expectations renewed from time to time, while we waited upon God, to ſee which way he would manifeſt himſelf upon our appeals? And ſhall we, after all our prayers, faſtings, tears, expectations, and ſolemn appeals, call theſe mere events? The Lord pity you. Surely we fear, becauſe it hath been a merciful and gracious deliverance to us.

"I beſeech you in the bowels of Chriſt, ſearch after the mind of the Lord in it towards you, and we ſhall help you by our prayers, that ye may find it. For yet, if we know our heart at all, our bowels do in Chriſt yearn towards the godly in Scotland."

Such were the triumphal expreſſions of this archhypocrite, over a fallen fanatical enemy. But the Scottiſh miniſters ſupported their own tenets with the ſtrongeſt perſeverance. They imputed the late defeat to the manifold provocations of the king's houſe, of which they feared he had not thoroughly repented; to the ſecret intruſion of malignants into the king's family; and to the leaving a moſt malignant and profane guard of horſe, who being ſent for to be purged, arrived only two days before the defeat, and were ſuffered to fight among the godly. To ſuch wretched evaſions were theſe miniſters reduced to ward off the blow of ridicule for their late promiſes of victory.

While Charles was at the head of an army in Scotland, land, his ſervants and ambaſſadors abroad were treated with reſpect; and all the language of foreign courts, eſpecially that of France and Spain, expreſſed their deteſtation of the Engliſh rebels and regicides. But in reality, theſe two courts neither wiſhed nor endeavoured his reſtoration. The grand duke of Muſcovy, at once more barbarous and more generous, received Colepepper as an agent from Charles, and ſupplied him with a large ſum of money. The duke of Lorrain, though he had not a foot of land he could call his own, ſupplied Charles and his family with conſiderable ſums. The prince of Orange continued to be his faithful and uſeful friend, and a few of the German princes threw their mites into his treaſury. The king of Denmark aſſiſted him to the utmoſt of his power, but his kingdom was poor, and being inſulted by the Swedes, he was obliged to live in a precarious dependence on the Dutch. Chriſtina, queen of Sweden, who cheriſhed the moſt extraordinary paſſion for every thing that was extraordinary either in war or literature, was now ſo charmed with the exploits of Cromwell, that ſhe entertained a kind of Platonic paſſion for his perſon, and recommended it to her council, and to the prince ſhe intended for her ſucceſſor, to avail themſelves of the friendſhip of England.

A. D. 1651. Blake, Deane, and Popham, ſtill continued to command the Engliſh fleet, which was now increaſed to more than double its former number; but the parliament was very uneaſy that prince Rupert and his ſquadron had found a kind reception in the harbours of Portugal. The truth is, the Portugueſe had at this time ſeveral very rich ſhips coming from the Brazils, which they were afraid might be intercepted by the fleets of the Engliſh parliament. The ſhips under the command of prince Rupert therefore promiſed to be of ſignal ſervice to the Portugueſe, and he had actually been invited thither before he left Ireland. In his paſſage, he loſt two or three of his beſt ſhips in a ſtorm; but he took a great many rich prizes, which he ſold, and generouſly remitted the money to Charles. Vane, who reſided at the court of Portugal, as agent from the Engliſh parliament, made vigorous remonſtrances on this ſubject; but they were not much regarded, and, at laſt, the court of Portugal declared itſelf a friend to Charles. Upon this the parliament ordered Blake to ſail immediately, with a ſtrong ſquadron, to the coaſt of Portugal, and demand that the fleet of prince Rupert ſhould be given up, as they were nothing better than rebels and pirates, and conſequently entitled neither to protection nor neutrality. If this was denied, Blake had inſtructions to deſtroy them wherever he could find them. On his arrival at the mouth of the river of Liſbon, he demanded the fleet of prince Rupert; but the court of Portugal was ſo far from complying, that the king declared he would ſuffer no more Engliſh ſhips to enter his ports or harbours, and Blake found himſelf in no condition to force his entrance. He was ſoon after joined by Popham; and the Portugueſe finding themſelves unable to ſupport the prince any longer, orders were ſent to him for quitting the Tagus, and he was fortunate enough to make his eſcape. Blake revenged this diſappointment on the king of Portugal, by taking twenty ſhips of his Brazil fleet; and it was not without great difficulty, and making many ſubmiſſions, that he obtained a peace with the Engliſh republic.

The dreadful defeat at Dunbar, and the ridicule thrown on the Scottiſh miniſters by Cromwell, was far from curing them of their fanatical madneſs. They had been very open in declaring, that they had taken up arms in defence of the covenant, not for the crown, and were therefore equally hated by the royaliſts and independents. Thoſe jarring diſpoſitions had fatal effects on the royal ſervice. It was now ſufficiently evident, that the covenanters neither could nor would reſtore the king; and the beſt officers he had to depend upon were royaliſts, who diſdaining the meanneſs and ſelf-ſufficiency of the Scotch preſbyterians, refuſed to ſubmit to their diſcipline. The marquis of Argyle, would he have truſted the royaliſts, might have retrieved the late defeat; but the longer he converſed with Charles, the more reaſon he ſaw to diſtruſt him, and to keep a very watchful eye over his conduct. Charles had in his converſation ſomething bewitchingly ſoft: he talked to the Scots in their own language: his addreſs was eaſy and inſinuating; his perſon beautiful, and his underſtanding far ſuperior to what Argyle expected. But the marquis was convinced that he both deſpiſed and hated the covenanters; that all he did was from convenience or neceſſity; that he was tinctured with arbitrary principles; and that the misfortunes of his family had only taught him the art of diſſimulation, in order to re-eſtabliſh his power. Argyle could not avail himſelf of the aſſiſtance of either the epiſcopal or preſbyterian royaliſts: his bloody proceedings againſt Montroſe and his friends, who acted under the king's commiſſion, had ſtruck all mankind with horror. He ſaw the conſequences of his conduct, and trembled for the event, whenever the king was intruſted with the powers of royalty. He therefore treated Charles with more condeſcenſion, and removed ſeveral particulars which had rendered him very uneaſy.

Charles was not ignorant of the cauſes that produced this relaxation, and began to exert ſome power with regard to his own affairs. His principal reſource lay in the affections of his friends: for when the revenues of the kingdom of Scotland were ſtated, they amounted to no more than ſeventeen thouſand ſix hundred and ten pounds, eighteen ſhillings and eight-pence ſterling, to defray all the charges of his court and government. This poverty was owing to the rapaciouſneſs of the Scots themſelves, who, ever ſince the acceſſion of the Stuart family to the crown of England, had been in a manner quartered on the royal revenues, and had raiſed both fortunes and families from what they had extorted from the crown. But this was no time for reſumption; and Charles, at preſent, enjoyed a decent ſtate, and had about him the proper officers of the Scottiſh court. Charles now ventured to propoſe, at the council-board, proper perſons for commiſſions in his army; and ſeveral of the counſellors, knowing the king's inclinations, reſumed courage ſufficient to ſecond him, even without applying to Argyle for leave. At laſt the royaliſts joining with the more moderate preſbyterians, Leſley was charged, in direct terms, with treachery at the battle of Dunbar, and required by the royal council aſſembled at Perth to deliver in to the board a circumſtantial account of his behaviour that day.

This coalition between the proteſtants and moderate preſbyterians rendered the conqueſt of Scotland a work of more difficulty than Cromwell before imagined, conſidering the complete victory he had obtained at Dunbar. The caſtle of Edinburgh ſtill held out. Charles was in poſſeſſion of the paſs at Stirling, and behind him lay the moſt populous and beſt affected counties in Scotland; while the country where Cromwell lay had been eaten up, and the inhabitants looked upon his men as infernal dæmons. The king's levies were going on with great ſucceſs, and there was no doubt but he would ſoon be at the head of a much ſtronger army than that which had been defeated at Dunbar. Theſe circumſtances, and the increaſing averſion of the country towards his army, gave Cromwell infinite uneaſineſs. He endeavoured to reconcile the people to his perſon, by treating them with uncommon humanity in his marches. He ſent a meſſenger to the governor of Edinburgh caſtle, inviting the preachers to take again poſſeſſion of their pulpits, provided they meddled not with the civil affairs of the kingdom in their ſermons. This invitation was rejected with diſdain; and they treated his offers with the moſt contumelious language.

In the mean time, the independent faction at Weſtminſter were extremely careful to make every ſucceſs, either of their arms or councils, a kind of teſt for diſcovering their enemies. They ordered a thankſgiving to be obſerved for the advantages gained over the Scots at Dunbar. Many of the preſbyterians refuſed to obſerve it, and were perſecuted on that account with great ſeverity; but they were unfortunate in their proſecutions; hardly a jury could be found that would bring in their verdict, guilty. Another high court of juſtice was therefore eſtabliſhed for the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdon, Cambridge, Lincoln, and the Iſle of Ely. Orders were alſo iſſued, by Cromwell's direction, for raiſing new bodies of horſe and foot in every part of the kingdom; the pay of the officers and ſoldiers, both by ſea and land, was augmented; and the greateſt induſtry and punctuality obſerved in procuring ſupplies, both for the fleet and army.

As theſe augmentations rendered it neceſſary for the parliament to increaſe the revenues of the kingdom, the contributions on the public were raiſed to one hundred thouſand pounds a month. They encouraged the importation of bullion; they impoſed a teſt, called An Engagement, upon all the people who lived under their government; by which they were obliged to ſwear fidelity to the commonwealth, as conſtituted without a king or houſe of lords. They alſo paſſed ſeveral other acts, all of them tending to encourage their friends, and terrify their enemies. The truth is, the preſbyterians had loſt the majority in the houſe. There were, however, ſtill ſeveral men of too great abilities to pay any attention to the mere forms of religion: theſe were republicans; and though they hated Cromwell, they joined the independents, becauſe they thought their principles better adapted to the eſtabliſhment of a commonwealth.

But notwithſtanding theſe acquiſitions gained by the parliament, Cromwell was ſtill in a very indifferent ſtate in Scotland. He was unable to attack Charles, whoſe army lay beyond the Forth, and who ſtill continued to keep poſſeſſion of Stirling. Cromwell's men began to be ſickly, he himſelf was in a very indifferent ſtate of health, the country round him was a deſart, and he had no opportunity of performing any remarkable action, that might revive the drooping courage of his ſoldiers. Charles and the royaliſts had now attained a great aſcendency in Scotland, and he had been crowned at Scone, with as much magnificence as the temper of the times and the impoveriſhed ſtate of the revenues would admit. The marquis of Argyle ſtill ſhewed great reſpect to his perſon, and had aſſiſted at his coronation, where the king was obliged again to take the covenant, and to liſten to many long ſpeeches and prayers from the pulpit. The duke of Hamilton was, however, now admitted to court; and both the parliament and general aſſembly declared, that in a time of ſuch imminent danger, there ſhould be no exception of perſons. This gave encouragement to the royaliſts, who now flocked from all quarters to the Engliſh ſtandard. The duke of Hamilton commanded under Charles, Leſley was lieutenant-general, Middleton major-general of the horſe, and Maſſey general of the Engliſh.

The royal army ſtill increaſing, Cromwell ordered colonel Overton to croſs the Forth, at the head of ſixteen hundred foot, and three hundred horſe: theſe were followed by major-general Lambert, and colonel Okey, with another body of fifteen hundred foot, and eight hundred horſe; while he himſelf marched towards Stirling, in order either to bring the Scots to a battle, or force them to divide their army. But when he came in ſight of the Scottiſh camp, he found it too ſtrong to be attacked, and their officers too cautious to be drawn from their poſt.

While both the main armies lay thus in ſight of each other, an engagement happened in Fiſe between the forces that had paſſed the Forth under Lambert, and a ſtrong detachment of the royaliſts, greatly to the diſadvantage of the latter, five of their regiments of foot, and the ſame number of horſe, being cut to pieces, and fifteen hundred taken priſoners. Cromwell had foreſeen great advantages from Lambert's paſſing the Forth: it was, indeed, one of the moſt maſterly actions he ever performed; for he had imperceptibly ſtrengthened Lambert's party to ſeven thouſand men, by which he not only ſecured all the paſſes on the Forth, but put himſelf between the king and the northern provinces, on which the royaliſts chiefly depended.

Charles had now no choice, but that of fighting Cromwell, or marching into England. The army of the parliament had been weakened greatly by detachments; but the mouths of the violent covenanting preachers, ſince the defeat at Fiſe, were opened againſt Charles and all his adherents, whom they accuſed of being the authors of that dreadful misfortune. Charles therefore thought proper to march into England, where he hoped to be ſtrongly ſupported by the friends to monarchy, who were ſtill very numerous.

The march of the royal army left Cromwell, as it were, maſter of Scotland, and accordingly his conqueſts in that kingdom were rapid and important. He made himſelf maſter of Perth, with all the adjacent country, and detached Lambert to hang on the rear of the king's army. But he thought the march of the royaliſts into England of too much importance to truſt the management of the war to any but himſelf; and accordingly, leaving general Monk to command in Scotland, he began his march in purſuit of the king, at the head of the main body of his army.

The beſt officers about Charles entertained very melancholy preſages of the conſequences that would probably attend this march; and, from an excellent letter wrote by the duke of Hamilton to his niece, it appears to have been conſidered as a deſperate ſtep, and that the royaliſts daily deſerted from the army. But the preſbyterian party at Weſtminſter either conſidered, or affected to conſider, this matter in a very different light. The conduct of Cromwell was blamed; he was accuſed of forcing an enemy into the bowels of England, and of having trifled away his advantages in Scotland, till it was too late to retrieve them. Cromwell paid little regard to theſe calumnies; he left his actions to ſpeak for themſelves. His abſence, however, gave ſome advantage to his enemies; and they made great intereſt to ſave Love, a preſbyterian preacher, who had for ſome time continued under ſentence of death for being engaged in the ſervice of the king. But Cromwell, who well knew that one inſtance of ſeverity would have more effect upon the preſbyterians than twenty of lenity, refuſed their requeſt, and Love was accordingly executed. This ſeverity increaſed the hatred of the preſbyterians againſt Cromwell, and ſeveral warm ſpeeches were made againſt him in parliament, for ſuffering the royal army to enter England. Ignorant of the effect theſe prepoſſeſſions might have on the parliament, Cromwell, in his letters, very freely owned, that he had ſuffered the king to march into England, from a perſuaſion, that if the parliament did their parts in defending the moſt tenable paſſes, his whole army muſt be ruined; whereas a winter campaign in Scotland might have ruined that of the parliament.

The king, who expected great reinforcements on his entering England, found himſelf greatly diſappointed. Terrified at ſo dangerous an enterprize, the Scots loſt their uſual courage, and deſerted in great numbers; while the Engliſh preſbyterians, having received no intelligence of the king's approach, were not prepared to join him. This meaſure was full as unexpected to the royaliſts; nor were they very deſirous of joining the royal ſtandard, as the Scottiſh miniſters, even in this deſperate extremity, had iſſued orders not to admit any who refuſed to take the covenant. The earl of Derby had exerted all his intereſt to raiſe troops for the king's ſervice; but before he was in a condition to march, his recruits were diſperſed by a party of the parliamentary forces; ſo that when Charles reached Worceſter, he found his army was not more numerous than when he began his march for England.

Cromwell followed the king with the utmoſt expedition; and being joined by the militia of the different counties through which he paſſed, he inveſted Worceſter with an army of forty thouſand men. On the third of September, he attacked the royaliſts, and the engagement ſoon became general, and very bloody. Charles led on his men in perſon, with an intrepidity which amazed even Cromwell himſelf; while the Scottiſh infantry behaved ſo gallantly, that they obliterated the mean opinion that uſurper had always entertained of their courage. By this time Cromwell had brought up ſome field-pieces, to make good the paſſes he had gained; but theſe were attacked with ſo much impetuoſity by the duke of Hamilton's regiment, that the artillery was, for ſome time, in the power of the royaliſts. Charles endeavoured to improve this advantage, and charged, at the head of ſome of his battalions, with ſo much ſpirit, that Cromwell was obliged to bring up his veterans, whom he had hitherto ſpared. The diſpute was now no longer equal; for Leſley, the Scottiſh general, remained in the city with his horſe, as if they had been unconcerned ſpectators of the engagement. The parliamentary army now made a general attack on all the poſts of the royaliſts, and were every where ſucceſsful. The brave duke of Hamilton was mortally wounded. General Maſſey was alſo wounded, and taken priſoner. Charles, however, ſtill made a noble defence: he had two horſes killed under him, but he was always foremoſt in every poſt of danger. Had Leſley done his duty, Cromwell muſt have purchaſed his victory very dear; but he continued totally inactive, notwithſtanding the dreadful carnage of his countrymen. The king made another effort to lead his broken troops to the charge; but neither his actions, his words, nor his preſence, could prevail. The tide of victory became irreſiſtible; and Cromwell entered Worceſter ſword in hand; nor could Charles prevail on the Scottiſh cavalry, who were ſtill unbroken, to make one attempt to retrieve the fortune of the day. The king muſt now have fallen into the enemy's hand, had not the brave colonel Drummond, and a few battalions of foot, ſtopped the victors at Sudbury-gate, while Charles made his eſcape through the gate of St. Martin's in the duſk of the evening. He was attended by the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Shrewſbury, Cleveland and Derby, and about ſixty horſe. This defeat was fatal to the Scottiſh army, the greater number being either killed or taken priſoners; and many of the parties that eſcaped were put to death by the country people.

Diſtreſs is a powerful advocate for fallen majeſty; and the loſs which Charles ſuſtained by this total defeat was amply compenſated by the pity, the love, the eſteem, and the tenderneſs which now touched the hearts of the people. The Engliſh ſeemed to be aſhamed of their own triumphs; and ſome who had been remarkably forward in oppoſing his progreſs, were now the firſt in commiſerating his misfortunes. His unmerited ſufferings, his courage, his conſtancy, were the general topics of diſcourſe; while his eſcapes from the unremitted vigilance of his inveterate enemies, were conſidered as ſo many miraculous indications that he was deſtined to ſway the ſceptre of England.

It could not be expected that Charles, attended by ſo many of his friends, could ever eſcape from his purſuers; and it was therefore thought prudent that the king ſhould ſeek for that protection alone which was deſpaired of with his companions. On their arrival at Kidderminſter, the king, purſuant to the advice of the earl of Derby, retired to Boſcobel, a lone houſe on the borders of Staffordſhire, inhabited by one Penderell, a farmer. This man was an unſhaken friend to the royal party; and though death was denounced againſt all who concealed the king, and a large reward promiſed to any who ſhould betray him, Penderell preſerved an incorruptible integrity. He had, indeed, a dignity of ſentiment far ſuperior to his condition; and was more pleaſed with having it in his power to conceal his royal maſter, than to have enjoyed all the advantages Cromwell was able to beſtow. He had four brothers equally loyal with himſelf, and theſe all joined in aſſiſting their diſtreſſed ſovereign. The king was cloathed in the dreſs of a peaſant, and carried into the woods with a bill in his hand, where they pretended to be employed in making faggots. Colonel Careleſs only, of all his attendants, was now his companion, except the five faithful Penderells. He ſometimes lay on ſtraw in the houſe, and ſometimes in the fields. But even this manner of life was expoſed to the utmoſt danger. Two ſtrangers continuing ſome time at Boſcobel, could not be concealed from the ſervants, and parties of the parliament's army were diſperſed all over the neighbourhood, in ſearch of his majeſty. It was therefore thought prudent that the king and Careleſs ſhould continue conſtantly in the woods; and, for the better ſecurity, they mounted upon a large oak, the leaves and branches of which ſheltered them from the ſight of the enemy. While they continued in this retreat, they ſaw ſeveral ſoldiers paſs by in ſearch of the king; and ſome of them expreſſed, in their hearing, their earneſt deſire of ſeizing him. This tree was, for many years after, held in great veneration; and, for having concealed his majeſty from the ſight of his enemies, was called, The Royal Oak.

But notwithſtanding all their precautions, it was found impoſſible to conceal the king any longer at Boſcobel; and it was propoſed by lord Wilmot, who had now joined him, to repair to the houſe of Mr. Whitegrave, a catholic gentleman, who lived at ſome diſtance from Boſcobel, and where lord Wilmot had, before he joined his royal maſter, been concealed. They accordingly paſſed thither with the five Penderells, and met with a very kind reception. During the whole time, the parliament's officers were very aſſiduous in their inquiries after all ſtrangers that were lately arrived in theſe parts; and, perhaps, all the fidelity of his friends would not have been ſufficient to have ſaved him, had not the houſes, whither he retired, generally belonged to Roman catholics, and contained ſeveral ſecret hiding-places in the walls and wainſcot, where they concealed their perſecuted prieſts, when their houſes were ſearched by the officers of juſtice.

Colonel Lane, a zealous loyaliſt, who reſided at Bentley, not many miles diſtant from Whitegrave's houſe, was now made acquainted with the king's diſtreſs, and the neceſſary precautions were taken for carrying him thither. But his majeſty's feet were ſo hurt by walking about in heavy boots, or countrymen's ſhoes, which did not fit him, that he was forced to mount on horſeback; and in this manner he travelled to Bentley, ſtill attended by the five Penderells, his faithful companions. After ſome conſultation, it was reſolved that the king ſhould repair to Briſtol, where it was hoped a ſhip might be found to carry him over to the continent: and, in order to prevent any diſcovery being made during the journey, it was propoſed to make uſe of a paſs that had been procured for Mrs. Jane Lane, the colonel's ſiſter, for herſelf and ſervant to viſit Mrs. Norton, a near relation, who lived within three miles of Briſtol. Charles was accordingly dreſſed in the habit of a ſervant, and rode before the lady, lord Wilmot, with a hawk on his hand, paſſing for a ſtranger who had joined them by accident.

Nothing remarkable happened during their journey; but on their arrival at Norton's houſe, Mrs. Lane pretended that her ſervant had been taken ill on the road, and deſired that he might have a private room, where he might be quiet. In this chamber Charles kept himſelf concealed; but he was known by one Pope, the butler, at his firſt entering the houſe. He, however, prudently concealed the diſcovery, but took the firſt opportunity of throwing himſelf on his knees before the king, and praying for his life and preſervation. Charles was greatly alarmed at this incident, but made the butler promiſe that he would keep the ſecret inviolably, and he ſcrupulouſly performed the engagement.

After continuing ſome days at Norton's houſe, they were informed that no ſhip was expected to ſail from Briſtol either to France or Spain in leſs than a month. This rendered their ſcheme abortive; and it was agreed that the king ſhould intruſt his perſon to colonel Windham of Dorſetſhire, a gentleman who had always been a zealous partizan of the royal family. Before he received the king, Windham aſked leave to intruſt the ſecret to his mother, his wife, and four ſervants, on whoſe fidelity he could depend; and not one of them proved wanting either in honour or diſcretion. Here the king continued nineteen days, and all his friends in every part of Europe were held in the moſt anxious ſuſpence with regard to his ſafety. It was indeed generally imagined that he was dead, and this notion prevailing ſtrongly among his enemies, operated greatly in his favour, by relaxing their diligence. After leaving Windham's houſe he repaired to Charmouth, where he was in the utmoſt danger of being diſcovered by the ſagacity of a blackſmith, who declared that the horſe on which his majeſty rode had been ſhod in the north, and not, as he pretended, in the weſt of England. This intelligence of the ſmith rendered it neceſſary for Charles to leave the place immediately, and he was fortunate enough to reach Windham's houſe, before the neighbourhood was informed of the diſcovery.

It was now determined that he ſhould paſs into Suſſex, where it was hoped a veſſel might be found to carry him over to the continent. He accordingly went to Hale near Saliſbury, and thence to Brighthelmſtone, where he continued till a ſhip could be provided for his paſſage. This was at laſt accompliſhed, and on the fifteenth of October he embarked in a ſmall veſſel at Shoreham, and was landed at Feſchamp, in Normandy, after having been concealed no leſs than two and forty days in England. His eſcape was truly wonderful, ſome of the royaliſts have termed it miraculous. But the moſt extraordinary part of the whole is, the inviolable attachment which all, who either diſcovered him, or to whom he diſcovered himſelf, expreſſed for his perſon. Tho' no leſs than forty perſons of both ſexes were intruſted with the ſecret, and though every method was uſed by Cromwell for diſcovering where he was concealed, yet not one of them ever wavered in their affection, though their vanity ſometimes got ſo much the better of their loyalty, that all his party in the neighbourhood knew the houſe where he was ſheltered.

The ſucceſs of Monk in Scotland completed the deſtruction of the royal party, and rendered the triumph of the parliament complete. He took the ſtrong caſtle of Stirling, where he found forty pieces of cannon, five thouſand ſtands of arms, the regalia and records of Scotland, and other rich booty. He afterwards ſurprized and made priſoners the earls of Leven and Crawford, with the principal nobility and gentry, whom he either knew or ſuppoſed to be enemies to the Engliſh parliament. He ſtormed Dundee, and put the governor and garriſon to the ſword. The plunder of this town was very conſiderable, Whitlock ſays the common ſoldiers had five hundred pounds to their ſhare; fifty ſail of ſhips were taken in the harbour, and thirty pieces of ordnance in the town. All the Lowlands of Scotland now ſubmitted; but the Highlands, where the braveſt and moſt warlike part of the inhabitants reſided, ſtill ſupported themſelves under two rival chiefs, the marquis of Huntley and Argyle.

This ſucceſs in Scotland added to the victory Cromwell had gained at Worceſter, rendered him abſolutely maſter of the kingdom. He called the deſtruction of the royal army at Worceſter, his "crowning mercy;" and was ſo elated with his ſucceſs in that deciſive battle, that he intended to have conferred the honour of knighthood on two of his generals, Lambert and Fleetwood, in the field: and it was not without great difficulty that his friends diſſuaded him from exerciſing that act of legal authority. His power and ambition were both too great to brook ſubmiſſion to the empty name of a republic, which ſubſiſted merely by his influence, and was ſupported by his victories. According to Whitlock, he now communicated to his moſt intimate friends the views he had formed on the crown itſelf; and expreſſed a deſire of aſſuming the regal power, which he had ſo long and ſo effectually laboured to aboliſh. He well knew that the members in parliament, who at preſent governed the nation, were deſpiſed by the people, and their views too much confined to qualify them for legiſlators. Their whole attention was engroſſed by ſelfiſh aims and fanatical bigotry. Their rigid auſterity was carried to the greateſt height; and they had hardly made any progreſs in the important work of fixing a new plan of government, and ſettling a juſter model of repreſentation.

All theſe particulars were favourable to Cromwell's ſcheme of power; the army was at his devotion, and he had no competitor in authority. The only perſon that ſeemed capable of making any oppoſition to his ambitious ſcheme was Ireton, who commanded the troops in Ireland, but he ſoon after died of the plague, and left Cromwell at full liberty to proſecute the plan he had formed. Ireton was famous for his vigilance, induſtry, capacity, and even for the ſtrict execution of juſtice in that unlimited command he poſſeſſed in Ireland. He was obſerved to be inflexible in all his purpoſes; and it was believed by many, that he was animated with a ſincere and paſſionate love of liberty, and could never have been induced, by any motive whatever, to ſubmit to the ſmalleſt appearance of regal government.

A. D. 1652. No farther oppoſition being apprehended either in England, Scotland, or Ireland, the parliament turned their thoughts towards the affairs of the continent; and the Dutch were the firſt who felt the vigour of their arms. The ſtates had obſerved an exact neutrality with regard to the civil wars of England, during the life of Frederic Henry, prince of Orange; but after his death, when his ſon William, who married an Engliſh princeſs, ſucceeded him in power, they were accuſed of betraying an inveterate prejudice againſt the Engliſh parliament, and of aſſiſting the royal party. After the death of William, which was attended with the depreſſion of his party, it was hoped that a kind of a coalition might be effected between the two republics, and St. John, lord chief-juſtice, was ſent to the Hague for that purpoſe. But he ſoon perceived that the ſtates entertained a contemptible idea of a government whoſe meaſures were ſo obnoxious to the people. They offered indeed to renew the former alliances with England, but refuſed any nearer connection. Diſguſted with this refuſal, and incenſed at many affronts offered him with impunity, the haughty St. John returned to England, and exerted all his intereſt to excite a war between the two republics.

St. John, who had a great aſcendency over Cromwell, ſoon accompliſhed his deſigns. He repreſented to the parliament, that the Dutch ſought nothing ſo much, as to diſpute with England the government of the ſeas; that in all their papers they mentioned Charles II. which was a tacit recognition of his authority; that in all their profeſſions they were inſincere, and that it was neceſſary for the Engliſh to depreſs thoſe, whoſe friendſhip they could not gain. Theſe repreſentations had the deſired effect, and under pretence of providing for the intereſt of commerce, the parliament embraced ſuch meaſures as they knew would ſufficiently diſguſt the ſtates. They formed the famous act of navigation; which prohibited all nations from importing into England in their own bottoms, any commodity not the growth and manufacture of their own country. Though the terms in which this ſtatute was conceived were general, yet the Dutch were principally injured; becauſe their country produced few commodities, and they ſubſiſted chiefly on being the general factors and carriers of the world. Several merchants complaining of injuries they pretended to have received, obtained letters of reprizal againſt the ſtates; and about eighty of their merchant ſhips were taken. About thirty years before the Dutch had practiſed the moſt horrid cruelties on the Engliſh merchants in Amboyna; theſe were now complained of, and even ſatisfaction demanded.

Alarmed at theſe proceedings which indicated an approaching rupture, the ſtates ſent ambaſſadors to London in order to renew, if poſſible, the treaty of alliance that had been broken off by the abrupt departure of St. John. They repreſented that famous republican as a perſon whom it was impoſſible to pleaſe; and that they either granted, or were willing to grant every thing that he aſked. But the parliament believed St. John rather than the Dutch, and all the preparations for an approaching war were made with great vigour and alacrity.

Soon after an Engliſh man of war falling in with a fleet of Dutch fiſhermen, demanded the uſual acknowledgement. This being refuſed the captain ſunk one of the Dutch veſſels with all her crew. All negotiations were now ſuſpended. The Dutch following the example of the Engliſh in iſſuing letters of reprizal, and in a few days appeared before Portſmouth with a fleet of forty-five ſail. The Engliſh marine was not immediately in a condition to reſent this inſult, but their motions were watched by commodore Brown till Blake's ſquadron was in a condition of meeting them on the open ſea. This required no great length of time; ſuch diſpatch was uſed in the different departments, that in leſs than ſix weeks Blake was ſailed with a conſiderable fleet. About the middle of May, he diſcovered the Dutch ſquadron commanded by their celebrated admiral Van Tromp, and immediately made a ſignal for his paying reſpect to the Engliſh flag. The ſignal being diſregarded, Blake, though his ſquadron conſiſted only of twenty-ſix ſhips, formed the line of battle, and advanced towards the enemy. Before he came within gun ſhot he was joined by eight ſhips, and ſoon after the action began with great fury, and laſted till night put an end to the battle. Blake's ſhip being conſiderably a-head of the reſt, was expoſed, for ſome time, to the whole fire of the enemy, but his other ſhips coming up the attention of the Dutch was divided. One of the Dutch ſhips was taken, and another ſunk by the Engliſh, who loſt only fifteen men in the engagement. The next morning the Dutch fleet was perceived at four leagues diſtance, ſteering towards the coaſt of France. The truth is, neither of the admirals were deſirous of renewing the engagement, as they had received no orders to fight but in caſe of neceſſity.

The Dutch pretended that Van Tromp had exceeded his commiſſion, and that he had been forced upon the Engliſh coaſt by ſtreſs of weather. But the Engliſh parliament affected to diſbelieve their moſt ſolemn aſſurances, and voted a letter of thanks to Blake for his behaviour. Cromwell himſelf repaired to Dover to encourage Blake and the ſeamen to do their duty, and to aſſure them that they ſhould want for nothing.

The Dutch ſoon perceived they had been miſtaken in the notions they had formed with regard to the Engliſh commonwealth; and Paw, their ambaſſador extraordinary at London, received orders to exert all his power, for putting a ſtop to hoſtilities; but all his endeavours were in vain. The parliament indeed behaved with politeneſs both towards Paw and his maſters; but at the ſame time redoubled their applications to increaſe the power of their navy. Sir George Aſcue received a commiſſion independent of that of Blake, and ſoon after deſtroyed about thirty ſail of the St. Ube's fleet; while Blake, in leſs than a month ſent upwards of forty ſail of rich prizes into the Thames. He now ſtood to the northward, in order to aſſert the right of his country to the Britiſh fiſhery. This ſervice he nobly performed; he took their whole convoy of twelve men of war, one only excepted that was fortunate enough to eſcape. He might alſo have deſtroyed all their fiſhing veſſels, but ſuffered them to continue their occupation on their promiſing never to return to the Engliſh coaſt without leave, and on their paying the tenth herring.

This expedition of Blake, though attended with the greateſt ſucceſs, had nearly proved fatal to the ſquadron of Sir George Aſcue, who was left in the Downs. For Van Tromp, whoſe fleet was far ſuperior to that of Aſcue, was then at ſea, and attempted to take advantage of Blake's abſence. He ſtood accordingly towards the Engliſh coaſts, but was overtaken by ſo dreadful a ſtorm, that he was obliged to return to Holland to repair the damages his ſhips had received. His fleet was now increaſed to one hundred and fifty ſail, and his appearance was ſo formidable, that it was thought neceſſary to erect a platform and mount it with cannon, between Deal and Sandown-caſtle, and to line the ſhore with militia. Aſcue lay as near as poſſible to the ſtrand, but his whole ſquadron, which conſiſted only of fifteen ſhips, muſt have been deſtroyed had not the wind immediately changed, and prevented the Dutch from reaching the Engliſh ſhore; and the Dutch merchant ſhips being impatient for a convoy to the northward, Van Tromp took them under his protection, hoping he ſhould be fortunate enough to meet with Blake in the north ſea. He was, however, diſappointed, but greatly diſtreſſed the Engliſh trade to Newcaſtle, while Blake took two of the Dutch Eaſt-India ſhips. The weather proving extremely tempeſtuous, Tromp found it impoſſible to keep the ſea, and accordingly returned once more to Holland with no more than forty ſhips, ſome being loſt, and the remainder not arriving in the Texel till ſome weeks after.

In the mean time Aſcue ſent ſome of his ſhips to convoy home a rich Eaſt India fleet, while he himſelf cruiſed between Dover and Calais, where he took ten Flemiſh ſhips, and forced twenty to run a-ſhore. The famous de Ruyter was now appointed to command a ſquadron of about fifty Dutch men of war, and ſent to convoy home a large fleet of merchantmen. Aſcue, whoſe ſquadron amounted only to thirty-eight ſhips, fell in with this convoy on the ſixteenth of Auguſt; and though his force was ſo far unequal, he attacked de Ruyter, and deſtroyed ſeveral of the Dutch ſhips: but ſome of his captains not ſeconding the attack of their leaders, he was obliged to abandon the enterprize, after the fight had continued with the utmoſt fury near four hours. Captain Peck, who acted as rear-admiral was mortally wounded, and moſt of the ſhips that charged the enemy were greatly ſhattered. Aſcue, however, renewed the attack in the morning, but with no better ſucceſs. He made another attempt on the third day, but his ſhips were now ſo ſhattered in their rigging that he was again obliged to deſiſt, and return to Plymouth to refit, and the Dutch continued their courſe to Holland.

The jealouſy which always attends a true republican ſpirit appeared eminently on this ocaſion. Aſcue had done the public more eminent ſervices at ſea, than even Blake himſelf had hitherto performed; but he had acted as a true Englihman; and when he reduced Barbadoes under the government of the commonwealth, he granted ſuch advantageous terms to lord Willoughby, colonel Waldrone, and other royaliſts in that iſland, that the council of ſtate ſuſpected his principles. And notwithſtanding his eminent ſervices, he was now laid aſide. He was, however, preſented with three hundred pounds in money, and three hundred pounds a year landed eſtate in Ireland.

The Engliſh parliament, though they parted with this able officer, were not ignorant that the Dutch were ſolliciting all the princes in Europe to join them againſt the Engliſh. At the ſame time, they knew the Dutch had above an hundred ſail of ſhips ready for the ſea, and reaſon to think the French would ſoon aſſiſt them; yet the imperious parliament would hearken to no reaſons for putting an end to hoſtilities. Elated with the numerous ſucceſſes they had obtained over their domeſtic enemies, they were perſuaded that nothing could ſtand before their victorious arms. Blake, who was now returned from the north, carried his fleet into different harbours to refit; and as ſoon as every thing could be got ready, he was ordered to put to ſea, and take or deſtroy all the Dutch or French veſſels he met with in his cruize.

The whole naval power of the Dutch was now at ſea, under the command of de Wit and de Ruyter, and Blake did all in his power to bring them to a deciſive engagement. But the Dutch admirals having a rich fleet of merchantmen under their convoy, avoided a battle, which they knew muſt be fatal to ſome of their ſhips. They had, however, no ſooner ſecured their convoy, than they ſtood towards the Engliſh, drawn up in a line of battle. Blake, though his fleet was greatly inferior in number to that of the enemy, advanced to engage them. He divided his ſhips into three ſquadrons; the firſt commanded by himſelf, in the Sovereign, the largeſt ſhip in the Engliſh navy; the ſecond by Penn, and the third by Bourn. He began the battle himſelf; but there being a ſand-bank between the two fleets, the Sovereign, the Reſolution, and the St. Andrew, all firſt rates, ſtruck upon the ſhoal. Perſuaded that theſe three ſhips were now rendered unſerviceable, the Dutch admirals ſtood farther off to ſea, in order to bring on a cloſer engagement. The three ſhips got off the ſand with very little damage, and a furious battle enſued. The largeſt ſhip in the Dutch fleet, followed by two more, bore down upon the Sovereign, on board of which Blake's flag was hoiſted, and attacked her with the utmoſt fury. But they had ſoon cauſe to repent of their temerity. The firſt broadſide of the Sovereign ſent the headmoſt ſhip to the bottom; and the others, intimidated by the dreadful incident, retreated back to their fleet. Night at laſt put an end to the engagement, but not before the Dutch rear-admiral was taken. De Wit took the advantage of the night to bear away from the Engliſh, whoſe ſhips were ſo ſhattered in their rigging, that they could not follow him.

The ſame ſucceſs did not attend the Engliſh in the Mediterranean, where commodore Badily was ſtationed, with a ſmall ſquadron, to protect the Engliſh trade. Van Galen, the Dutch admiral, who was much ſuperior in force, defeated him; but he purchaſed the victory with the loſs of his life. Badily retired under the cannon of Porto Longone, where his ſhips were protected by the governor.

Sea-fights are hardly ever ſo deciſive, as to diſable the vanquiſhed from being, in a ſhort time, in a condition to face the victors. Van Tromp ſailed with a fleet ſufficiently numerous to recover the honour the Dutch had loſt in the late engagement. It conſiſted of one hundred and ten ſail of men of war, beſides ſeventeen which joined him, a few days after, from Zealand. It ſeems as if the Engliſh had placed too much confidence in the diviſions among the ſtates, with regard to Van Tromp, who had been laid aſide ſince his engagement with Blake, and it was thought would not be any more employed during the war, and that it would be impoſſible for the Dutch to fit out a fleet of any great ſtrength that ſeaſon. In conſequence of this opinion, Blake had detached twenty ſail of his ſhips to convoy the colliers from Newcaſtle; twelve were laid up at Plymouth, and fifteen ſent up the river Medway to refit. The admiral had, therefore, only thirty-ſeven ſail of ſhips with him in the Downs when Tromp appeared in the Engliſh channel. He had under his convoy three, ſome ſay five, hundred ſail of merchantmen. But he had no ſooner conducted them to a place of ſafety, than he ſtood directly for the Downs, with a fleet of eighty ſail of men of war. Blake perceived the Dutch admiral advancing towards him in the morning of the twenty-ninth of November; and though his ſquadron was ſo far inferior to that of the enemy, he determined not to refuſe the engagement. The fight accordingly began about eleven in the morning, and laſted till ſix in the evening, but with infinite diſadvantage to the Engliſh. The great force of the engagement fell upon Blake's own ſhip, the Triumph, and two others, the Victory and the Vanguard, which were attacked by twenty of the Dutch ſhips, and fought them all for a conſiderable time before any other ſhips could come to their aſſiſtance. Towards the evening, the Garland, commanded by captain Batton, and the Bonadventure, commanded by captain Hookſton, attacked Van Tromp's own ſhip, and would have taken her, had not ſeveral of the Dutch fleet come to her aſſiſtance. They, however, paid dear for their temerity; they were both killed, and their ſhips taken. Blake, deſirous of ſaving theſe two ſhips, puſhed forward, and by that means brought himſelf into ſo deſperate a ſituation, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty he was ſaved by the aſſiſtance of the Vanguard and the Sapphire. Fortunately for the Engliſh, night ſoon after put an end to the engagement: two hours longer of day-light would have proved the deſtruction of their whole fleet. Blake retired firſt to Dover, and then to the mouth of the Thames, having loſt, beſides the two ſhips already mentioned, the Hercules, and two merchantmen. Blake himſelf was dangerouſly wounded; and a great number of his men, and ſeveral of his officers, killed. Tromp was ſo elated with this victory, that he fixed a broom at his main-top-maſt-head, intimating, that he intended to ſweep the ſea entirely of all Engliſh veſſels.

A. D. 1653. This defeat only tended to animate the Engliſh to wipe off the diſgrace. The utmoſt efforts were made to fit out a fleet ſufficient to recover the loſſes ſuſtained in the late engagement. Among other encouragements, the pay of the ſeamen was increaſed; a larger ſhare of the prizes taken from the enemy was allotted them; and Monk, at Blake's particular requeſt, was ſent for from Scotland to aſſiſt him in the command. The true reaſon for this ſeems to have been the death of Popham, who was buried with a profuſion of honours, and the neceſſity of having a land officer on board the fleet to command the ſoldiers in time of action, but without any ſeparate command at other times. So much expediton was uſed, that by the eleventh of February, Blake was at ſea, with a fleet of ſixty ſail of men of war. Several of his ſhips were new, and all of them much better manned than before. That nothing might be wanting to encourage the ſeamen and ſoldiers, hoſpitals for the reception of their ſick and wounded were erected all along the coaſts; and Blake's fleet was ſo ſtationed off Portland, that Tromp, who had above one hundred and fifty merchantmen under his convoy, could not avoid an engagement on the eighteenth of February.

The fight was begun about eight in the morning, by Blake, in the Triumph, ſeconded with about twelve other ſhips; among which was the Fairfax, commanded by captain Lawſon, and the Vanguard, by captain Mildmay. The impetuous courage of Blake had its uſual conſequence; it expoſed him to the moſt imminent danger: for this ſmall ſquadron bore the whole fire and fury of the Dutch till the reſt of the fleet could come up to their aſſiſtance, which was not till ſome time after. This battle far exceeded all that had been hitherto fought between the two republics. Amazed and confounded with the ſtrength, the order, and the diſcipline of the Engliſh, the Dutch exerted all their force to deſtroy Blake's fleet; while Blake, ſtung with his late miſfortune, collected all his force to be revenged on the Dutch,

Dutch. The ſea was covered with wrecks, and the fire from the ſhips ſo quick and violent, that, for ſome time, there was a dead calm. In the mean time, the fury of the combatants was aſtoniſhing; they bore down cloſe to one another, and received the whole of every broadſide: it ſeemed as if the diſpute had not been victory, but which ſhould firſt go to the bottom. The Triumph bore the whole fury of this dreadful fire; and muſt have been either ſunk or taken, had ſhe not been relieved by Lawſon. Blake was wounded in the thigh; Mildmay in the Vanguard, and Ball in the Triumph, were killed. The admiral's ſecretary was killed by his ſide. The Proſperous, a forty-four gun ſhip, was boarded by the Dutch, but ſaved by the Merlin frigate. The Aſſiſtance and the Advice were both diſabled, and obliged to put into Portſmouth. The Fairfax loſt a hundred men, the Triumph as many; and captain Batten, in the Sampſon, after ſinking one of the enemy's ſhips, found it impoſſible to keep his own above water, and was obliged to go, with his crew, on board other ſhips. But this was far from being equal to the loſs ſuſtained by the Dutch. Three days was the battle continued, with the utmoſt rage and obſtinacy; and Blake, who was victor, obtained not more honour than Tromp, who was vanquiſhed. He made ſo ſkilful a retreat, that he ſaved the greater part of his convoy, which was very large, thirty only of his merchantmen falling into the hands of the Engliſh. He, however, loſt eleven ſhips of war, had two thouſand men killed, and near fifteen hundred taken priſoners. The Engliſh, though many of their ſhips were dreadfully ſhattered, loſt only one. Their ſlain were not much inferior to that of the enemy; but they gained the immortal honour of filling their rival republic with the terrors of their power and valour.

This ſucceſs of the Engliſh was, in a great meaſure, owing to the ſize of their ſhips; an advantage which all the ſkill and bravery of the Dutch admirals could not compenſate. But the misfortunes which the Dutch met with in battle, were ſmall in compariſon of thoſe which their trade ſuffered from the Engliſh. Their whole commerce by the channel was cut off; even that with the Baltic ſuffered greatly by the Engliſh privateers. Their fiſheries were totally ſuſpended. Above ſixteen hundred of their ſhips had fallen into the hands of the enemy. Nor was this diſtreſs ſuffered from any national intereſt or neceſſity, but from vain points of honour and national reſentments, of which it was difficult to give a ſatiſfactory account to the people.

Cromwell was filled with ſentiments very different from thoſe of the public at theſe triumphs of the parliament. The remembrance of his exploits was now but faint, and one farther ſtep to glory muſt have placed the republicans ſuperior to every thing but envy. He knew not how ſoon his ſoldiers, infected with a paſſion for increaſing the glory of their country, might declare for the parliament; and ſhould that happen, one ſingle vote would be ſufficient to deſtroy at once his greatneſs and his power. No time had yet been fixed for the diſſolution of the parliament; and while he was a ſubject, and conſequently accountable, it was the ſame to him whether the preſiding power was a monarchy or a commonwealth. He indeed commanded the army, and the troops were at preſent at his devotion; but theſe triumphs at ſea ſeemed greatly to leſſen their regard for their favourite general; they deſired to ſhare in the honours of their countrymen. On the other hand, the zealous republicans ſet up the fleet in oppoſition to the army, and celebrated, with uncommon demonſtrations of joy, the ſucceſſes of their naval armaments. They even ventured to urge the neceſſity of diminiſhing the number of the land forces, which they repreſented as no longer neceſſary to ſupport the domeſtic peace of the nation. Cromwell plainly perceived that they entertained a jealouſy of his power and ambitious deſigns, and were reſolved to render him ſubordinate to their authority. This he reſolved to prevent; and the only method of effecting it, was by diſſolving the parliament. He accordingly ſummoned a general council of officers, and ſoon found that they were ready to join him in any attempt he might think neceſſary. Moſt of them were indeed his creatures, owed their advancement entirely to his favour, and depended upon him for their future preferment. Some of them indeed were men of principle, but guided by notions ſo fanatically extravagant, that they were eaſily deluded into the moſt violent and moſt criminal meaſures.

Their firſt ſtep was to vote a remonſtrance to the parliament. It began with complaining of the arrears due to the army; and after applauding the parliament for their zeal and enterprize, repreſented to them, that it was now time to reſign their ſeats, and leave to other members of the commonwealth the cares of government; and that they would now, by eſtabliſhing a free and equal adminiſtration, perform the promiſe they had long ſince made to the people. The parliament was at once alarmed and exaſperated at the temerity of the army; and after a violent debate, a ſharp reply was returned to their remonſtrance.

Cromwell now found no difficulty to inſpire the council of officers with the ſentiments he deſired: they were ſufficiently exaſperated by the harſh anſwer returned by the parliament. Harriſon having aſſured the council, that the general's deſign was only to pave the way for the government of Jeſus and his ſaints, major Street replied, that it was neceſſary for Jeſus to come quickly; for if he delayed it till after Chriſtmas, he would find the ſeat of power occupied by another. While the officers were engaged in ſuch debates, colonel Ingoldſby entered, and informed Cromwell, that the parliament had juſt voted not to diſſolve themſelves, but to fill up the houſe by new elections; and that the manner of carrying this expedient into execution was the ſubject on which they were then deliberating. Exaſperated at this intelligence, Cromwell left the council of officers; and taking with him three hundred ſoldiers, repaired to the houſe, leaving ſome of his men at the foot of the ſtairs, ſome at the entrance of the lobby, and ſome at the door. He advanced to his ſeat, and told his friend St. John, that he was come to do an act which grieved his very ſoul, and had beſought the Lord, with prayers and tears, not to impoſe it upon him, but that the glory of God, and the good of the nation, rendered it abſolutely neceſſary. He, however, ſat ſtill, and liſtened to the debates for ſome time; and then told colonel Harriſon, that he thought the parliament was now ſufficiently ripe for a diſſolution. Harriſon warned him of the danger that might attend a ſtep of that nature, and deſired him to conſider the conſequences before he attempted it. Cromwell accordingly ſat ſtill for ſome time longer; but when the ſpeaker was juſt going to put the queſtion, he ſtarted from his ſeat, accuſed the parliament, in the moſt opprobrious language, of tyranny, ambition, rapine, and injuſtice. Then ſtamping violently with his foot, the ſignal he had given the ſoldiers for entering the houſe, he cried out, "Get you gone for "ſhame; give place to honeſter men, to thoſe who "will more faithfully diſcharge their truſt. You are "no longer a parliament: I tell you, you are no "longer a parliament; the Lord hath caſt you off; "he hath choſen other inſtruments for carrying on "his work." Then taking Martin by the cloak, "Thou art a whoremaſter," ſaid he. To a ſecond, "Thou art an adulterer." To a third, "Thou art "a drunkard and a glutton." And to a fourth, "Thou art an extortioner." The ſpeaker, fond of his power and dignity, ſeemed unwilling to leave the chair, and kept his ſeat till he was in a manner pulled out of it by Harriſon. Cromwell, pointing to the mace that lay on the table, ſaid to one of the ſoldiers, "Take away that fool's bauble." Then turning himſelf to the houſe, he ſaid, "It is you that have "forced me upon this. I have ſought the Lord, "night and day, with ſtrong prayers and tears, that "he would rather ſlay me than put me upon this "work; but he would not hear me." The ſoldiers ſoon cleared the houſe, and it was ſufficiently evident, from the furious manner in which Cromwell behaved, that he would, in caſe of oppoſition, have put every man of them to death. Sir Peter Wentworth and Sir Henry Vane, were the only members that had the courage to upbraid him with his conduct, which they did in the ſevereſt terms, accuſing him of ingratitude and treachery. He took no notice of what was ſaid by the former, but interrupted the latter, by crying out with a terrible voice, "O! Sir Harry Vane, Sir Harry Vane! The Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" As ſoon as the ſoldiers had cleared the houſe, Cromwell ſeized all the journals and public papers, ordered the doors to be locked, and carried the keys with him to Whitehall.

No circumſtance in the life of this remarkable man, conveys a juſter idea of his true character, than this memorable incident. It demonſtrates that he was a perſon of the profoundeſt ſubtilty blended with the moſt fiery intrepidity. Incapable of moderation, he often paſſed from the exceſſes of debauchery to thoſe of enthuſiaſm and religious auſterity. When at war with the king he made no ſcruple of ſaying, that if he met him in battle he would put him to death with the ſame facility as a common ſoldier; and there was no doubt but he would have carried his threat into execution, had an opportunity offered. But this ſudden diſſolution of the parliament exceeded all the reſt of his actions. He alone was capable of forming and executing ſo bold a deſign.

Perſuaded that heaven had inveſted him with the ſole adminiſtration of government, he at firſt intended to be the only diſpenſer of juſtice, and not to ſhare his power with another: but upon more mature reflection he determined to ſatisfy the expectations of the people by governing them under the appearance of a republic. Accordingly he ſummoned one hundred and twenty-eight Engliſhmen, ſix Iriſh and five Scots to meet at London, and delegated to them, during fifteen months, the legiſlative authority, and which they were afterwards to transfer to one hundred and thirty-four others, choſen by themſelves.

This aſſembly, ſelected from the fanatical dregs of the people, conſidered themſelves as a true parliament, and acted accordingly. They began "by ſeeking God in prayer." Some particular enthuſiaſts were charged with this office, and declared, "That never in their uſual tranſports of favour had they known the communication of the holy ſpirit in ſuch abundance." Cromwell's firſt ſpeech to this remarkable aſſembly is ſingular for that ridiculous myſtery, under which he always concealed his hypocriſy. "I own, ſaid he, that I never preſumed to expect, "nor you, perhaps, to ſee a day like unto this, when "Jeſus Chriſt is made known unto us even as at "this day. Jeſus Chriſt is at this day made known "by your vocation, and you make him known by "your zeal to appear for him, and do manifeſt, as "much as it is in the power of frail creatures, that "this day is the day of the power of Jeſus Chriſt. "I know you well remember, that ſcripture, he "maketh his people willing in the day of his power. "God manifeſts it to be the day of the power of "Chriſt, having through ſo much blood and ſo much "trial, as has been upon this nation, he maketh this "one of the greateſt mercies, next to his own ſon, "to have his people called to the ſupreme authority. "God hath owned his ſon, and hath owned you, "and hath made you to own him. I confeſs, I "never looked to have ſeen ſuch a day: I did not."

Animated by this ſpeech of the general, they thought themſelves under an abſolute neceſſity of proceeding to a thorough reformation, both in civil and religious affairs; and accordingly began in a manner worthy of ſuch an aſſembly, and of the ſpirit with which it was acted. They took into conſideration the abolition of the eccleſiaſtical function, which they ſaid was a relict of popery; and of taking away tythes, which they termed a judiacal practice. They declared ſciences and univerſities to be heatheniſh inſtitutions, unworthy of protection in a chriſtian country. The common law of England they called the badge of Norman ſlavery: and formed a deſign of eſtabliſhing the law of Moſes, as the only ſyſtem of Engliſh juriſprudence. In a word, a general reformation was projected; but, for want of time, the whole was reduced to the ſingle article of performing the marriage ceremony by the civil power without the intervention of the clergy.

The Dutch flattered themſelves that they ſhould now be able to ſucceed in their negotiations for a peace, as the haughty republican parliament was no more. And it muſt be owned that Cromwell was far from being averſe to put a period to hoſtilities. But ſeveral reaſons prevented him from carrying his deſign into execution. He knew that nothing could render him more popular than that of carrying on the Dutch war with vigour; the Engliſh being now more capable of diſputing the empire of the ſea with the enemy, than they had ever been before. This was, in a great meaſure owing to the friendſhip of Sweden, by which, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition of the Dutch and Danes, the Engliſh had been furniſhed with materials for ſhip-building. On the other hand, the populace of Holland, who ſaw only the ſurface of things, were full of the higheſt expectations, that the diſſolution of the parliament muſt occaſion a civil war in England.

In the beginning of June a ſtrong fleet was aſſembled and ſailed from Holland under the command of Van Tromp, de Wit, and de Ruyter, and manned with the beſt ſeamen of their country. Blake with his diviſion of eighteen ſail of ſhips, had ſtood to the northward, and had not yet joined the fleet commanded by Monk and Dean. But his abſence did not prevent the Engliſh from advancing againſt the enemy. Their fleet conſiſted of ninety-five men of war, and five fire-ſhips; and the Dutch of ninety-eight men of war, and ſeven fire-ſhips. The engagement began in the morning of the ſecond of June, and almoſt the firſt broadſide received from the enemy, Dean, one of the Engliſh admirals, was killed. Monk, with great prudence and preſence of mind, concealed this misfortune from the ſeamen, by immediately dropping his cloak over the dead body of that able officer. The fury of the contending fleets ſeemed to be increaſed in proportion as the officers had learned experience. Lawſon, the Engliſh rear-admiral, charged with the blue ſquadron, conſiſting of forty ſhips, through the whole Dutch fleet, with amazing execution, and would have taken de Ruyter's ſhip, had he not been relieved by Van Tromp, who, in his turn, was charged by Monk, and the battle continued to rage with the moſt violent fury till three in the afternoon, each party ignorant of the loſs they had ſuſtained, both fleets being involved in an impracticable cloud of ſmoke. At laſt the Dutch fury gave way to the well directed courage of the Engliſh. The faintneſs of their fire gave the firſt intimation of their loſs, and the wind being favourable they withdrew from the engagement; but were cannonaded in their retreat by the lighter ſhips of the Engliſh. Van Tromp performed all that could be expected from the braveſt and moſt experienced commander. He endeavoured to keep his ſhips in a line of battle; but three or four of them being ſunk, and one of his flag-ſhips blown up, his whole fleet was thrown into confuſion, and he was obliged to retire from the Engliſh. This engagement happened off the north Foreland, and during the night Blake joined Monk with his diviſion. The next morning the attack was renewed; but the Dutch were ſo diſheartened by the preceding engagement, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty their admirals could prevail upon their men to fight. But the conteſt was now unequal. Tromp was twice boarded by vice-admiral Penn, but diſengaged by de Ruyter and de Wit. Six capital Dutch ſhips were ſunk, two blown up by fire-ſhips, and eleven taken. The whole was now a diſorderly flight; nor could the Dutch captains, either by perſuaſions or menaces, be brought to face the Engliſh; and their whole fleet muſt inevitably have been deſtroyed, had they not taken ſhelter on the flats between Dunkirk and Calais, where it was dangerous for the Engliſh to follow them. The latter loſt not a ſingle ſhip in this deſperate engagement.

It is impoſſible to deſcribe the conſternation into which the Dutch were thrown when the news of this defeat reached their country. They now ſaw that fleet, which, but a few days before, they thought invincible, blocked up in their harbours by a victorious enemy, which was every moment ruining their trade, on which their very being, as a maritime power, depended. Tromp, in his letters to the ſtates, complained bitterly that his ſhips were not ſufficiently ſupplied with powder and ball, and that his whole misfortune ought to be imputed to his want of ammunition. The common people, from whom theſe complaints were not long a ſecret, were enraged to the higheſt pitch of fury. They ſaid, that a deſign had been formed to betray their fleet into the hands of the enemy, that the republic might be under a neceſſity of making peace upon their own terms. The ſtates were alarmed, and purſued the only method in their power to ſilence the clamours of the people; they uſed the utmoſt diligence and expedition in repairing and refitting their fleet; they recalled their ſhips from their different ſtations, in order, if poſſible, to wipe off the diſgrace of the late defeat.

The ſpirits of the Engliſh were raiſed to ſuch a height by the late victory, that they would hear of no peace, unleſs the Dutch would agree to diſarm their ſhips, pay all the expences of the war, and make full ſatiſfaction for the damages the Engliſh merchants had ſuſtained. Cromwell, however, hinted to the Dutch ambaſſadors, that peace might be concluded on much eaſier terms, but did not think it prudent to explain himſelf farther at preſent on ſo delicate a ſubject. He was, however, perſuaded, that if the Dutch were totally ruined, he ſhould never be able to obtain the ſummit of his wiſhes, the ſupreme power in England, which, perhaps, he would have been glad to purchaſe even by a defeat at ſea. To this perſuaſion the Dutch owed their ſafety. The late victory, however complete, was not proſecuted with all the vigour that might have been expected. The enemy were incapable of ſending five men of war to ſea, their beſt admirals refuſed to act, and a rich Eaſt-India fleet was every day expected. Yet no advantages were taken of this diſtreſſed ſtate of the enemy. Blake, indeed, continued cruiſing on the coaſt of Holland; but he made no attempt on their harbours, and the Eaſt-India fleet arrived in ſafety.

While the Engliſh admiral triumphed in his ſuperiority, and continued the undiſputed maſter of the ocean, the Dutch were exerting all their efforts to repair and increaſe their navy. Nor were their attempts in vain; their fleet was ſoon in a better condition than ever, both with regard to the largeneſs of the ſhips and the number of ſeamen. Van Tromp, de Ruyter, and other famous admirals, had now no longer the leaſt pretence for abandoning the public ſervice. Young Tromp, who had taken an Engliſh man of war in the Streights, was ordered home with his ſquadron, and ſome very large Eaſt-India ſhips were converted into men of war; ſo that about the latter end of July, Van Tromp's ſquadron conſiſted of ninety ſtout ſhips, manned with able ſeamen, and well provided with ammunition and ſtores.

On the thirtieth of July, that celebrated admiral ſailed to the Texel, and joined de Ruyter and de Wit; and by this junction the whole fleet amounted to one hundred and twenty ſail. The Engliſh fleet, which was commanded by Monk, Lawſon, and Penn, amounted only to ninety ſail; but they were determined to give the enemy battle. The engagement accordingly began on the thirty-firſt of July, in the morning, with the utmoſt fury. The Dutch had now obviated all the diſadvantages under which they laboured in their former engagements: they worked their ſhips with wonderful addreſs, and fought with the moſt ſurpriſing reſolution. Monk, on the other hand, gave his orders with that calmneſs and preciſion which characterizes the conſummate commander. The battle continued to rage with the utmoſt violence till near noon, when the brave admiral Van Tromp was killed with a muſquet-ball, as he was encouraging his men. As ſoon as his death was known, the Dutch retired towards their own coaſts with great precipitation. They loſt in this engagement twenty-four of their men of war, about four thouſand of their men were killed, and a thouſand taken priſoners. The Engliſh loſt three men of war, ſix captains, and five hundred ſeamen. Eight hundred were dangerouſly wounded, and their whole fleet ſo dreadfully ſhattered, that they were obliged to leave the coaſt of Holland.

By this time Cromwell himſelf was aſhamed of his parliament, which had, for ſome time, been expoſed to the ridicule of the public. Among the fanatics that compoſed this motley aſſembly, was a very active member, remarkable for long prayers, ſermons, and harangues. He was a leather-ſeller in London, and known by the name of "Praiſe-God Barebone," a ridiculous appellation formed by ſome poet to expreſs the meagre figure of ſo ſtrange a perſon. The populace were pleaſed with the thought, and gave the aſſembly itſelf the name of Barebone's parliament. Though this aſſembly had received all their authority from Cromwell, they now began to pretend they had been favoured with power from the Lord, and to inſiſt on their divine commiſſion. The friends of the general perceived that they were on the point of acting contrary to his intereſt, and determined to put a period to this ridiculous parliament. Accordingly they met early at the houſe; and one of them moved, that the ſitting of this parliament any longer would be of no ſervice to the nation. The motion was carried, and they haſtened to Cromwell, with Rouſe, their ſpeaker, at their head; and by a formal deed, reſigned back into his hands that authority which they had ſo lately received from him. This reſolution was taken and carried into execution before many of the members came to the houſe; and that they might prevent the reign of the ſaints from coming to an untimely end, they placed one Moyer in the chair, and began to draw up a proteſt againſt all that had been done in their abſence; but before they had finiſhed their deſign, colonel White came to the houſe with a party of ſoldiers, and put an end to their labours. On his entrance, he aſked them what they did there? "We are ſeeking the Lord," ſaid they. "Then you muſt go elſewhere," replied the colonel; "for, to my certain knowledge, he has not been here theſe ſeveral years."

This reſignation once more ſtopped the machine of government; and it was now propoſed, in a council of officers, to introduce a new ſcheme of adminiſtration, and to temper the liberty of a commonwealth by the authority of a ſingle perſon, who ſhould be known under the appellation of Protector. Lambert accordingly produced the inſtrument of government, containing the plan of this new legiſlature; and as it was ſuppoſed to be agreeable to the general, it was immediately agreed to by the council. Cromwell was now inſtalled, with great ſolemnity, in that high office. The ceremony was performed in the court of chancery, the commiſſioners of the great ſeal, the barons of the exchequer, the judges, the council of ſtate, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, attending.

The chief articles in this inſtrument of government were the following: A council of ſtate was appointed, which was not to conſiſt of more than twenty-one, nor leſs than thirteen perſons. Theſe were to enjoy their office during life, or good behaviour; and in caſe of a vacancy, the remaining members were to name three, out of whom the protector was to chuſe one. The protector was appointed the ſupreme magiſtrate of the commonwealth: in his name all juſtice was adminiſtered; from him all magiſtracy and all honours were derived; he had the power of pardoning all crimes, except murder and treaſon; and to him the benefit of all forfeitures devolved. The right of peace, war and alliance, was veſted in him; but with regard to theſe particulars, he was to act entirely by the conſent and with the advice of his council. The power of the ſword was veſted in the protector, jointly with the parliament, while it was ſitting, or with the council of ſtate in the intervals. He was obliged to ſummon a parliament every three years, and to allow them to ſit five months, without adjournment, prorogation, or diſſolution. The bills they paſſed were to be preſented to the protector for his conſent; but if within twenty days it was not obtained, they were to have the force of laws by the authority of the parliament only. A ſtanding army for England and Ireland was eſtabliſhed, conſiſting of twenty thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe; and funds were eſtabliſhed for their ſupport. Theſe were not to be diminiſhed without the conſent of the protector, and in this article alone he aſſumed a negative voice. During the intervals of parliament, the protector and council had the power of enacting laws, which were to be valid till the firſt meeting of the parliament. The chancellor, treaſurer, admiral, chief governors of Ireland and Scotland, and the chief juſtices of both benches, were to be choſen with the approbation of parliament; and in the intervals with the approbation of the council, to be afterwards ratified by parliament. The protector was to enjoy his office during life; and on his death, the place was to be filled by the council. Such was the inſtrument of government enacted by the council of officers, and ſworn to by Cromwell. Fifteen perſons were named in the inſtrument, as the firſt council of ſtate; theſe were all of them perſons entirely devoted to the protector; and, at the ſame time, ſo very oppoſite in their opinions with regard to the principles of civil and religious liberty, that there was not the leaſt danger of their uniting againſt the protector's power.

The government being thus ſettled, the following proclamation was publiſhed in the ſtreets of London and Weſtminſter. "Whereas the late parliament diſſolved themſelves, and reſigned their powers and authority; the government of the commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland in a lord protector, and ſucceſſive triennial parliaments, is now eſtabliſhed. And whereas Oliver Cromwell, captain-general of all the forces of this commonwealth, is declared lord-protector of the ſaid nations, and hath accepted thereof: we have therefore thought it neceſſary (as we hereby do) to make publication of the premiſes, and ſtrictly to charge and command, all and every perſon or perſons, of what quality or condition ſoever, in any of the ſaid three nations to take notice hereof, and to conform and ſubmit themſelves to the government ſo eſtabliſhed. And all ſheriffs, mayors, bailiffs, &c. are required to publiſh this proclamation, to the end that none may have cauſe to pretend ignorance in this behalf."

The ſituation of Cromwell, notwithſtanding the high office he had attained, was not to be envied. He was at once both hated and feared by all Europe; and on the latter was his ſeat of power eſtabliſhed. Cardinal Mazarine began, when it was too late, to dread his ambition, which he had hitherto conſidered as nothing more than the wild fever of an enthuſiaſtical brain; and which his civil policy, if ever he attained any, would render all his ſchemes and attempts abortive. Spain had been particularly cautious to afford neither aſſiſtance nor protection to the exiled royaliſts; and this had procured her the liberty of raiſing and tranſporting ſeveral battalions of Iriſh ſoldiers, who proved as fine troops as any in Europe. Perceiving that the princes of the Stuart family ſtill reſided in France, the Spaniſh miniſtry falſely imagined, that no government in England would enter into a treaty of peace with a power that protected the pretenders to the Engliſh crown. Hence they thought themſelves ſecure of Cromwell's friendſhip, eſpecially as the affairs of England were ſo much embarraſſed, that ſome foreign alliance would not only be convenient but even neceſſary to his preſervation. The two northern nations were ſtill more confident of the importance of their friendſhip to any government that could be eſtabliſhed in England. Both of them were at this time conſiderable maritime powers. The king of Denmark, ever ſince the rupture between England and the United Provinces, had been greatly careſſed by the Dutch, and was in arrears to England for the cargoes of twenty-five ſhips that had been ſtopped in his harbours, and their lading confiſcated to his own uſe. He concluded, however, that while he was cloſely united with the Dutch, it would be impoſſible for England to have any power in the Baltic, and that the ſtates-general never would make a peace without concluding him in the treaty. The queen of Sweden was ſtill fantaſtically fond of Cromwell's perſon and government; her romantic ſentiments correſponded exactly with the actions of that extraordinary man; but ſhe had a wiſe miniſtry, who endeavoured to take all advantages of his ſituation with regard to the Dutch and Danes, in order to acquire every poſſible emolument, with regard to commerce. They plainly perceived that as affairs were then ſituated, the friendſhip of Sweden was abſolutely neceſſary to England; a truth of which both Cromwell, and the late republican parliament were ſufficiently perſuaded. The lord viſcount Liſle had been ſent by the republicans as their ambaſſador to the Swediſh court; but Cromwell, either to remove Whitlock from the government, or from an opinion of his ſuperior abilities, recalled Liſle and ſent Whitlock in his room. He was charged to exert all his power to conclude an alliance offenſive and defenſive with that crown. The Engliſh court had ſent but few ambaſſadors of late to foreign princes. Every court of Europe was, however, full of their reſidents, agents, or ſpies.

Overwhelmed with the expences of the war, terrified by their loſſes, and mortified by their defeats, the Dutch now puſhed the negotiations for a peace with the utmoſt aſſiduity. It was known that the greateſt obſtacle to a pacification conſiſted not in any animoſity conceived by the Engliſh againſt the Dutch, but in a deſire of a cloſe union and confederacy. Cromwell had formed the chimerical ſcheme of a coalition with the United Provinces; a total conjunction of government, privileges, intereſts and councils. It is no wonder that a ſcheme built on ſo deluſive a foundation ſhould appear abſurd to the ſtates-general: they were aſtoniſhed that any man in his ſenſes ſhould entertain ſuch romantic notions, and abſolutely refuſed to enter into any negotiations on ſo impracticable a ſcheme of accommodation. At laſt, however, the peace was ſigned by Cromwell, and a defenſive league made between the two republics.

A. D. 1654. Cromwell had no reſpect of perſons, with regard to public juſtice; not even the interceſſion of monarchs was ſufficient to divert the blow. Don Pantaleon Sa, brother of the Portugueſe ambaſſador, and joined with him in the ſame commiſſion, thinking himſelf affronted in the ſtreets of London, repaired the next day to the Exchange; and ſeeing a merchant, whom he thought reſembled the author of the injury, he immediately killed him, and took ſhelter in the houſe of his brother, who had connived at this baſe action. Cromwell paid no regard to his aſylum; he ſent a company of ſoldiers, who took Don Pantaleon from his brother's houſe, and committed him to priſon. He was ſoon after tried, and executed on Tower-hill, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the ambaſſador, who pleaded the privileges of his office. Foreign nations could not help applauding this vigorous exertion of juſtice, notwithſtanding the laws of nations were violated in the perſon of the ambaſſador.

But with whatever firmneſs Cromwell proceeded in the government, and whatever awe his undaunted behaviour might have occaſioned in the Engliſh, his uſurpation excited a general diſcontent. The people, ſo jealous of their liberties, were exaſperated at finding the chains forged for them much heavier than thoſe they had broken. The protector ſaw that theſe complaints had affected even the army, and therefore thought it highly prudent to aſſemble a parliament, in order to eſtabliſh his authority on the baſis of law. They met on the third of September; and as the people were allowed an entire freedom in the election, it is no wonder that many members of principles very different from thoſe of the protector, were returned from ſeveral parts of England. They were no ſooner aſſembled, than they gave ſufficient indications of their refractory ſpirit. Cromwell was ſoon alarmed, and ordered the houſe to attend him in the painted chamber. There he made an elaborate ſpeech, delivered in his dark, perplexed manner. He began with obſerving, that the moſt ſhameful abuſes had been introduced into civil and religious liberty by the levellers, anabaptiſts, and fifth monarchy-men, whoſe principles tended to ſap the foundation of all government, civil and religious. He pathetically enlarged on the miſeries which had flowed from theſe abſurd notions, during the late domeſtic and foreign wars; and enumerated the methods he had taken to cure theſe diſorders in the ſtate. He recommended to their care the ſettlement of the nation, and promiſed to join them in ſo important and neceſſary a work.

The protector was undoubtedly perſuaded, that his power, and the ſucceſs that had conſtantly attended him, would be abundantly ſufficient to eſtabliſh his government, and induce the aſſembly to add the legiſlative ſanction to the power he had uſurped. He was miſtaken: many of the members inſiſted on the illegality of diſſolving the long parliament; and ſome even propoſed, that the preſent aſſembly ſhould declare themſelves the ſame parliament continued. They then entered on a diſcuſſion of the pretended inſtrument of government, and of that authority which Cromwell, under the title of protector, aſſumed over the nation. The greateſt liberties were taken in arraigning this new dignity. Even the protector himſelf eſcaped not without cenſure. The utmoſt that could be done by the court party, was to protract the debate by arguments and long ſpeeches, and prevent the deciſion of a queſtion, which they were abundantly convinced would be carried againſt them by a great majority.

Surprized and enraged at this refractory ſpirit in the parliament, the protector commanded their attendance in the painted chamber, and inveighed in the moſt bitter terms againſt their conduct. He told them, and indeed very juſtly, that nothing could be more abſurd than for them to diſpute his authority, becauſe the ſame inſtrument of government that had conſtituted them a parliament, had made him protector; and conſequently, that the power of both muſt either ſtand or fall together: that ſome points of the new conſtitution were ſuppoſed to be fundamentals, and were not, on any account, to be altered or diſputed: that among theſe were the government of the nation by one perſon and a parliament; their joint authority over the army and militia, the ſucceſſion of new parliaments, and liberty of conſcience; and that with regard to theſe particulars, there was reſerved to him a negative voice, to which, in the other circumſtances of government, he confeſſed himſelf no-wiſe entitled.

But unwilling to depend wholly upon the effect he imagined his ſpeech had made on the members, he obliged them to ſign a recognition of his authority, and an engagement not to propoſe or conſent to any alteration of the government as it was ſettled in a ſingle perſon and a parliament. Had he exacted this promiſe from all the members before he opened the ſeſſion, it would have prevented him this trouble and mortification; for as many of the members did not attend him in the painted chamber, he was obliged to have recourſe to the unconſtitutional method of placing guards at the door of the houſe, with orders to ſuffer none to enter but thoſe who had ſubſcribed the protector's recognition. Many of them ſubmitted to this arbitrary condition, but thought themſelves ſtill at liberty to purſue the ſame courſe in their proceedings: they retained the ſame refractory ſpirit they had diſcovered in their firſt debates. The inſtrument of government was examined, article by article, with the moſt ſcrupulous accuracy. The general approbation of the houſe was given thoſe who advanced the freeſt topics; and during their whole tranſactions, they neither took any notice of the protector, nor ſent him a ſingle bill for his approbation.

A. D. 1655. Cromwell was highly diſguſted at this behaviour; and being informed that many of the members had joined in a conſpiracy with the diſcontented officers of the army, he determined to diſſolve an aſſembly ſo dangerous to his power. According to the inſtrument of government, five months were allowed every parliament to ſit before it could be diſſolved; but Cromwell pretended that a month contained only twenty-eight days; and the full time, according to this method of reckoning, being elapſed, they were again ordered to attend the protector in the painted chamber, where, after a long and angry harangue, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly.

If the nation was diſcontented before the meeting of this parliament, the abrupt diſſolution of that aſſembly tended not to give them a better opinion of the government. The members returning to their reſpective counties and ſeats, propagated among the people that refractory and mutinous ſpirit, they had exerted in the houſe. The old republicans, with Sir Harry Vane at their head, who maintained the indiſſoluble authority of the long parliament, took every method in their power to encourage the murmurs of the people againſt the preſent uſurpation, but at the ſame time were ſo cautious in the methods they purſued for this purpoſe, that the protector could find nothing ſufficient to found a proſecution againſt them. Elated with this oppoſition to the protector's authority the royaliſts could be no longer retained in ſubjection. They were perſuaded that every one who was diſſatisfied with the preſent government, would join them in overthrowing an eſtabliſhment they deteſted. They never conſidered that the old parliamentary party, however exaſperated they might be at the protector's uſurpation, they were ſtill more prejudiced againſt the royal cauſe. They had only loſt their power by the former: ſhould the latter gain the aſcendent, they would be obnoxious to the ſevereſt puniſhments, for their former behaviour.

This deluſion proved fatal to many of the royal party. A conſpiracy was formed in various parts of England, and a day for a general riſing was appointed. In an undertaking ſo widely extended, it is almoſt impoſſible to keep the ſecret. Cromwell was informed of the deſign. Thurloe, his ſecretary, had ſpies in every quarter of the kingdom; and the protector's government was extremely vigilant. Many of the royaliſts were ſeized and thrown into priſon. Others, as the day appointed approached, were ſeized with terror, and abandoned the project. In one place only the conſpiracy broke out into action. Penruddoc, Groves, Jones, and other gentlemen in the weſt, entered Saliſbury with about two hundred horſe, at the very time when the ſheriff and judges were holding the aſſizes. Theſe they made priſoners and proclaimed the king. But contrary to their expectations they received no acceſſion of force; the dread of Cromwell's power prevented the people from joining in an undertaking they wiſhed might ſucceed.

Confounded at this diſappointment, the men that had hitherto followed their ſtandard, deſerted by degrees, till a ſingle troop of horſe was ſufficient to put an end to the inſurrection. The leaders were moſt of them taken and put to death; and the reſt ſold for ſlaves, and tranſported to Barbadoes.

The bad ſucceſs of this attempt of the royaliſts tended only to eſtabliſh the power of the protector; the people were fearful of oppoſing a man, who was ſo conſtantly attended with ſucceſs. Cromwell even regarded the inſurrection itſelf as a fortunate event; becauſe it demonſtrated the reality of theſe conſpiracies, which his enemies always repreſented as mere fictions, invented ſolely to varniſh over his ſeverities. It ſerved another purpoſe; it enabled him to extort large ſums from the royaliſts, under pretence of making them pay the expences incurred by their mutinous diſpoſitions. He iſſued an edict for exacting the tenth penny on all their eſtates: and in order to collect an impoſition at once ſo oppreſſive and iniquitous, he inſtituted ten major-generals, and divided the whole kingdom into ſo many military juriſdictions. Theſe men, aſſiſted by commiſſioners, were impowered to lay every perſon they pleaſed under the tax of decimation, to level all the impoſts ſettled by the protector and his council, and to impriſon any perſon whom they ſhould ſuſpect to be enemies to the government. Nor was there any appeal from their arbitrary judgment but to the protector himſelf in council. Deſpotiſm now appeared openly to preſide over the Engliſh; the very maſk of liberty was thrown aſide. The people bewailed in ſecret the miſeries of their country; they ſaw the iron rod of Eaſtern tyranny held by the perſon who had ſeized the ſeat of power.

While England was thus obliged to ſubmit to the will of an illegal uſurper, the royal family ſuffered the utmoſt diſtreſs at Paris. The queen had, indeed, a moderate penſion aſſigned her; but it was ſo ill paid, and her credit ſo low in that capital, that ſhe complained one morning to cardinal de Retz, that her daughter, the princeſs Henrietta, was obliged to be a-bed for want of a fire to warm her. Cromwell, deſirous of humbling the pride and power of France, pretended to reſent the protection which the royal family received in that kingdom, though ſurely ſuch treatment deſerved not his anger: it muſt have excited pity in an ingenuous breaſt. Cromwell, however, thought otherwiſe; and the merchants having complained that ſome of their ſhips had been ſtopped and ſearched by the French, he iſſued letters of repriſal; and Blake ſeized a whole fleet of merchant ſhips, loaded with proviſions and ſtores for Dunkirk, then beſieged by the Spaniards.

Theſe hoſtile proceedings ſufficiently alarmed the court of France; and in order to remove every cauſe of complaint, they treated Charles with ſuch neglect, that he thought it prudent to withdraw, in order to prevent the indignity of being deſired to leave the kingdom. He firſt retired to Spaw, and afterwards to Cologne, where he reſided two years on a ſmall penſion paid him by the king of France, and a few ſubſcriptions ſent him by his friends in England. His chief friends and confidents were Sir Edward Hyde, created lord chancellor, and the marquis of Ormond. This puſillanimous behaviour in the court of France produced at laſt the deſired effect, and the protector ſigned a peace with that kingdom.

The court of Spain had paid every ſubmiſſion to the Engliſh government, and even endeavoured to form an alliance, offenſive and defenſive, with the protector; but failing in the attempt, endeavours were uſed to make a breach between England and France. Cromwell was no ſtranger to theſe intrigues, but made no complaints to Cardenas, the Spaniſh miniſter. A powerful fleet was, however, fitted out, and all Europe were held in ſuſpence with regard to its deſtination. The Spaniards ſeemed not the leaſt alarmed; they never ſuſpected that it was intended to attack their ſettlements in the New World. At laſt two ſtrong ſquadrons ſailed from England, one commanded by Penn, and the other by Blake. The former was deſtined to the Weſt-Indies, the latter to act in the Mediterranean. And what is ſtill more remarkable, Blake had orders to aſſiſt the Spaniards in Europe, and Penn to diſtreſs them in America.

Blake, on his arrival in the bay of Cadiz, undertook to ſerve the Spaniards againſt the duke of Guiſe, who then threatened to make a deſcent on Naples, and was fortunate enough to eſcape the Engliſh fleet. Blake now directed his courſe towards Africa, in order to demand ſatisfaction from the pyratical ſtates of Barbary for the inſults and depredations they had committed on the Engliſh. On his arrival at Trepano, he detached ſeveral frigates to block up the Tuniſine ſhips at Porto Farino. Terrified at the appearance of Blake, the Dey of Algiers deſired to make a peace with the protector, and agreed to reſtrain his pyratical ſubjects from committing any farther violences on the Engliſh. But he was treated in a very different manner by the Dey of Tunis. On preſenting himſelf before that port, and making the ſame demands, the Dey, pointing to the caſtles of Porto Farino and Goletto, dared him to do his worſt. The courage of Blake needed not this bravado to rouze it into action: he laid the broadſides of his ſhips almoſt cloſe to the caſtles, and ſoon tore them in pieces with his artillery. While this furious attack was carrying on, he ſent a ſtrong detachment of ſeamen in their long boats up the harbour, and burnt every ſhip that lay there. Terrified and aſtoniſhed at an action hitherto conſidered as impoſſible, the Tuniſines were convinced that they had acted very imprudently; they agreed to make the required ſatisfaction, and courted the friendſhip of a man whoſe valour had filled the African ſtates with wonder and aſtoniſhment.

The expedition under Penn was leſs ſucceſsful. The fleet conſiſted of thirty ſhips of war, and a great number of tranſports, on board of which were five thouſand land forces, under the command of colonel Venables. They were joined by about five thouſand more at Barbadoes and St. Chriſtopher's. But the two commanders, though they both favoured monarchy, were of very different tempers. The troops were ill provided with arms, ammunition, and proviſions: they were the refuſe of the whole army, and thoſe inliſted in the Weſt-Indies the moſt profligate of mankind. Before the fleet and army ſailed from St. Chriſtopher's, a proclamation was publiſhed, by which it was declared, that neither the ſoldiers nor ſailors were to have any ſhare of the plunder; but, as an equivalent, to receive a fortnight's pay. Perhaps a more imprudent meaſure could not have been taken: the men were deprived of the only incentive to valour among ſuch people.

On the twentieth of April, the fleet arrived at the iſland of Hiſpaniola; and it was determined by the admiral and general to attack St. Domingo, the capital, and indeed the only place of ſtrength in the iſland; but this was over-ruled by the commiſſioners whom the protector had ſent on board the fleet, to regulate its operations, and act as ſpies on the conduct of both commanders. This oppoſition of the commiſſioners proved the ruin of the expedition. A ſmall part of the fleet was ordered to lie before the capital, to amuſe the enemy, while the main body of the forces were landed at Baſſado-bay, where the proclamation againſt plundering was again renewed. This threw ſuch a damp upon the ſpirits of the ſoldiers, that all the courage and intrepidity of their officers could not remove. In the mean time, colonel Buller had landed about ten miles from St. Domingo, at the head of the troops that had been left on board the ſhips to amuſe the enemy. It had been agreed, that Buller ſhould wait till he was joined by Venables, in order to attack a fort ſituated between them and the capital. But the enemy abandoning the fortreſs at the appearance of the Engliſh, Buller purſued his march towards St. Domingo, and encamped at ſome diſtance from a ſtrong fort, which formed the principal defence of the place. While Buller continued in his camp, Venables was obliged, during four days, to purſue a very fatiguing and diſcouraging march of near forty miles through an unknown and deſart country, where his men were every moment fainting with heat and thirſt.

During this delay, the Spaniards recovered from their conſternation; and having drawn together a conſiderable body of forces, lined the woods with ſtrong ambuſcades, by whom great numbers of the Engliſh were cut off in their march. Notwithſtanding this, the Engliſh attacked them with ſuch intrepidity, that they were driven from their faſtneſſes into the fort; and had not the Engliſh, through thirſt and faintneſs, been obliged to defer the attack of the fort, both that and the town itſelf muſt have fallen that very night into their hands. Nor could they continue on the ſpot where Buller was encamped for want of water; but were obliged to march to the place where that commander landed, where they continued till the twenty-fifth of Auguſt, under inexpreſſible hardſhips. Captain Cox, their principal guide, was ſlain; their bread was mouldy and ſcarce; their proviſions ſalt and rotten; their arms in very bad condition; one of their regiments gave evident ſigns of mutiny; no harmony ſubſiſted between their two principal commanders; and a peſtilential diſeaſe raged both in their fleet and camp. They, however, marched, on the twenty-ſixth of April, to attack the fort. Captain Jackſon, who commanded the van, led his men, either incautiouſly or treacherouſly, into a defile, lined on each ſide by the enemy's troops. The Engliſh had advanced ſo far before they perceived their danger, that they were expoſed to the whole fire of the Spaniards, without being able to return it with any effect; and every man of them muſt have been cut off, had not colonel Haynes, at the head of a detachment of his regiment, puſhed into the wood, and diſlodged the enemy, by attacking them in flank. Haynes himſelf was killed, after diſplaying amazing efforts of valour, together with moſt of the officers, and five hundred ſoldiers. The diverſion of Haynes enabled Venables to attack the enemy with advantage, and drive them into the fort. But the next morning it was found, that the only mortar-piece in the army was unfit for ſervice, and without a bombardment there were no hopes of ſucceſs. It was therefore determined to abandon the enterprize, and re-embark the forces.

In order to atone, if poſſible, for this miſcarriage, it was propoſed to make an attempt upon Jamaica, which ſurrendered to the Engliſh without making the leaſt reſiſtance. On their return, both the commanders were ſent to the Tower, though they had made a conqueſt of much greater importance to their country than that of Hiſpaniola itſelf. The protector immediately iſſued orders for ſending both men and money to his new conqueſt, and that iſland has ever ſince continued in the hands of the Engliſh.

The whole government being at this time veſted in the hands of the protector, whoſe deſignation and authority were entirely unknown in the Engliſh conſtitution, ſuch diſputes happened every day in the courts at Weſtminſter, concerning the foundation of his power, that they ſeemed to threaten to put a final ſtop to the courſe of juſtice itſelf: nor would the complicated affairs of government allow ſufficient leiſure for Cromwell to ſtudy a plan of civil government that might ſupply theſe defects. Conſcious that his preſent power reſted wholly on a military foundation, he determined to ſet up the military over the civil power: but before he could accompliſh his deſign, his attention was diverted from domeſtic to foreign affairs.

A. D. 1656. The Spaniards were no ſooner informed of the proceedings of Penn and Venables in the Weſt-Indies, than they declared war againſt the protector, and ſeized all the goods and ſhipping belonging to the Engliſh merchants in the territories of Spain. The commerce with that kingdom, ſo advantageous to the nation, was entirely at an end, and near fifteen hundred merchantmen fell into the hands of the enemy. Blake received orders to begin hoſtilities againſt the Spaniards, and exert all his abilities to intercept their Plate fleet. But many of his officers, perſuaded that the war carried on againſt Spain was unjuſt, and contrary to the principles of the law of nature, threw up their commiſſions, returned to their country, and lived retired.

This, however, did not diſpirit Blake; he reſolved to do his duty as an honeſt man. He cruized, for ſome time, off Cadiz, in expectation of falling in with the Plate fleet; but being at laſt diſtreſſed for want of water, he was obliged to ſail towards Portugal, in order to procure a ſupply. Soon after his departure, captain Stayner, whom he had left on the Spaniſh coaſt with a ſquadron of ſeven ſhips, came in ſight of the galleons, and crowded all the ſail he could carry, in order to come up with them; but before this could be effected, the Spaniſh admiral ran his ſhip aſhore, and was followed by two others. The reſt were following the example, but were taken by the Engliſh, and valued at near two million of pieces of eight. The two galleons on ſhore were ſet on fire; and the marquis of Bajadox, viceroy of Peru, with his wife and daughter, periſhed in the flames.

This ſucceſs added ſome ſhare of popularity to Cromwell's government; and he took care to diſplay all the advantages of this acquiſition, by ordering the treaſure taken in the galleons to be brought up from Portſmouth to London by land. Before this welcome ſupply arrived, Cromwell had been reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of money, and ſeverely laſhed in ſeveral pamphlets by ſome of the members of the long parliament. He had, indeed, laid exceſſive impoſitions on the royaliſts, and publiſhed ſeveral rigorous edicts for collecting the public taxes; but all theſe reſources were not ſufficient to defray the expences of government.

The next action that happened between the Engliſh and the Spaniards acquired much greater glory to the Engliſh arms, though far from being attended with ſuch emoluments to the nation. Blake had not been long returned from the coaſt of Portugal, before he received advice that a Spaniſh fleet of ſixteen ſhips, much richer than the former, had taken ſhelter in the bay of Santa Cruz, in one of the Canary iſlands. Blake immediately ſailed thither, and ſoon found that his intelligence had not deceived him; but he perceived that every precaution had been taken to render any attempt upon the galleons abortive. Their ſmaller ſhips were moored cloſe to the ſhore, under the numerous cannon of a ſtrong caſtle, and ſeven ſmaller batteries well mounted with artillery, and a line of communication running between them all. Six large galleons lay near the entrance of the harbour, a ſtrong boom being drawn acroſs its mouth, fitted up like floating batteries, with their broadſides towards the Engliſh.

Blake ſurveyed theſe batteries with the cloſeſt attention, but was rather animated than daunted by the danger. He called a council of war, and it was unanimouſly determined to burn the Spaniſh galleons. Blake himſelf undertook the attack of the large ſhips and forts, while Stayner attempted to force his way into the harbour. Accordingly, as ſoon as the morning appeared, Stayner, in the Speaker frigate, ſtood into the bay with his ſquadron, while Blake attacked the forts and galleons. The dreadful ſcene that followed is eaſier imagined than deſcribed. The Spaniards themſelves believed it to be the effect of fiends rather than of men, and thanked heaven they could loſe no part of their honour in the action, as they were born to fight with men, and not with devils. Every circumſtance tended to confirm them in that deluſion. The thundering of Blake's cannon; the fury of his ſailors, who ruſhed amidſt the thickeſt of the enemy's fire, as if they had been invulnerable, and ſeemed to ſeek their ſafety in the mouth of danger; the ſhouts of the aſſailants, and the groans of the wounded, heard in the ſhort intervals between the roaring of the artillery; and, at laſt, the flames of their own ſhips, burſting through the clouds of ſmoke, and lighting up the dreadful ſcene of death and ruin, convinced the Spaniards that all oppoſition was in vain; they thought it would be madneſs to oppoſe force and courage to a ſupernatural power. The fire from their forts abated; their troops were driven from their intrenchments; their harbour was in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, and their ſhips totally abandoned; ſo that not one of them eſcaped the flames, except two which had been ſunk in the action.

This battle aſtoniſhed all Europe. It ſeemed beyond the power of a few ſhips to attack and ſilence a ſtrong caſtle, numerous forts, and a large fleet, well furniſhed with men and artillery, and aſſiſted by every requiſite, either for offence or defence, that human prudence could deviſe. A greater danger ſtill attended the Engliſh; the wind blew right into the bay; and their eagerneſs had carried them ſo near the ſhore, that their ſhips muſt have been deſtroyed, had not the wind, by ſuddenly ſhifting, removed all their fears, and carried them beyond the reach of danger. Though this action was remarkably ſevere, and though the Engliſh expoſed themſelves to the thickeſt of the enemy's fire, they had only forty-eight men killed, and one hundred and twenty wounded. The loſs of the Spaniards, both in men and ſhips, was very great; and the latter, for ſome time, irrepairable. A very conſiderable part of the rich lading of the galleons, being too bulky to be carried off, periſhed in the flames.

This was at once the greateſt and laſt action of the intrepid Blake. His health had been, for ſome time, declining, and he now obtained permiſſion to return; but he lived not to land in his native country. He died in his paſſage, and has always been conſidered as one of the greateſt men this country has ever produced. Though a ſtrict republican in principles, he always enjoyed the confidence of Cromwell. "We ſhould fight for our country," ſaid he, "into whatever hands the government may fall." The ſtrongeſt proof of his merit is, that, in the midſt of ſo many jarring, and even hoſtile factions, he was eſteemed by them all.

If Cromwell was at once both loved and reſpected abroad, his adminiſtration was not leſs calculated to maintain his authority at home. A ſtrict obſerver of juſtice and the laws, as far as his uſurped authority would admit, he ſupported both with equal vigour. He had quelled a late inſurrection of the royaliſts, but he refuſed, with indignation, the counſel of his officers to maſſacre all the inſurgents. The army continued faithful to him, notwithſtanding the dangerous enthuſiaſm that ſtill prevailed among the officers and ſoldiers. The militia, kept up and exerciſed with care in the ſeveral counties, was always ready, on the firſt ſignal, to lend him very powerful aſſiſtance. As religion, or rather fanaticiſm directed the multitude, one of his principal cares was to manage the fiery preſbyterians, by gaining over their adverſaries, which he accompliſhed by means of a general telleration, from which none but papiſts and the partizans of epiſcopacy were excluded. Attentive to the ſmalleſt particular, he had ſpies in almoſt every place, where any intelligence was likely to be procured; it is ſaid that theſe coſt him ſixty thouſand pounds a year. He was apprehenſive of nothing but aſſaſſination, againſt which neither prudence nor vigilance could avail. Colonel Titus, under the name of Allen, wrote a very ſpirited pamphlet, exhorting every one who wiſhed well to his country, to embrace this method of vengeance, the only one in their power to put a period to the uſurpation of a tyrant. This publication alarmed Cromwell: he knew that the minds of the royal party were ſufficiently inflamed to put ſo obvious a method in practice. He therefore declared openly, that he looked upon all attempts of that kind as baſe and odious, and would never begin hoſtilities by ſo ſhameful an expedient; but if the firſt attempt came from them he would retaliate the injury by every method in his power; that he did not want agents ſufficient to execute his purpoſe, and that he would employ them to the utter extinction of the royal family. This menace probably ſaved him from the dagger of the aſſaſſin.

A. D. 1657 Cromwell had always been deſirous of giving the power he had uſurped the ſanction of a legal eſtabliſhment, and now determined to make another attempt to effect it. He accordingly aſſembled a parliament compoſed of the repreſentatives of the three kingdoms. Ireland and Scotland, reduced to a ſtate of ſlavery, nominated ſuch members as were conformable to his wiſhes. But the ſpirit of the Engliſh was not yet ſufficiently ſubdued to ſubmit to his arbitrary directions. He ſoon perceived that many of the diſſatisfied members in the laſt parliament were again returned, and began to fear they would be too powerful for his friends. In order therefore to ſecure a majority, he excluded a hundred ſuſpected members, and thus made himſelf maſter of the parliament. This being effected, every thing followed of courſe; for though there was ſtill a ſtrong oppoſition, the majority was on the ſide of the protector's friends. They began with abrogating all the titles of Charles Stuart and his family. This being effected it was moved that the protector ſhould have the title of king; and after a very warm debate it was carried that a bill ſhould be brought in for that purpoſe. It was urged that the Engliſh conſtitution neceſſarily ſuppoſed a royal authority; that the laws admitted not of a protector except during a minitory, and had not fixed the prerogatives of the functions of that office; that to remove all appearance of arbitrary power, the only method was to have recourſe to a title which the nation had always reſpected; and that this was the more practicable, as an expreſs law of Henry VII. had provided for the ſecurity of thoſe who defended the reigning prince; a ſufficient proof that the legiſlation depended more on the form of government, than on the birthright of the ſupreme magiſtrate. The bill was violently oppoſed by Lambert, the major-generals, and all the republican party. But being unable to anſwer the above arguments, they had recourſe to a very tumultuous behaviour, which ſufficiently convinced Cromwell, that unleſs he could prevail with the officers of the army to join with the majority in parliament, he muſt renounce the honour he ſo ardently wiſhed to obtain. No arts were left untried to bring Lambert over to his purpoſe, but in vain. Fleetwood and Deſborough were alſo averſe to his accepting the title of king; and declared, if the bill paſſed, and received the aſſent of the protector, they would immediately reſign their commiſſions, though they would make no efforts to diſturb the government.

The houſe, however, proceeded in their deſign; and at laſt, after a long and violent debate, it was voted, "That his highneſs will be pleaſed to aſſume the name, ſtile, title, dignity, and office of king of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the reſpective dominions thereunto belonging, and to exerciſe the ſame according to the laws of theſe nations." A committee was now appointed to reaſon with the protector, and, if poſſible, overcome thoſe ſcruples, which he pretended he entertained againſt accepting ſo liberal an offer.

Cromwell ſtrongly oppoſed all their reaſons, which were urged with great ſtrength and eloquence. But his oppoſition proceeded not from the reaſonableneſs of his accepting the offer. He was well convinced of the ſolidity of their arguments; and his inclination, as well as judgment, was entirely on the ſide of the committee. But the oppoſition of his friends, and that of the army, terrified him. He knew the office of king had been painted in ſuch horrid colours, that there were no hopes of reconciling the ſoldiers to it ſuddenly, even though beſtowed upon their general, to whom they were ſo remarkably devoted. He knew that the tranſition between coldneſs and averſion was very ſmall; that they who had loved with the greateſt affection, hated with the moſt deadly rancour; and it was impoſſible to foreſee what diſappointment and deſpair might occaſion. Some already talked of dividing England into a new heptarchy, to be governed by the chief officers of the army. Even this ſtrange deſign the republicans would rather have adopted, than agree to Cromwell's accepting of the royal dignity. He was alſo fearful, that when the queſtion regarded only perſons, not forms of government, no one would any longer balance between the ancient royal family and an ignoble perſon, who had waded to the throne through a torrent of blood. Suſpended between theſe fears and his own ardent deſires, Cromwell protracted the time, and ſeemed ſtill to oppoſe the reaſons of the committee, hoping that he might be able, by artifice, to reconcile the minds of the ſoldiers to his new dignity. His elocution was always confuſed; but now, when he reaſoned in contradiction to his own judgment and inclination, it was involved in tenfold darkneſs; it was deſtitute both of reaſon and common ſenſe.

At laſt, after an agony of perplexity, occaſioned by a long and tedious ſeries of doubts, the protector was obliged to refuſe that crown which he ſo ardently wiſhed to receive, and which the repreſentatives of the nation had tendered him in the moſt ſolemn manner. Upon this refuſal, the parliament found it neceſſary to retain the name of Commonwealth and Protector; but as the government had hitherto been a manifeſt uſurpation, it was thought neceſſary to give it a parliamentary ſanction.

In order to this, it was proper to ſet aſide the inſtrument of government, which had been drawn up by the general officers only, and ſubſtitute another in its room. This was accordingly done, and a new inſtrument of government was framed, and offered to the protector by the parliament, under the title of "An humble petition and advice." This act of the legiſlature formed the baſis of the republican government; by it the powers of each member of the conſtitution was regulated and limited, in order to place the liberty of the people on a more ſolid foundation. In ſome particulars, the authority of the protector was enlarged, and in others diminiſhed, by this deed. He had the power of naming his ſucceſſor; he had a perpetual revenue aſſigned him, a million a year for the fleet and the army, and three hundred thouſand pounds for the civil government. He had the power of eſtabliſhing another houſe of parliament, the members of which were to hold their ſeats during life, and to exerciſe many of the functions of the former houſe of peers. On the other hand, his power of framing laws with the conſent of his council, during the receſs of parliament, was abrogated: and it was eſtabliſhed, that no member of either houſe ſhould be excluded, but by the conſent of that houſe of which he was a member. The other articles received very little alteration, remaining the ſame in ſubſtance as in the firſt inſtrument of government. This parliamentary ſanction being obtained, Cromwell was again inaugurated, with the utmoſt pomp and ceremony, in Weſtminſter-hall; and on the twenty-ſixth of June, he put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament.

The ſituation of the protector was now very critical in England. He had indeed obtained the diſpoſal of a very large revenue; but great difficulties attended it. His acceptance of the office and title of protector, had not leſſened them, and the force he had put upon the parliament by excluding ſo many of the members was univerſally condemned. Even thoſe who were moſt deſirous of a ſettlement, upon almoſt any terms, and would have been contented, for the ſake of a permanent government, to have ſubmitted to his authority, either as king or protector, entertained many ſcruples with regard to the legality of the proceedings of a parliament, which ſat under a viſible force. Cromwell found that theſe ſcruples were invincible; and his enemies having already felt his ſeverity, he was now determined they ſhould taſte his clemency. Lambert was allowed a penſion of four thouſand pounds a year. Ludlow was ſuffered to reſide in his own houſe, Sir Harry Vane was releaſed from his confinement in Cariſbrook-caſtle, and he determined to ſuffer the ſecluded members to take their ſeats the next ſeſſion of parliament. In the mean time Cromwell applied himſelf cloſely to the formation of his upper houſe of parliament, which was to conſiſt of ſixty members, among whom were five or ſix ancient peers, and ſeveral gentlemen of fortune and diſtinction; the reſt were officers of the army, who had riſen from the dregs of the people. All the ancient peers, however, refuſed to accept a ſeat, which they muſt ſhare with ſuch companions as were aſſigned them.

A. D. 1658. On the twentieth of January the parliament met, purſuant to their prorogation, and the protector, in order to maintain the appearance of a legal magiſtrate, removed the guards from the doors of both houſes. The firſt ſubject of deliberation among the commons was the illegality of excluding ſo many of their members during the laſt ſeſſion of parliament. In this debate it was confidently affirmed, that there could be no free parliament under ſuch a force, and therefore, that the humble petition and advice, together with all that had been done in conſequence of it, were invalid; nor were they obliged to take any notice of the other houſe. Cromwell, by taking ſo many of his friends and adherents from the lower houſe, in order to form the upper, had loſt the majority among the national repreſentatives. The enemies of the protector were ſoon ſenſible of their power; they made and carried a motion not to acknowledge the juriſdiction of the other houſe which Cromwell had eſtabliſhed.

While the commons were thus oppoſing the arbitrary proceedings of the government, a petition was preparing in the city for taking the power of the militia out of the protector's hands. Exaſperated at theſe meaſures, Cromwell ſent a very ſharp meſſage to the commons, acquainting them that he expected they would give the ſame appellation, and pay the ſame attention to the lords, as had been given or paid to any houſe of peers in England. But the commons, inſtigated by Lambert and Haſlerigg within doors, and by Harriſon and the fifth monarchy-men without, paid no regard to his threat, or his authority. Cromwell was now ſufficiently exaſperated, and without conſulting any perſon, flung himſelf into a common coach, and with no more than four or five of his guards, and attended by his nephew and a lieutenant-colonel, hurried to the houſe of peers, where he whiſpered Fleetwood, that he was come to diſſolve the parliament. Fleetwood, who ſeems to have acted in concert with the malecontents, uſed every argument in his power to diſſuade Cromwell from his purpoſe. He deſired him to reflect a moment on the dreadful conſequences that had generally attended a haſty diſſolution of the parliament. But Cromwell, without paying any attention to his arguments, laid his hand upon his breaſt, and ſwore by the living God they ſhould not ſit a moment longer. He accordingly ſent a meſſage to the commons commanding their attendance in the houſe of peers, where, after a very reproachful ſpeech, he diſſolved the parliament.

This precipitate action, which in any other perſon, would have been conſidered as an indication of madneſs, was in this extraordinary man, a meaſure at once both bold and neceſſary, and prompted by that genius which ſeldom or never forſook him. But notwithſtanding all his power, his abilities, and the terror of his name, he was now ſurrounded with dangers both open and ſecret. The fifth monarchy-men had long been his avowed enemies. They pretended to aboliſh all taxes, cuſtoms, tythes, and every other burthen laid upon the people. They held their meetings at Mile-end, and though they were in general perſons of the loweſt condition, they were bold, bloody and deſperate. They depended greatly upon major-general Harriſon, admiral Lawſon, and the colonels Rich, Danvers and Okey to head them. They had even their cabals and correſpondents in every part of the kingdom. But Cromwell's intrepidity, and Thurloe's excellent intelligence, rendered all their ſchemes abortive; and about ten of the moſt deſperate among them were ſeized in the midſt of their conſultations, together with the ſtandard they intended to erect, as the ſignal of the commencement of the reign of the ſaints upon earth.

This well-timed action did not, however, put an end to their cabals. Cromwell perceived that the poiſon had reached much farther than he expected. Several of the officers of the army, and even ſome of them who ſerved about his perſon, became ſullen and gloomy; a ſure indication that they were forming ſome dangerous deſign. The protector therefore aſſembled all the officers near London, among whom major Packer, and moſt of the captains of his own regiment were chiefly ſuſpected. Cromwell repaired to the meeting, and in a very authoritative tone of voice, demanded whether they were willing to ſerve him againſt his enemies? Over-awed by the preſence of their general, they continued ſilent for ſome time; at laſt they ſaid, they were ready to ſerve him upon the footing of "the good old cauſe." Cromwell treated that expreſſion with great contempt, and after aſking what they meant by uſing it now, he immediately diſmiſſed them from their poſts in the army, and gave their commiſſions to others whom he knew he could truſt. This inſtance of firmneſs and ſeverity produced the deſired effect; the reſt of the officers promiſing to obey him with great alacrity.

The daring ſpirit of Cromwell only was capable of diſcharging men, who had been the principal inſtruments of his greatneſs. But it ſeems to have given him no diſquiet. He was perſuaded they could never join with the royaliſts, from whom alone he was apprehenſive of danger: He did not indeed think it prudent to treat the chief officers, who were equally diſcontented, in ſo deſpotic a manner: he endeavoured to regain their favour by careſſes; but was never able to remove the hatred they had conceived againſt the government. The wiſeſt and richeſt of the royaliſts, lived upon their eſtates, pleaſed with obſerving the deſpotiſm which Cromwell had exerciſed over a parliament, who had treated them in ſo tyrannical a manner. They ſaw with delight the perpetual commotions of the public, from a perſuaſion that out of confuſion order muſt at laſt ariſe. Their retirements, their ſtudies, their reflections, tended happily to promote the good of their country. They had now ſufficient leiſure to reflect on the errors of the late king, and comparing them with the diſtractions of the government that ſucceeded. Theſe they ſaw evidently were the extremes of legiſlation, and that in the mean between them true liberty was to be found.

The Spaniards, deſirous of diſtreſſing the Engliſh government, had invited Charles to Bruges, where he appeared at the head of four thouſand men, chiefly Engliſh, formed into four regiments. This revived the hopes of the royaliſts, and a general inſurrection was projected. Ormond was ſecretly diſpatched to England, in order to concert meaſures for the execution of this deſign. Lord Fairfax, Sir William Waller, and ſeveral more of the leaders of the preſbyterian party had ſecretly entered into the engagement. The army was ſtill infected with the general ſpirit of diſcontent; and, after the protector's violent breach with the late parliament, no hopes remained of founding his power on the baſis of legiſlative authority. His adminiſtration, ſo expenſive both in military enterprizes and ſecret intelligence, had exhauſted his treaſury, and involved him in a conſiderable debt. All his arts of policy were exhauſted; and having ſo often deceived every party by proud and falſe pretences, he could no longer hope that the ſame arts would be attended with the ſame ſucceſs.

But notwithſtanding all theſe promiſing circumſtances, the conſpiracy of the royaliſts was rendered abortive. Cromwell was informed of their deſign before it was ripe for execution. The marquis of Ormond was obliged to fly to the continent; and great numbers of the royaliſts were thrown into priſon. Sir Henry Slingſby, and Dr. Huet, were condemned and beheaded; and Mordant, brother to the earl of Peterborough, eſcaped the ſame fate merely by the accident of colonel Pride's being abſent, till the ſentence was pronounced in his favour. For the numbers were equal, and Pride, who was his declared enemy, entered the court juſt as the preſident had finiſhed his determination.

Nor was the protector free from the fears of aſſaſſination; Sindercombe, one of the fifth monarchy-men, had undertaken to murder him, and it was only by the intervention of the moſt unaccountable accidents that he was prevented from executing his bloody purpoſe. His deſign was at laſt diſcovered; but though the cleareſt proof of his guilt was apparent to the jury, and though every man held the crime of which he was accuſed in the utmoſt deteſtation, it was not without the greateſt difficulty they could be prevailed upon to find him guilty; ſo greatly were they diſſatisfied with the protector's right of ſupreme government of the nation. This incident could not fail of giving Cromwell the utmoſt uneaſineſs; and which was greatly increaſed by the firmneſs of Sindercombe, who refuſed to diſcover any of his accomplices.

Mrs. Claypole, Cromwell's beloved daughter, a lady endued with every humane virtue, and the moſt amiable accompliſhments, had entertained the higheſt regard for Dr. Huet, and made the moſt preſſing inſtances to her father to ſave his life; but being refuſed his pardon, her temper, which was always enclined to melancholy, preyed upon her health; and after uſing the moſt preſſing remonſtrances to awaken the protector into a compunction for the heinous crimes into which his ambition had betrayed him, ſhe paid the debt of nature amidſt the tears of all who were friends to virtue. Her death greatly affected Cromwell. And her words now obtained their full force; they embittered the ſmall remainder of his life. His old friend, the earl of Warwick died alſo about the ſame time, which greatly affected him, and he began to perceive, when it was too late, that the purſuits of ambition are not the purſuits of peace.

His compoſure and tranquillity of mind were now fled for ever. He ſaw that all his neareſt and moſt beloved friends, Fleetwood, Deſborough, Claypole, and Falconbridge, abhorred his principles; and he who had ſo lately the whole army at his call, could now hardly find five men in the whole nation to ſecond his favourite deſigns. He was become a bankrupt both in his government and his private fortune; and notwithſtanding all the mighty things he had done, he found himſelf no better than a ſplendid wretch ſurrounded with misfortunes, which the ſmalleſt grain of genuine virtue in his former career of glory, might either have prevented or removed. His diſſimulation was at once ſo groſs and odious, that had he now actually returned to the paths of virtue, not a man in England would have thought him ſincere; even his profeſſing it muſt only have tended to have increaſed the public deteſtation of his hypocriſy.

Amidſt all theſe diſtreſſes of mind, he was ſeized, on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, with a ſlow fever, which ſoon after changed into a tertian ague. No dangerous ſymptoms, however, appeared for ſome time, and he was even able to walk abroad during the intervals between the fits. But the fever, as well as the force of the paroxyſm of the diſeaſe, increaſing at every return, Cromwell himſelf began to be apprehenſive that his end was approaching. His thoughts were now turned towards a future ſtate, which had formerly been the conſtant ſubject of his contemplations; but which the continual wars and affairs of government, had for ſome time totally interrupted. Goodwin, one of his enthuſiaſtic preachers, conſtantly attended him, and endeavoured to remove from his mind that deſpondency in which he was now involved. One day, when he was cloſely engaged in this pious converſation, Cromwell aſked him, with great emotion, "whether it was poſſible for the elect to fall, or ſuffer a final reprobation?" "It is impoſſible," replied the preacher. "Then," cried Cromwell, with an air of ſatisfaction, "I am ſafe; for I am ſure I was once in a ſtate of grace."

Fully ſenſible of the dangerous condition of the protector, the phyſicians were continually intimating to thoſe about him, and even often to himſelf, that they thought it highly prudent to ſettle the affairs of government. On the other hand, his chaplains, by their prayers, viſions, and revelations, inſpired him with ſuch hopes, that he believed he was no longer in danger. "I ſhall not die of this diſtemper," ſaid he one day to his phyſicians; "I am well aſſured of my recovery. My ſupplications have prevailed; I am promiſed it from the Lord." Thoſe ſtrange enthuſiaſtic notions ſeem to have prevailed among all his friends. "The lord," ſaid Fleetwood, in a letter to Henry Cromwell, "will ſoon reſtore him, and bring him forth with more vigour, life and zeal. His highneſs has himſelf had very great diſcoveries from the Lord. He hath received aſſurances of his being reſtored, and of being farther ſerviceable in the great work he hath begun." Goodwin was ſo thoroughly convinced of his being in no danger of death, that he uſed the following expreſſion in his prayer: "Lord we beg not for his recovery, for that thou haſt already granted and aſſured us of, but for his ſpeedy recovery." Even when the phyſicians abſolutely deſpaired of his being able to ſupport the next fit of his diſeaſe, Thurloe has the following expreſſion in his diſpatch to Henry Cromwell, "That which is ſome ground of hope is, that the Lord has, as on ſome former occaſions, given to himſelf a particular aſſurance, that he ſhall yet live to ſerve him, and to carry on the great work he hath put into his hands."

At laſt the phyſicians were obliged to declare that all hopes were over. The council was now ſufficiently alarmed; and a deputation was ſent to know his pleaſure with regard to a ſucceſſion. But before they reached his apartment, he was ſpeechleſs and almoſt inſenſible. They aſked whether he did not intend that his eldeſt ſon Richard ſhould ſucceed him; and a ſimple affirmation was, or ſeemed to be, extorted from him. He lived only a few minutes after, paying the debt of nature on the third of September, in the ſixtieth year of his age, amidſt a ſtorm ſo dreadful all over Europe, that it ſeemed a general wreck of nature. This tempeſt happening at ſo critical a moment, gave occaſion to many reflections both of his friends and enemies. The day on which he died was alſo much taken notice of, it being the anniverſary of his moſt glorious ſucceſſes at Dunbar and Worceſter, which he always conſidered as the moſt fortunate events of his whole life.

The character of Cromwell has been often drawn both by his friends and enemies. The former ſeems dictated by panegyric, and the latter by invective. It muſt be owned, however, that both carry the ſtrongeſt air of probability, becauſe they are ſupported by ſtriking circumſtances in his conduct and fortune. "What, ſay his friends, can be more extraordinary, than that a perſon, of private birth and education, no fortune, no eminent qualities of body, which have ſometimes, nor ſhining talents of mind, which have often raiſed men to the higheſt dignities, ſhould have the courage to attempt, and the abilities to execute ſo extraordinary a deſign as the ſubverting one of the moſt ancient and beſt eſtabliſhed monarchies in the world? That he ſhould have the power and boldneſs to put his prince and maſter to an open and infamous death? Should baniſh that numerous and ſtrongly allied family? Cover all theſe temerities under a ſeeming obedience to a parliament, in whoſe ſervice he pretended to be retained? Trample too upon that parliament in their turn, and ſcornfully expel them as ſoon as they gave him ground for diſſatisfaction? Erect in their place the dominion of the ſaints, and give reality to the moſt viſionary idea, which the heated imagination of any fanatic was ever able to entertain? Suppreſs that monſter in its infancy, and openly ſet up himſelf above all that ever attained the appellation of ſovereign in England! Overcome firſt his enemies by arms, and afterwards all his friends by artifice? Served all parties patiently for a while, and command them victoriouſly at laſt? Over-run each corner of the three nations, and ſubdue with equal facility, both the riches of the ſouth and the poverty of the north? Be feared and courted by all foreign princes, and adopted a brother to gods upon earth? Call together parliaments with a word of his pen, and ſcatter them again with the breath of his mouth? Reduce to ſubjection a warlike and diſcontented nation, by means of a mutinous army? Command a mutinous army by means of ſeditious and factious officers? Be humbly and daily petitioned, that he would be pleaſed, at the rate of milions a year, to be hired as maſter of thoſe who had hired him before to be their ſervant? Have the eſtates and lives of three nations as much at his diſpoſal as was once the little inheritance of his father, and be as noble and liberal in the ſpending of them? And laſtly (for there is no end of enumerating his glory) with one word bequeath all his power and ſplendor to his poſterity? Die poſſeſſed of peace at home and triumph abroad? Be buried among kings, and with more than regal ſolemnity? And leave a name behind him not to be extinguiſhed but with the whole world; which, as it was too little for his praiſe, ſo it might have ſtretched out to the extent of his immortal deſigns?"

On the other hand his enemies have placed the actions of this extraordinary man in the moſt odious point of light. "What, ſay they, can be more ſuperlatively wicked than for a perſon to endeavour not only to exalt himſelf above, but to trample upon all his equals and ſuperiors? To pretend freedom for all men, and under the cloak of that pretence, to make all men his ſervants? To take up arms againſt taxes amounting to ſcarce two hundred thouſand pounds a year, and to lay himſelf upon the nation the enormous load of above two millions? To quarrel for the loſs of three or four ears, and ſtrike off three or four thouſand heads? To fight againſt an imaginary ſuſpicion of two thouſand guards for the king to be fetched from no body knew were, and keep up for himſelf no leſs than forty thouſand? To pretend the defence of parliaments, and violently to diſſolve all, even thoſe of his own calling, and almoſt of his own chuſing? To undertake the reformation of religion, and on that pretence to ſtrip to the ſkin, and then to expoſe it naked to the rage of every ſect? To eſtabliſh councils of rapine and courts of murder? To fight againſt the king under a commiſſion for him? To take him out of the hands of thoſe for whom he had conquered him? To deceive him by proteſtations and vows of fidelity and when he had effected his purpoſe, to put him to death, in the face of the world? To receive a commiſſion from the king and parliament, and murder the one and deſtroy the other? To fight againſt monarchy, when he declared for it, “and to declare againſt it, when he wiſhed to acquire it in his own perſon? To defame preſidiouſly, and ſupplant ungratefully his own general, and afterwards moſt of thoſe officers, who with the loſs of their honour, had raiſed him to the ſummit of his unreaſonable ambition? To break his faith equally with his enemies and with his friends? To make as frequent uſe of the moſt ſolemn perjuries, as the common people of cuſtomary oaths? To uſurp three kingdoms without the leaſt ſhadow of pretenſions, and govern them as unjuſtly as they were acquired? To ſet himſelf up as an idol, and make the ſtreets of London reſemble the valley of Hinnom, by burning the bowels of men, as a ſacrifice to himſelf? To endeavour to entail this uſurpation upon poſterity, and with it an endleſs war upon the nation? And laſtly, by the ſevereſt judgment of the Almighty, to die hardened, mad, and without repentance, with the curſes of the preſent, and the deteſtation of all ſucceeding ages?”

Such are the different characters given of Cromwell, and both are founded on facts and circumſtances that cannot be controverted. But from the whole we may ſafely conclude, that he wanted nothing but honeſty, to make him one of the greateſt men in the world.

Cromwell was married to Elizabeth, daughter to Sir James Bouchier, by whom he had two ſons, Richard who ſucceeded him, and Henry, lord-lieutenant of Ireland; and four daughters, Bridget, married to general Fleetwood; Elizabeth, to John Claypole, of Northamptonſhire, eſq; Mary, to lord Falconbridge; and Frances, to lord Rich.

The powerful, the dreaded Cromwell being now no more, ſome ſudden revolution in the ſtate, which muſt deſtroy the preſent ill-conſtructed fabric of government, was immediately expected. But this was not the caſe. The council, the army, the navy, even the whole country at once, acknowledged Richard Cromwell protector of the commonwealth. He was a plain, indolent, good-natured young man, brought up in the country, at a diſtance from buſineſs and intrigue, and neither formed by inclination, inured by habit, nor aſſiſted by talents ſufficient to enable him to ſupply the place of his father. Henry Cromwell, who governed Ireland with great popularity and applauſe, inſured to his brother the obedience of that kingdom. General Monk, whoſe authority was well eſtabliſhed in Scotland, proclaimed the new protector in the principal towns of that kingdom. Addreſſes flowed from every part of the kingdom, and Richard was treated with the ſame reſpect as his father.

But this external complaiſance among the fanatical leaders of the different parties, was nothing better than a deceitful calm which ſuited the views of all, as a breathing time for concerting plans to promote their own intereſts. No perſon could have been found more unexceptionable for this purpoſe than Richard. The republicans did not fear him, nor the royaliſts hate him; and his advancement was of the utmoſt conſequence to thoſe who were in the preſent poſſeſſion of the government. But a queſtion was ſoon ſtarted in the council, whether Richard, according to the tenor of the humble petition and advice, was to be conſidered as general of the army. This was ſtriking at the very baſis of all his power, and the ſecret cabals againſt him were indefatigable in forming plans for his ruin.

A. D. 1659. But as ſupplies were wanting for the affairs of government it was thought neceſſary to call a parliament. The upper houſe, or houſe of peers, conſiſted of the ſame perſons who had been nominated by Oliver himſelf, and thence conſidered as friends to his family. And in order to inſure a majority in the commons, it was thought neceſſary to reſtore to the old boroughs their former right of ſending members to parliament; while the counties were allowed no more than their accuſtomed members. By this means the miniſtry procured a majority in the lower as well as in the upper houſe, and all the members ſigned, without heſitation, an engagement not to alter the preſent government.

On the firſt of February, ſecretary Thurloe preſented to the commons, “An act of recognition of his highneſs's right and title to be protector and chief magiſtrate of the commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging.” This act was very artfully drawn, the recognitory part being expreſſed in general terms; but it contained a very particular and ample abjuration of the royal family. A ſmall debate only enſued on the firſt reading, but the republicans determined to oppoſe it with all their power when it came to be read a ſecond time. They ſaw that it virtually contained a recognition of the petition and advice, which they were determined, if poſſible, to ſet aſide, and conſequently deſtroy the baſis of the protector's government. Beſides the republican and miniſterial parties, there were two others in the houſe, who had views of their own, and though directly oppoſite to each other, agreed in one point, that of embarraſſing both the others. The firſt was compoſed of men of deſperate fortunes, and who wiſhed to ſee Fleetwood commander in chief of the army, hoping that the government would once more fall into the hands of the military, and both king and protector be excluded. The miniſterial party had, however, ſtill a majority in the houſe. But the proceedings of this parliament afford a memorable inſtance, that a dead majority in an Engliſh houſe of commons, may carry their queſtions, and yet loſe their purpoſes. The republicans were much bolder and far better ſpeakers than their antagoniſts. In oppoſing this bill, they founded their arguments on the conſtitution ſettled immediately after the death of the late king, and Sir Harry Vane very pertinently obſerved, that if the government founded at that period was illegal, they were guilty of the blood of their late prince. The miniſterial party, on the other hand, went no farther back than the inſtrument of petition and advice, which they contended to be the laſt, and only legal conſtitution of government. But even admitting that poſition, they found themſelves embarraſſed with another difficulty, that of proving that the privileges and authority granted by that inſtrument to the protector were not perſonal, and terminated with his life. Even if they did not, the republicans contended, that a free parliament ought to have no regard to the whole, or any part of that inſtrument, becauſe it was voted by a power deſtructive of that conſtitution, which gave their aſſembly an exiſtence as a parliament. Their arguments had great effect upon the people, eſpecially as the anſwers given to them, by the miniſterial party were far from being thought ſufficient.

Fleetwood, who had concealed his ambition under the veil of an obſequious behaviour to the new protector, could not help obſerving, that the army, by joining the republicans, might retrieve at once their power and popularity. But the greateſt art was neceſſary to form this connection, as the protector's influence among the troops was very powerful. It was therefore contrived between him and Deſborough, to introduce Lambert once more on the ſtage. That general ever ſince he had been deprived of his commiſſion, had lived retired at Wimbleton in Surry; but he no ſooner ſaw a proſpect of regaining his former authority, than he reſumed all his ambitious proſpects. Many of the principal officers in the army thought he had been ungenerouſly treated by the late protector, and his ſufferings had, in ſome meaſure, rendered him popular. Fleetwood therefore ſecretly made uſe of Lambert to ſtrengthen the diſcontented party among the officers, while Deſborough declared openly and violently for a republic. The meetings for carrying on their deſtructive ſchemes were held at Wallingford-houſe, where Fleetwood reſided, and hence the aſſembly was called the cabal of Wallingford-houſe.

While the officers of the army were employed in theſe conſultations, the debates in parliament were carried on with great vehemence by both parties. The republicans exerted all their power to have the militia and negative voice ſettled in the repreſentatives of the people, while the miniſterial party ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on recognizing the protector. Many expedients were propoſed for reconciling the two parties, but in vain; both continued firm to their principles. After the queſtion had been debated for ſeveral days, with the utmoſt warmth and freedom, the miniſterial party carried their point, by a majority of one hundred and ninety-one, againſt one hundred and ſixty-eight. The republicans were not, however, diſcouraged. They procured the following reſolution to be taken by the houſe, viz. "That before the bill of recognition be committed, this houſe doth declare ſuch additional clauſe to be part of the bill, as may limit the power of the chief magiſtrate, and fully ſecure the right and privileges of parliament, and the liberties and rights of the people; and that neither this, nor any other previous vote, that is, or ſhall be paſſed, in order to this bill, ſhall be of force or binding to the people, till the whole bill is paſſed."

The carrying this reſolution, ruined the republicans: they fancied they were now a match for their opponents, and had recourſe to methods that leſſened their intereſt. They reſumed the deſign of preſenting a petition in favour of a republic, which was in great forwardneſs when Oliver Cromwell diſſolved the parliament; and accordingly it was brought to the houſe a few days after, by a formidable body of citizens. Fleetwood's party had hitherto joined the republicans, in order to diſtreſs the government, being no friends to this petition, they joined the miniſterial party; and it was voted by a great majority that no notice ſhould be taken of it. The petitioners were told, that it was expected they ſhould acquieſce quietly in whatever was done by the parliament.

By this time Fleetwood had ſo far reconciled the differences that ſubſiſted between Lambert and Deſborough, that it was reſolved to preſent a remonſtrance to the protector, on the preſent ſtate of affairs. The inſtrument was accordingly preſented under the title of "The humble repreſentation and petition of the general council of officers of the armies of England, Scotland and Ireland." Richard referred it immediately to the commons, who ſeemed not to regard it with the attention the officers expected. In this remonſtrance the army complained "that large arrears of pay were due to the ſoldiers, by which they were reduced to neceſſity; that they who had borne the burden of the war, and undergone all the difficulties and dangers attending it, were now diſregarded, divided and laid aſide. That the good old cauſe was treated with contempt, and traduced by malignant and diſaffected perſons, who grew every day more inſolent, becauſe their numbers were every moment increaſing, by the return of their friends from foreign parts, and had now ſeveral meetings in the city of London: that the names of all thoſe who ſat as judges upon the late king, had been printed and ſcattered in different parts of the kingdom, intimating that they were all conſigned to deſtruction; that many ſuits were commenced at common law againſt honeſt men, for what they had tranſacted in the wars as ſoldiers: that thoſe famous acts which had been performed by the long parliament, and the late protector, were cenſured, railed at, and vilified. By theſe means, they ſaid, the good old cauſe, which they were reſolved to ſupport, was viſibly declined. And therefore they beſought his highneſs to repreſent their complaints to the parliament, and to require proper and ſpeedy remedies."

The commons affected to treat this petition with great contempt. They imagined that while they continued united with the protector, their joint intereſt in the army would be abundantly ſufficient to ſilence the factious officers; but the puſillanimity of Richard rendered all their hopes abortive. For ſome time they took no notice of the petition; but upon receiving repeated accounts that the officers continued their meetings, and that it had been propoſed to ſeparate the military from the civil power, the commons voted "that during the ſitting of parliament, there ſhall be no general council or meeting of the officers of the army, without the direction, leave and authority of his highneſs the lord protector, and both houſes of parliament. That no perſon ſhall have or continue any command or truſt in any of the armies or navies of England, Scotland or Ireland, or any of the dominions and territories thereto belonging, who ſhall refuſe to ſubſcribe, that he will not diſturb or interrupt the free meetings of parliament, of any of the members of either houſe, or their freedom in their debates or councils."

This reſolution of the commons excited the reſentment of the cabal at Wallingford-houſe, and they ſeemed determined to carry things to extremity. Lord Broghill, aware of the conſequence, prevailed upon Richard to repair to one of their meetings, and command them to diſſolve. Surprized at this unexpected exertion of power in Richard, they immediately withdrew, but did not diſſolve. Fleetwood and Deſborough were now ſufficiently alarmed, and upbraided lord Broghill with his conduct in the houſe of peers, and even threatened him with an impeachment. This threat did not in the leaſt intimidate Broghill; he threatened to move the houſe to know who had conſented to the calling of a council of war, without the knowledge and conſent of parliament. His ſpeech was ſo well received by the houſe, that the officers deſpaired of carrying any thing in parliament, and renewed their ſecret conſultations.

Their deſigns were, however, known to thoſe officers who were attached to the protector; and they offered, if Richard would promiſe to ſupport them, to anſwer with their heads for the ſucceſs; and to bring before him Fleetwood, Deſborough, Vane, and other leaders of the oppoſition, dead or alive. Howard, who was one of Oliver's diſtinguiſhed favourites, was among the foremoſt to puſh Richard to take this vigorous reſolution, which might have been eaſily effected. But he declined the offer, and choſe rather to purſue peaceable than violent meaſures. Nor did he poſſeſs any of thoſe arts which were neceſſary to gain the love of an enthuſiaſtic army. Some diſguſt being taken at the promotions he had made, he anſwered, "Would you have me prefer none but the godly? Here is Dick Ingoldſby, who can neither pray nor preach, yet I will truſt him before you all." The pretended ſaints were highly offended at this imprudent ſpeech, and vowed the protector's deſtruction.

The council of officers aſſembled, repaired to the protector in a tumultuous manner, and demanded the diſſolution of the parliament. Richard wanted fortitude to deny, nor had he indeed the ability to reſiſt. The parliament was diſſolved, and by the ſame act the protector was effectually dethroned. A few days after, he ſigned his diſmiſſion in form. His brother Henry, governor of Ireland, a man of much better parts, but not greater ambition, reſigned his power at the ſame time. Such was the fate of Cromwell's family! That edifice of grandeur, erected at the expence of ſo much guilt and labour, diſappeared in a moment. Richard retired into the country, where he poſſeſſed a ſmall eſtate, and where he remained unmoleſted: his peaceable diſpoſition defended him againſt the malignancy of every party. After the reſtoration of monarchy, Richard travelled for ſome years. The prince of Conti, governor of Languedoc, ſaw him at Prezenaz, without knowing him. They were ſpeaking of Engliſh affairs, and the prince highly extolled the courage and talents of Oliver Cromwell. "But the poor, weak Richard," added he, "what is become of him? How could he be ſo great a blockhead as not to profit more by the crimes and fortunes of his father?" The poor, weak Richard, however, lived happy in a middle ſtation, to a good old age: and ſurely a man of common ſenſe would hardly heſitate which ſtate to chuſe, his calm condition, or his father's haraſſed and hated fortunes. He died about the latter end of queen Anne's reign.

The military council being thus poſſeſſed of the ſupreme command, applied themſelves to the eſtabliſhment of ſome form of government; and, after many deliberations, it was determined to recall the long parliament, which had dethroned Charles, and was afterwards diſmiſſed, with diſgrace, by Oliver Cromwell. That aſſembly, it was aſſerted, could only be diſſolved by their own conſent; and though violence had interrupted, it could not deſtroy their rights to government. This parliament now conſiſted of no more than forty members, who, with their old ſpeaker Lenthal at their head, proceeded immediately to buſineſs. The officers were perſuaded that this parliament would govern wholly by their directions, and act in ſubordination to the general council of the army. They were miſtaken; their firſt votes ſufficiently ſhewed that they were reſolved to exert themſelves the ſupreme authority. They were, however, held in the higheſt contempt, both by the royaliſts and preſbyterians, and ſtiled the Rump, by way of reproach. A ſecret reconciliation therefore took place between the rival parties; and it was agreed, that, laying aſide former enmities, every effort ſhould be uſed for the overthrow of the Rump parliament. The preſbyterians, notwithſtanding their religious prejudices, repented of that violent zeal by which they had been hurried away. They ſaw, that by carrying the love of liberty too far, they were brought into ſlavery; and were now as deſirous as others to reſtore that crown to the royal family, which they had ſnatched from it, without increaſing their own happineſs. The nobility and gentry concurred in the ſame deſign; and a general conſpiracy was formed in the nation, the ſucceſs of which ſeemed infallible, had not Sir Richard Willis betrayed the common intereſt before the deſign was ripe for execution. The republican parliament was no ſooner informed of the deſign, than they ordered Lambert to prevent its execution. He was remarkably active in obeying their commands, and the gaols were ſoon filled with priſoners of birth and fortune.

But this ſucceſs proved the ruin of the parliament. The officers, at the inſtigation of Lambert, preſented a petition concerning wounded ſoldiers, and the widows of thoſe who had periſhed in the ſervice. They alſo complained that they themſelves were greatly neglected, notwithſtanding the ſervices they had done their country; and deſired that Fleetwood ſhould be made commander in chief, Lambert major-general, Deſborough lieutenant-general of the horſe, and Monk major-general of the foot. They likewiſe preſſed for the puniſhment of thoſe who had been concerned in the late inſurrection; and that no officer ſhould be diſmiſſed from his employment but by the ſentence of a court-martial.

Alarmed at theſe proceedings, the republicans determined to make one bold attempt in ſupport of their power: they voted that Lambert, Deſborough, Berry, Clarke, Barrow, Kelſey, and Corbet, ſhould be caſhiered; that Fleetwood's commiſſion ſhould be vacated, and the command of the army veſted in ſeven perſons, viz. Fleetwood, Ludlow, Monk, Haſlerigg, Walton, Morley, and Overton, with powers to diſpoſe of the forces in ſuch a manner, that they might preſerve the peace of the commonwealth, and the ſafety of the parliament. They alſo declared it high-treaſon to levy any money without conſent of parliament. Sir Arthur Haſlerigg moved, that Lambert ſhould be impeached, but his motion was not ſeconded.

It was now evident, that either the power of the parliament or army muſt fall, and it required no great degree of penetration to foretel which would obtain the victory. Lambert led a party of his ſoldiers into the ſtreets of Weſtminſter, leading to the parliament-houſe; and when the ſpeaker came in his coach, they very civilly turned his horſes, and conducted him back to his home. The other members were intercepted in the ſame manner, and the Rump parliament diſſolved with as much eaſe by Lambert, as it had been before by Cromwell.

The diſſolution of the parliament deſtroyed all government in England; and there was now a neceſſity of ſettling a new one, though it was not eaſy to determine of what ſpecies it ſhould be. The conſequence of this unſettled ſtate was an univerſal anarchy over all England: both the magiſtrates and officers of the revenue refuſed to act; and the ſoldiers were under a neceſſity of returning to their former occupations, or procuring themſelves ſubſiſtence by their ſwords. In this diſtreſsful ſituation, the eyes of the whole kingdom were directed to Monk, who, it was now foreſeen, muſt be the arbiter of the fate of England.

That general, at firſt attached to the royal party, afterwards employed by Cromwell, and appointed governor of Scotland, had now, by his politeneſs, his integrity, and other virtues, obtained the love of the ſoldiers, and the confidence of the people. Whether he meant only to oppoſe the views of the ambitious Lambert, or ſecretly meditated the reſtoration of the king, is not known; but he declared in favour of the parliament againſt thoſe who had diſmiſſed it. His prudence, however, kept his intentions an impenetrable ſecret; but deeper deſigns, either in the king's favour or his own, were, from the beginning, ſuſpected to be the motive of his actions.

In the mean time, the council of officers, in order to preſerve ſome appearance of government, elected a committee of twenty-three perſons, of whom ſeven were officers. Theſe they pretended to inveſt with the ſupreme authority, and called them a committee of ſafety. They promiſed to ſummon a free parliament, but took no ſteps to carry it into execution. On the contrary, they made ſome progreſs towards aſſembling a military parliament, compoſed wholly of officers, elected from every regiment in the ſervice. Nothing but a dreadful proſpect of ruin and ſlavery preſented itſelf to the people. They were ſufficiently convinced that the diviſions or union of theſe ſanctified robbers tended equally to extirpate from the Britiſh dominions all private morality, as well as civil law and juſtice.

The late ſuppreſſion of the conſpiracy ſeemed to have put a final period to all the hopes and expectations of Charles. Deſtitute of reſources from his friends, he ſought to intereſt foreign powers in his favour. He repaired to Fontarabia, where Mazarine was carrying on the negotiations for a peace with Spain. The cardinal even refuſed to ſee him; and Don Louis de Haro, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, ſhewed him barely common civilities. This was not a time, from a mere motive of generoſity, to arm a powerful monarch in the cauſe of a prince who had been unfortunate. The treaty of the Pyrannees was concluded without the leaſt mention of Charles. But fortune is always capricious; Charles paſſed, ſoon after, from this abject ſtate, to the poſſeſſion of a throne.

Deſirous of diſcovering the real ſentiments of Monk, whoſe deſigns were ſtill impenetrable, Charles ſent Dr. Monk, that general's brother, to ſollicit his ſervices. The general aſked him if he had truſted any perſon with the ſecret of his commiſſion. "Nobody," replied the doctor, "but Brice your chaplain, in whom I know you confide." Brice was worthy of the higheſt confidence, and a zealous loyaliſt. But Monk thought proper to break off the converſation, and diſmiſſed his brother, without diſcovering his intentions; perſuaded, that in an affair of ſuch importance, a ſecret intruſted to a third perſon is no longer a ſecret.

His conduct in every other particular was directed by the ſame prudence and reſerve. Corbet, who had been ſent by the committee of ſafety, under pretence of communicating their reſolutions to Monk, but in reality to debauch his army, was put under arreſt, and all the officers who ſeemed inclined to favour Lambert and his party were caſhiered.

It was no ſooner known that the governor of Scotland had declared for the parliament, than many of the Engliſh followed the example. Whole regiments revolted. Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, Walton and Morley, ſeized Portſmouth for the parliament. Theſe circumſtances ſerved only to increaſe the public diſtractions, and confirm the anarchy in which the whole kingdom was involved. Fleetwood, the general, a man equally weak and enthuſiaſtic, ſought thoſe reſources in prayer, which his poverty of genius could not afford him. He would frequently fall on his knees in the midſt of a council of war; and when he was exhorted to vigorous meaſures, he anſwered, that the Lord had ſpit in his face, and would no longer hear him. He became jealous of Lambert; he could not truſt either Haſlerigg or Vane; and would willingly have joined Monk, had not Ludlow, Whitlock, and others of great parts and experience, prevented him, by laying before him the danger that might attend ſo precipitate a ſtep. They obſerved, that the unaccountable manner in which Monk had left Scotland, as well as his ſubſequent conduct, ſtrongly indicated that his real intention was to re-eſtabliſh monarchy. In this hour of dreadful perplexity, Lambert offered to march againſt Monk, and put the whole to the deciſion of a general engagement; and could Lambert have been truſted, Monk might poſſibly have been defeated. But the republican party, who formed the majority of the committee of ſafety, choſe rather to be ſubdued by Monk than ſaved by Lambert. Under the ſpecious pretence, therefore, of an accommodation, they procured letters from the city of London, the officers of the navy and army in England and Ireland, perſuading Monk to join with the committee of ſafety in their endeavours to reſtore at once the parliament and the peace of the kingdom. Monk was pleaſed with theſe invitations: he knew that a negotiation, however ſhort, muſt be the ruin of Lambert, who was deſtitute of money for the payment of his forces. Clerges was accordingly diſpatched to Monk with propoſals from the committee of ſafety. Monk, to gain time, agreed to ſend three of his colonels, Wilks, Cloberry, and Knight, to treat of an accommodation. The two latter employed this opportunity in forming connections with the royaliſts, particularly with Redman, one of the ableſt officers in the army; and by that means ſecured the Iriſh regiments, who had received orders to ſerve under Lambert againſt Monk. Wilks, therefore, was chiefly intruſted with the negotiation. A treaty was ſoon concluded, but Monk refuſed to ratify it, declaring his officers had exceeded their commiſſion. He deſired, however, to enter into a new negotiation at Newcaſtle; and the committee readily accepted his fallacious offer.

While Monk amuſed the committee of ſafety with the hopes of an agreement, theſe military ſovereigns were ſurrounded with diſtreſs. Anarchy prevailed in every part of the nation; and the people having refuſed the payment of all taxes, there was no money to pay the ſoldiers. Lambert had loſt his time and his credit, both with the committee of ſafety and his own ſoldiers. Whitlock ſaw their danger, and propoſed to Fleetwood two expedients; either to draw together all his forces, take poſſeſſion of the Tower, and join with the city of London in their declaration for a free parliament; or to reſtore the king upon the beſt terms he could procure. Fleetwood would willingly have embraced the latter, but he was weak enough, even after he had given his conſent, to be diſſuaded from it by Sir Harry Vane, Deſborough and Berry, all of them implacable enemies to the royal family.

Theſe different cabals placed the ſettlement of government, which was conſidered as an indiſpenſable preliminary to whatever reſolution ſhould be taken, at a greater diſtance than ever. Vane had employed all his abilities in a noble ſcheme for reforming the practice of the law; and was ſo earneſt in the cauſe, that he inſiſted on its being adopted in the new plan of government. He was obſtinately oppoſed in this deſign by Whitlock, St. John, and all the lawyers whom they conſulted. For Vane, Lambert, and other leaders of the independents, propoſed a coalition with the papiſts, and hence they conſidered a general liberty of conſcience as an indiſpenſable preliminary to the new ſettlement. All the preſbyterian clergy violently oppoſed this comprehenſion, and thus all the deep ſchemes of Vane were rendered abortive. Theſe debates were carried on with ſo much acrimony and perſonal invectives were ſo generally known, and ſo generally condemned, that the committee of ſafety found it abſolutely neceſſary to releaſe the impriſoned royaliſts, to ſcreen them from the fury of the people. This did not, however, prevent freſh plots and freſh inſurrections of the royaliſts from breaking out almoſt every night in the city. They were, indeed, generally diſcovered and quelled by the army, before they arrived at any alarming height; but they ſufficiently ſhewed that the people ſeemed determined to free themſelves from the yoke of a military committee, whom they deteſted. Colonel Hewſon, who, from the profeſſion of a cobler, had riſen to a high rank in the army, was very active in this ſervice, and had more than once entered London at the head of his regiment. In one of theſe expeditions, he fired upon and killed ſeveral of the city apprentices, who had aſſembled in a tumultuous manner, and declared for a free parliament. The magiſtrates of London were not, however, intimidated; they eſtabliſhed a ſeparate government, and aſſumed the ſupreme authority within the city. Admiral Lawſon brought his fleet up the river, and declared for a free parliament. Haſlerigg and Morley, informed of this important event, left Portſmouth, and advanced towards London. The regiments near the capital, being ſollicited by their old officers who had been caſhiered by the committee of ſafety, revolted to the parliament. Deſborough's regiment, being ſent by Lambert to ſupport his friends, no ſooner reached St. Alban's, than they declared for the ſame aſſembly.

Theſe events, the diſſentions among the members of the cabal at Wallingford-houſe, and particularly the want of money, threw ſuch a damp upon Lambert's army, that from being far ſuperior, in all reſpects, to that of Monk, it was dwindled into a mere handful of men, when a reſolution was taken to reſtore the parliament.

A. D. 1660. Lenthal, the ſpeaker, being invited by the officers, again aſſumed his former authority, and ſummoned the parliament, which met on the ſixth of January. The authority of Fleetwood was now ſo entirely loſt, that not a ſingle company or troop would obey his orders. His hand was too weak to ſupport this ill-founded fabric of government, which was now every where falling into ruins. Lenthal, on this occaſion, acted as general of the army; and both officers and ſoldiers were ſo ſubmiſſive to his orders, that he diſcharged Fleetwood's lieutenant of the Tower, and put Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper in his room. He alſo ordered a general rendezvous of all the troops in and about London to be held in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, where they gave him all the military honours due to a general.

The firſt act of the parliament was to repeal the bill againſt the payment of exciſe and cuſtoms. They appointed commiſſioners for aſſigning quarters to the army; and, without taking the leaſt notice of Lambert himſelf, they ſent orders to his troops to repair immediately to the quarters aſſigned them. This had the deſired effect. His ſoldiers obeyed the orders of the parliament, and he was left without more than an hundred horſe about him. He himſelf was ſoon after ſeized, and ſent priſoner to the Tower. Sir Harry Vane, and the other members who had concurred with the committee of ſafety, were confined to their own houſes; and the officers who had joined in ſubduing the parliament, were caſhiered, and ordered into a like confinement. By theſe exertions of authority, the power of the parliament ſeemed built on a firmer foundation than ever.

The reſtoration of the Rump parliament did not, however, ſatisfy Monk, who ſtill kept his army on the borders of England. Lord Fairfax had taken arms, and declared for a free parliament. This was going a ſtep farther than Monk had yet propoſed, notwithſtanding he had made all the neceſſary diſpoſitions for marching to the capital before contrary orders ſhould be ſent from the parliament. Though the reaſons he gave for this march were very plauſible, yet it tended to confirm the ſuſpicions of the public, that he really intended to reſtore the king. He left major-general Morgan to command the troops neceſſary to preſerve the peace of Scotland; and was received with open arms by lord Fairfax and his friends, who had actually taken poſſeſſion of York for the uſe of a free parliament. The Rump parliament was now held in greater deteſtation than ever: and the general received, as he advanced to the ſouthward, continual accounts of ſome freſh declaration or aſſociation of the counties for a free parliament.

Alarmed at theſe declarations, and deſirous of keeping the power they had obtained, the parliament made ſome attempts to bring about a reconciliation between themſelves and the cabal of Wallingford-houſe. They paſſed a vote, "That all officers who were in commiſſion on the eleventh of October 1659, and all other officers and ſoldiers in the late defection and rebellion, who have already ſubmitted, or may hereafter ſubmit themſelves, and return to their duty and obedience to the parliament, ſhall be pardoned, and indemnified for life and eſtate." Lambert was comprehended in this reſolution; and both he, and all his officers, among whom was colonel Hewſon, who had been ſo active againſt the city of London, made their ſubmiſſions, but were ordered to be confined in their own houſes.

The next buſineſs of the parliament was to paſs a vote to juſtify Monk's marching into England. They alſo voted, that one thouſand pounds a year ſhould be ſettled on him; and that Scot and Robinſon ſhould be ſent to compliment him on his arrival. Theſe emiſſaries were ſoon convinced, from the univerſal wiſhes of the people for a free parliament, that the preſent aſſembly could not long ſubſiſt. Their diſcoveries occaſioned great uneaſineſs to the heads of the faction.

Monk's army did not amount to more than ſix thouſand men; but this force was ſufficient to deſtroy a faction divided againſt itſelf; and the city of London was ſo confident of his declaring for a free parliament, that they ſent a committee of the council to congratulate him on his approach to the capital. On his arrival at St. Albans, he was informed that near nine thouſand ſoldiers were then in London, diſpoſed in different regiments; but that moſt of their officers were confined by the parliament. He therefore imagined there would be no great difficulty in removing theſe troops; and accordingly wrote a very preſſing letter to the houſe, that room might be made for his regiments. Had the members of parliament been united among themſelves, or dared to truſt the experienced officers that ſerved under them, they would not, probably, have ſubmitted to Monk's requeſt; but their power was ſo precarious by their diviſions, that they made no difficulty of complying, and orders were given for their own regiments to retire. Four of them, however, ſcrupled to obey: a mutiny enſued; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty they were prevented, either from joining with the royaliſts in the city, or marching out againſt the army of Monk. This mutiny being conſidered as a freſh inſult upon their authority, the parliament preſſed Monk to haſten his march, and he accordingly entered London on the fourth of February.

Two days after the general was introduced to the houſe, and thanks were given him by Lenthal, for the eminent ſervices he had done his country. Monk who was a prudent, though not an elegant ſpeaker anſwered with great modeſty. He told the houſe; that the ſervices he had performed merited not ſuch encomiums, he had done no more than his duty: that among many perſons of greater worth who bore their commiſſion, he had been employed as the inſtrument of Providence for effecting their reſtoration; but he conſidered their ſervice only as a ſtep to more important ones, which it was their part to render to the nation: that as he marched along he obſerved all ranks of men, in all places, to be in earneſt expectations of a ſettlement after the violent convulſions to which they had been expoſed; and to have no proſpect of ſuch a bleſſing but from the diſſolution of the preſent parliament, and the ſummoning a new one, free and full, who, meeting without oaths or engagements, might finally give contentment to the nation: that applications had been made to him for that purpoſe; but that he, ſenſible of his duty, had always told the petitioners, that the parliament itſelf, which was now free, and would ſoon be full, was the beſt judge of all thoſe meaſures, and that the whole community ought to acquieſce in their determination: that though he expreſſed himſelf in this manner to the people, he muſt now freely inform the houſe, that the fewer engagements were exacted, the more comprehenſive their plan would prove, and the more ſatisfaction it would give to the nation: and that it was ſufficient for the public ſecurity, if the fanatical party and the royaliſts were excluded; ſince the principles of theſe factions were deſtructive either of government or of liberty.

The parliament were now convinced that ſome meaſures muſt be purſued in order to ſettle the tranquillity of the nation. It was indeed impoſſible that things could continue any length of time in their preſent ſituation. Every thing tended to bring on a criſis, which muſt be deciſive. The people paid ſo very little regard to the orders of the parliament, that a ſmall part only of the revenues could be collected. The common council of London abſolutely refuſed to pay any obedience to their commands, and openly declared they would pay no aſſeſſment till it ſhould be impoſed by a free and lawful parliament, and then they ſhould think it their duty to ſubmit.

Determined to make at leaſt one effort for ſupporting their power, the parliament ſent orders to Monk to march immediately into the city and ſeize twelve of the magiſtrates whom they ſuppoſed to have been the cauſe of this alarming reſolution, to remove the poſts and chains from all the ſtreets, and to demoliſh both the portcullices and gates of the city. Monk, to the aſtoniſhment of all men, obeyed the order. He apprehended many of the obnoxious perſons and ſent them to the tower; and notwithſtanding the interpoſition of his friends, the remonſtrances of his officers, and the cries of the people, he broke down the gates and portcullices of the city, and returned to his lodgings at Weſtminſter in triumph.

A moment's reflection convinced him he had gone too far. Inſtead of ſupporting that cautious ambiguity he had hitherto maintained, his late conduct had ſufficiently indicated that he had joined the parliamentary party, and that his deſign was to ſubject the whole nation to the arbitrary deciſions of that contemptible aſſembly. Theſe conſiderations determined him to alter his conduct, and to recover the good opinion of the citizens, which he ſeemed to have forfeited by his late precipitate conduct. He could not bear the thought of being conſidered as the miniſter of violence and uſurpation. He repaired to the houſe and complained in the bittereſt terms of the odious ſervice he had been obliged to execute in obedience to their orders. But this was only part of the plan he had formed for retrieving his character. He wrote a letter to the parliament, in which he reproached them in the ſevereſt terms of tyranny and oppreſſion; of their forming new cabals with Lambert and Vane; and of giving encouragement to a fanatical petition preſented by Barebone. He concluded with requiring them, in the name of the citizens, ſoldiers, and people, to iſſue writs immediately for filling up their houſe, and to fix the time for their own diſſolution, that a new and free parliament might be aſſembled.

Monk waited not for an anſwer to this letter: he marched immediately into the city, at the head of his army, and ordered Allen, the lord-mayor, to ſummon a common-council to meet at Guildhall. As ſoon as the citizens were aſſembled, he repaired thither, and aſſured them that he was extremely ſorry for the indignity he had ſo lately put upon the city, in complying with the orders of the parliament, and was now come to make them all the reparation in his power. He declared that he would always perſevere in the meaſures he had adopted; and wiſhed a firm union might be eſtabliſhed between the city and army for their mutual defence, and for promoting the happineſs and ſettlement of the kingdom.

It is impoſſible to expreſs the applauſe and exultation with which this ſpeech of the general was received. The news of this happy event was ſoon ſpread through the whole city, and excited the moſt extravagant demonſtrations of joy. Every individual promiſed himſelf that the dreadful ſcenes of horror and confuſion were over, and thoſe of happineſs and tranquillity would ſoon ſucceed. Even the rage of party was forgotten; the royaliſts and the preſbyterians joined in the common joy. The populace, who in the gratification of their paſſions regard neither honour nor decency, roaſted rumps at every bonfire, and where theſe could not be procured, pieces of fleſh cut into the ſame ſhape were uſed as ſubſtitutes; in order, as the people expreſſed it, to celebrate by thoſe ſymbols of hatred and deriſion, the funeral of the rump parliament.

The diſpirited parliament exerted all their power to reconcile themſelves to Monk and his officers; but he refuſed to truſt them. He formed, in conjunction with his new friends in the city, a well-regulated militia, which were intruſted to men whoſe fidelity could be relied on; and the moſt proper meaſures were purſued for ſettling the nation. Several perſons, equally deſperate from guilt and fanaticiſm, offered to inveſt him with the dignity of ſupreme magiſtrate, and to ſupport his government; but he rejected their offers with contempt.

A declaration of the general's deſire that the ſecluded members ſhould reſume their ſeats being publiſhed, they repaired in ſuch numbers to the houſe, that they ſoon became the majority. Upon which moſt of the independent members retired. They immediately repealed all the votes that had been paſſed for their excluſion; releaſed the royaliſts from their confinement, and reſtored them to their eſtates; renewed and enlarged the general's commiſſion; and fixed an aſſeſſment neceſſary for the ſupport of the fleet and army. Theſe votes being paſſed, they ordered writs to be iſſued for the immediate aſſembling a new, full, and free parliament, and then diſſolved themſelves. Theſe proceedings gave the higheſt ſatisfaction. The long parliament had for ſome time been the general object of deteſtation, and their diſſolution occaſioned a general joy throughout the kingdom.

A new council of ſtate was choſen and obtained the approbation of the people, as it conſiſted of men of dignity, moderation, and virtue. Their credit was ſo well eſtabliſhed, that the city of London immediately advanced them ſixty thouſand pounds for the uſe of the army. Though every perſon of the leaſt penetration perceived that the reſtoration of the king muſt be the conſequence of a free parliament, yet no declaration of that kind had hitherto been made; the general's intentions were ſtill impenetrable. But in the private meetings of the royaliſts, a queſtion was ſtarted with regard to the conceſſions that ought to be made by the king; and the treaty entered into with his late majeſty during his reſidence in the Iſle of Wight was propoſed as a proper baſis for the negotiation. This queſtion would certainly have been carried could the perſons have agreed with regard to the limitations; but that was far from being the caſe; and Monk ſtill continuing to declare only for a free parliament, none had the courage to offer any thing upon that head to the public. The limitations were, therefore, neglected, and ſeveral writers have been very ſevere upon the memory of Monk, and other leaders of the royaliſts, on account of that omiſſion. But when we conſider the conſtitution of the Engliſh monarchy, the little regard paid by either party to conceſſions, when it is in their power to revoke them, the difficulties attending ſuch limitations, the ſalutary authority of parliament when virtuous, its pernicious power when corrupted, and that it was in the breaſt of the members to bind the prerogative even after the king was reſtored, we ſhall perhaps be inclined to think that theſe clamours have no foundation. The wiſe and the virtuous part of the nation were placed between the two extremes of frenzy; that of fanaticiſm, which diſclaimed even the ſhadow of monarchy, on one hand, and that of loyalty, which adopted all the abſurdities of government, on the other. No terms could be invented rigorous enough to pleaſe the former, nor any mild enough to content the latter. And thus the deſign of the reſtoration, by an obſtinate perſiſtance in limitations, might have miſcarried.

Unmoved by all the offers of faction, Monk purſued the plan he had formed with equal prudence and firmneſs. Among the friends of that prudent general, was Mr. Morrice, a gentleman of Devonſhire, remarkable for a ſedentary, ſtudious diſpoſition, and a ſound judgment. With this friend only Monk deliberated concerning the great enterprize he had formed, and hitherto conducted with ſo much ſucceſs. Sir John Granville, who was ſent with a commiſſion from the king to Monk, applied to Morrice, in order to obtain acceſs to the general. He was deſired to communicate his buſineſs to Morrice; but Granville refuſed every importunity, refuſing to communicate his buſineſs to any one whatever, but the general himſelf in perſon. Monk was now convinced that Granville might be truſted, and therefore not only admitted him to his preſence, but alſo communicated to him his whole deſign. But he ſtill refuſed to commit any thing to writing: he only charged Granville with a verbal meſſage, aſſuring his majeſty of his ſervices, and exhorting him immediately to quit the Spaniſh territories, and retire into Holland. Charles fortunately took his advice: had he ſtaid a few hours longer he had certainly been detained under pretence of honour and reſpect, by the Spaniards, who would not have releaſed him till the Engliſh had agreed to deliver up Jamaica.

The Engliſh in general were now ſo well cured of their jealouſy againſt the prerogatives of the crown, that the new parliament was entirely compoſed of members devoted to it. The rage of the republicans, however, grew more violent, and Lambert, having found means to eſcape out of the tower, ſoon collected troops. No time was to be loſt to reduce this active general. Colonel Ingoldſby was accordingly diſpatched after him and overtook him at Daventry, where he had only aſſembled four troops of horſe, one of which immediately deſerted from him. Another quickly followed the example, and he himſelf, endeavouring to eſcape, was ſeized by Ingoldſby, to whom he made ſubmiſſions not ſuitable to his former character and valour.

When the parliament met, they choſe Sir Harbottle Grimſtone their ſpeaker, and the members chiefly exerted themſelves in bewailing the late troubles, and in expreſſing their hatred of the memory of Cromwell. In the midſt of theſe ſpeeches Monk acquainted the houſe, that Granville was at the door with diſpatches from the prince. The whole houſe was in an extaſy of joy. Granville was introduced. He preſented a letter and a declaration from Charles. The declaration was well calculated to ſupport the ſatisfaction inſpired by the proſpect of a public ſettlement. It offered a general amneſty to all perſons whatever, and that without any exceptions, but ſuch as ſhould afterwards be made by parliament. It promiſed a liberty of conſcience, and a concurrence in any act of parliament, which, upon mature deliberation, ſhould be offered for ſecuring that indulgence. It ſubmitted the inquiry into all grants, purchaſes, and alienations, to the arbitration of that aſſembly; and it aſſured the ſoldiers that their arrears ſhould be paid, and that they ſhould, for the future, receive the ſame pay they had hitherto enjoyed. Every one was ſatiſfied. The conceſſions of the late king had limited the prerogatives too much, to give the real friends of liberty any uneaſineſs.

The two houſes (for the peers had reſumed their ſeats without oppoſition) aſſiſted in proclaiming the king by the title of Charles II. A preſent of fifty thouſand pounds was conferred on the king, ten thouſand on the duke of York, and five thouſand on the duke of Glouceſter. And ſo univerſal a joy appeared throughout the nation, that the king ſaid, it was ſurely his own fault that he had not ſooner taken poſſeſſion of the throne, ſince he found every body ſo zealous for promoting his reſtoration.

Monk repaired to Dover to receive the prince, whom he had the glory of placing on the throne. No revolution was ever more rapid, more advantageous, or leſs violent. So many evils, occaſioned by civil contentions, had taught the people, that a legal government was the only ſupport of the liberty and happineſs of the ſubject.

The king was proclaimed on the ſeventh of May, and the intermediate time between that and the twenty-ninth, the day appointed for his entering London, was ſpent in preparing every thing for his reception. Magnificent beds, linen, chairs, robes, yatchts, &c. were voted to his majeſty. Every precaution was taken to prevent any farther waſte of the lands, either of the king or royaliſts; and great care was exerted in ſecuring the perſons of the regicides, and the moſt criminal perſons during the late government.

The public rejoicings were boundleſs, after the king was invited by the two houſes of parliament to reſume the regal function. The peers who were deputed to receive him were the earls of Oxford, Warwick, and Middleſex; the lord viſcount Hereford, the lord Berkley of Berkley-caſtle, and the lord Brook.

The king, on his diſembarking at Dover, embraced the general in the moſt cordial manner, and, perhaps, never ſubject deſerved better of his king and country. Charles made his public entry into London on his birth-day, being the twenty-ninth of May; where he was received with ſuch demonſtrations of joy, and ſuch diſplay of magnificence, as ſhewed that the whole nation partook of the general ſatiſfaction.

It will be proper to ſtop here for a moment, to ſurvey the period we have finiſhed. We have ſeen fanaticiſm lighting the flames that involved the ſtate. That epidemical ſcourge viſited the three kingdoms. England in particular was over-run with infatuated ſectaries, determined to ſupport their abſurdities without law or controul. The republicans were ſo much the more terrible, as their religious principles enjoined a ſeverity of manners too refined for human nature. Perhaps nothing contributed more to their triumph over the royaliſts, whom they called cavaliers, the greater part of them being men of pleaſure, either in conſequence of their birth and fortunes, or becauſe, from a diſlike of the fanatics, they fell into the contrary extreme of immorality. A parliamentarian ſaying one day to a royaliſt, "Your friends, the cavaliers, are very diſſolute:" "Yes, (replied the other) they have the infirmities of men; but your friends, the round-heads, have the vices of devils, tyranny, rebellion, and ſpiritual pride." The latter carried their ſeverities ſo far, that they prohibited every kind of diverſion.

Among the great variety of ſectaries, the Quakers ſtand eminently diſtinguiſhed. Their founder was George Fox, a ſhoemaker's apprentice: but though enthuſiaſts in the higheſt degree, they made no figure in the general commotions, becauſe their principles forbade the uſe of arms. They thought the practice of civility a worldly refinement unworthy of chriſtianity. They addreſſed themſelves to every body by the monoſyllables thee and thou; and gave no title but that of Friend, even to people of rank and fortune. Their dreſs was ſimilar to their manners: they rejected all ſuperfluities, not excepting plaits to their clothes, and buttons to their ſleeves and hats, which they thought unneceſſary. Their religious ſyſtem conſiſted in following the letter of the goſpel: they thought an oath blaſphemy, even when taken in a court of juſtice. They allowed no ſacraments, no church ceremonies, no churches, no prieſts. Every one affected inſpiration, and made ſtrange efforts to receive the Holy Spirit; and, from theſe trembling convulſions, they acquired the name of Quakers. Theſe enthuſiaſts would ſometimes ruſh into churches, diſturb the ſervice, and inſult the miniſters. They were ſentenced to be whipped and pilloried; but in this they triumphed, and their obſtinate patience appeared ſupernatural to the people. Some of them undertook to faſt forty days, in imitation of the Saviour of the world, and actually periſhed in the attempt. All made a point of offering their cheek to them that would ſmite them, and never to return an injury. The conſequence was, that by carrying their religious duties to the moſt extravagant height, they expoſed their virtues to ridicule. Strange ſurely it is, that the goſpel, calculated to inſpire every ſocial virtue, ſhould have afforded ſo many pretences to folly and frenzy, to break the ſacred bonds of ſociety! But ſuch is the weakneſs of the human mind; while men affect to quit the path marked out by the Author of reaſon, they wander through wildneſs and obſcurity, till they loſe themſelves and their way together.

The different follies of theſe fanatical ſects contributed greatly to multiply deiſts, men of raſh and ſuperficial minds, who attributing to religion the exceſſes of fanaticiſm, fall into the contrary extreme of incredulity. Cromwell called them heathens; but when in their company, laughed with them at the fanatics.

Under the commonwealth, the taxes amounted, one year with another, to more than two millions: the late king's revenues amounted to leſs than half that ſum. In 1650, commiſſioners of exciſe and cuſtoms were appointed; but in 1657, Cromwell ſettled them according to the ancient uſage, and eleven hundred thouſand pounds a year were offered for them. They were of leſs value under the regulation of commiſſioners. The protector, notwithſtanding all his vigilance and œconomy, left two millions of debts. The commonwealth, in 1652, had more than fifty thouſand men in arms, whoſe ordinary pay was a ſhilling a day for the foot, and two ſhillings for the horſe. It is not, therefore, ſurpriſing, that the army oppoſed the re-eſtabliſhment of the civil government, becauſe it muſt totally ſuperſede ſo lucrative an employment. The parliamentary forces at the battle of Worceſter, including the militia, amounted to eighty thouſand men. The commerce of England had been greatly advanced under Charles I. before the civil wars. The Eaſt-India and Guinea trades were very advantageous. The annual return was ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, and twenty thouſand pieces of cloth were ſent yearly into Turkey. The commonwealth reſtored this ſource of wealth, which had been loſt in the civil wars. One of the chief things that made commerce flouriſh, was, that the principles of a democratical government had weakened the prejudices of vanity. People of faſhion put their children apprentices to merchants, and that uſeful profeſſion became honourable. In 1650, the intereſt of money was reduced to ſix per cent. Before the reign of Elizabeth, it had been at fourteen. This ſhews a great increaſe of ſpecie, and a better ſyſtem of policy. The colony of New-England increaſed by means of the puritans, who fled thither in order to free themſelves from the conſtraint which Laud and the church-party had impoſed upon them; and before the commencement of the civil wars, it was ſuppoſed to contain twenty-five thouſand ſouls. For a ſimilar reaſon the catholics, afterwards, who found themſelves expoſed to many hardſhips, and dreaded ſtill worſe treatment, went over to America in great numbers, and ſettled the colony of Maryland.

Learning, before the civil wars broke out, began to flouriſh in England. Shakeſpeare will ever be ranked in the firſt claſs of our Engliſh poets. His beauties are his own, and, in the ſtricteſt ſenſe, original. The faults found in him are chiefly thoſe of the age in which he lived, his tranſcribers, and his editors. He not only excelled in copying nature, but his imagination carried him beyond it. He had all the creative powers of fancy to form new characters, and was more an original genius than any other writer. Like other great poets, he has had the felicity of having his faults admired for the ſake of his beauties. He died in 1616.

Ben Johnſon, poet-laureat to James I. and Charles I. was one of the greateſt dramatic writers of his age. He was familiarly acquainted with the beſt ancient authors, from whom he has borrowed freely; and was the firſt that brought critical learning into repute. He was as defective in tragedy as he was excellent in comedy, and that excellence is confined to a few of his works. In Shakeſpeare we ſee the force of genius; in Johnſon, the power of induſtry. He is frequently deficient in the harmony, and ſometimes in the meaſure of his verſes. What appears to be facility in his compoſitions, is generally the effect of uncommon labour. He died in 1637.

Edmund Waller, ſometimes ſtiled the Engliſh Tibullus, excelled all his predeceſſors in harmonious verſification. His love verſes have all the tenderneſs and politeneſs of the Roman poet; and his panegyric on Cromwell has ever been eſteemed a maſterpiece of its kind. His vein is never redundant; we frequently wiſh he had ſaid more, but never that he had ſaid leſs. His perſonal qualities were as amiable as his poetical, and he was equally formed to pleaſe the witty and the fair. He not only enjoyed all his faculties, but retained much of his youthful vivacity at eighty years of age. He died in 1687.

The great Milton flouriſhed alſo in this age. His Paradiſe Loſt, though defective in its plan, though ſtiffened with foreign idioms, technical terms, and uncouth expreſſions, exhibits ſuch a ſtupendous force of genius, as amazes, confounds, and tranſports the reader; and it is with juſtice conſidered as equal to the firſt epic poem of antiquity. What is moſt aſtoniſhing is, that the author wrote it under the united oppreſſions of misfortune, blindneſs, poverty, and contempt. Nor is it much leſs ſurpriſing, that this ſublime poem ſhould remain ſo many years unknown in a bookſeller's ſhop.

At the head of the philoſophers who flouriſhed during this period, is juſtly placed Sir Francis Bacon, lord Verulam, one of the greateſt geniuſes the world ever ſaw. If we conſider the juſt and extenſive views of this prodigious man, the infinite number of his objects, the nervouſneſs of his ſtile, his ſublime imagination, and his rigorous exactneſs, we ſhall, perhaps, eſteem him one of the greateſt and moſt eloquent of philoſophers. This penetrating genius diſcovered the emptineſs of the viſionary ſyſtems of philoſophy, which had, for many ages, amuſed mankind, and taught the world, that the only method of diſcovering truth was by experiment. He had the glory of being the firſt adventurer in the new world of ſcience, and of diſcovering ſuch mines of knowledge as will never be exhauſted.

Thomas Hobbs acquired a reputation for writings equally unphiloſophical and irreligious. He deſpiſed learning; and ſaid, if he had read as much as other men of letters, he ſhould have been as ignorant. Man, according to Hobbs, is naturally wicked; a principle which certainly does him very little honour. He is alſo reproached with favouring arbitrary power. He died in 1679.

William Hervey, M.D. acquired immortal honour for his diſcovery of the circulation of the blood. He enjoyed the happineſs, in his life-time, to find the clamours of ignorance, envy and prejudice, againſt his doctrine, totally ſilenced; and his diſcovery univerſally eſtabliſhed. He died in 1657.

The polite arts flouriſhed in England during the reign of Charles I. eſpecially painting and ſculpture. He was the patron of Rubens, Vandyke, Inigo Jones, and other eminent artiſts; ſo that, had it not been for the civil wars, he would probably have converted his court into a ſecond Athens; and the collections he made for that purpoſe, conſidering the difficulties under which he laboured, were amazing. His favourite, the duke of Buckingham, imitated him in that reſpect, and laid out the amazing ſum of four hundred thouſand pounds upon his cabinet of paintings and curioſities. The earl of Arundel was, however, the great Mæcenas of that age; and, by the immenſe acquiſition he made of antiquities, eſpecially his famous marble inſcriptions, he may ſtand on a footing, with regard to the encouragement and utility of literature, with the greateſt of the Medicean princes. But during the civil wars, and the government of Cromwell, the polite arts were totally eclipſed, though, it is ſaid, the protector himſelf was not an enemy to learning.

From the Reſtoration of Charles II. to the Revolution.

CHARLES II.

A.D. 1660. THE univerſal joy that ſpread over the nation at the reſtoration of the king, ſeemed to promiſe a happy reign both with regard to the king and his people. The ancient order and diſcipline, both in church and ſtate, were reſtored with the monarchy, and a round of magnificence and pleaſures ſucceeded the gloomy ferocity which had ſo long taken poſſeſſion of the minds of the Engliſh people. Charles introduced the ſpirit of gallantry into a palace yet ſtained with the blood of his father. The independents were hardly heard of, and the puritans retired from the ſeat of government. The manners of the Engliſh underwent ſo total a change, that the late civil war became a ſubject of ridicule: the auſtere and gloomy ſectariſts, who had filled the kingdom with their enthuſiaſtic notions, were now the ſubjects of raillery to the gay licentious courtiers.

Charles II. was about thirty years of age, nurſed in the ſchool of adverſity, acquainted with men and courts, a man of genius, acute, ſenſible, good natured, polite, never out of temper, and perfectly unaffected; but immoderately addicted to pleaſure. It is eaſy to judge of the wiſdom of a prince from the choice of thoſe he honours with favour or his confidence. The council was at firſt compoſed of reſpectable perſons, choſen indifferently from among the preſbyterians and the royaliſts. Monk, created duke of Albemarle, proved that Charles was not tainted with that vice of courts, ingratitude. Sir Edward Hyde, created earl of Clarendon, and appointed lord chancellor and prime miniſter, had few equals either in virtue or knowledge.

The duke of York, the king's brother, was of a vindictive temper, active, and violent, and ſo confirmed a bigot to the popiſh religion, that he thought nothing too much to promote its eſtabliſhment. He therefore laboured to extend the prerogative, that he might be able at laſt to eſtabliſh an arbitrary government. This, joined with the indolence of the king, enabled the duke to extend the ſchemes he had formed, and which gave riſe to all the troubles and animoſities that diſtracted the cloſe of this reign.

The two houſes of parliament having met without a ſummons from the king, they were at firſt diſtinguiſhed by the title of convention; nor did they aſſume the name of the parliament, till Charles had paſſed an act for that purpoſe.

The firſt object that engaged their attention was the amneſty, which had been promiſed by the king before he landed in England. The upper houſe, animated partly by reſentment and partly by zeal, were for excluding many perſons from the benefit of this act of oblivion. But Charles deſired them to remember the ſacred promiſe he had made, and to which he thought himſelf in ſome meaſure indebted for his good fortune. He therefore recommended clemency to them in the moſt preſſing manner; an inſtance of the tenderneſs of his diſpoſition, and which gained him univerſal applauſe. This interpoſition had the deſired effect, and only the regicides, and the furious republicans, Lambert and Vane, were excluded. Some others were indeed rendered incapable of the benefit of this act, in caſe of their accepting public employments, and ſome were rendered incapable of holding them. It would have been difficult to ſhew greater moderation, where there were ſo many criminals.

The act of amneſty being ſettled, the two houſes took into conſideration the royal revenue, and it was ſettled at twelve hundred thouſand pounds a year; a ſum greatly ſuperior to that of any former king. But it muſt be remembered, that the expences of the crown were prodigiouſly increaſed, after the courts of Europe had adopted the example of Lewis XIV. in keeping up large ſtanding armies. The maintenance of the navy, with ſome other articles, which formerly amounted to no more than eighty thouſand pounds per annum, now required at leaſt eight hundred thouſand. It is not eaſy to imagine what advantage could be propoſed by ſo great an augmentation of the forces. The people were more heavily taxed, and the prince not at all the more powerful. A handful of men formerly did what an hundred thouſand were employed to do at preſent.

The people had been long ſo highly exaſperated againſt the regicides, that their trial occaſioned a general joy. But they firmly defended the cauſe for which they ſuffered: the terrors of death loſt all their force. Harriſon told his judges, that the pretended crime of which he was accuſed, far from loading him with guilt, was an act enjoined by heaven, that in his doubts he had implored the Lord with tears, to enlighten him, and that he had received inconteſtible aſſurances of his will; that human judgments were but darkneſs in compariſon of divine illumination; that being determined not to injure the loweſt man in the world for the greateſt advantage in it, he was ſatisfied he had acted from a good conſcience; that neither ambition nor fear had ever extorted from him the ſmalleſt token of approbation in behalf of the tyranny of Cromwell; that he had always been found firm in his principles of religion and integrity; and that this was not the character of a murderer and a villain. All the reſt, who were ten in number, that were executed, ſhewed the ſame firmneſs and courage to the laſt. They conſidered themſelves as martyrs to what they ſtiled the cauſe of religion. The great lenity of the king reſpited the reſt, and they were retained in different priſons. Lambert was ſent to the iſland of Guernſey. The bodies of Cromwell, Ireton, Bradſhaw, and Pride, were taken up and ſuſpended during a whole day at Tyburn, and then cut down and buried under the gallows.

When the king paſſed the act of amneſty, he alſo gave the royal aſſent to an act for a perpetual thankſgiving on the twenty-ninth of May, the day of his arrival in England. In the mean time the parliament applied themſelves to the neceſſary work of diſbanding the army. It would have been an act of the higheſt imprudence to keep together a body of men ſo formidable by their numbers and valour, and ſo accuſtomed to outrage and violence. An aſſeſſment of ſeventy thouſand pounds a month was therefore impoſed, in order to enable his majeſty to diſband theſe forces.

The rejoicings for the happy reſtoration of the royal family, were hardly over before the duke of Glouceſter paid the debt of nature, in the twenty-firſt year of his age. He was a young prince of many amiable qualities. His judgment was clear, his perception quick, his ideas extenſive. He was warmly attached both to the religion and conſtitution of his country, ſo that his death was conſidered as a loſs of the utmoſt importance to the nation. The king was never ſo deeply affected by any incident in his life.

In the month of October the princeſs of Orange came over to England to complement her brother on his reſtoration; the queen-mother arrived the month following, bringing with her the princeſs Henrietta, her youngeſt daughter, who, by the king her brother's conſent, was married to the duke of Orleans. The princeſs of Orange had not been more than two months in England, before ſhe was ſeized with the ſmall-pox, and died on the twenty-fourth of December, leaving only one ſon, William prince of Orange, who was afterwards king of England.

When Charles came to diſband the army he was ſtruck with their martial diſcipline, and would have been glad to have detained them; but Clarendon ſoon convinced him that it could not be done with any ſafety to the nation. Only five thouſand men, and a few garriſons, were retained.

On the twenty-ninth of December, the king, after returning the parliament thanks for their aſſiduous attention to ſettle the nation, diſſolved them. If we may credit ſome authors, the king had it in his power to raiſe two millions annually on the landed intereſt, excluſive of the exciſe and cuſtoms: a ſum more than ſufficient to have rendered the crown independent. The ſame authors add, that a member of the houſe of commons having propoſed it to him, he rejected it by the advice of his chancellor. "Your majeſty's beſt revenue," ſaid Clarendon, like an honeſt ſubject, "is the hearts of your people. While you have thoſe you will never want money." If ſuch an offer ever was made, we may ſafely conclude it was not by the conſent of the houſe; for though they gave largely to his majeſty, yet it was done with ſuch precautions as ſufficiently ſhewed they had the rights of parliament at heart; and were determined to defend the liberties of the people.

The parliament had taken no care to ſettle epiſcopacy; it was conſidered as a kind of appendage to monarchy, and not having been eſtabliſhed by any legal power it was reſtored without violence by the legal authority of the king only. In an affair ſo delicate and ſo odious to the preſbyterians, Charles, from the very firſt, ſhewed himſelf extremely moderate, and determined not to infringe that liberty of conſcience, which he had ſo ſolemnly promiſed. The epiſcopal juriſdiction was to be limited. Such parts of the liturgy as gave offence to the oppoſite party were to be expunged; and every man left wholly at liberty to purſue his own principles. But an inſurrection of the Millenarians or fifth monarchy-men obliged the miniſter to recede a little from theſe benevolent principles. About fifty or ſixty of theſe wretches, headed by one Venner, a cooper, broke out into open hoſtility, and proclaimed king Jeſus. They declared that the perſonal reign of Chriſt upon earth was juſt going to commence; that they were called by God to reform the world and to make all earthly powers ſubſervient to king Jeſus; and in order to accompliſh this pious work, they were never to ſheathe the ſword till all the carnal powers of the world became a hiſſing and a curſe; and in the frenzy of their zeal, they declared, that one of them was alone ſufficient to ſubdue ten thouſand of their adverſaries; and had very confidently planned, after having led captivity captive in England, to march into France, Spain, Germany, and other parts of the world, to proſecute in thoſe countries their holy deſign. They were, however, ſoon ſubdued; but ſo ſtrong was the force of enthuſiaſm, that they maintained with their laſt breath, at the place of execution, that if they were in an error, it was the Lord that was to blame.

Clarendon imputed all the troubles England had ſuffered during the civil wars to the factious ſpirit of the preſbyterians, and was therefore determined to take every opportunity of weakening them, that they might not be any longer capable of raiſing diſcontents and inſurrections in the nation.

The affairs of Scotland were ſettled with leſs difficulty than thoſe of England. They had ſo ſeverely felt the conſequence of their joining the Engliſh parliament, that they were determined not to follow ſuch imprudent methods for the future. The people had alſo diſcovered, that their former reſiſtance had proceeded more from the turbulence of the ariſtocracy, and the bigotry of their eccleſiaſtics, than from any fixed paſſion for civil liberty. The lords of articles were reſtored, with ſome important branches of the prerogative; and the royal authority, fortified with more plauſible claims and pretences, was re-eſtabliſhed in its full extent. The eccleſiaſtical affairs required more conſideration; but it was at laſt determined to reſtore prelacy; and Sharpe, who had been commiſſioned by the preſbyterians in Scotland, to manage their intereſts with the king, was perſuaded to abandon that party; and as a reward for his compliaſance, was created archbiſhop of St. Andrews. The covenant, once revered as divine, was diſſolved. The Scottiſh parliament teſtified the greateſt difference for the pleaſure of the monarch; but the people ſtill retained the leven of diſcontent, which might one day occaſion the worſt effects. Charles would gladly have united the preſbyterians with the natural church; and for that purpoſe procured a conference to be held in the Savoy between twelve biſhops and an equal number of preſbyterian divines; but as each party came abſolutely determined to give no point up, the conference came to nothing.

A. D. 1661. The intereſts of the royaliſts was now ſo powerful in the different counties and boroughs of England, that it was found at the meeting of the parliament, which aſſembled on the ſixth of May, that there were only fifty-ſix preſbyterians in the lower houſe, a number much too ſmall to prevent the commons from diſtinguiſhing their zeal for the church and crown. They voted every attempt to dethrone the king to be high treaſon; that to accuſe him of hereſy or popery, or to aſperſe him by libels, ſhould be puniſhed with an excluſion from all employments; that the power of the ſword belonged to him; and that it was unlawful for a man to defend himſelf againſt him. The covenant, and other republican acts were condemned to be burnt. Though the hierarchy was already reſtored to their ſpiritual authority, they were ſtill excluded from parliament by the law which the late king had paſſed immediately before the commencement of the civil wars. The greateſt violence had been uſed both againſt the king and the houſe of peers at the paſſing of this bill; and on that account alone the partizans of the church were provided with a very plauſible pretence for repealing it. It met with no great oppoſition except from the few preſbyterian members, and it was obſerved that Charles expreſſed great ſatiſfaction when he gave it the royal aſſent.

Theſe acts being paſſed the aſſembly was adjourned to the twentieth of November, when both houſes again applied themſelves to repair all the breaches that had been made by the fury of faction and civil war. It was now thought proper to relinquiſh, in the moſt ſolemn manner, the violent pretenſions of that parliament, and to acknowledge that neither one nor both houſes, independent of the king, were poſſeſſed of any military or legiſlative authority. An act was paſſed for empowering the king to appoint commiſſioners for regulating all the corporations in the kingdom; and expelling from thence ſuch magiſtrates as had either obtruded themſelves by violence or profeſſed principles dangerous to the conſtitution, civil and eccleſiaſtical. It was alſo enacted, that all magiſtrates ſhould renounce the obligation of the covenant, and declare their belief, that it was not lawful, upon any pretence whatever, to take up arms againſt the king, and of their abhorrence of the traiterous poſition of taking arms by the king's authority, againſt his perſon and government.

A. D. 1662. Theſe bills paved the way for the act of uniformity, which now came to be debated in the houſe. By this bill it was enacted, that every miniſter, who had not received epiſcopal orders, ſhould now receive them; that he ſhould declare his approbation, without reſerve, of the book of the common-prayer; that he ſhould take the oaths of canonical obedience; and that he ſhould abjure the covenant, and renounce its principles of taking arms, by any pretence whatever againſt the king.

This bill was a thunder-bolt to the preſbyterians. Confounded with other nonconformiſts, and even with papiſts, they had the mortification of finding themſelves expoſed to penalties, after having ſeen their ſect predominant during the commonwealth. The church of England was put upon its ancient footing; and the penal laws were revived. Liberty of conſcience, ſo expreſsly promiſed by the ſovereign, was annihilated. Experience ſhewed the dangers of theſe violent meaſures. They were attributed to the catholics, who were deſirous either of ſharing the benefit of toleration with the preſbyterians, or that they ſhould ſhare with them the rigours of perſecution.

But however deſirous the commons might be of reſtoring the prerogative of the crown, they did not exert the ſame activity, where any demand was made by the crown for the pecuniary aſſiſtance. In the mean time the king's debts were become intolerable, and the commons ſaw at laſt the neceſſity of voting him an extraordinary ſupply of one million, two hundred thouſand pounds, to be levied by eighteen months aſſeſſment. They alſo voted an additional impoſition of two ſhillings on each hearth, and ſettled the tax on the king during life.

Before Charles put an end to the ſeſſion, the court was employed in making preparations for the reception of the new queen, Catherine of Portugal, to whom the king was betrothed, and who was juſt landed at Portſmouth. The marriage ceremony was performed with great pomp on the twenty-firſt of May; but the princeſs, had neither the graces of perſon or humour, to make herſelf agreeable to the king. She had a portion of three hundred thouſand pounds, together with two fortreſſes, Tangier on the coaſt of Africa, and Bombay in the Eaſt-Indies.

Lambert and Vane were ſtill in priſon: they had not been concerned in the death of Charles I. but their profeſſed hatred to the crown having occaſioned them to be excepted from the amneſty, the royaliſts demanded that they ſhould be brought to juſtice. They were accordingly tried, with great ſolemnity, before all the judges of the kingdom. The impeachment of Vane turned wholly on his conduct ſince the death of the king, in quality of counſellor of ſtate, and ſecretary of the marine department. He alledged, in his defence, the neceſſity of obeying the eſtabliſhed government, however illegal that eſtabliſhment might be. "If that obedience be criminal," ſaid he, "after the government is changed by force, every ſubject in the kingdom may be liable to puniſhment. The uſurpers will puniſh ſome for their fidelity to the depoſed prince, and the prince will puniſh others for their ſubmiſſion to the uſurpers. To prevent theſe diſaſters, and to defend the life and liberty of the ſubject, an act of Henry VII. declares, that no perſon ſhall be held criminal for obeying the reigning prince. It does not belong to individuals to diſcuſs the titles of thoſe who govern. Beſides, as the moſt reſpectable people were divided between the king and the commonwealth, ought a man to be condemned for following the party to which he was bound by the covenant, an obligation then ſacred and indiſpenſable?" Thoſe arguments were not, however, ſufficient to efface the remembrance of Vane's ſeditious conduct. The judges kept to the letter of the law; and though naturally of a timid diſpoſition, he died with all the fortitude of a fanatic. Vane had been noted, in all civil tranſactions, for temper, inſinuation, addreſs, and a profound judgment; in all religious, for folly and extravagance. He was a perfect enthuſiaſt; and fancying that he was certainly favoured with inſpiration, he deemed himſelf, to ſpeak the language of the times, a "man above ordinances;" and by reaſon of his perfection, to be unlimited and unreſtrained by any rules which govern inferior mortals. Theſe whimſies mingling with pride, had ſo corrupted his excellent underſtanding, that he ſometimes thought himſelf the perſon deputed to reign on earth for a thouſand years over the whole congregation of the faithful. Vane had been a principal leader in the trial of Strafford, and he was the laſt victim to theſe ſanguinary quarrels. Lambert was condemned at the ſame time, but reprieved at the bar. He lived above thirty years after, happier, poſſibly, in his exile, than he had ever been in the thorny path of fortune.

The act of uniformity produced a kind of eccleſiaſtical revolution. It was called the St. Bartholomew act, becauſe it was to take place on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, the feaſt of that apoſtle. Though it bore no reſemblance to the St. Bartholomew's day in France, it ſhewed the invincible obſtinacy of the enthuſiaſts. In one day, and by a concerted reſolution, above two thouſand preſbyterian miniſters reſigned their livings, becauſe they would not conform to the articles of the act. The church of England now triumphed over her perſecutors. The preſbyterians, in the time of their exultation, had left her at leaſt one fifth of the livings; but they now refuſed the ſame indulgence, though it was ſollicited by the peers. They were even, ſome time after, prohibited from coming within five miles of thoſe places where they had exerciſed their miniſtry, except on journies, under pain of ſix months impriſonment, and paying a penalty of five pounds. This was cutting off their very livelihood; nor were theſe rigorous proceedings by any means agreeable to the king. Though ſtrongly ſuſpected of indifference for all religions, he was ſecretly inclined to popery, which he had, probably, embraced before his reſtoration. He was ſtrongly ſollicited by his brother James to grant a general toleration; and the misfortunes of the preſbyterians afforded a very plauſible pretence. Charles embraced the opportunity: he proclaimed an indulgence to thoſe ſcrupulous conſciences that were afraid of conforming to the eſtabliſhed worſhip; and as the parliament was now prorogued, he gave his royal word, that at the approaching ſeſſion, he would endeavour to procure a confirmation of that indulgence.

A prince without œconomy is at all times expoſed to the moſt cruel neceſſity. The principal faults of Charles II. were an exceſſive love of pleaſure, and prodigality in the gratification of his darling paſſion. Prudence and good policy were therefore very neceſſary; but theſe were not in the catalogue of Charles's virtues. The parliamentary ſupplies, together with the portion of his new queen, were all ſquandered away; nor had he yet paid the portion of his ſiſter Henrietta to the duke of Orleans. Urged by neceſſity, he had recourſe to a meaſure which expoſed him to the ſevereſt cenſure, and is ſtill regarded as one of the greateſt blemiſhes of his reign. He offered the French miniſtry to deliver up Dunkirk, on their paying a valuable conſideration. Clarendon and Southampton, though virtuous miniſters, were concerned in this tranſaction; though there is the greateſt probability to think, that the expedient was firſt propoſed by Charles himſelf. The reſolution being taken, a negotiation was opened with d'Eſtrades, the French ambaſſador; and the French monarch purchaſed Dunkirk, with all the artillery and ammunition in the place, for four hundred thouſand pounds. The annual expence of the garriſon amounted to one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds; and the advantages ariſing from it were by no means anſwerable to ſuch a charge. The tranſaction, however, occaſioned great murmurings among the people; and Lewis XIV. ſoon converted Dunkirk into a port equally advantageous to France, and formidable to England.

A.D. 1663. On the 18th of February, the parliament aſſembled, purſuant to their prorogation, and Charles endeavoured to fulfil his promiſe with regard to the liberty of conſcience. But the parliament, who ſtrongly ſuſpected that he had another, and much deeper deſign in view, determined to defeat his intentions. The avowed deſign of gratifying the diſſenters, and the ſecret reſolution of ſupporting the catholics, were equally diſagreeable. They accordingly drew up a remonſtrance againſt the late declaration of indulgence, which they preſented to his majeſty, and both houſes joined in deſiring him to iſſue a proclamation againſt all popiſh prieſts and jeſuits. To this requeſt the king returned a very obliging anſwer; but in the proclamation afterwards iſſued, the terms were couched in ſo artful a manner, as to render it of little or no effect. This ſeeming complaiſance of the king, however deceitful, was ſo pleaſing to the parliament, that, upon his application, they voted him a ſupply of four ſubſidies, and this was the laſt time taxes were raiſed in that manner. The clergy alſo granted as much as the parliament; both parties being ſatisfied with the king's complaiſance.

Gratitude was not one of Charles's principal virtues. The royaliſts, who had ventured ſo much, and ſuffered ſo deeply in his ſervice, were wholly neglected. When application was made to him for relieving their diſtreſs, he ſeemed not at all affected, but laviſhed his favours on thoſe who had been enemies to his family. The parliament, however, had more generoſity: they took ſome notice of the poor cavaliers, and diſtributed among them above ſixty thouſand pounds. Mrs. Lane and the four Penderells had alſo ſome preſents and penſions aſſigned them, for their eminent ſervices to the king after the battle of Worceſter.

A.D. 1664. At the meeting of the parliament, which was fixed for the ſixteenth of March, a motion was made in the lower houſe for repealing the act for triennial parliaments. No great oppoſition was made to this motion: the act was repealed; and thus all the ſecurity of the ſubject againſt the influence of the court was at once deſtroyed; and Charles failed not to take advantage of theſe conceſſions to baffle oppoſition, from whatever quarter it might ariſe.

Nor was the parliament more ſervile in their compliance with regard to the requeſt of royalty, than rigorous and uncharitable with regard to the people. The true ſpirit of perſecution ſeemed to actuate all their proceedings on religious ſubjects. They had, poſſibly, forgotten, that the ſame rigid maxims of intolerance adopted by Laud had been one of the principal cauſes of the dreadful calamities from which the nation had been ſo lately delivered. They were not contented with the penalties contained in the act of uniformity; they now paſſed the famous conventicle act, whereby it was enacted, that if any one ſhould repair to conventicles, the name they gave the meeting-houſes of all diſſenters, he ſhould be fined five pounds for the firſt offence, or ſuffer three months impriſonment; for the ſecond offence, ten pounds, or ſix months impriſonment; but for the third offence, after being convicted by a jury of his peers, he was to be tranſported to ſome foreign plantation, or pay the penalty of one hundred pounds.

A diſpute had, for ſome time, ſubſiſted with the ſtates of the United Provinces, in relation to commerce. The royal African company, in particular, had been oppoſed in eſtabliſhing their ſettlements on the coaſt of Guinea. Sir Robert Holmes had been ſent the preceding year with a fleet of two-and-twenty ſhips to the coaſt of Africa, to protect the Engliſh traders, and expel the Dutch from ſome places they had ſeized, contrary to the faith of treaties. Holmes executed his commiſſion with equal ſpirit and ſucceſs. After taking from the Dutch Cape Verd, the iſland of Goree, and ſeveral of their trading ſhips, he ſailed to America, where he made himſelf maſter of Nova Belgia, ſince known by the name of New York, where the Dutch had been ſettled ſeveral years. Warm remonſtrances were preſented by the Dutch againſt theſe hoſtilities; but receiving no ſatisfactory anſwer, they reſolved to do their ſubjects juſtice by force. De Ruyter was accordingly diſpatched, with a ſtrong ſquadron, to the coaſt of Guinea, where he ſoon re-eſtabliſhed the Dutch in poſſeſſion of the ſettlements from which they had been driven by the Engliſh admiral. He afterwards attempted to take Barbadoes, but without ſucceſs. Theſe hoſtile proceedings, which could only be conſidered as preludes to a rupture between the two nations, were not diſpleaſing to Charles, whoſe growing neceſſities, the natural conſequences of a blind prodigality, induced him to embrace every pretence for drawing money from his parliament. The diſpoſitions of the commons were very favourable to his deſign; for on taking the ſtate of the trade of the kingdom into conſideration, they voted, "That the wrongs, diſhonours, and indignities offered to the Engliſh by the ſubjects of the United Provinces, had greatly interrupted the commerce of theſe kingdoms: that his majeſty ſhould be humbly requeſted to demand and obtain reparation for thoſe damages; and that in the proſecution of this affair, the houſe would aſſiſt him with their lives and fortunes againſt all oppoſition whatever." This vote was conſidered as a ſufficient ſanction for thoſe vigorous meaſures which the court had adopted, and the parliament was prorogued till the month of November.

The naval preparations were now carried on with great vigour, and the whole nation ſeemed deſirous of humbling the pride of the Dutch. But as the parliament had granted no ſupplies, the city of London advanced one hundred thouſand pounds, that no ſtop might be put to the preparations. Charles viſited the ports in perſon, directed the operations himſelf, and animated the workmen by his preſence and liberality.

The navy was ſoon in a reſpectable condition; and in the month of September, admiral Lawſon ſailed with orders to ſeize all the Dutch ſhips he met with in his cruize. He was ſo ſucceſsful, that in a very ſhort time one hundred and thirty-five of their merchant ſhips fell into the hands of the Engliſh. On the twenty-fourth of November the parliament aſſembled, and voted two millions five hundred thouſand pounds for carrying on the war; a much larger ſupply than had ever before been granted to any Engliſh monarch.

A.D. 1665. Strengthened by this vote of the commons, Charles declared war againſt the Dutch in the beginning of March; and ſoon after prorogued the parliament. In this ſeſſion the clergy gave up the right of taxing themſelves in convocation, and have ever ſince been taxed by the parliament, in common with other ſubjects. In conſequence of abandoning the above privilege, they obtained votes at the elections of members of parliament.

The great preparations made in England alarmed the Dutch, who ſent an ambaſſador extraordinary to the court of England, in order, if poſſible, to prevent an open rupture, ſo deſtructive to the intereſts of a trading people: but finding all their endeavours were in vain, they exerted themſelves in making preparations for carrying on the war with vigour. John de Wit, a miniſter equally diſtinguiſhed for the extent of his capacity and the integrity of his manners, now directed all the meaſures of the Dutch republic, and infuſed ſpirit into that phlegmatic people. Though remarkably modeſt in his private behaviour, he well knew how to ſupport, in his public conduct, that magnanimity which becomes the miniſter of a powerful people. It was always his opinion, that no independent government ſhould ever make any mean or unreaſonable conceſſions to another; and that all ſuch compliances, inſtead of preventing the miſeries of war, ſerved only to invite farther inſults and indignities. By his management, a ſpirit of harmony was preſerved in all the provinces of the republic; large ſums were raiſed; and a powerful fleet, conſiſting of larger ſhips than the Dutch had ever built before, was fitted out with the utmoſt expedition, in order to conteſt with the Engliſh the empire of the ſea.

On the eighteenth of March, the duke of York, as lord high-admiral of England, ſailed with a fleet of one hundred and fourteen ſail, excluſive of fire-ſhips and bomb-ketches. He was aſſiſted by prince Rupert; and the gallant earl of Sandwich commanded one of the diviſions. Two and twenty thouſand men ſerved on board this powerful armament. The Dutch navy conſiſted of one hundred and twenty ſail of men of war, beſides fire-ſhips. Opdam, an experienced ſea-officer of undoubted courage, commanded this numerous fleet, and received orders to ſeize the firſt opportunity of giving battle to the Engliſh.

The two fleets met on the third of June, and a furious engagement enſued, in which the Dutch were defeated, with the loſs of twenty of their men of war. The ſhip on board of which the brave admiral Opdam had hoiſted his flag, was blown up, and he himſelf periſhed, with all his crew. The Engliſh loſt only four men of war; but ſeveral perſons of diſtinction were ſlain, and others dangerouſly wounded. A thankſgiving was appointed in England for this victory, and medals of the duke of York were ſtruck on this occaſion. He had, indeed, diſplayed amazing courage and conduct during the whole engagement.

When the news of this defeat reached Holland, the Dutch were ſeized with terror and diſmay; it required all the abilities and conſtancy of De Wit to revive the drooping ſpirits of his countrymen. He viſited the fleet in perſon, rectified all diſorders, and repaired the damages ſuſtained in the late engagement. While he was thus employed in fitting out the navy for another battle with the enemy, a large fleet of Dutch merchant-ſhips from Turkey and the Eaſt-Indies, having ſailed north about to avoid the Engliſh cruizers, anchored in the port of Bergen, in Norway, in order to wait there till a proper convoy could be ſent to bring them into the ports of Holland.

This was no ſooner known in England, than orders were ſent to Sir Gilbert Talbot, the Engliſh envoy at Copenhagen, to perſuade his Daniſh majeſty to ſeize this rich fleet, in revenge for the ſhameful conduct of the Dutch, who had involved him in a troubleſome war with Sweden. Tempted by the value of the prize, his Daniſh majeſty liſtened to the reaſons of the Engliſh miniſtry, but declared he was not in a condition to execute the deſign. Talbot promiſed to procure aſſiſtance from England, if his majeſty would agree to give the captors half the value of what ſhould be taken. The conditions were accepted, and the earl of Sandwich was ordered to ſail immediately to Bergen. Perſuaded that part of his ſquadron would be abundantly ſufficient to ſeize a fleet of merchantmen, Sandwich ſent Sir Thomas Tiddeman, with a few ſhips, on that ſervice. He attacked the Dutch with great impetuoſity; but the governor of Bergen having then received no orders to remain neutral, joined the Dutch, and gave the Engliſh ſo warm a reception, that Tiddeman was obliged to abandon the enterprize, after having received conſiderable damage. Charles was greatly provoked at this diſappointment: he ordered the earl of Sandwich, to whoſe conduct he imputed the whole cauſe of the miſcarriage, to return to London, where he deprived him of his command, and ſent him ambaſſador to Spain.

During theſe tranſactions at ſea, a dreadful plague raged in the city of London. It continued eleven months, and during that time ſwept away above one hundred thouſand ſouls. The dead was carried out in carts during the night, and buried at Holy-well mount. Charles at its firſt appearance removed to Hampton court, and afterwards to Saliſbury. The ſeſſion of parliament was held at Oxford; and the capital ſeemed for a time to be deſerted.

Alarmed at the miſcarriage of Tiddeman, and aſhamed of his conduct, the king of Denmark concluded an offenſive alliance with England againſt the ſtates; but reflecting on the great power of the Engliſh navy, and the fatal conſequences that might attend the deſtruction of a power, whoſe fleets were only capable of diſputing the ſovereignty of the ocean, he ſent orders to his reſident at the Hague to conclude a defenſive alliance with the ſtates againſt England. He adhered to the laſt alliance, and ſeized and confiſcated all the Britiſh ſhips in his harbours. This was a ſenſible check to the advantages Charles had obtained over the Dutch. The Engliſh commerce was not only affected, but the naval force of the king of Denmark was alſo conſiderable, and there was the greateſt reaſon to imagine that his ſhips would ſoon join the fleets of the republic.

Nor was Denmark the only power that was alarmed by the ſucceſs of the Engliſh; the king of France could not behold their triumphs without uneaſineſs. He was already engaged in a defenſive alliance with the ſtates; but his naval force was yet in its infancy. He was reſolved to ſupport the Hollanders in the unequal conteſt in which they were engaged; but protracted his declaration, and employed the interval in naval preparations both in his ports on the ocean, and thoſe in the Mediterranean. The king of Denmark was, however, made acquainted with his deſign, and ſtipulated to aſſiſt the Dutch with a fleet of thirty ſail; in conſequence of which he was to receive an annual ſubſidy of one million five hundred thouſand crowns; three hundred thouſand of which were to be paid by France.

Encouraged by theſe favourable circumſtances, the Dutch continued to exert all their power in their own defence, and to ſupport that power on the ocean, their fleets had obtained. De Ruyter, their great admiral, was arrived from the coaſt of Guinea: their India fleet was returned in ſafety: their harbours were crowded with merchantmen: Domeſtic faction was appeaſed; the young prince of Orange had put himſelf under the tuition of de Wit, who executed his office with the ſtricteſt honour and fidelity: and the whole republic was ſo exaſperated againſt the Engliſh, that they thirſted for revenge, and promiſed themſelves that their next enterprize would be attended with better ſucceſs. Their merchant-ſhips were not ſuffered to ſail; and even the fiſheries were ſuſpended, that no impediment might retard the manning of their fleet.

The Engliſh parliament aſſembled at Oxford, declared their intention of ſupporting his majeſty in the war againſt the Dutch. Accordingly they voted him twelve hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, to be levied in two years, by monthly aſſeſſments. The independents, anabaptiſts, and republicans, encouraged by the emiſſaries of the Dutch, had formed a ſcheme for a general inſurrection; but their whole plan was rendered abortive. Exaſperated by theſe practices the parliament brought in a bill, known by the name of the five-mile-act, and which has given occaſion to many heavy and juſt complaints. Under the ſpecious pretence of ſupporting the throne, againſt the attempts of its moſt inveterate enemies, the church perſevered in her project of wreaking her vengeance on the non-conformiſts. By this bill it was enacted, that no diſſenting teacher, who refuſed to take the oath of non-reſiſtance, ſhould, except upon the road, come within five miles of any corporation, or of any place, where he had diſcharged the offices of a miniſter after the act of oblivion, under the penalty of fifty pounds. Violences like theſe could only be conſidered as preludes to the moſt furious perſecution; but the ſpirit of the nation had undergone a change, and the intolerant ſpirit was nipped in its bud: the commons rejected the bill for impoſing the oath of non-reſiſtance on the whole nation.

A. D. 1666. France was now openly engaged on the ſide of the ſtates, and declared war againſt England. The conteſt was now unequal. But the Engliſh ſtill enjoyed one advantage: their country lay between the fleets of her enemies, and might be able, by ſpeedy, and well-concerted operations, to prevent their junction. But ſuch was the want of intelligence in the miniſtry, or the want of conduct in the commanders, that this favourable circumſtance became rather prejudicial. Beaufort, the French admiral, had received orders to ſail from Toulon with his ſquadron, in order to join the Dutch, and it was ſuppoſed that he was already in the channel. The Engliſh fleet, conſiſting of ſeventy-four ſail, was commanded by Monk, earl of Albemarle, and prince Rupert. The former, from the repeated defeats of the Dutch during the government of Cromwell, had raſhly entertained too deſpicable an opinion of their courage; and it was determined in a council of war, to detach prince Rupert with a ſquadron of twenty ſhips, in order to intercept Beaufort.

The Dutch fleet, commanded by de Ruyter, was now riding at anchor between Newport and Dunkirk, expecting, as it was ſuppoſed, the arrival of the French ſquadron. Albemarle determined to force them to an action, and accordingly ſtood immediately towards them. The Dutch, who did not expect this viſit, prepared for the engagement, and cut their cables, that they might be the ſooner in readineſs to receive the enemy. Sir George Aſcue, who was well acquainted with the bravery of the Dutch, cautioned Albemarle of his danger, but it was now too late. The battle which enſued is one of the moſt remarkable recorded in hiſtory, whether the duration, or the deſperate courage with which it was fought, be conſidered. It continued four days, and each was marked with events of the moſt aſtoniſhing nature. Albemarle, conſcious of the miſtake he had made with regard to the courage and conduct of the enemy, exerted all his great abilities on this memorable occaſion. Though now in the decline of life, he appeared the youthful hero, and ſeemed to have forgot his years as well as his danger.

Sir William Berkeley, who led the van during the firſt day's engagement, fell into the thickeſt of the enemy, and was obliged to yield to ſuperior force. When the victors entered the ſhip, they found the gallant commander dead in his cabin and covered with blood. The advantage which the Engliſh had acquired by gaining the weather-gage of the enemy, was of very little conſequence, occaſioned by the wind blowing ſo high, that they could not uſe the guns on the lower deck. A diſcovery made by de Wit was of the utmoſt conſequence to the Dutch. This was chain-ſhot, which tore the rigging of the Engliſh to pieces. Sir John Harman attacked the Dutch admiral Evertz, and obtained the victory: Evertz was killed in the engagement. Night at laſt put an end to the conteſt.

It was ſomewhat calmer the next morning; by which the battle became at once more ſteady and dreadful; and it was now perceived that valour alone is not ſufficient to compenſate for a defect of ſuperiority, when the enemy is not wanting either in courage or conduct. De Ruyter and Van Tromp, at once enemies from faction, and rivals in glory, exerted themſelves in this memorable battle. The latter being ſurrounded by the Engliſh, was relieved by the former, when reduced to the laſt extremity. During the action ſixteen freſh ſhips joined the Hollanders. This addition was deciſive. The Engliſh, whoſe ſhips were dreadfully ſhattered, and reduced to twenty-eight, found themſelves obliged to retreat towards their own coaſts, whither they were followed by the Dutch, and their whole fleet muſt have been taken had not a ſudden calm, which happened a little before night, prevented a freſh engagement.

As ſoon as the morning appeared, they continued their retreat. The ſhattered ſhips were ordered to ſet all their ſails, while ſixteen of the moſt entire, drawn up in order, followed them, and kept the enemy in play. Albemarle himſelf cloſed the rear, and preſented an undaunted countenance to the enemy fluſhed with victory. The admiral confeſſed to the young earl of Oſſory, who ſerved a volunteer, that he was determined to blow up his ſhip, and periſh gloriouſly in the bed of honour, rather than ſtrike to the enemy. Oſſory agreed with him, and highly applauded this deſperate reſolution.

Juſt as the Dutch were come up with the Engliſh, and were preparing to begin the engagement, a new fleet appeared to the ſouthward, crowding all their ſails to reach the ſcene of action, and join in the dreadful conteſt. De Ruyter was perſuaded that Beaufort was arrived to aſſiſt in the total defeat of the enemy: while the Engliſh flattered themſelves that prince Rupert was coming to ſnatch the laurel wreath from the brow of the conqueror. Albemarle was ſoon convinced that they were the prince's ſhips; and ſtood immediately towards them. The whole fleet followed the admiral; but Sir George Aſcue, whoſe ſhip carried one hundred guns, and was the largeſt in the fleet, unfortunately ran aſhore upon a ſand called the Galloper, and was obliged to ſtrike to the enemy.

It was now determined in a council of war, to make another attempt againſt the Dutch, and accordingly the engagement began the next morning with more fury than ever. The ſhips were grappled to each other, and the men fought hand to hand, as if on firm ground. In this manner the conteſt continued till a thick miſt obliged them to ſeperate; when the Engliſh retired to the mouth of the Thames.

The Dutch claimed the victory, but had little reaſon to boaſt. The Engliſh fleet was ſoon in a condition to face the enemy; and de Ruyter having repaired the damages his fleet had ſuſtained, ſtood to the mouth of the Thames, in order to block up the Engliſh, and facilitate his junction with the French admiral. It could not be expected that the Engliſh would tamely bear ſo vile an inſult. Albermarle and prince Rupert haſtened to attack the enemy. The two fleets, as well as the courage and conduct of their leaders were nearly equal; each conſiſted of about eighty-eight ſail. They met on the twenty-fourth of July, and the engagement began with incredible fury. Sir Thomas Allen, who commanded the white ſquadron attacked the van of the Dutch, with ſo much fury that they were entirely routed, and the three admirals who commanded that diviſion were ſlain. Van Tromp engaged Sir Jeremy Smith; and during the heat of action he was ſeperated from the main body commanded by de Ruyter, who with the utmoſt conduct and valour maintained the fight againſt the principal force of the Engliſh; and the fight continued till night put an end to the engagement. He propoſed to have renewed the battle as ſoon as the morning appeared, but inſtead of finding his ſhips in a ſituation for attacking the enemy, he ſaw them ſcattered, and unwilling to renew the battle. In this alarming ſituation neither his courage nor his preſence of mind forſook him. He made ſo noble a retreat, that he acquired as much honour by his prudence as he would have done had he gained the victory. But he could not bear the thought of flying from the enemy. He often exclaimed, "What a wretch am I, that among ſo many thouſand ſhot that fly near me, not one will put an end to my miſerable life!" He however perſevered in his duty, and by his amazing efforts, the Dutch fleet were conducted into their own harbours. On his return to Holland he complained loudly of Van Tromp's conduct, and that gallant admiral was diſmiſſed the ſervice.

This victory rendered the Engliſh the indiſputed maſters of the ocean, and admiral Holmes was detached with twenty ſail of ſhips, to inſult the coaſts of Holland. He accordingly entered the road of Ulie, where he deſtroyed one hundred and forty ſail of merchantmen, and two ſhips of war. He afterwards burnt Brandorus, a rich and populous village on the coaſt. Theſe loſſes exaſperated the merchants: they exclaimed loudly againſt the adminiſtration, and joined the Orange faction. The firmneſs of de Wit was hardly ſufficient to ſtem the furious tide of popular reſentment.

Alarmed at the victory of the Engliſh, the king of France haſtened Beaufort to join the Dutch, leſt his friend de Wit might not be able to ſupport himſelf in the adminiſtration. De Ruyter's fleet was ſoon refitted; he put to ſea, and again cruized in the ſtreights of Dover. The Engliſh fleet, now ſtronger than ever, ſailed, under the command of prince Rupert, to attack the enemy. Ruyter thought proper to decline the engagement, as he every day expected to be joined by the French ſquadron, and retired into St. John's road near Bologne, where he was ſheltered from a terrible ſtorm which ſoon after aroſe. Rupert was not ſo fortunate: his ſhips received conſiderable damage, and he was obliged to retire to St. Hellens to refit. In the mean time the duke of Beaufort, the French admiral, proceeded up the channel, and paſſed the Engliſh fleet unperceived. But before he reached the place where he expected to join de Ruyter, that commander had been ſeized with a fever, and the ſtates had thought proper to recal their fleet. Anxious for his navy, which he had raiſed with ſo much care and induſtry, Lewis ſent orders to Beaufort to make the beſt of his way to Breſt, and to continue as near as poſſible to the French coaſt. Beaufort obeyed, and was fortunate enough to paſs the Engliſh without being perceived. One of his ſhips only, being ſeparated from the fleet, fell into the hands of the enemy.

While the fleets were thus inactive, the city of London was laid in aſhes by a dreadful fire which broke out on the ſecond of September. It began at a broker's houſe near the bridge, and diffuſed itſelf on all ſides with ſuch rapidity, that nothing could reſiſt the progreſs of the flames. The dreadful conflagration laſted three days and nights; nor did it ſtop, till the greater part of the capital was deſtroyed. Eighty churches, ſeveral of the city gates, and four hundred ſtreets, containing above thirteen thouſand two hundred dwelling houſes, were conſumed. The ruins covered a ſpace of four hundred and twenty-ſix acres, extending along the banks of the Thames from the Tower to the Temple church; and from the north-eaſt gate along the city wall to Holbourn-bridge. It was at laſt extinguiſhed by blowing up a number of houſes. Both the king and the duke of York attended, and exerted all their endeavours to put a ſtop to the progreſs of the flames, but without ſucceſs.

This dreadful calamity gave occaſion to various conjectures with regard to its cauſe; no perſon being inclined to think it caſual. Some imputed it to the malice of the republicans; but the greater part aſcribed it to the papiſts; and in order to comply with this popular prejudice, an inſcription engraved by authority on the monument, imputed this calamity to that hated ſect. Both theſe ſuſpicions, however, ſeemed to have owed their riſe to the violent animoſities that poſſeſſed the minds of the different parties which divided the people at this period. Their poſterity, who behold this, and other events of that time, through the cooler medium of reaſon, ſee no cauſe for aſcribing this dreadful accident either to treachery or malice. The ſtreets of London were then extremely narrow; the houſes were almoſt all built of timber, or lath and plaiſter; the ſeaſon was remarkably dry; and a violent eaſt wind happened to blow at that time. To theſe cauſes, and to theſe only, the aſtoniſhing progreſs of the flames ought to be aſcribed.

But however dreadful this calamity proved to the inhabitants, it has ſince been attended with very beneficial conſequences. The new ſtreets were much wider than the old; the houſes were built with brick and ſtone, lath and plaiſter, as well as timber in the walls, being forbid by authority. By this means the city became much more healthy than before; and the plague, which ſo often ſwept the greater number of inhabitants, has not once appeared ſince this dreadful conflagration. The parliament voted a ſupply of one million, eight hundred thouſand pounds, to be levied partly by a poll-tax and partly by aſſeſſments.

A. D. 1667. The king was by this time convinced that it would prove a much more difficult taſk than he at firſt imagined to humble the Dutch. He was therefore deſirous of opening negotiations for a peace; but concealed his intentions till the parliament had granted the ſupply, which had been poſtponed from time to time, on the moſt trifling pretences, notwithſtanding the king ſent repeated meſſages to the houſe, requeſting that the buſineſs might be finiſhed. At laſt, on the eighteenth of January, the bill for raiſing the above ſum paſſed the commons, and received the royal aſſent with ſeveral other acts, about the middle of February.

Charles now determined to bring about a peace, and accordingly propoſed the opening conferences for that purpoſe. The Dutch, who by their riches and navigation, were on a better footing than the Engliſh, propoſed the alternative, that things ſhould be reſtored to the ſituation they were in at the beginning of the war, or that the two nations ſhould retain all their acquiſitions. The laſt was accepted, and no difficulty remained but with regard to the poſſeſſion of the Iſle of Polerone in the Eaſt Indies, once famous for its ſpices. Holles and Coventry, the Engliſh plenipotentiaries at the congreſs, propoſed that a ceſſation of hoſtilities ſhould be concluded, till the ſeveral claims could be adjuſted; but de Wit refuſed the offer. That ſagacious and enterprizing miniſter, who was no ſtranger to Charles's neceſſities, had planned an expedition, which, if ſucceſsful, he knew would be of more weight in the negotiation than any arguments whatever.

Perſuaded that there was not the leaſt reaſon to fear the ſucceſs of the negotiation, and that no attempt would be made by the enemy, while the conferences were open, the king had laid up his large ſhips, in order to convert to his own uſe the greater part of the money granted him by parliament. De Wit, who had the beſt intelligence from England, determined to take advantage of this negligence of the Britiſh monarch. He ordered de Ruyter to ſail with a fleet of ſhips and ſurprize the Engliſh, lulled in a fatal ſecurity. De Ruyter executed his commiſſion with equal conduct and ſucceſs. He entered the mouth of the Thames, and threw the Engliſh into the utmoſt terror and conſternation. The mouth of the river Medway was defended by a chain, and ſome fortifications had been added to Sheerneſs and Upnore caſtle. But the former was ſoon taken, though defended by the brave Sir Edward Sprague. The wind blowing freſh at eaſt, the vice-admiral, Van Ghent, broke the chain drawn acroſs the entrance of the Medway, and burnt the Matthias, the Unity, and the Charles V. all capital ſhips, and all taken from the Dutch during the war. He alſo poſſeſſed himſelf of the hull of the Royal Charles, which the Engliſh had ſet on fire, and advanced with ſix men of war and five fire ſhips as far as Upnore caſtle, where he burnt the Royal Oak, the Loyal London, and the Great James, all of them capital ſhips.

After performing this exploit without receiving any conſiderable damage, the Dutch fell down the Medway, and it was apprehended that they would proceed up the Thames next tide, and deſtroy all the ſhips in the river. The capital was in confuſion. Nine ſhips were ſunk at Woolwich, and four at Blackwall: platforms were raiſed in ſeveral places, and furniſhed with artillery: the trained-bands were called out, and every precaution taken to render the attempt of the enemy abortive. But de Ruyter did not think proper to proceed; the danger, he thought, was too great, and the hopes of ſucceſs too precarious. He left the mouth of the Thames, and ſtood to the weſtward, and made an attempt to deſtroy the ſhipping at Portſmouth and Plymouth, but was repulſed at both places with loſs. He was not, however, intimidated: he returned again to the mouth of the Thames, and advanced as far as Tilbury-fort; but found the Engliſh ſo well prepared for his reception, that there were no hopes of ſucceſs. He next inſulted Harwich, and kept the whole ſouthern coaſt of England in perpetual alarms till the concluſion of the peace, which happened on the tenth of July, when the treaty was ſigned at Breda. Arcadia was yielded to the French, who agreed to reſtore St. Chriſtophers, and ſome other iſlands which they had taken in the Weſt-Indies. The iſland of Porerine remained with the Dutch. The colony of New-York was the only advantage the Engliſh derived from a war, that had coſt the nation ſuch immenſe ſums, and in which the folly, negligence, and avarice of the ſovereign, had been ſo ſingularly diſplayed.

A war ſo ruinous, and terminated with ſo little advantage, exaſperated the Engliſh; and it was thought neceſſary to make ſome ſacrifice to appeaſe the people, before the meeting of the parliament. Clarendon, the chancellor, was, at this time, no favourite with either party. The king reſpected the merit of that great miniſter, but his virtues were troubleſome. The chancellor, incorruptible in the midſt of a diſſolute court, ſtill retained his integrity of manners. He had no complaiſance for the king's miſtreſſes. He was a reſtraint upon his pleaſures, and oppoſed his prodigalities. The people, leſs grateful for the good he had done them, than exaſperated at the circumſtances that diſpleaſed them, were ſo far from thinking themſelves obliged to Clarendon for his conduct, that they conſidered him as the author of their ſufferings. The preſbyterians reproached him with perſecution on one hand, and the Roman catholics with cruelty on the other. Tho' the war with Holland was undertaken contrary to his advice, yet the misfortunes were attributed wholly to him, becauſe it was determined to find him guilty at all events. The earl of Southampton, high-treaſurer, and the virtuous friend of Clarendon, who had been dead about three months, had done juſtice to his character. "This man," ſaid he, in full council, "is a true proteſtant, and an honeſt Engliſhman: while he enjoys power, we are ſecure of our laws, liberties, and religion: if he is removed, I tremble for the conſequences." But the virtues of Clarendon, inſtead of preventing, occaſioned his fall. The ſeals were taken from him, and given to Sir Orlando Bridgeman.

His enemies were not, however, ſatisfied with his diſgrace; they were determined to complete his ruin. As ſoon as the parliament met, a charge was opened againſt him in the houſe of commons, by Sir Edward Seymour. It conſiſted of ſeventeen articles; but the principal, and indeed the only one, that could affect him, was his adviſing the ſale of Dunkirk, and even this amounted to nothing more than an error in judgment. When the charge was carried up to the peers, it was ſo ill ſupported, that they refuſed to put him under arreſt. But Clarendon perceiving that the tide of popular clamour ran ſtrongly againſt him, and that he was entirely abandoned by his maſter, whom he had ſo long and ſo faithfully ſerved, withdrew to Rouen, in Normandy, and put himſelf under the protection of Lewis XIV. The French, more judicious and more humane than his countrymen, received the illuſtrious fugitive with every mark of reſpect. He lived ſix years in this retirement, employing his leiſure time in writing a hiſtory of the civil wars, a work worthy of the ſtateſman and the illuſtrious citizen. The early part of his life had been ſpent in the ſtudy of the laws. His father often exhorted him never to advance the prerogative at the expence of the public liberty, and died of an apoplexy juſt after he had repeated that leſſon to his ſon. This affecting incident imprinted it ſtrongly on his memory. His loyalty to Charles I. was that of an Engliſhman firmly attached to the principles of the conſtitution; and he died with the character of a nobleman of unblemiſhed virtue, an incorruptible judge, and an able miniſter, equally valuable for his attachment and integrity.

The miniſtry of Charles was now totally changed; the treaſury was put into commiſſion; and Sir Richard Clifford, a declared papiſt, was made firſt commiſſioner. Sir Henry Bennet, created earl of Arlington, a concealed papiſt, was made ſecretary of ſtate. The duke of Buckingham, a nobleman of ſpirit and humour, but of an abandoned character; and Wilmot, earl of Rocheſter, the lewdeſt, and moſt licentious poet of the age, were the king's chief favourites, and miniſters of his pleaſures. With theſe, and his miſtreſſes, Charles ſpent the greater part of his time.

The dreadful conflagration having laid the Royal Exchange, built by Sir Thomas Greſham, in aſhes, it was determined to rebuild it in a moſt ſplendid manner. A model of the intended building was accordingly preſented to the king; and it being approved of, Charles laid the firſt ſtone in the beginning of October, with great ſolemnity.

The baniſhment of Clarendon not having fully contented the people, the king had recourſe to another expedient more deſerving of praiſe; and had it been ſteadily purſued, would, probably, have rendered his reign happy; at leaſt, it would have rendered his memory glorious. This was the triple alliance; a meaſure which gave entire ſatisfaction to the public.

Lewis XIV. as proud as he was powerful, and paſſionately fond of glory, particularly that of conqueſts, unworthy of a great prince, filled Europe with uneaſineſs and apprehenſions. Notwithſtanding the renunciation of his queen, Maria Thereſa, of Auſtria, he ſeized Flanders and Franche Comté, pretending he had a legal right to them both. The United Provinces were ſufficiently alarmed. England was enraged at the aſſumed ſuperiority of France; and Charles projected the triple alliance. Sir William Temple was ſent to negotiate the treaty. A philoſophical miniſter could not fail of being agreeable to De Wit. The ſame frankneſs, ſincerity, and greatneſs of mind, diſtinguiſhed them both. It was not between miniſters of ſuch a character that politics degenerate into fineſſe and chicane. They undertook to mediate between France and Spain, and to engage them in a treaty that ſhould leave to Lewis part of his conqueſt, but that he ſhould abſolutely renounce the rights of his queen. Sweden entered into this alliance. According to the laws of the States General, all the towns were to conſent to the treaty; and this it was poſſible the intrigues of Lewis might have power to prevent. His ambaſſador, d'Eſtrades, was ſo ſure of this, that, on being informed of the negotiation, he ſaid, "We will talk of it in ſix weeks." But De Wit, foreſeeing the danger of delay, and perſuaded that, in a caſe of ſo much importance to his country, the good of the public ought to over-rule even the laws themſelves, boldly urged the ſtates to ratify the league the very day it was ſigned, and prevailed. Sir William Temple received the moſt flattering encomiums with a degree of modeſty that added to his merit. He anſwered, that to remove things from their element, or their centre, force and labour were neceſſary; but that they would return of themſelves. The triple alliance, ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle, put an end to the conqueſts of Lewis XIV. He kept what he had gained in the Low Countries, but Franche Comté was reſtored to Spain.

Philip IV. of Spain had been ſucceeded by his ſon, Charles II. then a minor, and his mother held the reins of government, with the title of regent. The court of Spain, though it was forced to ſubmit to the terms of the triple alliance, by no means approved proved of that treaty; becauſe certain conceſſions were to be made to France, by no means agreeable to the haughty ſpirit of the Spaniards. That court even declared, that they were ready to relinquiſh all the Low Countries, rather than ſubmit to the articles of the treaty. This was, however, nothing more than a paſſionate declaration; it was found in vain to reſiſt, and the treaty was accepted.

A. D. 1669. Peace being thus reſtored on the continent, Charles formed a ſcheme for attaching both the preſbyterians and papiſts more ſtrongly to his intereſt. To effect this, he propoſed to incorporate the preſbyterians with the church of England, and to obtain a toleration for all the other ſects of non-conformiſts. The lord-keeper was accordingly directed to procure a conference between ſome of the moſt eminent of the epiſcopal and preſbyterian miniſters; and to offer propoſals for a comprehenſion of ſuch diſſenters as could be brought into communion with the church of England. The epiſcopal divines, either from a ſpirit of chriſtian charity, or a deſire to pleaſe their ſovereign, were very compliable on this occaſion; they even made large conceſſions; and nothing remained to put a final hand to the accommodation, but the re-ordaining the preſbyterian miniſters, which was at laſt ſettled by the conſent of both parties. Matters being thus adjuſted, lord chief-juſtice Hales undertook to draw up a bill of comprehenſion, and the lord-keeper engaged to ſupport it in parliament.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was not intruſted with the ſecret, determined to render every ſcheme of this kind abortive. He wrote circular letters to the ſuffragan biſhops in his province, enjoining them to make an exact enquiry into the number of conventicles in each particular dioceſe. Provided with theſe neceſſary informations, he repaired to court, and obtained a proclamation to be publiſhed, for putting the laws againſt diſſenters in execution, particularly the act for reſtraining non-conformiſts from reſiding in corporate towns. But the king ſoon rendered the intentions of the biſhop abortive, by ordering the non-conformiſt miniſters to be told from him, that he was very deſirous of making them eaſy; adding, that if they thought proper to petition the crown, they ſhould be favourably heard. They embraced the offer; a petition was preſented; and the king, in his anſwer, told them, "That he would uſe all his intereſt to get them comprehended in the public eſtabliſhment."

The parliament was, however, averſe to any conceſſions; and when they met in October, they preſented an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for his proclamation, and appointed a committee to make a ſtrict enquiry into the conduct of the non-conformiſts. A great number of informations were accordingly laid before them; and they reported, "That ſeveral conventicles and ſeditious aſſemblies were held, even in the neighbourhood of the houſe, tending to inſult the government, and endanger the peace of the kingdom." This report ſet the houſe in a flame; and the following declaration was immediately voted, "that they would adhere to his majeſty, for the ſupport of the government, both in church and ſtate, againſt all adverſaries whatever." They proceeded no farther at that time, and the king prorogued the parliament to the fourteenth of February.

A. D. 1670. The king, when he opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the fourteenth of February, demanded a ſupply in the moſt preſſing terms. But the commons, before they complied with the king's deſires, paſſed the conventicle act, by which every member of a conventicle, or aſſembly of non-conformiſts, conſiſting of more than five perſons, excluſive of the family where it was held, was liable to a fine. And contrary to the principle received in criminal matters, what appeared doubtful was always to be interpreted in the leaſt favourable light. This ſeverity of the commons was the more extraordinary, as the ſame ſpirit of perſecution had, a little before, occaſioned a rebellion in Scotland. About two thouſand preſbyterians, after renewing the covenant, took up arms; and the flame which deſpair had kindled was quenched in blood. One Maccail, who had joined in this inſurrection, expired under the torture, in a kind of triumph of joy. The moment when his ſoul was taking her flight, he cried out, "Farewell ſun, moon, and ſtars; farewell world, and time; farewell weak and frail body: welcome eternity, welcome angels and ſaints, welcome Saviour of the world, and welcome God, the judge of all!" The ſpectators were ſtruck with a fortitude like this; a man expiring under the moſt cruel torments, and rejoicing in the dreadful conflict, was truly aſtoniſhing; it increaſed their hatred againſt ſuch inhuman perſecutors.

Though prince Rupert, the duke of Ormond, ſecretary Trevor, and the lord-keeper Bridgeman, on whoſe honour and integrity the people could rely, ſtill continued in office, yet they enjoyed but little power: they were ſeldom admitted to the cabinet council, or conſulted on the moſt preſſing affairs of the nation. Equally ſuſpicious and ſuſpected, a ſlave to pleaſure and a dupe to artifice, Charles neglected the cares of government, and expoſed himſelf to the danger of a fatal revolution. Five miniſters ſhared his confidence, and directed all the affairs of government. Aſhley Cooper, earl of Shaftſbury, diſtinguiſhed by his learning, but of the moſt violent paſſions; the duke of Buckingham, with all the advantages of wit, figure. and fortune, but without either conduct or principles; the duke of Lauderdale, a man of parts, but opinionated, a ſycophant to the prince, and a tyrant to the ſubject: the bold and impetuous Clifford; and the earl of Arlington, well verſed in buſineſs, and worthy of the place he enjoyed, had his reſolution been ſufficient to follow his own ſentiments, rather than the influence of the court. The miniſtry was called the Cabal, from the five initial letters of their names forming that word. Their political ſyſtem ſeemed to be that of complying with the king's inclinations, and ſupporting the intereſt of the duke of York.

As ſoon as Charles had given the royal aſſent to the bill againſt diſſenters, the commons paſſed an act for granting one million ſeven hundred thouſand pounds to his majeſty; but this money had the ſame fate with other ſums he had already received from parliament. It was ſquandered away upon his miſtreſſes and favourites; and he was ſo far from making good his engagements with the States-General, that he entered into meaſures for forming a cloſer union than ever with the king of France. Deſirous of rendering himſelf abſolute, by ſhaking off the yoke of dependence on the ſupplies of parliament, he determined to ſecure the friendſhip of Lewis XIV. as the only method of executing his purpoſe. To this chimerical project he ſacrificed every ſentiment of honour, juſtice and humanity. He knew he had nothing to fear from his miniſters; their ſervile flattery, and the licentiouſneſs of their manners, were ill calculated to ſupport the intereſts of their country. They were deſirous of rendering the king independent of the parliament; and thought the only way to effect it, was to enter into a new war with Holland, and depend upon Lewis for aſſiſtance of men and money.

Pursuant to this reſolution, it was determined to renew the war with Holland on the ſlighteſt pretences. The duke of York entered heartily into this ſcheme, which he was perſuaded could not fail, if ſucceſsful, of eſtabliſhing the catholic religion in England. But the alliance with France was to be kept an impenetrable ſecret, till Charles had procured a vote of parliament for arming the nation, under pretence of being ready, at all events, to protect the commerce, and ſupport the independence of the nation againſt the attempts of any power whatever, great preparations being making in the ports of France and Holland.

But however fond Charles might be of the French alliance, it does not appear, till an event determined him to purſue the ſcheme with the utmoſt vigour. The triple alliance had put an effectual ſtop to the conqueſts of Lewis, and that ambitious prince was very deſirous of revenge. Could the Engliſh be prevailed upon to enter into a new war with the Dutch, that difficulty would be removed; and he flattered himſelf that this was not difficult to be accompliſhed, as the reduction of Holland would remove the object of emulation to the Engliſh, who were jealous of their privileges. Full of theſe ideas, he took a journey to Dunkirk, accompanied by his whole court, and the dutcheſs of Orleans took that opportunity of viſiting her brother. Lewis was no ſtranger to the addreſs of that amiable princeſs, and the aſcendant ſhe had acquired over the Engliſh monarch, and had prevailed upon her to exert all her intereſt to draw her brother from the triple league. This young princeſs, then only twenty-five years of age, was accordingly ſelected as the plenipotentiary for concluding this important treaty. Charles met his ſiſter at Dover, where they ſpent ten days together in the utmoſt harmony. In their conferences ſhe artfully inſinuated, that nothing was wanting to render him the greateſt monarch in the world, and to recompenſe him for all the misfortunes he had ſuffered, than that of making himſelf as abſolute in England, as the other princes of Europe were in their dominions. This glorious end ſhe obſerved could never be obtained while his ſubjects had any proſpect of being aſſiſted by the Dutch, whoſe republican principles led them to ſupport the liberty of the ſubject. It was therefore neceſſary for him to humble the Hollanders, which would effectually remove the only difficulty of keeping his own ſubjects within the bounds of obedience. She added, that he might reſt aſſured, the king of France would aſſiſt him with men and money ſufficient to quell any commotions that might be raiſed in England, by purſuing this deſign. Blinded with the love he bore his ſiſter, and intoxicated with the deſire of governing with unlimited authority, Charles agreed to every thing propoſed by Lewis, and laid the foundation for the ruin of his allies, in the midſt of feaſtings and diverſions.

But Lewis was no ſtranger to the natural inconſtancy of Charles's temper, and therefore artfully determined to fix him firm to his engagements by the bands of pleaſure. He ſent over with the princeſs Henrietta, mademoiſelle de Querouaille, a young lady of extraordinary beauty and accompliſhments. Charles wanted power to reſiſt her charms. She accompanied him to London; was ſoon after created dutcheſs of Portſmouth, and maintained her empire over his heart during the whole courſe of his life. She kept him firm in his connections with France, and continued to be the reigning favourite, while his former miſtreſs was honoured with the title of a dutcheſs, as ſome recompence for the favour ſhe had loſt.

But the joy which Charles derived from this new alliance was greatly leſſened by the loſs of his ſiſter, who died ſoon after her return to France. This event, however, made an alteration in the reſolutions of the two monarchs. The duke of Buckingham was diſpatched to Paris to put a finiſhing hand to the treaty, by which the ſpoils of the Dutch, devoted to deſtruction, were to be ſhared between France and England.

It was ſoon found impoſſible to keep this treaty a ſecret: too many perſons had been concerned in its execution. But though it was generally ſuſpected, and perhaps known to moſt of the courts of Europe, it occaſioned no alarm. The emperor was fully employed with ſeditions in Hungary; the Swede lulled aſleep with negotiations; and the Spaniſh monarchy, weak and irreſolute, and always ſlower in its motions, permitted Lewis to follow the carreer of his ambition without reſtraint.

The marquis of Crequi made an irruption into Lorraine; the duke, not dreaming of hoſtilities, was forced to abandon his territories. He flattered himſelf that he ſhould find a powerful advocate in Charles, in return for the many favours he had received during his exile: but he was miſtaken. His envoy was told, "That the king was extremely ſorry for the misfortunes of his maſter, but that the preſent violence, like the misfortunes of a ſudden inundation, had no remedy but patience."

Such glaring partiality in favour of the French monarch alarmed the Dutch, and they began to fear for the ſafety of their country. Their misfortunes were increaſed by two factions which divided the commonwealth, One compoſed of rigid republicans, to whom the leaſt ſhadow of abſolute authority ſeemed a monſter, contrary to the laws of human ſociety; the other of republicans of a more moderate diſpoſition, who were deſirous of inveſting the young prince of Orange, afterwards the famous William III. with the poſts and dignities of his anceſtors. The grand penſionary John de Wit, was at the head of the rigid republicans, but the party of the young prince began to gain ground in the ſtate. Theſe domeſtic diſſentions were more regarded than the foreign danger that threatened the deſtruction of their liberty.

The French monarch had not only gained the Engliſh monarch over to his intereſt, but alſo the famous Van Galen, biſhop of Munſter, whoſe delight was war and plunder, and naturally an enemy to the Dutch. Lewis had formerly aſſiſted them againſt this warlike prelate; he now joined him for their deſtruction. The Swedes, who had united with the republic to ſtop the projects of a conqueror, who had then no deſigns againſt them, abandoned her when they ſaw ſhe was threatened with ruin, and renewed their old connections with France, on condition of receiving the former ſubſidies.

But among all the powers engaged againſt this little ſtate, not one of them could alledge a lawful pretence for hoſtilities. Their deſire of ſharing in the ruins of a people, who had enriched themſelves by commerce and œconomy, was the only reaſon for their uniting in their deſtruction.

On the twenty-fourth of October the parliament met purſuant to their prorogation, and the ſeſſion was opened with a ſpeech from the lord-keeper, who repreſented the preſſing exigencies of the ſtate, and the abſolute neceſſity of an immediate ſupply. He told them, "That France and the ſtates-general were collecting powerful armies by ſea and land; were aſſiduouſly employed in building ſhips, and filling their magazines with all ſorts of warlike ſtores and proviſions: that ſince the beginning of the laſt war with Holland, France had increaſed the ſtrength of her marine more than three times what it was before; and that Holland, alſo ſince the concluſion of the peace, had applied herſelf diligently to the augmentation of her fleets: that in ſo critical a conjuncture, common prudence required that his majeſty ſhould make ſome ſuitable preparations: that he had accordingly given orders for fitting out fifty ſail of his largeſt ſhips againſt the ſpring, beſides thoſe which were neceſſary for the ſecurity of trade, foreſeeing, that if he neglected to put his navy in a reſpectable condition, it might prove a temptation to thoſe who ſeem not now to intend it, to offer an affront at leaſt, if not do a real injury to the nation." He next expatiated on the ſeveral advantageous leagues he had entered into for the defence of his kingdom, and the benefit of commerce. He particularly mentioned the triple alliance concluded with the Duch and Swedes, and thoſe with Portugal and Denmark. And concluded with aſſuring them, that the king would prorogue the parliament at Chriſtmas, and therefore wiſhed they would regulate the proceedings accordingly.

The commons were deceived by this ſhameful prevarication; and either unacquainted with, or not crediting his engagements with France, voted him two millions and a half: a much larger ſupply than had ever been granted by parliament, and certainly never leſs deſerved. Sir William Temple was ſtill at the Hague, where he had acquired ſo great a reputation for honour and integrity, that the Cabal were perſuaded no orders from his majeſty could prevail upon him to promote or countenance meaſures deſtructive of the intereſt of his country. He was therefore recalled. De Wit, who admired the great and noble qualities of the Engliſh reſident, took leave of him with the higheſt regret. The Dutch ſaw through the flimſey veil of pretence made uſe of to remove him; and were now fully convinced of the inſincerity of Charles. They even ordered their ambaſſador at London to ſignify to the Engliſh miniſtry, that they ſhould look upon their recalling Sir William Temple, as an undoubted proof of their having changed their meaſures.

A. D. 1672. Though the parliament had voted a large ſupply to his majeſty, the bills for it were not paſſed when the parliament was prorogued. They met again the latter end of January, and a few days after the king ſent a meſſage to the commons, deſiring that the money-bills might be haſtened; but inſtead of paſſing the acts they joined with the lords in a ſolemn addreſs to his majeſty, upon the alarming increaſe of popery, and deſired that no papiſt or reputed papiſt might enjoy any office civil or military. The king, unwilling to give them an abſolute denial, publiſhed a proclamation againſt the catholics, but never intended to carry it into execution.

When the firſt of the money bills was carried to the houſe of peers, Lucas ſeverely animadverted on the enormous grants made to the crown, and the ſhameful manner in which theſe ſupplies were ſquandered away. "While we are continually giving," ſaid he at the concluſion of his ſpeech, "and the king is continually aſking, it is neceſſary to make ſome eſtimate for ourſelves. Would his majeſty be pleaſed to requeſt a quarter of our eſtate, I would, for my part, chearfully reſign it. Were it half, upon good occaſions, I ſhould reſign it freely; but then let us have ſome aſſurance of quietly enjoying the reſidue, and know what we have to truſt to." The king was in the gallery when Lucas ſpoke with ſuch boldneſs, and was highly offended; but he was ſo exaſperated when he found the ſpeech was printed and diſperſed in every part of the kingdom, that he ordered it to be burnt by the hand of the common executioner.

It had, however, ſuch an effect upon the lords, that they made ſome alterations in the money bill ſent up by the commons. This was highly reſented by the latter, who conſidered it as an infringement on their undoubted right of regulating all acts of ſubſidy. Several conferences were held between the two houſes, in order to terminate the affair; but inſtead of coming to an amicable agreement, they carried the diſpute to ſo great a height, that the king was obliged to prorogue the parliament, and loſe the large ſupply that had been voted by the commons.

During this ſeſſion of parliament, a tax on plays was propoſed. This was objected to by the court party, who ſaid the players were the king's ſervants, and adminiſtered to his pleaſures. Sir John Coventry pleaſantly aſked, "Whether the king's pleaſures lay among the male or female actors?" Charles, who beſides his other miſtreſſes, entertained two actreſſes, Mrs. Davis, and Nell Gwin, was hurt by this ſarcaſm, and took an unworthy revenge. Some of his guards attacked Coventry, and ſlit his noſe. The commons expreſſed their indignation, by paſſing what is called the Coventry act, by which maiming and deforming was made a capital crime, and thoſe perſons who had aſſaulted Coventry were rendered incapable of receiving the king's pardon.

About the ſame time one Blood, a diſcarded officer who had ſerved under Cromwell, and the moſt daring villain recorded in hiſtory, found means to ſteal the crown, and ſeveral other parts of the regalia from the Tower. He had ſome time before attempted to aſſaſſinate the duke of Ormond, but failed in his deſign, and eſcaped without being diſcovered. He was not ſo fortunate in his ſecond villany. He was detected; but by a ſtrange lenity, or rather weakneſs in Charles, he not only gave him his pardon, but ſettled on him five hundred pounds a year. When he was taken, he confeſſed his crimes, but refuſed to diſcover his accomplices. "I will never," ſaid he, "diſown a crime, nor betray a friend." The king had the curioſity to ſee ſo daring a villain. He was accordingly brought into his preſence, and had the impudence to tell his majeſty, that if he ordered him to be executed, his friends, who were both able and willing, would not fail to revenge his death. Whether this declaration intimidated the king, or whether he thought ſo intrepid a perſon might be of uſe on ſome future occaſion, is uncertain; but Charles took him into his favour, and even treated him with diſtinction, while many of his faithful ſervants, who had loſt their fortunes in his ſervice, were unrewarded and forgotten. Princes are not eaſily forgiven for neglecting thoſe who have ſerved them faithfully, eſpecially when they laviſh their favours on unworthy objects.

But this imprudent action was only a prelude to others of a more dangerous tendency. Charles was always in want of money, and the failure of the laſt ſupplies voted by the commons, had greatly increaſed his neceſſities. In this exigency, the Cabal adviſed him to ſhut up the exchequer. Their advice was followed; the exchequer was ſhut up, and continued ſo for a year and ſome months, to the great diſtreſs and ruin of many families, who had lent their money upon government ſecurity. No Engliſh monarch had ever before dared to commit ſo flagrant an act of injuſtice; and at any other period he might perhaps have fallen the victim of his own folly. Every part of the kingdom reſounded with complaints. The moſt ſevere libels againſt the king and his miniſters were publiſhed. But Charles was deaf to the complaints of his people. Immerſed in pleaſure, he regarded not the reproaches incurred by his avarice and injuſtice.

It has been already obſerved that Charles had publiſhed a proclamation againſt the papiſts; but he now determined to change his conduct. Accordingly, as head of the church, he iſſued a proclamation for ſuſpending the penal laws, which had been made againſt all non-conformiſts and recuſants whatever; and for granting to the proteſtant diſſenters the public exerciſe of their religion, and to the papiſts the liberty of celebrating maſs, in private houſes. The lord-keeper Bridgeman refuſed to put the ſeals to the edict for ſuſpending the penal laws. Exaſperated at this oppoſition, the king deprived him of his office, and gave the ſeals to the earl of Shaftſbury.

The nation could not, however, ſtill believe that the king had entered into a treaty with Lewis for the deſtruction of the Dutch. A yatch had been ſent from England to bring over the lady Temple from Holland. The captain inſiſted that the Dutch admiral Van Ghent ſhould pay the honours due to the Engliſh flag. This the Dutchman refuſed, declaring that it was never known for an admiral in his own harbour to ſtrike his flag to a ſmall veſſel, eſpecially as the commander had nothing more than a captain's commiſſion. Though this reaſon was irrefragable, the Cabal laid hold of the incident to quarrel with the ſtates. Unwilling to enter into a war with England, the Dutch offered to make any conceſſions: But the miniſtry, determined to declare war againſt the republic, purſuant to the conditions ſtipulated in their famous treaty with Lewis, refuſed every ſatisfaction.

It was now generally believed, that the vaſt naval preparations making in the different parts of England were intended againſt the Dutch; but before any declaration was publiſhed, a perfidious attempt was made on the Dutch Smyrna fleet, amounting to ſeventy ſail, and valued at a million and a half ſterling. The deſign was, however, rendered abortive, by the gallant behaviour of the Dutch, who repulſed all the attacks of the Engliſh during three days ſucceſſively. Theſe hoſtilities were followed by a declaration of war. But ſurely never reaſons more abſurd and ridiculous were employed to cover ſo flagrant a violation of the late treaty. Complaints were made of injuries offered to the Eaſt-India company; a charge which that company themſelves diſowned. The detention of ſome Engliſh ſubjects in Surinam was alſo alledged, though it was known that their continuing in that colony was voluntary. The refuſal of a Dutch fleet to pay the honours of the flag to an Engliſh yacht, was alſo urged as an unpardonable offence; and to complete the ridiculous catalogue of affronts, mention was made of ſome abuſive pictures, reflecting on the Engliſh nation. It was ſome time before the ſtates could diſcover the meaning of the laſt charge againſt them. At laſt it was found, that the complaint related entirely to a portrait of Cornelius de Wit, brother to the penſionary, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the expedition, when the Engliſh ſhips were burnt in the Medway. On the back ground of the picture was a repreſentation of ſeveral ſhips on fire. Such were the injuries which nothing leſs than the blood of a whole people could obliterate. Lewis, with more dignity, though not with more ſolid reaſon, alledged nothing but his diſpleaſure with the ſtates.

All the efforts which ambition could dictate, or prudence deviſe, were now to be put in practice for the deſtruction of a ſtate, whoſe only crime was their oppoſition to the conqueſts of Lewis XIV. Near two millions ſterling were expended by that ambitious monarch in making preparations againſt the Dutch republic. Thirty men of war, of fifty guns each, joined the Engliſh fleet, which conſiſted of an hundred ſail. The French monarch, accompanied by his brother the duke of Orleans, marched, at the head of one hundred and twelve thouſand men, towards Maeſtricht and Chaleroi, on the frontiers of Spaniſh Flanders and Holland. The biſhop of Munſter, and the elector of Cologne, had about twenty thouſand men. The prince of Condé and marſhal Turenne were the principal generals of the French army: the duke of Luxemburgh commanded under them: Vauban, the famous engineer, was appointed to conduct the ſieges.

Againſt ſo formidable a force, commanded by ſuch conſummate generals, and furniſhed with immenſe treaſures to bribe the commanders of garriſons, what had the republic of Holland to oppoſe? A young prince of a weak conſtitution, who had never ſeen a battle, and about twenty-five thouſand ill-trained ſoldiers, who formed the whole military force of the country. In a word, the total annihilation of the republic appeared inevitable.

Lewis ſoon made himſelf maſter of all Guelderland, and the towns upon the Yſſel. The inhabitants of Utrecht ſent the keys of their city to the conqueror, and the whole province of that name capitulated. Lewis made a triumphal entry into Utrecht on the twentieth of June. The provinces of Holland and Zealand only remained to conquer, and Amſterdam itſelf ſeemed but to wait the hour of its ſlavery or deſtruction. A little more alacrity on the part of Lewis would have put that important fortreſs into his hands. The capital once taken, not only the republic itſelf muſt have fallen, but there would have been no longer ſuch a ſtate as Holland. Some of the richeſt families, and thoſe who were zealous lovers of liberty, were preparing to fly their devoted country, and embark for Batavia.

Nor were the Dutch diſtreſſed in this manner by land only; the combined forces of France and England threatened the deſtruction of their marine power, and the total annihilation of their navy. The ſtates had not, however, been negligent in fitting out their ſhips; and De Ruyter, with a fleet of ninety ſail, was ſent in queſt of the Engliſh and French fleets, commanded by the duke of York and the marſhal d'Etrees. They were riding careleſsly in Solebay, little expecting the appearance of a ſhip from an enemy, whoſe whole force was far from being ſufficient to defend their own frontiers. Cornelius de Wit was on board, as deputy from the ſtates. The Engliſh were very near being ſurprized; but recovering themſelves, they ſlipt their cables, and ſtood out to meet the enemy. A dreadful engagement enſued, in which both the commanders and ſeamen diſplayed the greateſt courage and conduct. The earl of Sandwich, who commanded under the duke of York, led the van, and was ſoon engaged in a cloſe fight with the enemy. Several Dutch ſhips attacked him at once; but he bravely defended himſelf againſt their joint attempts, killed the Dutch admiral, Van Ghent, and beat off his ſhip. Aſtoniſhed at the valour diſplayed by this gallant officer, and deſirous of ſilencing the dreadful fire he kept up with ſuch amazing vigour, three fire-ſhips were ſent ſucceſſively to deſtroy him; but he ſunk them all, together with another capital ſhip of the enemy, that had ventured to lay him aboard. At laſt, when his ſhip was almoſt torn to pieces, and ſix hundred of his men were ſlain, another fire-ſhip grappled him, and he periſhed with the remainder of his crew. In the mean time, De Ruyter engaged the ſhip on board of which the duke of York had hoiſted his flag, with the utmoſt fury, and one of the fierceſt encounters recorded in hiſtory ſucceeded. At laſt the duke's ſhip was ſo ſhattered, that he was obliged to leave her, and hoiſt his flag on board another. But he was ſo overpowered by the enemy, that had not Sir Joſeph Jordan brought the Blue ſquadron to his relief, he muſt have been taken, with ſeveral ſhips that were cloſely engaged with the enemy. This reinforcement rendered the conteſt equal, and it was continued with the ſame fury till night obliged them to ſeparate. The Dutch retired; nor did the Engliſh think it prudent to follow them.

Both ſides claimed the victory; and, perhaps, with equal reaſon. The loſs was greateſt on the ſide of the Engliſh; but the Dutch firſt retired. De Wit, who knew that nothing leſs than a complete victory could ſave his country, thought it prudent to retire when he found that this was impoſſible to be obtained. The Engliſh complained loudly that the French were wanting in their duty; for they ſeparated from the fleet, and fought only at a diſtance. This conduct was aſcribed to ſecret orders given to the marſhal d'Etrees. Nothing could tend more to promote the ambitious projects of Lewis, than the total deſtruction of both the Engliſh and Dutch fleets, while his own ſhips were ſpared.

The Dutch were now reduced to deſpair; and to add to their misfortunes, the ſtate was diſtracted by the diviſions which commonly ariſe among an unfortunate people, who impute to each other the calamities of their country. John de Wit was perſuaded, that the only way of ſaving the ſmall remains of the wretched republic, was by making a peace with the conqueror. Full of a republican ſpirit, and jealous of his perſonal authority, which had always been exerted for the good of his country, he dreaded the power of the prince of Orange, little leſs than the ambition of the French monarch. While the prince, who was equally attached to the intereſt of the ſtate, exerted all his intereſt to induce the ſtates to elect him ſtadtholder, an honour ſo long enjoyed by his anceſtors. He ſtrenuouſly oppoſed a peace with Lewis, as he knew it could now only be obtained on terms that muſt annihilate the power and opulence of the republic. But the intereſt of the penſionary prevailed; and a reſolution was taken, in an aſſembly of the ſtates, to ſue for peace. Deputies were accordingly ſent to the French camp, to implore mercy in the name of the republic, who, ſix months before, looked upon herſelf as the arbiter of kingdoms. Lewis received the deputies with an arrogance that was an inſult upon humanity; but at length deigned to dictate the terms on which he would permit the Dutch to exiſt as a ſtate. His demands, however, were little better than articles of ſlavery; and a peace on ſuch conditions was abſolutely inſupportable. Inſpired with a deſperate courage by the haughtineſs of the conqueror, it was determined, that if a peace could be obtained on no better terms, to periſh with their liberties.

The firſt ſtep neceſſary to be taken, purſuant to this deſperate reſolution, was to ſtop the progreſs of the conqueror; and accordingly the ſluices of the province of Holland were opened, whereby the whole country was laid under water. The eyes of the people were now fixed upon the young prince of Orange, whom they conſidered as the deliverer of their country: while the grand penſionary, by having prevailed upon the ſtates to ſend deputies to the French king, was conſidered as the betrayer of the ſtate. The fury of party zeal now roſe to the greateſt height; and Cornelius de Wit, being accuſed of a deſign to murder the prince, was committed to priſon, where he underwent the moſt cruel torture, in the height of which he repeated thoſe verſes of Horace, which ſo elegantly expreſs the duty of a true citizen. His brother, the penſionary, failed not to viſit him in priſon, determined to ſhare his fate. The outrageous populace followed him, and glutted their brutal fury on the mangled bodies of theſe two illuſtrious citizens.

The murder of the De Wits extinguiſhed, for a time, the party diſtinctions which had divided the ſtate. The prince of Orange was declared ſtadtholder, and ſhewed himſelf worthy of the power with which he was intruſted. He exhorted the citizens to firmneſs, aſſuring them that the other powers of Europe would not fail to ſend them aſſiſtance. He repreſented to them, that it was in vain to flatter themſelves with being able to diſarm, by ſubmiſſion, an enemy whoſe ambition would keep no meaſures: that now was the time to ſacrifice every thing to ſupport that precious liberty which their anceſtors had purchaſed with their blood: that, for his own part, he would tread in the ſteps of his fathers, and devote himſelf, without reſerve, to the preſervation of the ſtate. Buckingham, the Engliſh envoy, aſking him whether he did not ſee that the republic was infallibly ruined, anſwered, with great vivacity, "I have one ſure method of never ſeeing the ruin of my country; I will die in the laſt intrenchment."

His conduct ſhewed that he ſpoke the real ſentiments of his heart. He exerted all his power againſt the common enemy. He overflowed all the paſſes by which the French could penetrate into the reſt of the country. He ſent envoys to the different courts of Europe; and by his negotiations, rouſed the emperor, the empire, the Spaniſh council, and the government of Flanders, from their lethargy; and even induced the court of England to be leſs deſirous of ſupporting the ambitious deſigns of the French monarch. Affairs now began to wear a different aſpect. Lewis entered Holland in the month of May; and before September, the greater part of the powers of Europe were forming a confederacy againſt him. Montercy, governor of Flanders, ſent privately a few regiments to the aſſiſtance of the States; the emperor Leopold diſpatched Montecuculli, at the head of twenty thouſand men; and the elector of Brandenburgh took the field with forty thouſand troops, whom he paid himſelf. In a word, while the ſubjects of Lewis were every where erecting monuments of his conqueſts, the powers of Europe were forming confederacies for ſnatching them from his hands. They rightly conſidered the reduction of Holland as a prelude to their own ſlavery. It would be impoſſible, they thought, to defend themſelves againſt the exorbitant power of France, ſhould it be increaſed by ſo great an acceſſion.

A. D. 1673. The ſtates depended greatly on the Engliſh parliament; they were perſuaded that the intereſt of the nation would prevail over the ambitious views of the court. Charles, for near two years, had been free from the uneaſineſs of parliamentary remonſtrances; but the want of money rendered it abſolutely neceſſary for him to ſummon that aſſembly. His ſpeech to both houſes at the opening of the ſeſſion, full of confidence and cordiality, diſguiſed the real ſentiments of his heart. Shaftſbury, the chancellor, inſiſted on the neceſſity of carrying on the war againſt a republic ſo eſſentially an enemy to the Engliſh. "The parliament itſelf," ſaid he, "acknowledged that Carthage was to be deſtroyed: the preſent hoſtilities therefore may more properly be called the war of the parliament, than that of the king." The commons, however, entertained a different opinion, and were determined that his majeſty ſhould purchaſe the ſupplies by particular compliances.

The cabal had uſurped the whole power of the government, and the chancellor, contrary to the eſtabliſhed cuſtom, had iſſued writs for electing new members in the room of thoſe who were deceaſed. The firſt vote of the parliament declared theſe elections void, and the members accordingly withdrew. It was now evident that there was a large majority againſt the court, and that without remarkable firmneſs in the king the whole plan formed by the cabal muſt fall to the ground, and a change in the miniſtry be the conſequence. Shaftſbury, before he communicated his plan to Charles, had determined within himſelf, that if he found the king wanted reſolution to execute it, he would immediately join the country party, in order to prevent a proſecution by the commons, as the adviſer, or at leaſt the promoter of a ſtep that threatened the deſtruction of the conſtitution. The example of the earl of Clarendon was yet too recent to be forgotten, and he doubted not but his ſovereign would as readily ſacrifice him to the indignation of the parliament and people, as he had done that faithful ſervant.

The parliament now proceeded to take into conſideration the proclamation of indulgence, by which the penal laws againſt non-conformiſts and catholics were ſuſpended, and it was voted, that it tended to alter the conſtitution, and change the legiſlative power, which the two houſes ſhared with the king. Charles at firſt appeared determined to ſupport his declaration, and in caſe of reſiſtance, to apply to France for aſſiſtance. But he now ſaw the danger of his reſolution. He perceived that a civil war muſt be the conſequence of his breaking with the parliament; and the remembrance of the miſeries that had attended his family nearly affected him. His natural indolence, his love of pleaſure and repoſe, added to his want of money, were motives too powerful to be withſtood, and he determined to comply with the parliament. He, however, conſulted the peers in order to give an air of deliberation to the buſineſs; after which he broke the ſeals of the obnoxious declaration with his own hand, and promiſed to aſſent to all bills that had a tendency to remove abuſes.

Shaftſbury ſaw his danger, and immediately joined the country party, and his great talents ſoon placed him at the head of the oppoſition. The parliament were now determined to put the king's declaration to the proof. They paſſed a bill entitled, "An act to prevent the dangers which may happen from popiſh recuſants," commonly called the Teſt Act, whereby all perſons, enjoying any office, or place of truſt or profit, were required to take the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy, and alſo an oath againſt tranſubſtantiation in theſe terms, "I declare that I believe that there is no ſuch thing as tranſubſtantiation in the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, either before or after conſecration by any perſon whatever." They were likewiſe to receive the communion, according to the rights of the church of England, in ſome pariſh church. Nor were the parliament contented with paſſing theſe bills, they alſo preſented two petitions concerning grievances; and the king having promiſed to redreſs them, they paſſed the money-bill, but without mentioning any thing of the war, which they highly diſapproved; but they added a clauſe to it, importing, That no papiſt ſhould be capable of holding any public employment.

In conſequence of the Teſt Act all the popiſh officers reſigned their employments, and among the reſt the duke of York his poſt of lord high-admiral. The lord Clifford alſo reſigned his treaſurer's ſtaff, and died ſoon after. Shaftſbury was deprived of the ſeals, which were given to Sir Heneage Finch: and Sir Thomas Oſborne, created earl of Danby, ſucceeded lord Clifford in the office of treaſurer.

The duke of York had ſome time ſince loſt his dutcheſs, daughter to the earl of Clarendon, and was now determined to marry Mary, ſiſter to the duke of Modena, a princeſs educated in all the ſuperſtition of the Romiſh religion. This alliance was warmly oppoſed by the parliament, who, on this occaſion, preſented a petition to the king, conceived in the ſtrongeſt terms, and expreſſive of their apprehenſions of the dangerous conſequences that might reſult from ſuch a marriage. The duke of York, however, paid little regard to their petition. He declared he would not be contradicted in a meaſure he thought ſo eſſential to the happineſs of his life. He accordingly married that princeſs on the twenty-firſt of November.

The war was ſtill carried on with great vigour againſt the Dutch, and prince Rupert was appointed commander of the fleet, in the room of the duke of York. As ſoon as the prince had joined the French admiral, they ſailed in queſt of the Dutch to force them to an engagement; and as the latter were far from declining the offer, a battle enſued, and proved very obſtinate and very bloody; but without either gaining any very great advantage. The principal loſs fell upon the French, whom the Engliſh, diffident of their attentions, took care to place under their own ſquadrons, and by that means expoſed them to the thickeſt part of the fire of the enemy. This engagement was fought on the eighth of June; and was renewed on the fourteenth, when the fortune of the day remained as doubtful as before.

Both nations now exerted all their force, and ſeemed determined to put the whole to the event of a general engagement. The prince of Orange had found means to reconcile de Ruyter and Van Tromp, a ſon worthy of the gallant father from whom he ſprung. Theſe two celebrated admirals now commanded the Dutch fleet, and on the eleventh of Auguſt the battle began at the mouth of the Texel. De Ruyter ſingled out prince Rupert, Tromp oppoſed himſelf to Sir Edward Sprague, the Engliſh vice-admiral, and Brankert, the Dutch rear-admiral bore up to attack d'Etrees. The engagement was conducted with aſtoniſhing fury and emulation by the Engliſh and Dutch officers; but the French kept at a diſtance and left the Engliſh to ſuſtain the whole fury of the battle. In vain did prince Rupert make a ſignal to d'Etrees to bear down to his aſſiſtance; he took no notice of any thing that paſſed, and kept his whole ſquadron far from the ſcene of action. Sprague, when the battle began, had hoiſted his flag on board the Royal Prince; but ſhe being ſoon diſabled he left her, and diſplayed his flag on board the St. George, while Tromp for a ſimilar reaſon, quitted his own ſhip, and went on board the Comet; and the fight was immediately renewed with the ſame fury as before. Both the ſhips of theſe gallant commanders were ſoon ſhattered, and Sprague was leaving the St. George in order to hoiſt his flag on board a third ſhip, when a cannon ball paſſing through his ſhip, ſtruck his boat, and the gallant admiral was drowned. It is worthy of remark, that in all the engagements theſe brave admirals always ſingled out each other, as the only antagoniſt worthy of them; and when the brave Sprague periſhed Van Tromp generouſly paid him the tribute of a tear.

Had the French done their duty a total victory muſt have been the conſequence. But by this refuſal in the Frenchman, and his own ſhips having received ſo much damage by the enemy, prince Rupert could not purſue the advantages he had gained by his valour. He therefore ſtood away for the Engliſh coaſt, leaving the victory undecided. The Dutch, however, gained every thing they wiſhed. By the retreat of the Engliſh, a rich fleet of Eaſt-India ſhips, which had been for ſome time expected, arrived unmoleſted in their ports. An expedition which had been planned againſt the coaſt of Zealand, was alſo rendered abortive. This was the laſt engagement fought betwixt thoſe rival nations. The Engliſh became very deſirous of putting an end to a war which had exhauſted them of men and money, without the leaſt proſpect of honour or advantage.

The parliament met on the twentieth of October; but the king, finding he had nothing to expect from their deliberations, ſent the uſher of the black rod to the commons, commanding their attendance in the houſe of peers. But before they would ſuffer him to enter, they voted, that a ſtanding army is a grievance; that the evil counſellors about the king are a grievance; that the duke of Lauderdale is a grievance, and not fit to be employed in any office of truſt. They had hardly finiſhed theſe votes before the uſher of the black rod entered, the ſpeaker leaped from the chair, and the houſe broke up in the utmoſt confuſion.

In the mean time the Dutch began to recover from their aſtoniſhment. Lewis by not deſtroying the forts, as Condé and Turenne had propoſed, greatly weakened his own army by the number of garriſons he was obliged to detach. The prince of Orange, by a maſterly piece of military conduct, joined the army of the empire, and the French were obliged to evacuate the three Dutch provinces with as much precipitation as they had conquered them; but not before the inhabitants had paid dear for their deliverance. The intendant Robert had raiſed in the ſingle province of Utrecht no leſs than ſixteen hundred and ſixty-eight florins. All the triumphant monuments of Lewis's conqueſt erected in the Netherlands were deſtroyed, and that prince, conſidered by all the powers of Europe as one who had enjoyed the honours of a tranſient triumph with too much precipitation and pride; which had now involved him in a bloody war with the united forces of the empire, Spain and Holland.

A. D. 1674. On the ſeventh of January the parliament met agreeable to their prorogation, and it was ſoon evident that they had not changed their opinions during the receſs. Aware of the dangerous deſigns of Charles, they were determined to exert all their power to render his plans of abitrary power abortive. They ſeriouſly debated on the grievances of the nation, and both houſes were perſuaded that there was a neceſſity for their being removed. They began with addreſſing the king for a general faſt to implore the bleſſing of the Almighty on their endeavours againſt the dangerous errors of popery; and then reſolved to grant no more ſupplies till the grievances they enumerated were redreſſed, and the proteſtant religion, as well as the liberties and properties of the people, ſecured. Both houſes joined in an addreſs to the king, for the removal of the duke of Lauderdale from his majeſty's preſence and councils for ever. The commons examined the duke of Buckingham on ſeveral particulars of government, and not being ſatisfied with his anſwers, they paſſed the ſame vote againſt him, as they had done againſt Lauderdale. Arlington was next queſtioned; but his anſwers were ſo ſatisfactory to the houſe, that notwithſtanding an impeachment was prepared againſt him, they thought proper to drop the proſecution.

Theſe vigorous proceedings intimidated Charles; who, finding it would be impoſſible to carry on the war without ſupplies, began to liſten to the terms propoſed by the ſtates general, for a ſeparate peace. The French miniſter exerted all his power to keep Charles firm to his engagements, but in vain. The king choſe rather to reconcile himſelf to his people and parliament, by agreeing to a peace they ſo much deſired, than to depend upon France for ſupport. A treaty was accordingly ſigned with the ſtates, by which they again gave up the honours of the flag, and agreed to pay three hundred thouſand pounds towards defraying the expence of the king's naval armaments. Several attempts were made for concluding an offenſive and defenſive alliance with Holland. Moſt of the European princes ſollicited this meaſure as the only infallible means of putting a ſtop to the alarming progreſs of the French monarch. The two houſes of parliament ſupported theſe ſollicitations with all their power. Their hatred to the French was indeed ſo great, that they would gladly have relinquiſhed the enjoyments of the new peace for a time, to ſee their king armed againſt the common diſturber of the tranquillity of Europe: nor would they have thought any ſupplies too great in order to proſecute a war which had ſo evidently tended to increaſe the good of the public. Charles, however, paid no regard to their ſollicitations. Prompted equally by his hatred to the Dutch, and the hopes of ſtill receiving a powerful aſſiſtance from France, he refuſed to ſacrifice his ally to the reſentment of his enemies. He ſuffered ten thouſand of his men to engage in the ſervice of that crown, and made a merit with Lewis of the neceſſity which had drawn him from his alliance, and offered his mediation for concluding a general peace.

Soon after the treaty with the ſtates was ſigned, Sir William Temple was again ſent to Holland with the title of ambaſſador. But before he embarked he nobly repreſented to the king the inconvenience which the ſyſtem of the Cabal muſt occaſion; how difficult, not to ſay impoſſible, it was, to eſtabliſh in England the government and religion of France; that the genius and principles of the people were not to be ſuddenly or eaſily changed; that force of arms alone could compel them to ſubmit to a yoke they beheld with horror; that an Engliſh army could never be prevailed upon to promote thoſe ends; that the catholics did not compoſe the one hundredth part of the nation; that foreign troops could not be levied or maintained in any conſiderable number; and that if a few were retained, they could do nothing more than excite the hatred and revolt of the people. He concluded with referring him to the obſervations of Gourville, a French writer much eſteemed by Charles, who ſays, "A king of England that chuſes to be a man of his people, is the greateſt monarch in the world; but if he chuſes to be ſomething more, he is nothing at all." Though the king was highly diſpleaſed at this diſcourſe, he knew how to diſſemble. "'Tis very well," ſaid he, "I will be the man of my people." Events ſoon ſhewed that he ſpoke not the dictates of his heart.

The defection of England was followed by that of the biſhop of Munſter, and even the elector of Cologne. Lewis was, however, ſucceſsful in ſeveral places. Franche Comté was again reduced. Turenne was able, with a much inferior force, to baffle all the attempts of the allied army in Alſace. By a ſudden and unexpected march he attacked and defeated, at Sintzheim, the duke of Lorraine and Copara, the imperial general. Seventy thouſand Germans invaded Alſace, and took up their quarters in that province. He attacked and routed a body of the enemy at Mulhauſen. He drove from Colmar the elector of Brandenburgh. He obtained a new victory at Turkheim: and having cleared the province entirely of the allies, he compelled them to repaſs the Rhine with great loſs and diſhonour. The French were not ſo fortunate on the ſide of Flanders where the prince of Orange commanded. That young general ſhewed himſelf nearly equal to the great Condé, in the bloody battle of Seneſſe. "The prince of Orange," ſaid Condé, "has conducted himſelf through the whole action like a great general, except in expoſing his life like a young ſoldier."

A. D. 1675. After a receſs of fourteen months the parliament aſſembled on the thirteenth of April, and immediately voted a bill to be brought in for preventing the growth of popery; in which it was declared, that the ſaying maſs ſhould be a ſufficient evidence of a perſon being a popiſh prieſt; and that a penalty ſhould be inflicted on all who aſſiſted at the catholic ſervice. They alſo framed a bill declaring it treaſon to levy money without conſent of parliament; another for vacating the ſeats of members who accepted of offices; and a third for ſecuring the liberty of the ſubjects, and preventing their being tranſported as priſoners to diſtant iſlands.

On the other hand the miniſtry exerted all their influence in the upper houſe, and paſſed a bill for a new teſt, by which every member of parliament, and all perſons in office, were to take an oath in the following terms: "I declare, that it is not lawful, on any pretence whatever, to take up arms againſt the king; and that I abhor the maxim, as treaſonable, which holds, that one may take up arms, by the authority of the king, againſt his perſon, or againſt thoſe who act by virtue of his commiſſion; and I ſwear that I will never uſe any effort to change or alter the government in church or ſtate." This bill was vigorouſly oppoſed: ſome maintained that it was founded upon falſe principles; others, that it would revive dangerous diſputes: even in the houſe of lords, it was carried only by two voices. The oppoſition would have been ſtronger in the commons, had not an unforeſeen quarrel between the two houſes ſuſpended all buſineſs of that kind. Dr. Shirley having appealed to the houſe of lords from a decree in chancery given in favour of Sir John Fagg, a member of the commons, the latter aſſerted, that this proceeding was a violation of their privileges; that none of their members could be cited to appear before the lords; and that the lords could not even receive appeals. On the other hand, the lords reſolved, "That it was the undoubted rights of the lords in judicature to determine, in time of parliament, appeals from inferior courts, where the members of either houſe were concerned, that there might not be a failure of juſtice." Several conferences paſſed between the two houſes, but with ſo much rancour and animoſity, that the king, alarmed for the conſequences, came to the houſe of peers on the ninth of June; and after reproaching both branches of the legiſlature for carrying their differences to ſuch an indecent height, he prorogued the parliament to the thirteenth of October.

The coffee-houſes, whither the people reſorted in crowds, were filled with cenſures on the government. The miniſtry was at once alarmed and exaſperated; and a proclamation was publiſhed, commanding all the coffee-houſes to be ſhut up: a ſtrange method of quieting the fears of the people, by giving them freſh cauſe of complaint. The keepers of the coffee-houſes promiſed not to ſuffer any ſeditious diſcourſe in their houſes, and on this condition they were ſoon opened again. But the general diſcontent continued to increaſe.

The war on the continent was ſtill carried on with great vigour, and the French arms were, in general, ſucceſsful. Though Turenne fell by a cannon-ball, and the prince of Condé had left the army; yet the defeat of the marſhal du Crequi, at Conſabrick, near Treves, was the only misfortune of that kind the French had experienced for ſixty years.

On the thirteenth of October, the king opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a very ſhort ſpeech; in which, after recommending unity between the two houſes, he demanded a ſupply ſufficient for building ſeveral new ſhips, and clearing off the anticipations of his revenue. The commons abſolutely refuſed to give any money for paying off the debts of the crown, but voted three hundred thouſand pounds for defraying the expence of building twenty ſhips of war, and appropriated the duties of tonnage and poundage to the ſupport of the navy. But the buſineſs of the nation was ſoon after ſuſpended by the revival of the diſpute between the two houſes, in the caſe of Shirley and Fagg. The commons were as reſolute and determined as ever in maintaining their privileges; and the king, to prevent the conſequences that might enſue from theſe alarming diſputes, prorogued the parliament for fifteen months.

A. D. 1677. When the two houſes met, purſuant to their prorogation, they acted as if they had forgotten theſe unhappy heats and animoſities which had put an end to the two laſt ſeſſions. The commons voted his majeſty ſix hundred thouſand pounds for the uſe of the navy, and a continuance of the duty of exciſe upon ale and brandy for three years. In a word, every thing ſeemed to promiſe a happy union between the king and both houſes of parliament. But unfortunately, theſe pleaſing appearances were ſoon over; the rapid progreſs of the French on the continent filled the nation with the moſt alarming apprehenſions. At the ſame time, it was evident, that Charles had it in his power to give peace to Europe whenever he pleaſed, by declaring his intention to join the allies, unleſs Lewis would accept of a peace upon reaſonable terms. The parliament had therefore recourſe to every method to induce the king to take up arms. They promiſed that the moſt affluent ſupplies ſhould be the reward of his compliance. This offer was a powerful motive; he ſeemed willing to comply with the wiſhes of his people. He gave the princeſs Mary, daughter to the duke of York, to the prince of Orange in marriage, and diſplayed ſome proofs of firmneſs with regard to France. He even made preparations for war with the ſupplies he received from parliament. But ever fluctuating and irreſolute, ſometimes gained by the promiſes of Lewis, and ſometimes abſorbed in the charms of pleaſure, he neither fulfilled the expectations of the Engliſh, nor that of the allies.

A. D. 1678. Weary of the war, and finding there were no hopes of any aſſiſtance from England, the States General ſigned a ſeparate peace with Lewis, on the tenth of Auguſt. By this treaty it was agreed, that each party ſhould retain what they were poſſeſſed of, except Maeſtricht and its dependencies, which Lewis was to reſtore to the Dutch, and were indeed all the French poſſeſſed of their conqueſts in the United Provinces; and by a ſecret article, Lewis engaged to reſtore all that belonged to the prince of Orange in France, Franche Comté, Charleroi, and Flanders. Spain and the Empire ſoon after accepted the conditions, and peace was reſtored in every part of Europe.

This peace, which was ſigned at Nimeguen, furniſhes a memorable inſtance how greatly projects are contradicted by events. Holland, againſt whom alone the war was undertaken, and whoſe ruin ſeemed inevitable, was ſo far from loſing any thing, that ſhe gained a barrier; while every other power that had interpoſed to ſnatch her from deſtruction, found themſelves conſiderable loſers, and obliged to accept the terms preſcribed them by Holland. It may, however, with great truth, be affirmed, that it was owing to the fault of the Engliſh monarch alone, that the allies had not a more advantageous peace; ſince the parliament were both ready and deſirous to furniſh very ample ſupplies for carrying on the war againſt France, would Charles have acted agreeable either to the intereſt of Europe in general, or of England in particular. This ſtrange conduct can be aſcribed only to his paſſionate deſire of executing his darling ſcheme, that of rendering himſelf the abſolute maſter of his people. Some have accuſed him of labouring to introduce the popiſh religion into England; but this is a crime of which he was not guilty. All religions were alike to Charles; and the conceſſions he often made in favour of the catholics, ſeem rather to have been the effect of his love for his brother, and ready compliance with any councils he adopted, than his own attachment to that particular mode of faith. He cared not whether popery or proteſtantiſm was the reigning religion in England, if he could enjoy his beloved eaſe and pleaſure.

During theſe tranſactions, Scotland had groaned beneath a load of tyranny. The duke of Lauderdale, in quality of royal commiſſioner, had been ſent into that kingdom. By his arts and influence, he prevailed upon the Scottiſh parliament to declare, that the whole exterior power of the church was veſted in the crown. He alſo induced them to eſtabliſh a militia of twenty-two thouſand men, ready to act in every enterprize where either the power or the grandeur of the ſovereign were concerned. The duke was as fond of perſecution as his maſter was of toleration. The former ſtrained the laws in favour of the firſt, and the latter ſuſpended their force in favour of the ſecond. He did not reflect, that perſecution was the moſt dangerous of all remedies againſt the preſbyterian fanaticiſm diſſeminated thro' every part of Scotland. It would be endleſs to particularize all the inſtances of oppreſſion in that unhappy kingdom. Let it ſuffice to ſay, that they were at once cruel and impolitic. Becauſe the law for prohibiting conventicles, had called them "Seminaries of Rebellion," he treated thoſe counties as rebellious where the conventicles moſt abounded; and the troops he detached into thoſe parts were guilty of the moſt horrid and ſhameful diſorders. By an old Scottiſh law, every perſon who was accuſed, and did not appear, was liable to be condemned for contumacy, and outlawed; and whoever afterwards held the leaſt communication with them, though only to give them the common aſſiſtances of humanity, was liable to the ſame penalties. This law, too odious to be executed with rigour, occaſioned a great number of outlawries. Fearful of appearing in a court where they could expect no mercy, they incurred, perhaps, a greater puniſhment by their abſence. In a word, the whole nation became a prey to the rapacity of the duke and dutcheſs of Lauderdale. Fearing that the complaints of the people might find their way to the throne, Lauderdale forbad all who were poſſeſſed of lands in Scotland from leaving that kingdom. Biſhop Burnet tells us, that Charles one day ſaid to his friends, "I hear that Lauderdale behaves very ill to my people in Scotland, but I do not find he has done any thing contrary to my intereſt." It is no wonder, when a prince makes a diſtinction between his own intereſt and that of his people, that the people follow the example.

We are now come to a period, when a tranſaction happened which has given occaſion to many politicians to exerciſe their critical ſagacity in ſupporting the truth, or expoſing the falſity of this remarkable incident, according as they were attached to this or that party. It muſt, indeed, be granted, that the whole is replete with contradictions, ſo that it is impoſſible, perhaps, to unravel the whole. It will be ſufficient, however, for an hiſtorian, to give a plain narrative of facts, and leave the reader to make his own reflections. The oppreſſions of the duke of Lauderdale in Scotland; the deſire Charles had always ſhewn with regard to procuring the catholics the free exerciſe of their religion; and his ſecret connections with Lewis XIV. which even the offer of the largeſt ſupplies could not induce him to abandon; all tended to confirm the people in an opinion, that he intended to introduce popery and arbitrary power.

When the minds of the people are thus prepoſſeſſed, it is no wonder that they liſten to every thing that has a tendency to confirm their ſuſpicions. At this juncture, a conſpiracy for eſtabliſhing the catholic religion was diſcovered by one Titus Oates. This man was originally a clergyman of the church of England, and of a very indifferent character. At length he turned papiſt, and lived for ſome time with the Jeſuits at St. Omers. Thence he went into Spain, where he was admitted to the councils of the Jeſuits; but being at length diſcharged from that ſociety, his reſentment induced him to turn informer. He now gave out, that his converſion to popery was a mere pretence, to enable him to diſcover the ſecrets of the Jeſuits; and the ſubſtance of his depoſitions was, that the pope claimed the ſovereignty of England, and had commiſſioned the Jeſuits to exerciſe his rights. In conſequence of which, the general of the order had, by patents under the pope's ſeal, diſpoſed of the principal offices, civil and military. That in a council of fifty Jeſuits, held at London, it was unanimouſly reſolved to kill the king; and that father la Chaiſe, confeſſor to Lewis XIV. had promiſed a reward of ten thouſand pounds to the regicide: that the crown was to be offered to the duke of York, on condition of his ſubmitting to receive it from the pope; but on his refuſing, he was to ſhare the fate of his brother. They (the Jeſuits) had formed a plan for ſetting fire to the city of London, and executing a general maſſacre of the proteſtants in every part of the kingdom. In a word, that they deſigned to overturn the whole conſtitution, and eſtabliſh by blood and deſolation the dominion of popery.

It is impoſſible to deſcribe the univerſal confuſion of the nation, when the information given by Oates was known. Coleman, ſecretary to the dutcheſs of York, being arreſted, copies of his correſpondence with father de la Chaiſe, the pope's nuncio, and ſome other papiſts, increaſed the alarm, and ſeemed to confirm the truth of Oates's narrative. In one of Coleman's letters to the French king's confeſſor, is the following paſſage: "We have a great work on our hands; nothing leſs than the converſion of the three kingdoms: God has given us a prince (meaning the duke of York) who is marvelouſly ambitious of being the inſtrument of this deſign; but as we muſt expect to meet with oppoſition, it behoves us to ſecure all the aſſiſtance poſſible." And in another letter he ſays, "Money will perſuade the king to every thing: there is nothing we may not obtain from him by this means. Money has an irreſiſtible influence over him; that logic has more power in his court than all the arguments in the world." He therefore deſired de la Chaiſe to furniſh him with three hundred thouſand pounds, which would, he ſaid, engage the king to diſſolve the parliament, whoſe reſolutions were unfavourable to France. A new incident ſeemed to confirm the guilt of the Jeſuits, whoſe known bigotry had before rendered it probable. Sir Edmundſbury Godfrey, the juſtice of peace who had taken the depoſition of Oates, was found dead in a ditch, with his rings on his fingers, and his money in his pockets; a ſufficient proof that he had not been killed by robbers. This aſſaſſination, the author of which was never diſcovered, was conſidered as the act of the papiſts. The whole city was in alarm: every individual thought himſelf in danger, and the ſame precautions were taken as if an enemy had been at the gates. Whether Charles believed the truth of this conſpiracy, or thought the whole a forgery of Oates, is uncertain; but he mentioned it to both houſes, and recommended vigilance to the magiſtrates in diſcovering and proſecuting all who were concerned in ſo black an action. Danby, the prime miniſter, moved, in the houſe of lords, that the affair might be taken into conſideration, and his motion was agreed to. Oates was called before the houſe, and ſtrictly examined; and on his perſiſting that the narrative he had before given to Sir Edmundſbury Godfrey was ſtrictly true, the houſe reſolved, that the popiſh recuſants had formed an infernal plot againſt the king, the government, and the proteſtant religion. An apartment in Whitehall, with a penſion of twelve thouſand pounds a year, was aſſigned to Oates; and every method that prudence could dictate, was taken to diſcover the particulars of this alarming contrivance.

While the parliament were engaged in this buſineſs, one Bedloe accuſed ſeveral papiſts, in the ſervice of the queen, of being concerned in the murder of Godfrey. He alſo added ſome circumſtances to the depoſitions of Oates. Several noblemen, accuſed by theſe informers, were apprehended, among whom were the earl of Powis, the lord viſcount Stafford, and the lords Arundel of Wardour, Petre, and Belaſis, who were ſent to the Tower.

The depoſitions of Oates and Bedloe being publiſhed, excited ſuch a ferment in the kingdom, that Charles was obliged to iſſue a proclamation, commanding all popiſh recuſants, under the ſevereſt penalty, to repair to their own houſes, and not venture farther than five miles from thence, without a particular licence. Another proclamation was alſo publiſhed, offering a reward to any perſon who ſhould apprehend a popiſh prieſt or jeſuit. The teſt which declared popery to be idolatry, was now inſtituted, and all who refuſed to take it were excluded from parliament. The duke of York, with tears in his eyes, requeſted of the upper houſe an exemption in his favour, declaring, that his religion ſhould be altogether between God and himſelf, and never appear in his public conduct. It was with difficulty he carried his point by two voices. "I would not" ſaid one of the lords, "have any thing of popiſh principles here; neither man, woman, dog, nor cat."

The commons proceeded ſtill farther. Finding that Sir Joſeph Williamſon, ſecretary of Scotland, had counterſigned ſeveral commiſſions to popiſh recuſants, and being a member of the lower houſe, they committed him to the Tower. Charles, highly incenſed at this commitment of his ſervant, without making any application to him, immediately ordered him to be releaſed. He, however, revoked the commiſſions that had given offence, and the commons were ſatisfied with this inſtance of royal condeſcenſion.

During theſe tranſactions in parliament, Montague, ambaſſador in France, haſtily returned, and laid open a new ſcene. He produced a letter written by the high-treaſurer Danby, during the late negotiations for a peace on the continent: by which it appeared, that the king had, in ſome meaſure, ſold the intereſts both of England and the allies. Among other particulars, it imported, that if the conditions of the peace were accepted by the allies, Charles was to be paid ſix millions by France, within three years after the treaty ſhould be ſigned. Danby, who, it ſeems, diſapproved of writing this letter, endeavoured to ſecure himſelf, by procuring it to be authenticated by the king, who had added, with his own hand, "This letter is written by my order, C. R." The commons now no longer doubted that Charles had acted in concert with France; and though they perceived that the letter reflected greater diſhonour on the king than his miniſter, yet, in order to diſcover the whole truth of this provoking myſtery, they impeached Danby of high-treaſon, but the lords refuſed to put him under arreſt. The diſpute now became violent between the two houſes; and Charles, to prevent the diſagreeable conſequences that might reſult from a breach between two branches of the legiſlature, firſt prorogued, and afterwards diſſolved the parliament, now juſtly ſuſpicious and diſſatisfied, though at firſt very favourable to the intereſts of the crown. The alteration in the ſentiments of the commons was wholly owing to the conduct of the king, and the ſpirit of the nation.

The trials of the conſpirators now wholly engroſſed the attention of the public, and Coleman was the firſt that felt the weight of popular indignation. On the twenty-ſeventh of November, he was brought to the bar of the king's bench, where lord chief-juſtice Scoggs preſided. The evidences againſt him were Oates, Bedloe, and his own letters. Oates and Bedloe ſwore that he had received a patent from the general of the Jeſuits, to act as ſecretary of ſtate; and that he had agreed to the aſſaſſination of the king. He was accordingly convicted of high-treaſon, and ſuffered on the third of December, but declared his innocence to the laſt. Father Ireland alſo ſuffered, though he alledged he was in Staffordſhire at the very time the accuſers ſwore he attended the meetings of the conſpirators in London. Every Jeſuit was conſidered as a villain, and that lying and mental reſervation made a part of the principles of their order. Several other perſons were impeached, among whom were Thomas Pickering, a prieſt; John Grove, a lay-brother; Thomas Whitebread, provincial of the Jeſuits in England, and who, according to the evidence of Oates, was to have been created archbiſhop of Canterbury; Harcourt, Fenwick, Gaven, and Turner, all Jeſuits; and Langhorne, a catholic lawyer. Theſe were all found guilty, and executed.

A.D. 1679. A new parliament being ſummoned to meet on the ſixth of March, it was ſoon evident that a very conſiderable majority was on the ſide of the country party. Charles was alarmed; and in order to ingratiate himſelf with this new aſſembly, he prevailed upon his brother, the duke of York, to ſubmit to an order for his leaving England. He deprived Danby of the treaſurer's ſtaff, and gave it to the earl of Lauderdale; but in order to prevent the former, either through reſentment or fear, from diſcovering ſecrets he wiſhed to be concealed, he granted him a free pardon.

Shaftſbury, and the other leaders of the popular party, determined to avail themſelves of the popular commotions, and the majority in the commons, to carry into execution the plan they had formed for excluding the duke of York from the throne. Shaftſbury's object was to give the Engliſh crown to the duke of Monmouth, one of Charles's natural ſons. It was already reported, that a marriage had been contracted between the king and Lucy Walters, the duke of Monmouth's mother. It therefore became neceſſary for Charles either to diſapprove or confirm this report; and accordingly, he ſolemnly declared, in full council, that it was falſe, and that Monmouth was illegitimate. The duke of York, who had obtained aſſurances from the king, before his departure from England, that he would ſupport his ſucceſſion to the crown, took up his reſidence at Bruſſels.

Foiled in this attempt, the commons renewed the impeachment of Danby, notwithſtanding the king had granted him a free pardon, and aſſured the houſe that the miniſter had done nothing but by his particular orders. They inſiſted, that a pardon from the crown was no arreſt of judgment with them; and it was voted, that if Danby did not appear on a day appointed, he ſhould be declared guilty. He did not chuſe to provoke farther the indignation of the commons; he appeared, and was committed to the Tower.

Alarmed by theſe violent proceedings, Charles ſummoned Sir William Temple, whoſe virtues he knew were revered by the public, to attend his duty in council. More attracted by the charms of philoſophy than thoſe of ambition, Temple had retired into the country, where he cultivated his favourite ſtudies in a quiet retreat. But he no ſooner received the royal mandate, than he haſtened to court, always preferring the good of his country to his own. He propoſed to form a council, compoſed chiefly of the favourites of the people. By this means (ſaid he) the parliament will be leſs aſſuming, or, at leaſt, we ſhall have a ſtrong party in the houſe againſt the diſcontented and the factious. His reaſons were thought to be well founded, and the ſcheme was carried into execution. But, contrary to his advice, Charles appointed Shaftſbury preſident of this new council. The king flattered himſelf, that by conferring ſo honourable a poſt on that dangerous man, he would become a friend to the meaſures of the court. He was miſtaken. Shaftſbury perceiving that the king's conduct towards him was leſs the effect of ſincerity than policy, changed not his conduct. He cultivated a ſtill cloſer correſpondence with the leaders of the oppoſition; and by being acquainted with all the ſecrets of government, became a more dangerous enemy than ever.

Having acquired ſo able a leader, the commons ſeemed determined to carry their reſentment to the greateſt lengths. They reſolved, that the duke of York's zeal for popery, and the hopes of ſeeing him on the throne, occaſioned popiſh conſpiracies. The king, who ſaw the deſign of this reſolution, endeavoured to prevent it, by propoſing conciliating meaſures. He offered to paſs a bill for reſtricting the power of a catholic prince, if ever one of that perſuaſion ſhould fill the Engliſh throne. He was not to have the right of conferring church dignities. The members of the privy-council, the judges, the lord-lieutenants of counties, and their deputies, together with all the officers of the navy, were neither to be appointed nor removed without conſent of parliament. Theſe extraordinary conceſſions, which muſt ſo greatly have limited the prerogative, were not ſufficient to appeaſe the houſe, which was conſtantly enflamed by the cabals of Shaftſbury.

It was therefore reſolved by a conſiderable majority to bring in what was called, "The Excluſion Bill;" by which it was declared, "That the crowns of England and Ireland belonged to the next heir, the duke of York excepted; that if he appeared in either of theſe kingdoms, he ſhould be declared guilty of treaſon; and that thoſe who defended his title ſhould be deemed enemies and traitors." Nor was this the only popular act of the commons; they expelled all ſuch as poſſeſſed lucrative offices, in order to weaken ſtill farther the influence of the crown. They declared ſtanding armies, and even the royal guards, illegal; and they paſſed the famous Habeas Corpus bill, which is ſtill conſidered as the principal ſecurity of the ſubject. By virtue of this noble act, no perſon can be ſent to priſon beyond the ſea. No judge can refuſe a priſoner his habeas corpus, which obliges the goaler to produce the priſoner before any court the writ ſhall appoint, and there ſhew cauſe for the impriſonment. The priſoner is to be tried at the time appointed; and if he is diſcharged by a court of juſtice, he cannot be impriſoned again upon the ſame account. This bill ſoon after paſſed the upper houſe, and received the royal aſſent.

Having paſſed theſe bills, the commons reſumed the proſecution of Danby; and reſolved, that to maintain the validity of the royal pardon in his caſe, was an infringement of their privileges. They alſo demanded, that the biſhops, who were conſidered as entirely devoted to the court, ſhould abſent themſelves during this trial. This was oppoſed by the upper houſe; and the commons prepared a remonſtrance. Charles was alarmed by theſe proceedings; and fearful leſt they ſhould preſent a remonſtrance to him, which might have the moſt dangerous conſequences, he repaired to the houſe of lords on the twenty-ſeventh of May; and after giving the royal aſſent to five bills, he prorogued the parliament to the fourteenth of Auguſt. By this means the excluſion bill was dropped for a time, and the ſchemes of Shaftſbury rendered abortive.

The preſbyterians in Scotland were treated with as much rigour as the catholics in England. They bore their perſecutions for a long time; but at laſt, ſeeing no proſpect of an end to their miſeries, they loſt all patience, and determined to take a full revenge on their perſecutors. Sharp, archbiſhop of St. Andrews, who had made his fortune by deſerting their party, and was now become as great a perſecutor as Lauderdale himſelf, was marked out for deſtruction. A large body of the covenanters accordingly lay in ambuſh for him; and, as he was returning in his coach from the council at Edinburgh, they attacked him near a little village called Magus, about two miles from St. Andrews: they immediately dragged him out of his carriage, and, regardleſs of the prayers, tears, and ſupplications of his daughter, who happened to be with him, put him to death in the moſt inhuman and brutal manner.

This aſſaſſination, conſidered as an action worthy of the faithful, was the ſignal for the covenanters to fly to arms. They accordingly aſſembled from every quarter, proclaimed the covenant at Rutherglen, ſurprized the city of Glaſgow, iſſued a proclamation, commanding the magiſtrates to drive all archbiſhops, biſhops, and curates, out of the kingdom immediately; and inviting all their brethren to join them, and finiſh the good work they had ſo happily begun. They were ſoon joined by a vaſt multitude of people; but inſtead of confining themſelves to the redreſs of grievances, they fell to plundering the adjacent country. This gave time to the magiſtrates to provide for the ſecurity of Edinburgh. The duke of Monmouth was ſent, at the head of an army, to reduce them, and ſoon executed his commiſſion. He came up with them at Bothwell-bridge; and falling upon them with incredible fury, ſoon gained a complete victory. Near a thouſand of the inſurgents were left dead on the field of battle, and twelve hundred taken priſoners, among whom were ſeveral of thoſe concerned in the murder of archbiſhop Sharp. Theſe were all hanged up immediately; a few more were afterwards tried and executed; but the greateſt part were ſent to the plantations. Monmouth, deſirous of gaining the affections of the Scots, treated the people with great humanity.

While this rebellion ſubſiſted in Scotland, the king was ſeized with a violent fever, which threw the whole kingdom into the utmoſt confuſion. The council aſſembled; and notwithſtanding the oppoſition of Shaftſbury, and ſeveral other members of the country party, they reſolved to ſend for the duke of York from Bruſſels. He ſoon arrived; but, in the interval, the king was pretty well recovered. The oppoſition was not, however, idle, during the king's ſickneſs: they demanded that the parliament ſhould be immediately aſſembled; and the court party, as a counterpoiſe to their petitions, preſented the moſt reſpectable addreſſes. This oppoſition in the two parties gave occaſion to the introduction of the names of Whig and Tory. The former, which had before been given to the Scotch fanatics, was now given to the oppoſition; and the latter, which had been originally applied to the rebels in Ireland, was now applied to the courtiers. Theſe odious appellations ſerved no other purpoſe than that of foſtering malignity and diſcord, and of widening the breach, already too large, between the two parties.

The behaviour of Monmouth in Scotland alarmed the duke of York, who uſed every method in his power to procure the diſgrace of that popular nobleman. He ſucceeded in his attempts, and Monmouth was obliged to retire to the continent; while he himſelf, under pretence of quieting the minds of the Engliſh, obtained permiſſion to retire into Scotland, but made himſelf more enemies than friends in that kingdom. Shaftſbury, whoſe deſigns were now ſufficiently known, was diſmiſſed from his poſt of preſident of the council, and the earl of Radnor was appointed in his room. The earl of Eſſex reſigned his poſt as treaſurer, and Lawrence Hyde was appointed in his room. Lord Ruſſel, one of the moſt popular and virtuous men in the kingdom, quitted the board, and Sir William Temple retired into the country.

The papiſts, exaſperated at the proſecutions carrying on againſt them, determined to be revenged upon their proſecutors, and turn the late odium from themſelves to the preſbyterians. They had accordingly recourſe to one Dangerfield, a fellow who had ſuffered almoſt every puniſhment that the law can inflict on the moſt abandoned miſcreant. This man, who enjoyed the firſt place in the chronicles of infamy, was tutored for the purpoſe. He was confined in Newgate for debt when he was pitched upon as the leader in this ſcene of action. The catholics releaſed him, and found him ſufficient employment. He pretended to have been privy to a deſign for deſtroying the king and royal family, and changing the government into a commonwealth. The king and his brother countenanced the information, and rewarded him for his diſcovery with a ſum of money: but certain papers which he produced as evidences of his aſſertions, appearing to be forged by himſelf, he was ſent to priſon. His character was alone ſufficient to create ſuſpicions; all his haunts were ordered to be ſearched; and in the houſe of one Mrs. Collier, a Roman catholic, his particular friend, they found the model of the plot fairly written in a book, tied with a ribband, and concealed in a meal-tub. From this incident it was called the Meal-tub Plot. Finding the whole diſcovered, the miſcreant made a general confeſſion. He ſaid the whole had been contrived by the counteſs of Powis, the earl of Caſtlemain, and the five lords confined in the Tower, in order to invalidate the evidences of Oates, Bedloe, and others, againſt the papiſts. He added, that he was inſtructed to accuſe the dukes of Monmouth and Buckingham, the earls of Eſſex, Hallifax, and others, of being concerned in a conſpiracy againſt the king and the duke of York. This diſcovery being made, lord Caſtlemain and lady Powis were committed to the Tower; and the people did not fail to cenſure both the king and his brother with being concerned in this perfidious ſcheme.

A. D. 1680. The new parliament met on the twenty-ſixth of January, when the king endeavoured to inſpire the members with ſentiments of unanimity, ſo neceſſary for the public welfare. "All Europe," ſaid he in his ſpeech at the opening of the ſeſſion, "has its eyes on this aſſembly, and ſeems to think its fate involved in it, as well as ours. Let us beware of ſtrengthening our enemies, and diſheartening our friends by unſeaſonable diſputes. Should theſe ariſe, the reproach will not fall upon me, for I have neglected nothing that might contribute to keep you in peace while I live, and to leave you ſo when I die." But the commons were far from entering into theſe views: they began with acts of violence againſt the Tories: no reſpect was paid to the habeas corpus bill. Arbitrary impriſonments became ſo common, that the whole nation complained of the violence. One Stowel had the courage to reſiſt an officer of juſtice, who attempted to impriſon him by order of the houſe. He ſaid, in his defence, that he knew no law by virtue of which he could be deprived of his liberty. The commons did not think proper to proceed any farther; and in order to free themſelves from the embarraſſment, they gave out, that Stowel was ſick, and they had granted him a month for his recovery. They now revived the excluſion bill, and ſent it up to the lords for their concurrence. A violent debate ſucceeded, in which the eloquence of Shaftſbury was eclipſed by that of Hallifax, his nephew, a zealous partizan of the court. At laſt the queſtion was put, and the bill was rejected by a conſiderable majority. This deciſion rendered all the hopes of the commons abortive; and they diſcharged their reſentment on ſome catholic peers, whom they impeached as abettors of the popiſh plos. Five of them had been, for ſome time, confined in the Tower. The firſt they attacked was the old lord Stafford. Oates depoſed, that he had ſeen a commiſſion ſent to him, ſigned by father Oliva, general of the Jeſuits. Two other witneſſes ſwore, that he had engaged to kill the king; and Stafford was found guilty by his peers upon a majority of twenty-four voices. His courage, ſupported by conſcious innocence, did not forſake him in the dreadful trial. Being very old and infirm, on going to his execution, he deſired a cloak: "I may tremble with cold," ſaid he; "but, thank heaven, I ſhall never tremble through fear." He declared, on the ſcaffold, his abhorrence of the corruptions of the church of Rome. "I die," ſaid he, "in hopes that the deluſion will ſoon vaniſh, and that truth will oblige the world to do me juſtice at laſt." "We believe you, my lord," replied the weeping populace; "God bleſs your lordſhip." The executioner was melted into tears, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty he performed his duty. The circumſtances of this execution ſhook the general belief of the conſpiracy; and though it ſtill continued to alarm the people, no more blood was ſhed upon that account. The commons perceived the paſſions of the people were turned againſt them, and they began to act with leſs reſolution.

They were, however, ſtill determined to purſue the plan they had formed, and flattered themſelves the flexibility of Charles, and his neceſſities for money, would at laſt render them ſucceſsful. They accordingly propoſed ſeveral inflammatory bills; and at laſt voted, that they would grant no ſupplies till the excluſion bill was paſſed into a law. Convinced that nothing was now to be expected, Charles diſſolved the parliament.

A. D. 1681. But though he had thus abruptly parted with one aſſembly, he hoped to have better ſucceſs with another; and accordingly ſummoned a new parliament to meet at Oxford, where the unfavourable diſpoſitions of the capital could have no effect on the members. This meaſure occaſioned the ſtrongeſt reſentment in the citizens. The old members were re-choſen, and thanked by their conſtituents for their enquiry into the popiſh conſpiracy, and for their attempt to exclude the duke of York from the throne: "for (added they) we look upon him as the principal cauſe of that ruin which threatens the nation." The duke of Monmouth, at the head of fifteen peers, oppoſed the deſign of holding the parliament at Oxford; and ſaid in his petition, "That the two houſes would be expoſed to the ſwords of the papiſts and their adherents, ſeveral of whom had crept even into the king's guards." This was followed by a more open attack; the ſpirit of rebellion no longer hid itſelf under the mantle of darkneſs. The heads of the party arrived at Oxford ſtrongly eſcorted; and the repreſentatives of London in particular were followed by crowds of citizens, with cockades, on which were written, "No popery, no ſlavery." In a word, both parties endeavoured to make a pompous diſplay of their ſtrength; and the meeting of this parliament had rather the appearance of thoſe in the diſtracted times of Henry VI. at Clarendon, Oxford, and Coventry, than the peaceable and amicable meeting of the ſovereign and his people.

Exaſperated at theſe appearances, Charles began to exert his authority with a vigour of which he was thought incapable. He opened the ſeſſion with a noble and elegant ſpeech; in which, after complaining of the diſreſpectful proceedings of the laſt parliament, which were ſuch he ſaid, as few princes beſides himſelf would have borne with equal patience; he declared, that as it was neither his deſire nor intention to exerciſe arbitrary power over them, ſo he would not allow it to be exerciſed over himſelf. He again inculcated moderation in their debates, as it was by that means alone the ends of the nation, who had deputed them as repreſentatives, could be anſwered. He told them he was willing to give them every ſatisfaction in his power, with regard to their fears of a popiſh ſucceſſor, by joining with them to eſtabliſh any practical ſcheme for putting the government entirely into the hands of proteſtants, during the reign of ſuch a prince. In a word, that as he would, on his part, perform every thing that could reaſonably be deſired of him, ſo he expected that they ſhould lay aſide their animoſities, and concur with him in that ſalutary intention; and not, by a revival of their paſt irregularities, inſpire him with a diſguſt to parliaments.

This ſpeech, however, produced not the deſired effect. Equally indifferent to the menaces and ſoothings of the king, they elected the ſame ſpeaker that filled the chair in the laſt parliament, and adopted the ſame meaſures, namely, the impeachment of Danby, the enquiry into the popiſh plot, and the bill of excluſion. They were ſo determined to carry the laſt meaſure, that they rejected every expedient. Ernely, one of the king's miniſters, in order to remove all their fears with regard to a popiſh ſucceſſor, propoſed, "That the duke of York ſhould be baniſhed five hundred miles from the Britiſh dominions; that the government ſhould be wholly veſted in a regent: that this regent ſhould be the princeſs of Orange; and in caſe of her death without iſſue, in the princeſs Anne: that if the duke ſhould have a ſon educated in the proteſtant religion, then the ſaid princeſſes reſpectively to ſucceed in the regency, during the minority of ſuch ſon, and no longer: that notwithſtanding theſe kingdoms, out of reſpect to the royal family, and for preſerving the right of ſucceſſion, might be governed in the name of James II. yet no man ſhould take arms from him, or by virtue of his commiſſion, on pain of being capitally puniſhed: that all officers, civil or military, ſhall take an oath to obſerve this ſettlement of the government: that acts of a ſimilar nature ſhould paſs in the parliaments of Scotland and Ireland: that if the duke of York ſhould come into any of the three kingdoms, he ſhould be abſolutely excluded, and the government devolve to the regent: that all papiſts of any conſideration ſhould be baniſhed by name, and their children be educated in the proteſtant religion." But even this propoſal, which amounted very near to an excluſion, was rejected. They were determined on their object, and no palliative expedients would be accepted.

While the parliament was thus employed, one Fitz-Harris, an Iriſh catholic, had inſinuated himſelf into the favour of the court, by giving information concerning the ſchemes of the oppoſite party. He joined with one Everard in compoſing an infamous and injurious libel, apparently with a view of getting money by the information. A traitor never ſpares his aſſociate when it is his intereſt to give him up. Everard impeached Fitz-Harris, and he was immediately arreſted. The priſoner had now no hopes of eſcaping from the hand of juſtice, but by changing his party. He accordingly declared, that he had been engaged by the court to write the libel in queſtion, to throw the odium on the partizans of the excluſion bill. He added ſome other circumſtances concerning the popiſh plot, and pretended he could make very important diſcoveries. The commons, hoping to obtain freſh matter for declamation, afforded him their protection; and their firſt meaſure was to reſcue him out of the hands of juſtice. In order to this, they ſent up an impeachment againſt him to the lords, who thought proper to reject it. Exaſperated at this refuſal, the commons complained of a violation of privilege, and declared, that if any judge ſhould preſume to try Fitz-Harris, he ſhould be held guilty of that violation.

The diſpute between the two houſes continued to increaſe, which afforded Charles a very favourable opportunity of putting a period to a parliament, whom he found were determined to oppoſe him in every particular. He, however, kept his deſign a ſecret even from his moſt intimate friends; and on the twenty-eighth of March, the very day the excluſion bill was to be read the ſecond him, he repaired, with the utmoſt privacy, to the houſe; and before they had received the leaſt intimation of his deſign, diſſolved the parliament. This reſolute behaviour in the king diſconcerted all the meaſures of the Whigs. He afterwards publiſhed a proclamation, in which he gave his reaſons for diſſolving the two laſt parliaments; and accuſed the commons of a deſign to wreſt from him the regal authority, and totally ſubvert the conſtitution of England.

Convinced from experience that he had nothing to hope for from the commons, he determined not to expoſe himſelf any longer to parliamentary ſtorms. He retrenched the expences of his government, relinquiſhed the town of Tangier in Africa, though the fortifications had coſt him very conſiderable ſums, and ſeemed reſolved to maintain the triumph he had gained over the oppoſition by his vigour. The clergy now boldly propagated the favourite maxims of the crown; and the whigs were repreſented as ſectaries and republicans of the moſt dangerous kind. Doubts were thrown out with regard to the truth of the popiſh conſpiracy; and could the king have maintained the ſame moderation in his conduct, he had hitherto done, his triumph had been worthy of him; but he ſuffered reprisals of too rigorous a nature to be made by the tory party. The ſpies who had ſerved the parliament, now offered their ſervices to the court, and were accepted. Fitz-harris was tried and executed. He declared before his execution that the libel was his own, and that he had compoſed it merely to give it up to the miniſtry for the ſake of a reward. The duke of York was recalled from Scotland, and reſumed his ſeat at the council board.

In order to preſerve the tranſactions of England entire during this buſy period, we have omitted to mention thoſe of Ireland. That kingdom had for ſome years been governed by the duke of Ormond, a zealous royaliſt, and a true friend to his country. He profeſſed the principles of the proteſtant religion, but was no bigot to his tenets: he was indulgent to thoſe of other perſuaſions, and provided they did nothing that tended to diſturb the peace of the government, was willing they ſhould worſhip their Maker in a manner moſt ageeable to their conſcience. Ormond had ſerved Charles faithfully; he never forſook him in his baniſhment; but, diſdaining the meanneſs of flattery and adulation, he was long neglected by that prince who could not number gratitude among his virtues. Dillon, an Iriſh colonel, once requeſted the duke to aſſiſt him on ſome particular occaſion with his intereſt at court, adding that he had no other dependence but on God and him. "I am heartily ſorry for you;" replied the duke, "you could not poſſibly have two friends of leſs credit at court." During his government, his whole ſtudy was to preſerve peace, and render the people happy. But his virtues were not ſufficient to defend him againſt the malice of Shaftſbury. He attacked him in parliament with all the powers of eloquence, and inſinuated crimes of which he was wholly a ſtranger. Ormond's only defender was his own ſon, the earl of Oſſory. He invalidated all the inſinuations of his adverſary, and after many juſt encomiums on the conduct of his father, added, with a boldneſs that did him honour, "He never adviſed to break the triple alliance; he never adviſed to ſhut up the exchequer; he never adviſed the declaration in favour of the non-conformiſts; he never adviſed to break with Holland, to preſerve the alliance with France: let my father enjoy the privilege that all honeſt men ought to enjoy; let him be judged by his counſels and his actions." Shaftſbury felt the poignancy of the ſarcaſm, having been the author of thoſe evil counſels which the king had followed. The lords applauded the noble defence of Oſſory, and his true and ſimple narrative of facts prevailed over the artificial eloquence of his adverſary. Oſſory did not long ſurvive this triumph. His father was ſincerely affected with his death, and ſaid on that melancholy occaſion, "I would not change my dead ſon, for any living ſon in Chriſtendom."

The duke of York while he reſided in Scotland, practiſed all the ſeverities of arbitrary power. He eſtabliſhed a teſt, by which the royal prerogative, the ſupremacy, and paſſive obedience were expreſsly acknowledged. But the oath was drawn up in ſo prolix and ill-digeſted a manner, that Argyle thought ſome explanations neceſſary, before he could be prevailed upon to take it. This conduct exaſperated the duke, who determined to make him feel the weight of power. Argyle was arreſted and condemned; but found means to eſape. Above two thouſand preſbyterians were proſecuted on this account with the moſt horrible ſeverity. An inquiſition more cruel than that of Spain was carried on in various parts of Scotland. The people complained; but without redreſs; the duke of York, who now directed the affairs of the kingdom, ſtifled all their applications.

A. D. 1683. The mutual animoſity of the two parties in the kingdom was now enflamed into rage and rancour; and Charles, who ſhould have conducted himſelf as the common parent of all his people, openly headed a faction. Very extraordinary meaſures were taken to humble the city of London, whoſe power and political intrigues had given great umbrage to the court. A quo warranto, or an order to produce the charters of the city, was iſſued. If it ſhould appear upon a ſtrict enquiry, that any of the conditions preſcribed in either of theſe charters, had been violated in any eſſential point, the privileges of the city might be taken away. Two facts were cited to prove that the city had actually broken the conditions of the charter. This was denied by the council for the defendants with very ſtrong reaſons; but the judges, devoted to the court, paſſed ſentence agreeable to its intentions. Struck with conſternation, the common-council aſſembled to conſult the moſt proper meaſures to be taken on this alarming exigency. It was propoſed, that an entire ſubmiſſion ſhould be made to the miniſtry, as the only means of preventing the total extinction of the liberties of the city. This propoſal was ſtrognly oppoſed by the whigs. They repreſented the late action of the court as a moſt notorious violation of their rights and privileges; and added, that they ſhould be, in ſome meaſure, acceſſary to this act of uſurpation, if, by a daſtardly ſubmiſſion, they acknowledged the unjuſt authority. Fear, blended with intereſt, however, prevailed over that firmneſs and reſolution which might have been expected from the capital of the Engliſh nation. An humble deputation was ſent to his majeſty, requeſting the reſtoration of their charter. Their petition was granted, but not till they had made ſuch conceſſions as, in effect, annihilated even the ſhadow of liberty.

Terrified by the example of the capital, all the other corporations in the kingdom tamely reſigned their charters into the king's hands: nor could they obtain a reſtoration of them till they had paid conſiderable ſums; and even then all the places of power and profit were, like thoſe of the capital, left entirely at the diſpoſal of the crown. This may truly be conſidered as the triumph of deſpotiſm. The Engliſh were no longer that bold and reſolute people who, in defence of their ancient privileges, had made their monarchs tremble on the throne; they were dwindled into ſlaves, who covered the yoke of oppreſſion, and offered the incenſe of adulation to the tyrant that trampled upon their liberties.

Shaftſbury, in conjunction with the duke of Monmouth, lord Ruſſel, and ſeveral other noblemen, had formed a plot for an inſurrection. After the diſſolution of the parliament at Oxford, Shaftſbury had been impriſoned, and an indictment for high-treaſon had been preferred againſt him; but the bill was rejected by the grand jury. After the ſeizing of the city's charter he found means to renew the ſcheme; and it was propoſed to excite inſurrections in different parts of the country, and even to attack the king's guards. All their meaſures were taken, the time fixed, and a manefeſto ready for juſtifying the revolt. But ſome unforeſeen accidents occaſioning delays, Shaftſbury, who knew the danger, deſpaired of ſucceſs. He therefore abandoned the enterprize, and retired into Holland, where he died ſoon after, diſregarded both by friends and enemies.

The defection of Shaftſbury did not, however, intimidate the conſpirators: they determined to purſue their plan; and hoped for ſucceſs from the univerſal diſſatisfaction that prevailed in every part of the nation. While they were employed in concerting meaſures for carrying their deſign into execution, another plot was formed by a ſet of inferior conſpirators. The principal of theſe were colonel Rumſey, colonel Walcot, both republican officers; Goodenough under ſheriff of London; Weſt, Tyler, Norton, Ayloffe, Ferguſon, Rouſe, Home, Keiling, Holloway, Bourne, Lee, and Rumbald. The laſt, who was a maltſter, poſſeſſed an eſtate in the road to Newmarket, called the Rye-houſe farm. Here the conſpirators frequently met, and from this circumſtance the conſpiracy is generally known by the name of the Rye-houſe plot. The deſign was to attack the king's guards, and ſeize the perſons of the king and his brother in their return from Newmarket. This being effected, the conſpirators were to have repaired, with the utmoſt haſte, to London, in order to join their brethren in the city, aſſemble their forces, and break out into open rebellion.

But before the deſign could be carried into execution, the whole was diſcovered by the confeſſion of Keiling. Orders were immediately iſſued for ſeizing the conſpirators. Terrified at their danger, Weſt and Rumſey ſurrendered with an intention of becoming evidences. The former had been admitted into the ſecret of the plot formed by the noblemen; and orders were accordingly iſſued for arreſting them. Ruſſel, Eſſex, Howard, Sidney, and Hambden, grandſon to the celebrated republican of that name, were apprehended, and ſent to the Tower. Monmouth abſconded.

Walcot, Home, and Rouſe, were firſt tried. The evidences againſt them were Rumſey, Weſt, and one Bourne, a brewer, who concurred in depoſing, that they were all frequently at the meetings held the preceding year on the buſineſs of the plot. Walcot, in his defence, alledged, and offered to prove by undoubted teſtimony, that he was ill of the gout all the time the king was at Newmarket. The evidence againſt him was, however, greatly ſtrengthened, by a letter he himſelf wrote, while under confinement, to ſecretary Jenkins; wherein he promiſed to reveal all he knew relative to the plot againſt his majeſty, provided he might be aſſured of the royal pardon. The jury found them all guilty, and they were ſoon after executed at Tyburn.

The trial of lord Ruſſel, ſon to the earl of Bedford, followed that of Walcot. Howard, a man of a very profligate character, condeſcended to purchaſe his pardon, by turning evidence againſt his friends. But his conduct rendered him ſo univerſally odious, that not a man of character or reputation in either party would afterwards admit him into their company. In adhering to the letter of the laws of England on the ſubject of treaſon, it was difficult to conſtitute the crime of the peers. According to the famous ſtatute of Edward III. there are two ſpecies of treaſon, the intention or attempt to take away the king's life, and the actual attempt to make war againſt him. According to a ſtatute of Mary, either of theſe crimes muſt be proved by the concurrent teſtimony of two evidences, with regard to any act tending to ſuch purpoſes. The refinements of the lawyers rendered the definition leſs limited, and, conſequently, the proof more eaſy. This was what condemned Ruſſel, who had long been the idol of the people. Too honeſt to deny that he had any concern in the propoſed inſurrections, he inſiſted only in ſaying, that he had no deſign againſt the life of the king. Monmouth offering to ſurrender himſelf a priſoner, if he thought that action would ſave his life, the earl nobly anſwered, "By no means; I ſhould gain nothing by ſeeing my friend die with me." He alſo rejected the offer of lord Cavendiſh, who was deſirous of changing dreſſes with him, in order to facilitate his eſcape.

On the morning of his execution, after winding up his watch, he ſaid, "We have done with time; we have nothing now to think of but eternity." It was thought he would have been pardoned, could he have been prevailed upon to abandon a principle he had always maintained, and which was thought by the court incompatible with the duty and loyalty of a ſubject. This principle was, that the power of every king of England is limited by the laws; and that if he goes beyond theſe bounds, the ſubjects have a right, in their own defence, to bring him back. But he always declared, that he was incapable of the baſe deſign of aſſaſſinating the ſovereign. He often declared, that he preferred a violent death to any other; becauſe, after being expoſed a few minutes to the eyes of the populace, every thing was over: and that there was leſs to be ſuffered than in the drawing of a tooth. He was attended in his laſt moments by Dr. Tillotſon and Dr. Burnet. He ſuffered on a ſcaffold erected in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, on the twenty-firſt of July; and died like an Engliſhman, without ſhewing the leaſt weakneſs, though ſurrounded by a populace drowned in tears.

The celebrated Algernoon Sidney, ſon to the earl of Leiceſter, was the next victim. His prodigious genius, his inſuperable courage, and his paſſion for liberty, gave him a diſtinguiſhed place among the republicans. He oppoſed the reſtoration of monarchy with the ſame zeal he had before oppoſed the uſurpation of Cromwell. Finding that his oppoſition would be in vain, he withdrew into Holland; but deſirous of reviſiting his native country, he took the benefit of the act of indemnity, and returned to England. He ſoon joined the country party, and warmly ſupported the bill of excluſion. In a word, he oppoſed, with all his intereſt and eloquence, every deſign and meaſure of the court. Howard was the only evidence againſt him: his papers were therefore produced, in order to ſupply the reſt. Some writings, in which he declared his own ſentiments on the national contract, on the reſiſtance to tyrants, on the advantages of a republican government, were conſidered as ſupplementary evidences, more than ſufficient to convict him. In vain did Sidney repreſent, that the reſemblance of a hand-writing, a proof rejected in England, was the only evidence that thoſe works were his; that beſides, they had never been publiſhed or communicated to any perſon; that they proved no recent conſpiracy, becauſe it was clear the writing was of an older date. He was, however, condemned: the duke thought him too formidable an enemy to eſcape. His ſentence had, however, no power to terrify him; he gloried in dying for the cauſe he had embraced from his infancy. This illuſtrious man muſt for ever be lamented, as, under a republican government, he muſt certainly have merited the higheſt applauſe.

The earl of Eſſex was found dead in priſon; and it was ſtrongly reported that he was murdered by order of the king and his brother; but there were afterwards found ſufficient proofs that he had put an end to his own life. This was the leſs ſurpriſing, as he had always been a ſtrong advocate for ſuicide. The principal friends of the duke of Monmouth being dead, that nobleman wrote two letters to the king, filled with the moſt humble and ſubmiſſive expreſſions. Monmouth was the favourite ſon of Charles, who now felt all his tenderneſs revive. He accepted of the guilty youth's ſubmiſſion, and permitted him to come to court. He even indulged him ſo far, that he was excuſed from giving evidence againſt any of his friends; but was required to ſign a paper, owning the plot in general, and tacitly juſtifying the evidence againſt thoſe who had ſuffered. In a few days, however, Monmouth repented of the ſtep he had taken, and, with the greateſt earneſtneſs, intreated the king to return him the paper. Charles was ſo highly incenſed at his behaviour, that he baniſhed him from court. Monmouth paſſed over into Holland, where the king, notwithſtanding all that had paſſed, correſponded with him by letter, unknown to the duke of York, and privately made him conſiderable remittances of money.

Charles now enjoyed an almoſt unlimited authority in peace. The plot that had been formed againſt him rendered him dearer to his people, who imputed all the late ſeverities to the duke of York. The doctrine of abſolute ſubmiſſion and paſſive obedience became the prevailing ſyſtem; and the univerſity of Oxford condemned for thoſe propoſitions which before had been eſtabliſhed as principles. Among theſe were the following: "All civil authority is derived originally from the people: the ſovereignty of England conſiſts of three eſtates, the king, the lords, and the commons, and the king has a power equal to that of the two houſes. Self-preſervation is a fundamental law of nature, and over-rules other laws, when put in competition with it." Theſe propoſitions were now condemned. Such is the inſtability of human opinions!

The duke of York, conſcious that the ſeverities lately practiſed by the government, were imputed to him; and being deſirous of doing ſome action that might recover a part at leaſt of his popularity, relaxed, for a time, the furious meaſures he had embraced; but his attempt was in vain; the veil was too thin to hide the enormity of his late conduct. Charles was more ſucceſsful. He knew the fear of popery had cauſed the moſt alarming apprehenſions in the minds of the people, and was deſirous of diſſipating their terrors. He thought proper to beſtow his neice, the princeſs Anne, daughter to the duke of York, on prince George, brother to the king of Denmark. But though he gratified his people in that particular, he never could be prevailed upon to call a parliament, or truſt the nation with the election of new repreſentatives, who might, in their collective capacity, become formidable to his newly aſſumed deſpotic power. York ſtrongly ſupported this reſolution of his brother; and at the ſame time prevailed upon him to purſue ſuch meaſures, as rendered it highly imprudent to convene that aſſembly.

The earl of Danby, who had remained ſeveral years a priſoner in the Tower, was now admitted to bail; the four popiſh lords that ſtill remained in confinement, were admitted to the ſame privilege. Lord Petre had died in the Tower about a month before. On his death-bed he wrote a letter to the king, aſſuring him on his hopes of ſalvation, that he was entirely innocent of the plot with which he was charged.

But all the flattering ideas of power were not ſufficient to drive remorſe from the breaſt of Charles. Conſcious of being the oppreſſor of a free and generous people, he pined beneath the oppreſſion under which the whole nation groaned. He had purſued meaſures he ſecretly condemned, and yielded to counſels which his own heart told him were equally inconſiſtent with his honour, and the happineſs of his people. Naturally of an eaſy temper, and a gentle diſpoſition, he had ſuffered arbitrary, and even cruel proceedings, to receive the ſanction of his authority, and the ſeal of royalty had been ſtamped on actions he never approved. He now ſaw, but it was too late, that while he compelled his people to ſubmit to his deſires thro' fear, he had loſt their affections as ſubjects. Penetrated with theſe reflections he formed a deſign of changing his conduct, and reſtoring the neglected intercourſe between himſelf and his parliament. The duke of York propoſing ſome meaſures which were extremely diſagreeable to the king, Charles ſaid to him, with ſome vivacity, "Brother, I am now too old to go a ſecond time upon my travels; you may do it if you pleaſe." But he lived not to carry the generous plan he had formed into execution.

A. D. 1684. He was ſuddenly ſeized with an apoplective fit on the ſeventh of February, and four days after he expired, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and the twenty-fifth of his reign, computing from his reſtoration. Some believed that he was poiſoned; but there ſeems very little foundation for their opinion. The papiſts, however, bore the odium of the act, and were ſaid to have perpetrated the execrable deed, in order to prevent his carrying on the reformation he had propoſed.

Charles would have been more worthy of a throne, had not indolence, and the indulgence of his paſſions, perverted his natural talents. He was an enemy to labour, forgetful of ſervices, attached to no perſon from eſteem, and negligent of every duty. His conduct gave ſufficient room for the cenſure of one of his intimate friends, that he never uttered a fooliſh ſentence, nor ever did a wiſe action. Moſt of his faults as well as his vexations, flowed from one ſource; his exceſſive love of pleaſure. To obtain the pecuniary aſſiſtance of France he formed an alliance with that power, which gave ſufficient room to ſuſpect that his real intention was that of making himſelf abſolute. This opinion gave riſe to all the diſputes between him and his parliament, and ſeemed even to threaten him with the loſs his crown. He was guilty of the ſame miſtake that had involved all the Stuart family in diſtreſs; they thought their authority equal to that of the moſt powerful monarchs on the continent, and thence paid no regard to the Engliſh conſtitution. Their principles and conduct could not therefore fail of alarming a people whoſe liberties were founded on Magna Charta, and were now grown exceſſively jealous of their privileges. Had the Stuarts paid more reſpect to the laws and conſtitution of England their own prerogatives would have been ſecure, and they would have reigned with more honour to themſelves, and advantage to the people. In private life Charles had fewer faults. He was an obliging huſband, a generous lover, a tender father, a kind maſter; but gratitude was a virtue to which he was totally a ſtranger: the royaliſts ſerved him faithfully from affection; but he remembered not their ſervices; nor took any care to reſtore that fortune they had ſo generouſly ſpent in the ſupport of his family.

Charles had no children by his queen, Catherine of Portugal, a virtuous princeſs, who could never engage the affections of her huſband. He, however, left a numerous progeny the fruits of his illicit love.

J A M E S II.

A. D. 1685. AS the bill of excluſion had failed in parliament, James, duke of York, mounted the Engliſh throne without any oppoſition. His ſpeech to the privy-council gained him great applauſe, being filled with wiſe and moderate principles of government. After paying ſome eulogiums to the memory of his brother, and declaring that he propoſed to take him for his model, he proceeded in the following manner: "I have been repreſented as infatuated with principles of arbitrary power; nor is this the only calumny that has been thrown upon me. But I now declare that I will endeavour to maintain the government both in church and ſtate, as by law eſtabliſhed. I am ſenſible that the church of England is favourable to monarchy, and that all the members of it have ſhewn themſelves faithful ſubjects. I ſhall therefore apply myſelf to ſupport and defend it. I am ſenſible, at the ſame time, that the laws of England make me as powerful a prince as I can wiſh to be; and my object is to preſerve the prerogative of my crown without invading the privileges of my ſubjects. I have often expoſed my life in defence of the nation, and am ſtill ready to expoſe it for the maintenance of its juſt rights and privileges."

This ſpeech, which was printed and diſperſed through the kingdom, revived the ſpirits of the Engliſh, who had formed the moſt alarming apprehenſions of his conduct. He had eſtabliſhed his courage and conduct as a ſeaman; and he was conſidered as one of the moſt able perſons in Europe, with regard to maritime affairs. His friends magnified his probity to the ſkies; and the people readily believed them, becauſe they wiſhed it to be true. Addreſſes were ſent from every quarter of the kingdom, filled with the warmeſt expreſſions of duty and reſpect. Even the quakers followed the general practice, and waited on the king with a congratulatory addreſs, in which was the following remarkable paragraph: "We are come to ſignify our affliction for the death of our good friend Charles, and our joy to ſee thee made the ruler of the people. They tell us, thou art not of the church of England any more than we; ſo we hope thou wilt allow us the ſame liberty that thou takeſt thyſelf; and if thou doeſt, we wiſh thee all manner of proſperity."

But it was too ſoon evident that James never intended to ſupport the church of England, and ſecure the privileges of the people. The very firſt Sunday after his acceſſion he went publickly to maſs, though contrary to the eſtabliſhed laws of England, and the prieſts and jeſuits became his principal confidents. He alſo publiſhed a proclamation for levying the duties of exciſe and cuſtoms granted to his predeceſſors, as if given by parliament, though he well knew that the grant expired with the life of his brother. He, however, took care not to ſhew much partiality to thoſe of his own communion, in ſettling the officers of his houſhold. All who poſſeſſed poſts under the late king were continued in their reſpective offices by proclamation.

But the number of prieſts and jeſuits who now baſked openly in the ſunſhine of the court, gave great offence. Pope Innocent XI. to whom he ſent his ſubmiſſion, blamed his conduct, and deſired him to proceed with more caution. The Spaniſh ambaſſador alſo deſired him to be more circumſpect in his proceedings, adding, that ſo many prieſts about the court might do hurt by their counſels. James aſked him whether the king of Spain did not conſult his confeſſor, "Yes," anſwered the miniſter, "and for that very reaſon our affairs are badly managed."

Though the king had entertained the greateſt diſguſt againſt parliaments, it was abſolutely neceſſary to ſummon that aſſembly at the commencement of a new reign, unleſs it had been determined to introduce at once a deſpotic government. The utmoſt pains were taken to procure a parliament wholly devoted to the court. Their endeavours were in general ſucceſsful; few beſides tories being elected. James opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he repeated his promiſe to govern according to the laws, and to ſupport the proteſtant religion. But the manner in which he demanded that his revenue ſhould be eſtabliſhed for life, in the ſame manner as in the preceding reign, gave the patriots no very favourable opinion of his deſigns; they thought he ſpoke the language of a deſpotic prince rather than that of an Engliſh monarch, whoſe actions are limitted by the laws, and who can levy no taxes without the conſent of parliament. "It may poſſibly be ſuppoſed," ſaid he, "that to grant me ſupplies from time to time, would prove an infallible means of frequent parliaments; but as I now ſpeak to you from the throne, for the firſt time, I tell you, without reſerve, that ſuch an expedient would be ill received, and that the beſt means to engage me to aſſemble you frequently is to treat me well."

This ſpeech wanted no comment to explain its meaning. It was ſufficiently evident, that he had already formed a reſolution of ſetting parliaments wholly aſide, in caſe he met with any oppoſition. The parliament, however, thought proper to diſſemble their apprehenſions, and voted the king the fixed revenues of his predeceſſor; but added, that they depended upon his royal word for the performance, with regard to his maintaining the religion of the church of England, as it was beneath the dignity of a king to falſify his promiſe.

It could not be expected that Oates, who had occaſioned ſo many reflections to be thrown on the catholics, could long eſcape the vengeance of his majeſty. He was tried in the court of king's-bench on two indictments for perjury, and found guilty on both. He was ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment, to ſtand five times every year on the pillory, and to be whipped firſt from Aldgate to Newgate, and the ſecond day after from Newgate to Tyburn. But notwithſtanding this dreadful puniſhment, which was executed with ſuch ſeverity that he fainted away ſeveral times, he would confeſs nothing. He continued in priſon till the revolution, when he obtained his liberty, and a penſion of four hundred pounds a year.

Dangerfield, his principal aſſociate, was alſo tried for writing a ſeditious libel, and convicted. He was ſentenced to ſtand twice on the pillory, to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate one day, and from Newgate to Tyburn another, and to pay a fine of five hundred pounds. As he was returning in a coach from his ſecond whipping, he was inſulted by one Francis, a barriſter of Grays-Inn. Dangerfield reſented the unmanly treatment, and ſpit in his face. This ſo provoked the barriſter, that he puſhed his cane with the utmoſt violence in the face of Dangerfield, and ſtriking him directly on the eye, he died in torture a few hours after. Francis was immediately apprehended, tried for the offence and executed at Tyburn.

On the twenty-third of April the Scottiſh parliament aſſembled, and the ſeſſion was opened by the duke of Queenſberry, as king's commiſſioner. His grace aſſured them that they were equally included in his majeſty's declaration in council with their brethren in England. At the ſame time he cauſed a letter from James to the Scottiſh parliament to be read. In this letter the king inveighed ſtrongly againſt the fanatics, or rigid preſbyterians, whom he called horrid murderers and aſſaſſins, and deſired the ſtates to take proper meaſures againſt their intrigues. The parliament ſhewed the moſt abject ſubmiſſion to the royal pleaſure: they preſented an addreſs to the king full of the groſſeſt flattery: they confirmed the act paſſed in the preceding reign for maintaining the eſtabliſhed religion: they gave the crown the duties ariſing from the exciſe: they paſſed a bill, by which the taking or defending the ſolemn league or covenant, was declared high treaſon: and another for ſuppreſſing houſe or field conventicles, by which all who ſhould preach or be preſent at ſuch conventicles, were to be puniſhed with death: and in a vote which they called an offer of duty, they profeſſed their abhorrence of all principles and poſitions that tended in any wiſe to derogate "from the king's ſacred, ſupreme, ſovereign, abſolute authority and power."

Theſe pleaſing conceſſions both in the Engliſh and Scottiſh parliament, ſeemed to flatter James with an opinion that no oppoſition would be made to his meaſures, and that he ſhould be able to re-eſtabliſh the Romiſh faith in all his dominions. He ſoon found himſelf fatally miſtaken in imagining no commotions would interrupt the tranquillity of his reign. The earl of Argyle, who had been obliged to fly from Scotland on being accuſed of having engaged with Monmouth and his friends in the late deſign for raiſing a rebellion in England, thought this a fair opportunity for being revenged upon James, whom he conſidered as the ſole cauſe of his diſgrace and misfortunes. He imparted his deſign to the duke of Monmouth, who, as well as himſelf, was an exile in Holland. Monmouth, always beloved by the people, liſtened to Argyle, and precipitately engaged in an attempt to dethrone his uncle. They hired a few ſhips of the Dutch, and collected between two and three hundred of the Engliſh exiles in Flanders, all perſons of deſperate fortunes, and who had no other proſpect of retrieving their affairs, than by bringing about a change of government at home. The duke flattered himſelf, indeed, with being joined by the whig party in England, provided a ſucceſsful landing both in England and Scotland could be effected.

The plan being concerted, the two chiefs ſeparated in order to carry the deſign into execution. Argyle, with a handful of troops, but with arms for five thouſand men, ſailed from Holland in the beginning of May, and landed without oppoſition in Scotland. But he ſoon found himſelf deceived in the notion of being joined by multitudes of his countrymen. About two thouſand men, principally highlanders of his own clan, repaired to his ſtandard; but the government, who received advice of his intended invaſion, were ready to receive him. He was purſued from one poſt to another by the royal army, till he was abandoned by the greater part of his followers, and taken priſoner. His execution was not long delayed. He was carried to Edinburgh, where his head was ſtruck off upon a ſcaffold.

Nor was Monmouth more fortunate in his enterprize. He landed at Lyme in Dorſetſhire, on the eleventh of June, with about eighty followers, but with arms for a much larger number. Some of his officers diſperſed themſelves about the country, in order, if poſſible, to engage the people to join him. They were ſo ſucceſsful, that in a ſhort ſpace of time the duke's little army was increaſed to near two thouſand men. On his firſt landing he publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he declared, that the ſole intention of his coming was to aſſert his natural right, and deliver the nation from the tyranny of the duke of York, whom he accuſed of being the principal author of that dreadful conflagration which laid the capital in aſhes; of the late popiſh plot for aſſaſſinating the king; and ſubverting the proteſtant religion; of the murder of the earl of Eſſex in the Tower; and of having actually impriſoned the king his brother. He repreſented the duke as being incapable, by his religion, of ſwaying the ſceptre of England, which could never hope for peace and ſafety while a papiſt and a tyrant filled the throne.

Very little effect was produced by this manifeſto, which abounded more with invective than ſound reaſoning. Few perſons of any diſtinction joined his ſtandard, and the greater part of thoſe who did, were a rude, undiſciplined rabble. On his reaching Taunton, his army was increaſed to about five thouſand men; but inſtead of marching directly to Briſtol, which was in no condition to reſiſt him, he ſpent ſeveral days in making preparations for a ſplendid proceſſion when he was proclaimed king, which was performed on the eighteenth of June. This ridiculous piece of oſtentation gave the king time to aſſemble his forces, which were now in full march againſt him, under the command of the duke of Albemarle.

Monmouth now ſaw his folly, but it was too late. A ſingle alternative only remained; he muſt either conquer or periſh. A council of war was called, where it was determined to march and meet the royal army, in order to prevent a ſurprize, which muſt have been fatal. The two armies came in ſight of each other on the fourth of July, and the next morning the battle began. Monmouth's horſe, commanded by lord Grey, fled at the firſt charge, owing to the inexperience, cowardice, or treachery of their general. He was himſelf taken priſoner, but readily obtained the king's pardon. The foot ſtood firm, and maintained their ground for a conſiderable time with great reſolution; but being deſerted by the horſe, and expoſed to a moſt dreadful fire from the artillery of the royal army, they at length gave way, and a moſt dreadful carnage enſued. Three hundred were killed upon the ſpot, above a thouſand in the purſuit, and as many taken priſoners. This battle was fought on Sedgemoor, near Bridgewater.

Monmouth himſelf, after uſing every method in his power to retrieve the fortune of the day, and diſplaying the moſt noble efforts of valour, was obliged to have recourſe to flight. His aſſumed ſovereignty vaniſhed like a dream, and all his mighty proſpects diſappeared in an inſtant. He fled, attended only by one ſervant, till his horſe dropped under him with fatigue. This incident obliged him to purſue his way on foot, till he reached a poor cottage, where he changed clothes with the peaſant, and continued his flight till he was wholly ſpent. Reduced to this extremity, he laid himſelf down in a ditch, covered with fern. Unfortunately for him, a party of the king's forces paſſing the next day by the ſame cottage, one of the officers knew the duke's clothes, in which the countryman was dreſſed. He was immediately ſeized; and, to extricate himſelf from danger, pointed out the road the duke had taken; and, after a ſtrict ſearch, he was diſcovered in his hiding-place, with his pockets filled with green peas, the only food he had eaten ſince his defeat. He was carried immediately to London, and committed to the Tower.

Terrified with this dreadful reverſe of fortune, Monmouth wrote a very ſubmiſſive letter to his uncle; but he no ſooner perceived that his life would be ſaved only on the condition of impeaching his friends, than he rejected the offer with a noble diſdain. James had a fine opportunity of ſignalizing his clemency, but his heart was a ſtranger to that generous paſſion; and Monmouth loſt his head upon a ſcaffold, ſurrounded by multitudes of ſpectators, who generouſly paid him the tribute of their tears.

He

He was greatly beloved by the people; and had not indiſcretion and the fire of youth precipitated his meaſures, his attempt might have ſhaken the crown on the head of his uncle.

The victory of Sedgemoor was followed by many barbarous executions. The lord chief-juſtice Jefferies, the moſt inhuman tyrant that ever filled the ſeat of juſtice; and colonel Kirk, a ſoldier of fortune, and who, by ſerving long at Tangier, had contracted, by his intercourſe with the Moors, a degree of inhumanity hardly ever known in a chriſtian; were ſent into the weſt, to execute the vengeance of a bigotted prince on the unhappy perſons who had joined Monmouth in his rebellion. The bare recital of the barbarities committed by theſe two inhuman monſters, is ſufficient to fill the reader with horror. Numbers were executed without any form of trial. Thirty were hanged at one time, as a diverſion to colonel Kirk and his officers while they were at dinner. One execution was attended with ſuch circumſtances of perfidy, as well as barbarity, that its equal cannot, perhaps, be found in the hiſtory of any other country. A young maid, frantic with grief, repaired to the colonel, to implore pardon for her brother. She threw herſelf at his feet, armed with all the charms that beauty and innocence, bathed in tears, could poſſibly beſtow. Fired with luſt, rather than ſoftened by love and clemency, he promiſed to grant her requeſt, provided ſhe, on her part, would condeſcend to ſatisfy his deſires. The ſtruggle was ſevere between virtue and her affection for her brother. The latter at laſt prevailed; ſhe ſubmitted to the conditions: but after paſſing the night with this inhuman ruffian, he ſhewed her next morning, from the window of the apartment, her brother, the darling object for whom ſhe had ſacrificed her virtue, hanging on a gibbet, which he had privately cauſed to be erected for his execution. The ſhock was too great for human nature: ſhe loſt her ſenſes in the dreadful conflict, and never recovered them more.

The chief-juſtice Jefferies was equally cruel, and demands a ſeverer reprehenſion, becauſe his office ſhould have taught him humanity. Mercy was a ſtranger to his breaſt; few eſcaped with life that were brought before him. He gloried in cruelty, and boaſted of the numbers he had put to death. A lady of the anabaptiſt perſuaſion was burnt for extending her charity to one of the rebels who had implored her aſſiſtance. The wretch ſhe had entertained was pardoned for turning evidence againſt her. Lady Liſle, though herſelf a loyaliſt, and her own ſon a volunteer in the king's army, was beheaded for entertaining a preſbyterian miniſter in Monmouth's party, though he had not been mentioned in the proclamation. The jury were melted into pity, and thrice refuſed to find a verdict againſt her; but at laſt the menaces of the inhuman Jefferies prevailed; and the lady, who was above eighty years of age, ſuffered on a ſcaffold. Father Orleans pretends, that James diſapproved of theſe cruelties, expreſſed his indignation, and repaired the injuſtice to the utmoſt of his power. But this is a proof that bigotry is capable of ſacrificing the moſt obvious truths to the ſupport of its party. James was ſo far from diſapproving the cruel proceedings of Jefferies, that he created him a peer at his return, and rewarded him with the poſt of chancellor.

The parliament were, however, alarmed at the behaviour of the court. James having declared that he had diſpenſed with the teſt required by the law in favour of the catholic officers who had ſerved him faithfully, the commons ſhewed a becoming ſpirit, and paſſed a reſolution for enquiring into the power which the king aſſumed in diſpenſing with the laws. "I hope," ſaid one of the members, "we are Engliſhmen, and not to be frighted with a few hard words." But this ſhew of reſolution was only for a moment; fear prevailed; they proceeded no farther; and voted more ſupplies than the king had demanded. The lords, however, were not ſo eaſily intimidated. They undertook the examination which the commons had declined: even the biſhops themſelves were ſtrongly deſirous of making the neceſſary enquiry. Alarmed and exaſperated at meeting with oppoſition where the moſt unlimited complaiſance was expected, James immediately prorogued the parliament. He determined to carry his point or loſe his crown in the conteſt.

Freed from all apprehenſions of the interpoſition of parliament, James flattered himſelf that he had no longer any occaſion to diſguiſe his ſentiments, or ſuffer any reſtraint in his actions. His arbitrary principles therefore began now to appear too evident to be miſtaken. The ſcabberd of deception was thrown away, and the ſword of deſpotiſm appeared naked, and ſurrounded with all its terrors.

A. D. 1686. The duke of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland was removed from his poſt, notwithſtanding his long and eminent attachment to the royal family. He was a proteſtant, and that particular alone was abundantly ſufficient with James to obliterate a whole life of ſervices. The earl of Tyrconnel, a catholic nobleman, was preferred in his room, and the teſt act was immediately repealed. The earl of Murray having ſupplanted the duke of Queenſberry as high-commiſſioner in Scotland, he ſummoned a parliament, and, in his majeſty's name, recommended to their care and humanity, the poor catholics in that kingdom, for indulgence in the exerciſe of their religion. A bill was accordingly brought in for that purpoſe; but it was ſo warmly oppoſed, that it was thought prudent to defer it till a more proper opportunity. But James was determined not to be diſappointed: he ſent orders to the high-commiſſioner to prorogue the parliament, and eſtabliſhed, by virtue of his own prerogative, a liberty of conſcience through the whole kingdom. Hardly any but catholics were now preferred to places of truſt or profit, both civil and military. James ſaw the increaſing power of the papiſts with great ſatisfaction; and was firmly perſuaded that, by means of their influence, he ſhould be able to eſtabliſh both the Romiſh religion and arbitrary power in every part of his dominions.

Having ſucceeded in Ireland and Scotland, he now determined to attempt the more difficult part of the taſk; the reducing the Engliſh to ſubmit to the yoke of deſpotiſm. He ſummoned the judges, and prevailed upon them to declare in favour of his diſpenſing power. He did not, however, carry his point without the utmoſt difficulty. Sir Thomas Jones, lord chief-juſtice of the common-pleas; Montague, lord chief-baron of the exchequer; Sir Robert Charlton, one of the judges of the common-pleas; and baron Nevil, abſolutely declared againſt the diſpenſing power, as totally ſubverſive of all the laws of England. It was therefore neceſſary to deprive theſe of their poſts, and fill them with others, who were leſs conſcientious, and more ſubmiſſive to the court. One Milton, a profeſſed catholic, was made a baron of the exchequer; and the reſt, though they profeſſed the proteſtant religion, were all creatures of the miniſtry. The people were now ſufficiently alarmed; but James gave himſelf no trouble with regard to their apprehenſions; he thought the eſtabliſhment of the Romiſh religion, an action worthy of the greateſt monarch, and that no danger was too great to intimidate him from the attempt. He therefore determined to proceed; and warmly ſollicited the noblemen who were about his perſon to change their religion, and embrace the Romiſh faith. This ſtrange requeſt was rejected by many with the contempt it deſerved. The earl of Sunderland was, indeed, mean enough to purchaſe the ſmiles of royalty at the price of his religion. Rocheſter, the treaſurer, though the king's brother-in-law, refuſed his compliance, and was diſcharged from his poſt. The treaſury was put into commiſſion; and lord Bellaſis, who had been long confined in the tower, on account of the popiſh plot, was appointed firſt lord of that board. Emboldened by the countenance of the ſovereign, the papiſts began to exerciſe their religion publickly: the jeſuits opened colleges and ſeminaries in all the principal towns in the kingdom: four popiſh biſhops were publicly conſecrated in the king's chapel, and ſent into different parts of England to exerciſe epiſcopal juriſdiction over thoſe of their own communion, Catholic noblemen were made lieutenants of counties, and gentlemen of the ſame perſuaſion acted as juſtices of the peace.

Alarmed but not intimidated at theſe proceedings of the court, the Engliſh divines nobly ſtood forth, in defence of their religion, and oppoſed the errors of popery with reaſons that never were or never could be ſatisfactorily anſwered. Orders were iſſued from the court, prohibiting the inferior clergy from preaching on controverted points of religion. But this order produced not the deſired effect; the divines continued their laudible efforts; Tillotſon, Stillingfleet, Teniſon, Patrick, Sharp, and ſome others ſhone with diſtinguiſhed luſtre on this remarkable occaſion.

Exaſperated at this honeſt boldneſs of the clergy, eſpecially at ſeeing the futility of the reaſonings of the popiſh divines expoſed, it was determined to erect an ecleſiaſtical tribunal, where all diſputes with regard to religion were to be finally heard and determined. A court ſimilar to this, together with that of the Star-chamber, had been aboliſhed by act of parliament in the reign of Charles I. A clauſe was alſo added to the bill that demoliſhed them, prohibiting all courts of a ſimilar kind from being erected for the future. But James was determined to put all laws at defiance. The commiſſion was iſſued, conſtituting Sancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury (who, however, refuſed to act) Crow, biſhop of Durham, Sprat, biſhop of Rocheſter, the earls of Rocheſter and Sunderland, chancellor Jefferies, and lord chief-juſtice Herbert, were appointed commiſſioners; but upon Sancroft's abſolutely refuſing to act, his name was ſtruck out, and that of the biſhop of Cheſter inſerted in its room. Theſe comiſſioners were inveſted with the ſame power with thoſe who ſat in the former high court of high commiſſion, and every branch of the ecleſiaſtical affairs in England, ſubject to their arbitrary deciſions.

The court was hardly eſtabliſhed before an opportunity offered for exerciſing their judicial authority. Dr. Sharp, rector of St. Giles, and dean of Norwich, had preached a ſermon, in which he had inveighed againſt popery in the ſtrongeſt manner, and expreſſed his apprehenſions of the danger that then threatened the eſtabliſhed church. This ſermon had given great offence to the court, and the king himſelf wrote to Compton, biſhop of London, ordering him to ſuſpend Sharp from his clerical function, till he ſhould give ſatisfaction for the offence, and his majeſty's farther pleaſure ſhould be known. Compton, on receiving this letter, returned an anſwer to the earl of Sunderland, ſecretary of ſtate, deſiring it might be communicated to his majeſty. In this letter the biſhop repreſented, that it was repugnant to all law and juſtice for him to paſs ſentence upon any perſon before the crime of which he was accuſed had been properly laid before him, and the party had liberty to anſwer for himſelf. This anſwer, though conformable to the ſtricteſt rules of equity gave the higheſt offence. James, inflamed with paſſion at what he ſtiled an inſolent dallying with his authority, cauſed the biſhop and Sharp to be cited before the court of high-commiſſion, where the ſentence of ſuſpenſion was paſſed againſt them both.

A. D. 1687. An open rupture with the church of England now ſeemed to be declared. Father Peters, the king's confeſſor, one of the moſt furious jeſuits of his time, was the perſon whoſe counſels principally puſhed on the king to the precipice from which he ſoon after fell. Ambitious of a cardinal's hat, and the primacy of England, he propoſed the moſt violent meaſures; the bigotted miſguided king followed his advice, and was undone. Every perſon of ſolid reaſon abroad condemned theſe precipitate meaſures; the cardinals at Rome turned both the king and his confeſſor into ridicule, declaring that they both deſerved to be excommunicated as perſons who were labouring to deſtroy the ſmall remains of the catholic religion in England.

James was not ſatisfied with theſe impetuous proceedings, he was determined to ſhew his people what they muſt expect if they preſumed to diſpute his meaſures, or make any oppoſition to his will. He cauſed a camp to be formed on Hounſlow heath, conſiſting of fifteen thouſand men. This large body of men he had kept on foot notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the parliament; and now gave the command to the earl of Feverſham. A catholic chapel was erected in the center of this camp, and maſs publicly celebrated every day. James fondly imagined that this military force, whoſe principal officers were Roman catholics devoted to his ſervice, would be ſufficient to enable him to carry into execution every meaſure he ſhould think neceſſary to adopt, and put the tongue of oppoſition to ſilence. But he ſhould have reflected, that this army was compoſed of Engliſhmen, who would be the firſt to abandon him, whenever they perceived that his real deſign was the deſtruction of the liberty of their country.

Theſe warlike preparations, together with the expedition uſed in fitting out a powerful fleet, in the time of a profound peace, filled the people with the moſt alarming apprehenſions. Theſe were greatly increaſed by a report ſpread by the king's enemies, that this fleet was intended to act againſt the Dutch; it having been determined by the miniſtry to declare war againſt that republic, in order to exclude the prince of Orange for everfrom the ſucceſſion; becauſe by that excluſion only, the eſtabliſhment of the Roman catholic religion in England could be rendered permanent. It was alſo ſuſpected, that James, purſuing the example of his brother, had concluded a ſecret treaty with Lewis XIV. and adopted that monarch's arbitrary plan of government. Theſe ſuſpicions which ſeemed to be well founded, completely deprived the king of the affections of his people.

James had ſent an ambaſſador extraordinary to Rome, in order to procure a legate a latere to be ſent into England. The pope highly diſapproved of the violent meaſures purſued by the king in order to obtain the eſtabliſhment of a ſcheme, which required the utmoſt prudence and caution to effect. But neither the cold reception of his ambaſſador at Rome, the inceſſant complaints of his own ſubjects, nor even the remonſtrances of the more ſenſible and prudent part of his catholic ſubjects, who, fearful of the conſequences, intreated him to moderate his zeal, could divert the king one moment from his darling purpoſe, the eſtabliſhment of the catholic faith, in every part of the kingdom. Deaf to every prudent advice, he liſtened only to the dictates of his own ſuperſtition, and the inflammatory counſels of father Peters.

Finding himſelf deſerted by the church party, James endeavoured to careſs the preſbyterians, and ordered a declaration to be publiſhed in Scotland, ſuſpending, by virtue of his ſovereign authority, all oaths, teſts, &c. impoſed upon non-conformiſts, who profeſſed the Chriſtian religion. He allowed the moderate preſbyterians to meet in their private houſes only, but forbad, under the ſevereſt penalties, all field conventicles. Quakers were alſo tolerated to meet and perform their worſhip in any place or places appointed for that purpoſe. By the ſame declaration, the catholics were relieved from all acts of parliament made againſt thoſe of their profeſſion.

A ſimilar declaration was publiſhed in England on the fourth of April; and the diſſenters, perſuaded that this indulgence proceeded from a ſincere deſire of giving relief to tender conſciences, preſented him with the moſt flattering addreſſes. Theſe tended to convince James, that he ſhould meet with no oppoſition in eſtabliſhing a liberty of conſcience in every part of his dominions. Had his views extended no farther, it is poſſible it might have been effected without occaſioning any commotion. But James was far from being ſatisfied with having procured his catholic ſubjects the public exerciſe of their religion; he was deſirous of procuring them far greater advantages. The papiſts had not hitherto been able to procure any preferments in either of the univerſities, an advantage paſſionately deſired by the clergy of that community. The king was therefore determined to attempt it, and procure them a ſhare in the government of the church. An order was therefore ſent from the king and council, to the univerſity of Cambridge, ordering them to admit father Francis, a Benedictine monk, to the degree of maſter of arts, without adminiſtering to him the uſual oaths. James was perſuaded that no oppoſition would be made to his command; but he was miſtaken. The univerſity refuſed to comply, and petitioned the king to recall his mandate. Exaſperated at this refuſal, the king ſuſpended the vice-chancellor, reprimanded the ſenate, and ordered them to ſend up to the privy-council, copies of their ſtatutes. He, however, ſoon perceived that the univerſity were not to be intimidated, and thought proper to deſiſt from his purpoſe.

He next attempted to influence the univerſity of Oxford; perſuaded that as that body had been the foremoſt to eſtabliſh, by their famous decree, the doctrine of paſſive obedience, they would not heſitate to put their principles in practice. The preſidentſhip of Magdalen college happening to be vacant, the king ſent his mandate to the vice-preſident and fellows, requiring them to elect one Anthony Farmer, a man of a very indifferent character, who had promiſed to declare himſelf a catholic on his being elected into that office. The college abſolutely refuſed to comply, as being contrary to their ſtatutes, and actually elected Dr. Hough to be their preſident. The king was highly offended, and ſummoned the electors, together with Dr. Hough, before the court of high-commiſſion, where the vice-preſident was ſuſpended, and the election declared void. But the univerſity having proved that Farmer's character was notoriouſly bad, the king ſent them a ſecond mandate, commanding them to elect Dr. Parker, biſhop of Oxford, a reputed papiſt. The fellows, determined to ſupport their choice, refuſed to obey the ſecond mandate: they cited the ſtatutes, and the oaths they had taken to prove, that they were obliged to purſue the method they had done, or be guilty of perjury. They proved that Parker was no better qualified than Farmer, having never been fellow either of Magdalen or New College, and therefore incapable of being elected their preſident.

Incenſed at their refractory behaviour, and hoping to conquer their obſtinacy by his preſence, the king repaired to Oxford, under pretence of making a ſummer's progreſs; and having ſummoned the fellows before him, he reproached them in the moſt virulent terms for their diſloyalty, arrogance and preſumption, as he termed their firm attachment to the ſtatutes of the college. He concluded with commanding them, in the moſt peremptory manner, to elect the biſhop of Oxford, or prepare to feel the weight of his royal diſpleaſure. But his threats loſt their effect. Determined to ſupport the choice they had made, they continued firm to their purpoſe; and the king, having expoſed himſelf to the contempt of the whole nation, returned with confuſion to London. The eccleſiaſtical commiſſion, however, exerted all their authority, and the preſident and twenty-five fellows were expelled. Parker was eſtabliſhed in the poſſeſſion of his office, and the places of the deprived fellows ſupplied with papiſts. This action, which was contrary to all the laws of juſtice and equity, convinced the people, that the king intended to reduce them to the moſt abject ſlavery. The bittereſt reflections, the moſt pathetic remonſtrances, and the loudeſt complaints againſt the court, now made the ſubject of almoſt every publication. But James was determined to proceed, and to ſhew the ſovereign contempt with which he treated every complaint, he gave a ſolemn audience to the pope's nuncio.

About this time Lewis XIV. revoked the edict of Nantes, given to the proteſtants by Henry IV. by virtue of which they had enjoyed the free exerciſe of their religion. But the perſecuting ſpirit of Lewis would no longer ſuffer them to enjoy a privilege which enriched his kingdom. They were now perſecuted with ſuch rigour and ſeverity, that they were determined to ſeek, in a foreign country, that ſecurity they were ſo unjuſtly denied in their own. Above half a million of the moſt uſeful and induſtrious ſubjects deſerted France, carrying with them, beſides an immenſe ſum of money, thoſe arts and manufactures which had ſo greatly tended to augment the opulence of that kingdom. Numbers of theſe diſtreſſed proteſtants came over into England, and the pathetic accounts they gave of their ſufferings, rendered the name of papiſt more abhorred than ever.

Senſible that the opinions of the prince and princeſs of Orange, who were adored by the people, would have great influence in England, James was very deſirous of knowing their ſentiments with regard to the revocation of the teſt and penal laws. The prince had hitherto conducted himſelf with the moſt profound policy, giving the king every demonſtration of reſpect and attachment; never interfering in the affairs of England; appearing only to attend to the general intereſt of Europe. The increaſing ambition, and haughty deportment of Lewis XIV. had alarmed all the neighbouring powers; and his cruel behaviour to his proteſtant ſubjects, repreſented him in the light of an odious perſecutor. Their ſufferings were commiſerated by the powers to whom they fled for protection, and inſpired them with the glorious reſolution of procuring them redreſs. The prince of Orange excited the other courts againſt France, and by his influence the league of Augſburgh was negotiated. While the prince was thus employed, the meſſengers of James, who were charged with a commiſſion to procure, if poſſible, the prince's approbation of the meaſures he was purſuing in England, arrived at the Hague. Aware of the conſequence of expoſing himſelf to the hatred of a people whom he might one day govern, he gave James to underſtand, that if on one hand he approved the revocation of penal laws, as a friend to toleration, he regarded, on the other, the teſt oath, as a neceſſary means to preſerve the eſtabliſhed worſhip; that an excluſion from public offices was not a puniſhment; and that Holland, though ſhe tolerated all ſects without diſtinction, intruſted thoſe offices to ſuch only as profeſſed the national religion. Theſe ſentiments were not long a ſecret in England, and gave as much joy to the people as mortification to the king.

A. D. 1688. This diſcovery had, however, no power to deter James from purſuing the meaſures he had formed. He publiſhed, on the twenty-ſecond of April, a ſecond declaration for liberty of conſcience, couched in nearly the ſame terms as the former: but he now ſubjoined an order, commanding the miniſters to read it in their churches immediately after divine ſervice. James was perſuaded that the clergy would not comply with the royal mandate, and determined, in that caſe, to make them feel the weight of power. He was not miſtaken; the far greater part of the clergy conſidered it as an inſult upon their order, and abſolutely refuſed compliance. Among theſe, ſeven prelates nobly ſtood forth in defence of their religion. Lloyd, biſhop of St. Aſaph; Ken, of Bath and Wells; Turner, of Ely; Lake, of Chicheſter; White, of Peterborough; and Trelawny, of Briſtol; with Sancroft archbiſhop of Canterbury at their head, repaired to court, and preſented, on their knees, a reſpectful petition to the king, in which they repreſented to his majeſty, that the declaration being founded on a power which the parliament had often pronounced illegal, they could not in prudence, honour or conſcience, publiſh it in the dioceſes over which they preſided. Impatient of controul, and diſtinguiſhed for obſtinacy, James reſented this oppoſition in a manner unbecoming either a monarch or a man. He reprehended them in the moſt contumelious language, and told them, that if they had forgotten he was the ſupreme head of the church, he knew how to make them acknowledge his power. They were ſoon after ſummoned before the council, and inſulted by the inhuman Jefferies with his uſual brutality. He told them, that unleſs they inſtantly retracted their aſſertions and withdrew their petition, he would ſend them all to the Tower. They anſwered, "that they ſhould ſubmit to his majeſty's pleaſure, whatever it might be; that their own conſciences told them, they had done nothing but what was agreeable to the laws, and the ſacred character with which they were inveſted; and that they depended upon the king for protection." A warrant was immediately iſſued for committing them to the Tower.

Determined to proceed to extremities, but aware of the conſequences that the ſight of ſo many perſons inveſted with a ſacred character being ſent as criminals to priſon, might occaſion among the people, the court took the precaution of ſending them by water. But this artifice was in vain. The alarm was ſpread, and the ſhore from Whitehall to the Tower, crowded with multitudes of people, who with one voice deplored their fate, and intreated their bleſſing on their knees. Even the ſoldiers ſent to guard them were moved to pity, fell on their knees, requeſting their benediction, and expreſſed, in the ſtrongeſt manner, their deteſta- of their perſecutors.

Two days after the biſhops were ſent to the Tower, the queen was delivered of a ſon, who was baptized by the name of James. The nation, perſuaded that the king would be deterred by no crime to eſtabliſh the Romiſh religion in England, diſputed the reality of this prince's birth; and many writers, even in our times, are not ſatisfied of his legitimacy. The king, and the whole catholic party, however, celebrated this happy event with the moſt extravagant demonſtrations of joy: while the proteſtants were affected with a melancholy that bordered on deſpair.

While the attention of the nation was engaged in this event, the trial of the biſhops came on in the court of king's bench. They were attended from the Tower by twenty-nine temporal peers, and a prodigious concourſe of gentlemen, followed by multitudes of people, who waited, with the utmoſt anxiety, the iſſue of a cauſe on which they thought the fate of both their liberty and religion depended. The council for the biſhops defended their cauſe with a boldneſs of expreſſion, and force of reaſon, that did honour to their talents, and their love of liberty. Two of the judges, Powell and Holloway, declared themſelves in favour of the priſoners, and the jury brought in their verdict "not guilty." An univerſal ſhout of joyful acclamation filled the hall. Thoſe who were waiting without in the utmoſt anxiety catched the ſound, which ſpread in a moment through the whole capital, and was ſoon conveyed to the remoteſt parts of the kingdom. It happened that the king had that day reviewed his army, and was juſt retired into the general's tent, when the news of the biſhops acquittal reached the camp; on which the whole army gave a loud ſhout, attended with the moſt extravagant ſymptoms of joy. The king enquiring with ſome degree of aſtoniſhment, into the cauſe, lord Feverſham anſwered, "It is nothing but the rejoicing of the ſoldiers for the acquittal of the biſhops." "Do you call that nothing," replied the king, "but ſo much the worſe for them."

This proof of the people's affection for their religion and liberties, had, however, no effect upon James. He determined to purſue the ſame meaſures which had already hurried him to the brink of the precipice. It is not perhaps eaſy to find in all the annals of hiſtory an inſtance of ſuch infatuation in a man, who, in other reſpects, was far from being deficient either in ſenſe or accompliſhments. It is perhaps an object of compaſſion rather than anger. He knew he had only a handful of catholic ſoldiers that could be depended upon; and that the whole nation beſide would defend their religion and liberties to the laſt. Death only was capable of wreſting them out of their hands. But this had no effect upon the conduct of the king: he purſued his courſe and was undone.

He was, however, greatly alarmed with regard to the rejoicings made in the army on the acquittal of the biſhops, and determined to be ſatisfied how far he might depend upon the aſſiſtance of his forces. He accordingly ordered lord Litchfield's regiment to be drawn up, and appeared himſelf at their head. After walking for ſome time between the ranks, and commending their appearance, he gave orders that all the officers and ſoldiers who would not contribute to the repeal of the teſt and penal laws, ſhould lay down their arms; but his aſtoniſhment is better conceived than expreſſed, when he ſaw the whole regiment, captains, and a few popiſh ſoldiers only excepted, lay down their muſquets on the ground. He ſtood ſpeechleſs for ſome minutes, and then with a ſullen air bid them take up their arms, adding, that for the future he would not do them the honour of aſking their advice. Nor were the ſeamen in the royal navy more ready to ſecond his deſigns. Vice-admiral Strickland having ordered maſs to be ſaid on board his own ſhip in the Downs, the ſailors were enraged to ſuch a degree, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty they were reſtrained from throwing the prieſts overboard. James was, however, ſtill obſtinate: he determined to new model both the army and navy. He accordingly ſent for ſix regiments from Ireland, compoſed chiefly of catholics, and ſent orders for three regiments to advance from Scotland.

There was now no myſtery in the meaſures intended to be purſued by the king. The flimſy veil of pretence was withdrawn, and it was evident he was determined to make uſe of force, where influence was unable to prevail. The chains of ſlavery were forging, and no time was to be loſt to prevent their being rivetted on a free people. A cloſe union was accordingly formed between the church and nonconformiſts in defence of their liberties; and it was determined to invite the prince of Orange into England, as the only perſon capable of ſaving the nation, which now tottered on the brink of ruin. He liſtened to their complaints, and by means of his agents cultivated the favour of all parties. The Tories, and ſuch of the clergy who had ſupported the pernicious doctrine of non-reſiſtance, abandoned that deſtructive tenet, and joined the Whigs. Several of the nobility and gentry paſſing over to the continent on various pretences, repaired to the Hague, and convinced the prince that the whole nation was ready to join him, and wanted only a leader to head them in their noble deſign of reſtoring their country to liberty.

William conſented to give them all the aſſiſtance in his power, and made the neceſſary preparations, without imagining he was going to take poſſeſſion of a throne. Though he acted in concert with the confederates at Augſburgh, the ſecret was long impenetrable. The preparations of the Dutch appeared to be made againſt France. The count d'Avaux, more quick-ſighted than James, penetrated at laſt the bottom of this intrigue, and informed his maſter of the real deſign of the armament fitting out with ſo much ſecrecy and expedition. Lewis immediately communicated the diſcovery to James, and offered him a ſquadron to join his fleet, and even to raiſe the ſiege of Philipſburgh, and march his troops into the Low Countries, in order to intimidate the Dutch by the fear of an invaſion. Carried away with a blind confidence, James was deaf to all advice, and rejected the offer of Lewis. "I am not," ſaid he, "reduced to the condition of cardinal Furſtemberg, nor obliged to ſeek the protection of France." Theſe officious offers of Lewis had, however, their effect on the Engliſh. They were now perſuaded that James had ſigned a ſecret treaty with the French monarch, and this opinion animated the ſpirit of revolt.

Every thing being ſettled at the Hague, the nobility and gentry in the intereſt of the prince of Orange diſperſed themſelves in their different counties, in order to gain the populace over to their party, and prevail upon them to take up arms in defence of the liberties of their country. The ſtates of Holland declared their intention of aſſiſting the Engliſh. The electors of Brandenburgh and Saxony, the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, and the whole houſe of Lunenburgh, agreed to aſſemble all their forces, in order to protect the United Provinces during the abſence of the ſtadtholder.

The illuſion now vaniſhed when it was too late. The Engliſh ambaſſador at the Hague informed his maſter, that every thing was ready for an embarkation of the forces; and that the grand penſioner Fagel openly avowed that the armament was intended to invade England. Diſtreſſed and terrified at the news, James retracted, and ſeemed deſirous of reforming his meaſures. He reſtored the friends of the teſt and penal laws to their places; he careſſed the perſecuted biſhops; he diſſolved the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion; he reſtored the charters of London and other cities; and endeavoured to gain the friendſhip of the Dutch, by promiſing to enter into ſuch alliances as they thought neceſſary to the welfare of Europe. But his indiſcretions, to call his meaſures by the ſofteſt name, had rendered the evil incurable; and had this ſudden change been even admitted as ſincere, ſtill there was the utmoſt danger of his arbitrary principles returning the moment the danger was over.

A manifeſto, publiſhed by the prince of Orange, prepared the way for an invaſion. Copies of this paper were ſent over into England, and diſtributed in every part of the kingdom. In this declaration the prince diſclaimed, in the moſt ſolemn manner, all thoughts of conqueſt, or of diſturbing the king in the enjoyment of his crown; declaring he had no other deſign than to maintain the proteſtant religion, the laws and liberties of England, and to procure the aſſembling a free parliament, which might provide for the public liberty, and enquire into the proofs of the legitimacy of the prince of Wales.

Soon after the publication of this manifeſto, the prince of Orange ſailed from Holland with a fleet of fifty ſail of Dutch men of war, and a conſiderable number of tranſports, attended by many of the Engliſh nobility and gentry. But a violent ſtorm ſoon overtook the armament, and ſeparated the ſhips ſo effectually, that hardly four were ſeen together. Fortunately, none of them were loſt; but ſome of them put into one port, and ſome into another. The news of this diſaſter no ſooner reached England, than James, perſuaded that the danger was over, repented of the conceſſions he had made to his proteſtant ſubjects, recalled ſeveral popular acts, and ſeemed again determined to purſue the ſame meaſures that had already puſhed him to the very brink of ruin.

The damage was ſoon repaired, and the forces landed in Torbay on the fifth of November. The prince marched immediately to Exeter, where he continued till the fifteenth before he was joined by any perſons of condition: the conſequences of Monmouth's rebellion had ſtruck the people with terror; and though they were very deſirous of ſupporting their liberties, both civil and religious, they were fearful of being the firſt in joining the prince, leſt a defeat ſhould renew the former ſcenes of horror. Alarmed at this backwardneſs of the Engliſh, the prince was on the point of re-embarking his forces, when Sir Edward Seymour, major Barrington, and ſeveral other gentlemen of intereſt and fortune, appeared at the head-quarters; and offered the prince to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power. They were received with the utmoſt politeneſs, and were ſoon followed by ſeveral more of the nobility and gentry. The whole kingdom was now in commotion. The earl of Devonſhire declared for the prince in Derby, the earl of Danby ſeized York, lord Delamere took up arms in Cheſhire, the earl of Bath, governor of Plymouth, declared his intentions of defending the religion and liberties of his country. None offered their ſervice to the king: no preparations for oppoſing the invader were made in any part of the kingdom. Even the army gave ſufficient indications that they would not draw their ſwords againſt the deliverer of their country. Lord Cornbury, ſon to the earl of Clarendon, and colonel of a regiment of dragoons, left the camp, and carried with him both his own regiment and three others to the prince. Churchill, afterwards the famous duke of Marlborough, followed the example of lord Cornbury, and deſerted his unfortunate maſter.

Convinced by fatal experience, that no dependence could be placed on the army, James left the camp, and returned to London, where he was informed that prince George of Denmark, his ſon in-law, and the princeſs Anne, his favourite daughter, had alſo abandoned him. In this ſcene of complicated diſtreſs, he cried out, "Great God, have pity on me; my own children have forſaken me!" He aſſembled all the proteſtant peers that remained in or near the capital, and deſired they would give him their advice in this diſtreſsful ſituation. They unanimouſly declared, that the only way, in their opinion, to divert the threatening ſtorm, was to ſummon a free parliament; and to ſend commiſſioners to treat with the prince of Orange. The king very readily embraced the propoſal. The lord chancellor was directed to iſſue the neceſſary writs. All the papiſts about the court were removed from their places. Sir Edward Hales, lieutenant of the Tower, was diſmiſſed, and Sir Bevil Skelton appointed in his room. Father Peters, whoſe pernicious counſels had plunged the king into this abyſs of miſery, perceiving the ſtorm ready to burſt on his devoted head, deſerted his maſter in his diſtreſs, and eſcaped into France.

The prince received the marquis of Hallifax, the earl of Northampton, and lord Godolphin, who were ſent by the king to negotiate a treaty, with great reſpect; and delivered to them a paper, containing certain propoſals; the heads of which were, that a free parliament ſhould be called; that all papiſts ſhould be diſarmed, and diſcharged from all employments; that all proclamations againſt the prince ſhould be recalled; that the command of the Tower ſhould be given to the lord-mayor of London; that if the king ſhould think proper to reſide in London during the ſeſſion of parliament, the prince ſhould alſo reſide there, with an equal number of guards, or that both the king and prince ſhould reſide at an equal diſtance from London; that both armies ſhould be removed thirty miles from the capital, and that no new forces ſhould be landed in the kingdom; that Tilbury-fort ſhould be put into the hands of the city magiſtrates; that till the parliament met, part of the public revenue ſhould be aſſigned for the ſupport of the prince's army; and that, in order to prevent an invaſion from France, or other foreign power, Portſmouth ſhould be committed to the care of ſome perſon equally agreeable to the king and the prince.

James now looked upon his fortunes as deſperate. He ſaw himſelf abandoned by his ſervants, his friends and his children. He ſaw the religion he was ſo deſirous of eſtabliſhing on the point of being eradicated; and determined to ſeek protection in a foreign country. He, however, diſſembled his ſentiments, and declared, that the terms were as moderate, or even more ſo, than he could expect in the preſent ſituation of his affairs. But fearful of throwing himſelf on the mercy of his parliament, he loſt all his firmneſs; and when every thing wore the aſpect of an approaching peace and reconciliation, the king, after ſending away the queen and prince ſecretly to Graveſend, diſappeared himſelf, during the night, attended only by Sir Edward Hales, Mr. Sheldon, and Mr. Labadie. The king's departure was no ſooner known, than the populace aſſembled, pulled down the maſs-houſes, and inſulted thoſe of the foreign ambaſſadors, from a perſuaſion that the Roman catholics had there depoſited the principal part of their riches. Conſcious of the reaſons he had given the nation by his infamous counſels and deciſions, Jefferies attempted to make his eſcape; but being diſcovered in a houſe at Wapping, the populace ſeized him; and the lord-mayor was obliged to ſend him to the Tower, in order to prevent his being torn in pieces. He did not long ſurvive this ſevere diſcipline; he died ſoon after in the Tower of the bruiſes he had received.

Feverſham was no ſooner informed that his maſter had deſerted the throne, than he diſbanded his forces, but without paying their arrears, or taking from them their arms. Thus a lawleſs banditti was let looſe to plunder the country. A report was at the ſame time ſpread all over the kingdom, that the diſbanded Iriſh, who ſerved in Feverſham's army, were every where employed in burning towns; and that nothing leſs than a general maſſacre of the proteſtants was expected. The people were confounded; they were ſeized with an univerſal terror; the capital was illuminated, that the enemy might not ſurprize it during the darkneſs of the night; and every perſon was in arms to defend his own houſe againſt the attempts of a cruel enemy. Next day, however, put an end to the confuſion: it was known that the report was totally deſtitute of foundation, and the people ſoon recovered from their ſurprize.

On the fourteenth of December, the prince of Orange arrived at Windſor, in order to ſettle the affairs of government; it being ſuppoſed that the king had abſolutely reſigned the reins of government, and retired to France. But in the midſt of their deliberations, advice arrived, that his majeſty had been diſcovered on board a ſhip at Feverſham, in Kent, where he was waiting for a wind to carry him over to the continent. Before he was known, the populace, who miſtook him for ſome papiſt of quality attempting to make his eſcape, treated him with great indignity, brought him on ſhore, and lodged him in the town. The lords immediately ſent the earls of Middleton, Ayleſbury, Yarmouth, and Feverſham, with a party of the guards, to attend his majeſty to London. Touched with the ſight of majeſty in diſtreſs, the people forgot his errors, and received him with ſhouts and acclamations of joy. On his arrival, an expreſs was diſpatched to the prince, to acquaint him with this unexpected event.

On the king's arrival at Whitehall, he again reſumed the reins of government; and an order of council was immediately publiſhed for ſuppreſſing tumults, and preventing the demolition of all kinds of ſtructures, and putting a ſtop to outrages of every kind. The next day the earl of Feverſham was ſent by his majeſty to the prince, inviting him to take up his reſidence in St. James's palace, attended with any number of guards he thought proper, in order to open the conferences for ſettling the government of the kingdom, and redreſſing the grievances complained of by the people. But the prince, inſtead of returning any anſwer to this meſſage, retained the earl of Feverſham priſoner. The Dutch guards were detached to take poſſeſſion of Whitehall; and the lords Hallifax, Shrewſbury, and Delamere, were ſent about midnight by the prince, requeſting the king to remove early the next morning to Ham, a ſeat belonging to the dutcheſs of Lauderdale.

James had now loſt all remains of ſpirit and reſolution. He patiently ſubmitted to this ignominious treatment, and only deſired that he might remove to Rocheſter, inſtead of Ham. His requeſt was very readily granted; but he continued only a few days in that city; embarking privately, on the twenty-fourth of December, on board a ſhip in the river; and, after a ſhort paſſage, was landed ſafely at Ambleteuſe, in Picardy. He was received by Lewis with more than royal magnificence, and every method made uſe of to ſoothe his care.

James left a paper behind him, containing his reaſons for withdrawing a ſecond time. "The world "(ſaid he) cannot wonder at my conduct, after the "prince of Orange had confined the earl of Feverſham, who was ſent to treat with him in a friendly "manner; and commanding his own guards to take "poſſeſſion of Whitehall at eleven at night, without "giving the leaſt intimation of his deſign; and even "ſending me an order at midnight to be gone. After "this, I had little to hope from one who had invaded "my kingdom, and called the legitimacy of my ſon "in queſtion. I appeal to all who know me, even "to the prince himſelf, whether they could believe "me guilty of ſo unnatural a villany? I was born "free; I deſire to remain ſo; and have, for that reaſon, withdrawn myſelf again, but ſo as to be within "call whenever the eyes of the nation ſhall be open "to ſee how they have been abuſed and impoſed "upon by the ſpecious pretences of religion and "property."

This may be conſidered as the laſt act of James in England; and that a final period was now put to his reign, which might have been as happy as that of any of his predeceſſors, had not his miſtaken notions of prerogative, his exceſſive bigotry to the religion of Rome, and an inflexible ſeverity of temper, hurried him into meaſures which rendered his government intolerable to a free and generous people, who could no longer ſubmit to a prince whom they ſaw altogether guided by the violent counſels of a popiſh, jeſuitical faction, and blindly adopting their ſlaviſh ſuperſtition.

James having thus deſerted his kingdom, it became neceſſary to appoint ſome perſon to hold the reins of government, and prevent that anarchy and confuſion that muſt enſue when there is no viſible authority to carry the laws into execution. The prince of Orange, too politic to ſeize the crown, too much a friend to freedom to expoſe himſelf to the reproach of tyranny; at the ſame time, depending on the favour of the people, who looked upon him as their deliverer, left the ſettlement of the government entirely to the laws. A parliament, under the name of a Convention, was ſummoned; and the commons ſoon reſolved, that James II. having attempted to overturn the conſtitution of the kingdom, by breaking the original contract between the king and people; having violated the fundamental laws, by the advice of Jeſuits, and other pernicious perſons, had abdicated the government and vacated the throne. But this reſolution met with great oppoſition in the upper houſe, where the Tories, though they had greatly relaxed their tenets with regard to the royal prerogative, diſplayed all their abilities. It was firſt debated, whether any national contract ever actually exiſted between the king and people, and the queſtion was carried in the affirmative by a majority of ſeven voices. The next queſtion was, Whether James had broken this contract, and this was alſo carried in the affirmative. The laſt queſtion was, Whether James had vacated the throne, and this paſſed in the negative. So unexpected a deciſion produced a memorable conference between the two houſes; the reſult of which was, that king James had abdicated the government, and the throne was thereby become vacant.

A. D. 1689. During theſe debates, the fugitive king continued in France, where both he and his family were royally entertained by Lewis XIV. But the behaviour of James rendered him contemptible in the eyes of all Europe. His ſole companions were the Jeſuits: he viſited them at their colleges, told them he was one of their fraternity, and, as ſuch, requeſted their prayers. This weakneſs of mind in a prince, together with the puſillanimous manner in which he had loſt his crown, rendered him ſo deſpicable, that the French courtiers diverted themſelves with turning him into ridicule. Nor did his great regard for the catholic religion, and his having ſacrificed his crown in endeavouring to eſtabliſh it in England, gain him the leaſt eſteem. The archbiſhop of Rheims, brother to Louvois, the prime miniſter, ſaid openly in James's anti-chamber, "Is not this a pious man to give up three kingdoms for a maſs?"

Lewis, however, more generous than his courtiers, endeavoured to ſupport him in this ſcene of diſtreſs. His liberality had hardly any bounds, and he made great preparations for re-eſtabliſhing him on the throne he had ſo meanly deſerted. Rouſed from his lethargy by this generous and ſpirited conduct of his old friend and ally, James endeavoured to prevent the conſequences of his imprudent retreat, and, if poſſible, recall his ſubjects to a ſenſe of their duty. He accordingly wrote two letters to the houſe of convention, nearly of the ſame import with that he had left behind him at Rocheſter, only adding a promiſe on the word of a king, that he would, on his return to England, ſummon a free parliament, and ſettle the government according to their deciſions: requiring, in the mean time, their advice with regard to the manner of his returning to his kingdom. He concluded with aſſuring them that he would paſs an act of oblivion to all his ſubjects who had forfeited their allegiance, ſome few only excepted. Theſe letters, though preſented to both houſes of convention were ſent back unopened.

The offers of James being diſregarded, the next queſtion was, who ſhould fill the vacant throne. Some were for a regent, others for a king. To change the right of ſucceſſion appeared, to the former, a breach of the fundamental laws of the kingdom; to appoint a regent who ſhould govern with a precarious authority, was, in the opinion of the latter, nothing leſs than opening a door to confuſion and diſcord. While this queſtion was depending, the prince of Orange ſummoned ſeveral of the peers, and told them, "that he meant not to interfere in the deliberations of the convention; and that it reſted entirely with that body to fix upon the moſt advantageous ſyſtem of government; but he thought himſelf bound to inform them, that if they fixed upon a regency he would not accept of a title of which he ſaw the inconveniences; that if they gave the crown to the princeſs, his ſpouſe, with whoſe merit he was well acquainted, he ſhould, for his own part, prefer a private condition to that of a crown, which would depend upon the life of another; that, on either of theſe ſuppoſitions, it would be impoſſible for him to ſecond their reſolutions; and that a precarious dignity could not induce him to abandon thoſe important objects which would ſoon call him back to the continent."

The princeſs Mary, devoted to her huſband, entered into his views, as well as the princeſs Anne her ſiſter. The former declared, "that being the prince's wife ſhe would never accept of any honour, but in conjunction with her huſband; and ſhould take it very unkindly in any one, who ſhould endeavour to ſeperate their intereſts."

Theſe reſolutions put an end to all debates in the convention, and the two houſes agreed that the prince and princeſs of Orange ſhould reign jointly as king and queen of England; but that the adminiſtration ſhould be veſted in the prince alone; and that the princeſs Anne ſhould ſucceed after their death. This reſolution was not, however, carried without a very conſiderable oppoſition. Echard ſays the majority was only twenty; the numbers being ſixty-five againſt forty-five.

The princeſs of Orange, to whom an expreſs had been ſent on that occaſion, arrived in London from Holland on the twelfth of February; and the next day, the prince and princeſs being ſeated in two large chairs in the banqueting-houſe at Whitehall, both houſes of convention waited upon them in a body, when the clerk of the crown read, in the names of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the commons aſſembled at Weſtminſter, the following "declaration of their rights," which they ſaid had been violated by king James.

"1. That the pretended power of diſpenſing laws, " or the execution of laws by regal authority, with" out conſent of parliament, is illegal.

"2. That the pretended power of diſpenſing with " laws, or the execution of laws, by legal authority, " as it hath been aſſumed and exerciſed of late, is " illegal.

"3. That the commiſſion for erecting the court " of commiſſioners for eccleſiaſtical cauſes, and all " other commiſſions and courts of like natures, are " illegal and pernicious.

"4. That the levying of money for the uſe of the " crown, by pretence of prerogative, without grant " of parliament for longer time, or in any other man" ner than the ſame is, or ſhall be granted, is ille" gal.

"5. That it is the right of the ſubjects to petition " the king, and all commitments and proſecutions " for ſuch petitioning is illegal.

"6. That the raiſing or keeping a ſtanding army " within the kingdom in time of peace, unleſs it be " with the conſent of the parliament, is againſt " law.

"7. That the ſubjects being proteſtants may have " arms for their defence, ſuitable to their condition, " and as allowed by law.

"8. That elections of members of parliament " ought to be free.

"9. That the freedom of ſpeech, or debates and " proceedings in parliament ought not to be impeach" ed or queſtioned in any court or place, out of par" liament.

"10. That exceſſive bail ought not to be required, " nor exceſſive fines impoſed, nor cruel nor unuſual " puniſhments inflicted.

"11. That jurors ought to be duly impaneled and " returned; and jurors which paſs verdicts on men " for high-treaſon, ought to be freeholders.

"12. That all grants and promiſes of fines and " forfeitures of particular perſons before conviction " are illegal and void.

"13. And that, for redreſs of all grievances, and " for the amending, ſtrengthening, and preſerving " of the laws, parliaments ought to be held fre" quently."

"And they do claim, demand, and inſiſt upon, all " and ſingular the premiſes as their undoubted rights " and liberties; and no declarations, judgments, " doings, or proceedings, to the prejudice of the " people, in any of the ſaid premiſes, ought in any" wiſe to be drawn hereafter into conſequence or ex" ample."

Such were the rights and liberties demanded by the convention, and the declaration in which they were contained, concluded in the following manner.

"Having therefore an entire confidence that his " highneſs the prince of Orange will perfect the de" liverance ſo far advanced by him, and will ſtill " preſerve them from the violation of their rights " which they have here aſſerted, and from all other " attempts upon their religion, rights, and liberties, " the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons aſ" ſembled at Weſtminſter, do reſolve, That William " and Mary prince and princeſs of Orange, be, and " be declared, king and queen of England, France " and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belong" ing, to hold the crown and royal dignity of the " ſaid kingdoms and dominions to them the ſaid " prince and princeſs during their lives and the life " of the ſurvivor of them, and that the ſole and full " exerciſe of the royal power be only in, and execu" ted by, the ſaid prince of Orange, in the names " of the ſaid prince and princeſs, during their joint " lives; and after their deceaſe the ſaid crown and " royal dignity of the ſaid kingdom and dominions

“ to belong to the heirs of the body of the ſaid princeſs; and, in default of ſuch iſſue, to the princeſs Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and in default of ſuch iſſue to the heirs of the ſaid prince of Orange.”

As ſoon as the reading of this declaration was finiſhed, the marquis of Hallifax, as ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, made a ſolemn tender of the crown to their highneſſes, in the name of the peers and commons of England. The offer was accepted in the politeſt and moſt obliging manner by ther highneſſes; and they were the ſame day proclaimed by the name of William and Mary, king and queen of England.

Inſtead of the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, ſuppreſſed by the declaration, new oaths in the following forms were ſubſtituted. “ I ſincerely promiſe and ſwear that I will be faithful to their majeſties king William and queen Mary. So help me God.

“ I ſwear that from the bottom of my heart I abhor, as impious and heretical, that damnable doctrine and poſition, that princes excommunicated, or deprived by the pope, or any authority of the ſee of Rome, may be depoſed or murdered by their ſubjects, or any other perſon whatever; and I declare that no prince, no perſon, no prelate, ſtate or potentate hath, or ought to have, any juriſdiction, power, ſuperiority, pre-eminence, authority, eccleſiaſtical or ſpiritual, within this realm. So help me God.”

Before we leave this remarkable period, it will be neceſſary to review the ſtate of the Engliſh military and commercial eſtabliſhments, and the improvements made in the arts and ſciences ſince the reſtoration of monarchy.

The militia of England during the reign of the two laſt princes, had been greatly neglected; a ſtanding army being thought better adapted to promote the ſafety of the nation, when the princes on the continent kept ſuch large bodies of troops in pay: But the navy was greatly improved. In 1660, when Charles was reſtored to the throne of his anceſtors, he found the navy reduced to the low condition of ſixty-three ſhips. In 1678, it conſiſted of eighty-three. At the revolution the number of ſhips amounted to one hundred and ſeventy-three; and forty thouſand ſailors were neceſſary for manning the the whole. James, when duke of York, invented the ſignals ſtill uſed at ſea.

During this period, which conſiſted of no more than twenty-eight years, the number of merchant ſhips were more than double what they were at the death of Cromwell; an evident proof of the increaſe of the Engliſh trade. The art of navigation was very favourable to commerce, and produced the intended effect in every quarter of the globe. The colonies in America were conſiderably improved, and the produce of the new world added luſtre to the old.

In the firſt year of the reign of Charles II. Sir Thomas Modyford, an eminent planter in the iſland of Barbadoes, having acquired a prodigious fortune, removed to Jamaica, where he inſtructed the young Engliſh planters in the cultivation of the ſugar cane, for which eminent ſervice, and others of a ſimilar nature, he was appointed governor of the iſland. And in the ſame year an act paſſed in favour of the Flemings eſtabliſhed at Colcheſter, who firſt brought into England the manufacture of baize.

In the year 1661, Charles II. granted a new excluſive charter to the Eaſt India company, by the old name of the governor and company of merchants trading to the Eaſt Indies.

About the ſame time, the worſted manufacture eſtabliſhed at Norwich, and other places in Norfolk, was prodigiouſly increaſed, and the ſilk manufacture in London was arrived to that height, that it found employment for above forty thouſand men, women, and children.

In 1668 Charles II. granted the town, port, and iſland of Bombay in the Eaſt Indies, in full property for ever to the Eaſt India company, to hold it in free common ſoccage of the imperial crown of England, under an annual rent of ten pounds, to be paid yearly on the thirtieth of September at the cuſtom-houſe in London.

The general balance of trade in the year 1668, was greatly againſt the Engliſh, the exports being leſs than the imports by no leſs a ſum than two millions, one hundred thirty-two thouſand eight hundred and ſixty-four pounds, eighteen ſhillings. This amazing loſs was chiefly owing to our having an unlimited intercourſe with France; a trade which was afterwards prohibited.

In the year 1670, the wear of muſlins was firſt introduced from India; before that time cambrics, Sileſia lawns, and other linens from France and Germany, ſupplied its place. Theſe linens were received in return for our woollen manufactures of different ſpecies, which were at this time exported thither in very large quantities. The ſame year the Hudſon's bay company was eſtabliſhed.

About the year 1676, the printing of callicoes was firſt eſtabliſhed in London: and about the ſame time the weaver's loom engine was introduced from Holland. The ſame year one hundred and two ſhips were employed in the cod fiſhery at Newfoundland; and the total value of the fiſh and oil was computed at three hundred, eighty-ſix thouſand four hundred pounds.

In the year 1680 the colony of Penſylvania in North America was eſtabliſhed by William Penn, an eminent quaker. He propoſed to make it a retreat for the people of his own perſuaſion, who met with great diſturbance here on account of their religious tenets. Numbers went over with him, and were ſoon joined by many more from various parts of England and Ireland. At his firſt arrival in that country he found many Engliſh families, and a conſiderable number of Dutch and Swedes. Theſe all readily ſubmitted to his wiſe and excellent regulations, which, together with his gentle and generous behaviour, ſoon endeared him to the planters, and extended his fame to ſuch remote places, that vaſt numbers of people flocked from all parts of Europe to people his new colony of Penſylvania. It is now one of the moſt flouriſhing countries in America.

The Turkey company was at this time in a very flouriſhing condition; they exported great quantities of our woollen manufactures, and other Engliſh commodities, to the great advantage of this country. Their exports about the year 1681, amounted to near half a million ſterling; in return for which they brought home raw ſilks, grogram, yarns, galls and other drugs, cotton, &c. The greater part of which being manufactured here, afforded bread to great numbers of poor families.

The year 1685 was famous for the revocation of the edict of Nantes by Lewis XIV. This revolution, though infinitely diſtreſsful to many thouſands of individuals in France, proved of the utmoſt advantage to all the proteſtant countries in Europe, eſpecially to England; where many thouſands of thoſe unhappy French manufacturers, particularly in the ſilk branch, ſettled in Spitalfields; while a vaſt number of other artiſts helped to fill the ſuburbs of Soho and St. Giles's. It was computed that near ſixty thouſand of theſe refugee families retired hither, to the great improvement of our arts and manufactures, and the introduction of new ones. And if we ſuppoſe that theſe fifty thouſand families brought one with another ſixty pounds in money and effects, they muſt have added near three millions ſterling to the riches of the nation.

The ſciences made great improvement during this period. In 1660 Charles II. eſtabliſhed, by letters patent, the Royal Society of London, ſo famous for its tranſactions and the learning of its members. But this patent was all Charles contributed to the advancement of the ſciences. They indeed ſtruck deep root, and attracted the admiration of all Europe; but but it was not owing to the bounty of the king, or the encouragement of the great and the wealthy. Among the philoſophers that flouriſhed in this period we can boaſt, among a great variety of others, of a Boyle, a Locke, and a Newton.

Boyle, who was born the ſame year the great chancellor Bacon died, ſeems to have inherited the penetrating genius of that illuſtrious philoſopher. We are at a loſs which to admire moſt his extenſive knowledge or his exalted piety. Theſe excellencies kept pace with each other: but the former never rendered him vain, or the latter enthuſiaſtical. He was himſelf the chriſtian virtuoſo he ſo well deſcribed. He particularly applied himſelf to chemiſtry; and made ſuch diſcoveries in that branch of ſcience as would hardly be credited by a leſs authority than his own. He greatly improved the air-pump, invented by Otto Guericke, by which he was enabled to make a great variety of new and various experiments on the air and other bodies. Hence he was enabled to write a treatiſe on the weight and ſpring of the air; a work which acquired him the great reputation he ſo well deſerved. He was a ſtrenuous ſupporter of the mechanical philoſophy, recommended by the great Bacon, and carried to ſuch an amazing degree of perfection by himſelf and his illuſtrious aſſociates.

In Sir Iſaac Newton this iſland may boaſt of having produced the greateſt and moſt penetrating genius the world ever ſaw. This prodigious man was ſatisfied it was time to baniſh from natural philoſophy all vague hypotheſes and conjectures; or, at leaſt, to lay no ſtreſs upon them, and that this ſcience ſhould be entirely ſubjected to experiment and geometry. It was perhaps with this view that he began by inventing the doctrine of fluxions and infinite ſeries, whoſe uſe in geometry is very evtenſive; but of ſtill greater advantage in determining the complicated effects obſerved in nature, where every thing ſeems to be performed by ſpecies of infinite progreſſions. He diſcovered the force that retains the planets in their orbits; he ſhewed us at once how to diſtinguiſh the cauſes of their motions, and to calculate them with an exactneſs that could hardly have been expected from the joint labour of ages. His immortal Principia appeared during the ſhort reign of James II. a work that at once aſtoniſhed the world, and occaſioned the greateſt revolution in the ſcience of philoſopy ever known before. It affords an illuſtrious proof of the vaſt power of the human mind: it being the higheſt inſtance that ever was, and, probably, ever will be given, of the exertion of that faculty. He formed a ſyſtem of optics entirely new, and ſhewed mankind the nature of the rays of light by decompounding them. He merits our higheſt acknowledgements for the infinite number of diſcoveries with which he has enriched philoſophy, and for his caution in keeping that ſcience within proper bounds: the firſt cauſes of the phænomena of nature always were, and ever will be a ſecret to mankind.

Locke attempted the metaphyſical parts of ſcience, which Newton neglected, or at leaſt never publiſhed his thoughts on that ſubject. Metaphyſics may be ſaid to have been invented by Locke, as philoſophy was by Newton. He rightly judged that the abſtractions and ridiculous queſtions which had till then been debated, and falſely ſuppoſed the ſubſtance of philoſophy, ought entirely to be rejected. Accordingly on examination he found, that theſe abſtractions, and the abuſe of words were the primary ſource of all our errors. In order to diſcover the nature of the ſoul, its ideas and affections, he declined the ſtudy of books, as they would only have been productive of errors; he entered deep into himſelf, and after contemplating and ſurveying what he experienced, publiſhed, in the reign of James II. his “ Eſſay on Human Underſtanding,” which he preſented to mankind as a mirror in which they might view themſelves. He reduced the ſcience to what it really is, The experimental philoſophy of the ſoul.

Polite literature did not make the ſame progreſs in England during this period, though the nation abounded with men of great genius and abilities. Their productions fell far ſhort of that correctneſs and delicacy we ſo much admire in the ancients. Moſt of the writers of this age remain monuments of genius perverted by indecency and bad taſte: the immeaſurable licentiouſneſs indulged in the court of Charles II. was more deſtructive of polite learning, than the fanatical enthuſiaſm that prevailed during the commonwealth.

Dryden was the great reformer of Engliſh verſification, and a ſtriking inſtance how far a great genius can be perverted by the bad taſte and licentiouſneſs of the age. The unhappy effects of his penury and dependence tended greatly to enervate his performances. He was not at liberty to purſue his own inclination, but frequently obliged to proſtitute his pen to ſuch perſons and things, as a man of his genius and talents muſt have deſpiſed. He failed in moſt of his dramatic writings; the prefaces, prologues and epilogues, are generally more valuable than the pieces to which they are affixed. There was a native fire in this poet which poverty could not damp, nor old age itſelf extinguiſh. He was ſtill improving as a writer, while he was declining as a man; and was far advanced in years when he wrote his “ Alexander's Feaſt,” which ſtands confeſſedly at the head of lyric poems, and is written in the true ſpirit of the ancients. His Abſolem on Achitophel contributed to the triumph of the Tories over the Whigs towards the end of Charles's reign, and is one of the beſt performances of this celebrated writer.

Few poets ever touched the paſſions with a more maſterly hand than Otway. He was acquainted with all the avenues to the human heart, and at once knew and felt all its emotions. He could rouſe us into rage, or melt us into tenderneſs. His language is the language of nature, and therefore the ſimpleſt imaginable. Hence his tragedies were received with ſilent tears rather than loud burſts of applauſe.

Butler ſtands unrivalled in burleſque poetry. His Hudibras is a remarkable inſtance of the force of human genius. It abounds with uncommon learning, new rhymes, and original thoughts. Its images are truly and naturally ridiculous: we are never ſhocked with exceſſive diſtortions and grimace; nor is human nature degraded into monkeys. It abounds with ſtrokes of temporary ſatire; there are alſo ſome characters and alluſions which cannot be diſcovered at this diſtance of time.

But notwithſtanding all the merit of Dryden, Otway, and Butler, the court ſuffered them to live in poverty, and die in diſtreſs. Charles with more wit and knowledge, perhaps, than Lewis XIV. knew not ſo well how to immortalize himſelf by rewarding genius. This is more ſurprizing in Butler than in any other, as the royal cauſe derived very ſingular advantages from his poem, which diſplayed the fanaticiſm and falſe pretences of the parliamentary party, in the moſt ridiculous point of light.

Wicherly was a careleſs and negligent writer. His comedies are conformable to his perſonal character, which conſiſted of a large ſhare of wit, more libertiniſm, and very little virtue. Theſe acquiſitions were indeed conſidered in the reign of Charles II. as the firſt qualifications of a fine gentleman, and the ſtrongeſt recommendations to the favour of the court. His “ Plain Dealer,” and his “ Country Wife,” are eſteemed the beſt of his productions. The character of the widow Blackacre in the former, is truly original, and the maſter-piece of Wicherly.

The duke of Buckingham, the earls of Mulgrave, Dorſet, and Roſcommon, wrote in a good taſte; but their pieces are either feeble or careleſs. They, however, tended greatly to reform the licentious manner of writing ſo generally practiſed in this age of pleaſure and diſſipation.

But among all the writers of this period, Sir William Temple was, perhaps, the only one, who kept himſelf unpolluted by that inundation of vice and licentiouſneſs which overwhelmed the nation. He was truly an honour to his country. To the gift of genius and the acquiſition of philoſophy, he added what was then ſo uncommon, the merit of reſpecting morality, and the laws. He was as much above the common level of politicians, as he was above the common herd of authors.

Among a great number of phyſicians that flouriſhed in this reign, Dr. Thomas Sydenham is juſtly placed at the head of that profeſſion. He was a perſon of great penetration and experience, and added conſiderable improvements to the healing art. He dared to deviate from the common practice, where nature and reaſon pointed out a better method; and was the firſt that introduced a cool regimen in the ſmall pox; a diſcovery which has been ſince followed with amazing ſucceſs. His works are ſtill in the higheſt eſteem with the faculty.

Beſides Sydenham, Willis, Sir George Ent, Gliſſon, Plunket, and Sir William Petty made ſeveral uſeful diſcoveries in phyſic, anatomy and botany.

Such was the ſtate of commerce and learning at this remarkable period of hiſtory, when the liberties of Engliſhmen, which had been ſo often invaded by former princes, were eſtabliſhed on a ſolid foundation.

From the Revolution to the Acceſſion of George I.

WILLIAM III. and MARY II. King and Queen of England.

A. D. 1689. IT was highly conſiſtent with the genius and ſpirit of the Engliſh to place the friend of liberty on the throne; eſpecially as they did not ſtrip the crown of any of its juſt prerogatives, when they preſented it to the prince of Orange. The power of ſummoning, proroguing, and diſſolving parliaments, of chuſing members of the privy council, and of making war and peace, was ſtill inveſted in the king. William on his part was extremely deſirous of giving no offence to the Engliſh in his exerciſe of the royal authority. His council was compoſed of perſons who had always been the friends of liberty, and could therefore give no offence to thoſe who were true lovers of their country.

There was, however, a party in the nation who beheld the exaltation of the prince of Orange in a very different light, and could by no means be prevailed upon to approve of the revolution. The papiſts made indeed the bulk, but not the whole of this party. The former had very ſufficient reaſons to diſapprove of the new ſettlement; but they were joined by a conſiderable number of proteſtants, who, either from the ſtrong impreſſions they had received from the late doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, could not think it lawful to reſiſt James, or from their being perſuaded that the hereditary right of the crown was indefeaſible, joined the catholics. The laſt abſolutely refuſed to take the oaths to the preſent government, and were thence ſtiled nonjurors. Theſe parties diſturbed the operations of the miniſtry during this whole reign, and prevented the people from reaping all the advantages they might otherwiſe have obtained from the revolution.

Before any of the principal acts of government could be performed, it was neceſſary to aſſemble a parliament, or give that title to the convention. The latter was choſen as the eaſieſt and moſt expeditious method. Accordingly William, on the twenty-third of February, gave the royal aſſent to a bill, to "remove and prevent all queſtions and diſputes concerning the aſſembling and ſetting of this preſent parliament." By this act the convention, which had ſettled the crown on the prince and princeſs of Orange, was changed into a parliament. This bill being paſſed, the king repaired to the houſe of lords, and delivered a ſpeech from the throne, wherein he thanked them for the great confidence they had repoſed in him by intruſting him with the Engliſh ſceptre, and aſſured them it ſhould be his ſtudy to preſerve the good opinion they had conceived of his integrity. He laid before them the critical ſituation of affairs in Europe, particularly in theſe kingdoms, and concluded with an earneſt requeſt, that they would concur in the moſt effectual meaſures to preſerve the domeſtic peace, and promote the happineſs of the nation. He ſoon after ſent a meſſage to the houſe, aſſuring them that he had received certain advice, that James had ſailed with an armament from Breſt to invade Ireland. Deſirous of convincing the world that they would ſupport his majeſty, both houſes came to a reſolution to aſſiſt him with their lives and fortunes: they voted a temporary aid of four hundred and twenty thouſand pounds, to be levied by monthly aſſeſſments. Both houſes waited on his majeſty to inform him of this reſolution.

This complaiſance in the parliament was, however, far from being unanimous; ſeveral of the peers both ſpiritual and temporal, refuſed to take the oaths to the preſent government, and did not therefore attend their duty in parliament. Among the former were Sancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury; Turner, biſhop of Ely; Ken, of Bath and Wells; White, of Peterborough; Lake, of Chicheſter; Lloyd, of Norwich; Thomas, of Worceſter; and Frampton, of Glouceſter: the four firſt had been impriſoned in the Tower by James, for refuſing to publiſh his declaration for liberty of conſcience. The temporal peers who refuſed the oaths, were the duke of Newcaſtle; the earls of Clarendon, Litchfield, Exeter, Yarmouth and Stafford; with the lords Griffin and Stowel.

William's friends were not deſerted like thoſe of Charles the ſecond; they were rewarded for their fidelity. Among the reſt Dr. Gilbert Burnet, who had for ſome time reſided in Holland, and came over with the prince as his chaplain, was promoted to the ſee of Saliſbury. The king, at once an enemy to perſecution, and a friend to Calviniſm, was very deſirous of procuring the proteſtant diſſenters a ſhare in the government; but he could not prevail upon the parliament to aboliſh the ſacramental teſt in favour of the preſbyterians. They, however, paſſed a bill under the title of "An act for exempting his majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects diſſenting from the church of England, from the penalties of certain laws." This law is ſtill in force, and generally called the Act of Toleration. About the ſame time William acquired great popularity by recommending to the parliament the abolition of hearth-money, a tax which which was conſidered as a heavy burden on the poor. Pleaſed with the attention paid to their intereſts, the people looked upon their new ſovereign as their father, and paid him the tribute of gratitude and affection.

The many ſhameful embezzlements of the public revenue before the revolution, now induced the parliament to provide a remedy for preventing ſuch flagitious practices for the future. They reſolved to allot a ſeparate fund for the maintenance of the king's houſhold, and the ſupport of his dignity; and ſubject the reſt of the public revenue to the controul of parliament. The former was diſtinguiſhed by the name of the Civil Liſt, an appellation it ſtill retains. They alſo voted, that theſe ſums ſhould be granted only from year to year, or, at moſt, for a very ſhort term. This appropriation of the public revenue was of infinite advantage to the nation, and the ſtrongeſt bulwark of the people's liberties. They were now no longer apprehenſive of ſeeing the aids they granted laviſhed away by the ſovereign in articles of profuſion, or applied to the nefarious purpoſes of ſupporting armies to wreſt from the generous donors their moſt invaluable privileges.

On the ſixteenth of December, the king gave the royal aſſent to the bill of rights, and ſucceſſion, agreeable to the declaration of rights made to the king and queen when they accepted the crown. A remarkable clauſe was added to the bill, by which all papiſts, and all perſons marrying papiſts, were excluded from the throne.

This manner of applying the public money could not be very agreeable to William, whoſe revenue was granted only for a ſhort and limited time. The ſum of two hundred thouſand pounds was granted him for the ſupport of the crown in time of peace. William conſidered this meaſure as a mark of their diffidence, by which he was diſtinguiſhed from all his predeceſſors, and thought it an ungrateful return for the great ſervices he had done the nation. The Tories, deſirous of diſtreſſing the Whigs, now made a tender of their ſervices to the king, who recommended an act of indemnity to the parliament, in order to profit by their aſſiſtance; but ſo many frivolous objections were made to it, merely to prolong the time, that it was dropped at the end of the ſeſſion. This increaſed the difference between the two parties, and gave great uneaſineſs to the government.

The authority of William was acknowledged in Scotland as well as in England, notwithſtanding all the efforts and emiſſaries of the dethroned monarch. James, who was now in Ireland, wrote to the Scottiſh convention, ſolliciting the members to maintain his lawful rights againſt the uſurper. He promiſed them immediate aſſiſtance; he offered pardon to all who would return to their duty, and threatened the ſevereſt puniſhments to thoſe who ſhould perſevere in their rebellion. But both his promiſes and threatenings produced not the deſired effect. Indeed, in his ſituation, they were vain, and almoſt ridiculous. The duke of Hamilton, preſident of the aſſembly, eaſily carried the votes againſt a prince, who was equally obnoxious on account of his religious and political principles. They voted, that James, by being a papiſt, and having exerciſed the royal authority without taking the oaths preſcribed by the law; by having attacked the fundamental conſtitution of a limited monarchy, and violated the laws and liberties of the nation, had forfeited all right to the crown, and, in conſequence of that forfeiture, the throne was now vacant. This vote was immediately paſſed into a law, under the title of "An act for ſettling the crown of Scotland upon the king and queen of England." All attempts to aſſiſt James were prohibited; William and Mary were proclaimed king and queen of Scotland; and commiſſioners ſent to London with the act which eſtabliſhed their authority.

The Scottiſh commiſſioners, after making a ſolemn tender of the crown of that kingdom to their majeſties, propoſed the form of an oath, containing, among other things, a promiſe to extirpate hereſy. William abſolutely refuſed at firſt to take this oath, proteſting he would never lay himſelf under an obligation of being a perſecutor: he was too fond of liberty himſelf, to be deſirous of deſtroying it in others. The commiſſioners aſſured him, that the intention of the oath was very different, and on that declaration he accepted the crown of Scotland.

The meeting of the ſtates of that kingdom was now, by virtue of a commiſſion from their majeſties to the duke of Hamilton, changed into a parliament. But complaints ſoon aroſe in that aſſembly againſt the king, who thought himſelf empowered to appoint the judges, and left ſome of the national grievances unredreſſed. Prelacy was, however, once more aboliſhed in Scotland, but the preſbyterian diſcipline was not eſtabliſhed, owing to ſome diſputes between the king and the parliament. The principal of theſe articles reſpected the lords. It was the cuſtom for the king's commiſſioner to nominate eight biſhops, who ſhould chuſe eight lords, and theſe eight barons and eight burgeſſes. Theſe jointly formed a committee, under the title of "Lords of Articles," having an excluſive right to propoſe a reformation of abuſes, and ſuch meaſures as they thought uſeful to the kingdom. This important privilege was claimed by the Scottiſh parliament. William, in part, refuſed their requeſt. He conſented that the ſtates ſhould chuſe the lords, and deliberate on ſuch articles as the latter ſhould reject. But this was not thought ſufficient; they wanted more extenſive privileges; while the king, fearful that they meant to reſume that liberty which had ſo often degenerated into licentiouſneſs, and unwilling to enter into conteſts with the parliament, as they might have been attended with dangerous conſequences in the inſancy of his reign, prorogued the aſſembly.

It muſt not, however, be imagined, that this revolution in Scotland was attended with no oppoſition. The duke of Gordon, ſtill faithful to the Stuart family, defended the caſtle of Edinburgh, which was now blocked up by the troops of the city. He ſtood a regular ſiege; but having neglected to furniſh the place with a ſufficient quantity of proviſions, he was forced to capitulate on terms very advantageous to the garriſon, though he generouſly declined to ſollicit any for himſelf. He was, indeed, perſuaded, that it would have been abſolutely inconſiſtent with the duty he owed his maſter, to conſult his own intereſt while he was defending the royal cauſe.

While the caſtle of Edinburgh was inveſted, the earl of Dundee, at the head of a body of Scotch highlanders, attacked the Engliſh, under the command of lieutenant-general Mackay, with the utmoſt fury, routed a large diviſion of them at the firſt onſet, and would, in all probability, have obtained a complete victory, had he not unfortunately been killed by a random ſhot. His death put an end to the conteſt. The highlanders loſt their courage with their general; and one misfortune treading on the heels of another, they laid down their arms, and accepted the amneſty offered by the Engliſh.

James ſucceeded no better in Ireland than in Scotland. His behaviour, indeed, ſoon loſt him the affections of his beſt friends. The earl of Tyrconnel, attached to him both by gratitude and a ſimilarity of religious ſentiments, exerted himſelf in the ſervice of his maſter. He had ſecured the moſt important places in the kingdom before the king abandoned the Engliſh throne. Inſtigated at once by the motives of religion, policy and prudence, he treated the unhappy proteſtants with ſo much ſeverity and rigour, that they abandoned their reſidence, and fled for protection to their brethren in the north of Ireland, where Kilmore, Coleraine, Inniſkilling, and Londonderry, declared for William.

Such was the ſtate of affairs in Ireland, when Lewis XIV. undertook to ſupport his old friend and ally in the recovery of one part at leaſt of his dominions. Perhaps there was hardly ever a more ſtriking contraſt than between theſe two princes. The one acted the part of a generous monarch, the other that of a mere devotee, always ſurrounded by Jeſuits, and neglecting his own buſineſs and ſituation, that he might attend to their eccleſiaſtical controverſies aud metaphyſical diſtinctions. Little ſucceſs could be expected from the attempts of a prince of ſo bigotted a diſpoſition. Lewis, however, furniſhed him with five thouſand forces, under the command of M. de Lauſun. Theſe troops were embarked at Breſt on board a fleet conſiſting of fourteen ſhips of the line, ſix frigates, three fire-ſhips, and a ſufficient number of tranſports. Lewis alſo furniſhed him with arms for forty thouſand men, a large ſum of money, and ſuperb equipages. At their parting, the French monarch embraced him, and ſaid, "I cannot wiſh you better than that I may never ſee you more."

James ſailed from Breſt on the ſeventh of March; and on the twenty-ſecond landed at Kingſale, in Ireland. He immediately ſet out for Cork, where he was received by the magiſtrates in their formalities. The people alſo expreſſed their zeal and their joy in the moſt extravagant manner. The earl of Tyrconnel joined him with an army of thirty thouſand foot, and eight thouſand horſe. But theſe happy beginnings ſoon terminated unfortunately. James took no care to gain the affections of his ſubjects. Inſtead of endeavouring to gain the proteſtants over to his intereſt by acts of kindneſs and popularity, he exaſperated them ſtill more by his cruelty and arrogance.

On his approaching the capital, the catholic biſhops and prieſts met him at the Caſtle-gate in ſolemn proceſſion, having the hoſt carried before them. He immediately diſmiſſed all the proteſtant members of the council, and filled their ſeats with papiſts. He publiſhed, indeed, ſeveral proclamations, promiſing protection to all his ſubjects in general who ſhould preſerve their conſtancy; but ſo little regard was paid to his promiſes, that they all reſolved to imitate the example of their friends, and ſtand in their own defence. He ſoon made himſelf maſter of Coleraine and Kilmore, and exerciſed the moſt brutal cruelty on all of that perſuaſion who fell into his hands. Terrified at theſe inhuman proceedings, and alarmed by the report of a general maſſacre intended to be perpetrated on all who adhered to the reformed religion, they fled from all parts of the country, and ſhut themſelves up in Londonderry, fully determined to ſuffer all the horrors of famine, rather than ſubmit to ſo brutal an enemy. An expreſs was diſpatched to England, imploring immediate aſſiſtance. Some arms and ammunition were directly ſent them; and about the middle of April, two regiments, under the command of the colonels Richards and Cunningham, arrived in Loughfoyle.

By this time James's army had reached the neighbourhood of Londonderry; and advice of the enemy's approach was ſent to Lundy, the governor, by Mr. Walker, a proteſtant clergyman of Donaghmore, who had raiſed a regiment for the defence of himſelf and his brethren. Lundy immediately ſummoned a council of war, at which both Richards and Cunningham aſſiſted. Whether the members were affected with cowardice or treachery, is uncertain; but they came to a reſolution, that the town was untenable, and that it would therefore be imprudent to land the regiments. Walker was of a very different opinion, and uſed every argument in his power to prevail upon the governor to take the field immediately, and bring on a general engagement with the enemy; promiſing that the proteſtant inhabitants would do their duty, and fall nobly in the conteſt, rather than ſubmit to an enemy whoſe very religion rendered them inhumanly cruel. But all his endeavours were in vain: the puſillanimous ſoul of the governor was not to be rouzed to action by perſuaſions and arguments. He concealed himſelf in his chamber, and Richards and Cunningham eſcaped on board their ſhips.

Exaſperated at this cowardly behaviour of thoſe who ought to have exerted themſelves in inſpiring the inhabitants with courage, Walker, and major Baker, the deputy governor, reſolved to defend their religion and liberties to the laſt extremity, and bury themſelves under the ruins of the town, rather than ſubmit to the enemy. They immediately formed the inhabitants, amounting to ſeven thouſand men, into different regiments; taught them the manner of uſing their arms, the firing of cannon, and other particulars neceſſary to be known at this alarming criſis. Their religious ſentiments inſpired them with a noble contempt of death, and they determined to conquer or periſh.

While Walker and his worthy aſſociate were employed in diſciplining their little army, Rozon, the French general, approached the walls, and began to play upon the town from ſeveral batteries. But the inhabitants, though the fortifications were in a very poor condition, and defended only by twenty pieces of artillery, bravely repelled all the attacks of the enemy. James was with the army at the opening of the trenches, but ſoon after returned to Dublin to open the ſeſſion of parliament. Exaſperated at the noble defence made by the inhabitants, Rozon, a perſon of more than ſavage brutality, cauſed four thouſand proteſtants to be ſtripped naked, and in that condition driven cloſe to the walls of the town, as ſo many victims deſtined to deſtruction, which the ſurrender of the place alone could preſerve. But this infernal contrivance produced not the deſired effect. Walker cauſed gibbets to be erected on the walls, and informed the French general, that unleſs he ſuffered theſe wretched people to retire, he would immediately hang up every catholic in the town, together with all the priſoners they had taken in their ſallies. Convinced, by the noble defence the inhabitants had already made, that the threat would be immediately carried into execution, Rozon ordered the unhappy proteſtants to be releaſed; but the brutal cruelties they had already ſuffered, rendered his mercy now of little effect; the greater part of them fell victims to hunger and diſtreſs.

The diſtreſs of famine, which now raged with uncommon violence, increaſed the horrors of the ſiege. The poor inhabitants eat their dogs, cats, mice, and leather; and even theſe wretched reſources at laſt began to fail; and they were on the point of coming to the dreadful reſolution of feeding upon their priſoners, when major-general Kirk, who had rendered himſelf ſo infamous for his cruelties after Monmouth's rebellion, arrived in the Lough with a reinforcement of nine thouſand men. He had received orders to relieve the town at all events; and accordingly ſent three ſhips, laden with proviſions, up the river, under the protection of the Dartmouth frigate. The enemy well knew that it would be impoſſible to conquer the town by famine, unleſs all communication with the ſea, by means of the river, was cut off. They had accordingly erected ſeveral ſtrong batteries on both ſides of the ſtream, and drawn a ſtrong boom acroſs the channel. Theſe precautions were thought ſufficient to render every attempt made by ſea, for the relief of the place, abortive. But here the enemy were miſtaken. One of the ſhips, taking the advantage of the tide and a ſtrong gale of wind, advanced through the fire of the batteries, with full ſail, againſt the boom. The ſhock was too violent to be reſiſted; the boom gave way, and the ſhips reached the town in ſafety, amidſt the joyful acclamations of the inhabitants.

Rozon now perceived that any farther attempts to reduce the place would be in vain. He raiſed the ſiege, and retired from before the town, where he had loſt nine thouſand men. Kirk entered the place with his reinforcement; and Walker, at the joint requeſt of the garriſon and inhabitants, paſſed over into England, where the king and queen received him with all the honour he ſo juſtly deſerved for his diſtinguiſhed valour.

Misfortunes had no effect to alter the conduct of James. Still inclined to deſpotiſm, ſtill immoderate in his zeal, he behaved in Ireland as if he had been ſtudious to render both his government and perſon odious to the Engliſh. He again publiſhed a declaration, inſiſting on his impartiality with regard to the proteſtants, on the preference he gave them, on the care he took to protect them, and to maintain a perfect liberty of conſcience; but his conduct belied his promiſes. The Iriſh parliament, conſiſting chiefly of catholics, annulled the act by which the proteſtants were maintained in the poſſeſſion of thoſe eſtates which had been taken from the catholics. The conſequence was, that they were ſtripped of all their poſſeſſions with the utmoſt ſeverity; and, to complete their ruin, a bill of attainder was preferred againſt thoſe who abſented themſelves from the kingdom, or held any correſpondence with James's enemies. About three thouſand were included in this proſcription. The proteſtant clergy loſt their juriſdiction and privileges, and were driven from many of their churches. Theſe meaſures would have been dangerous even in time of peace; in thoſe troubles they were infinitely more ſo. James directed every thing, without foreſeeing the conſequences of his indiſcretion. He was hurried headlong by the current of blind zeal. He was, however, deſirous of reſtoring the churches to the proteſtants; but the papiſts refuſed to obey; they diſavowed his authority whenever they diſapproved his orders. He had been reduced to the neceſſity of coining copper money, and to give it a nominal value far ſuperior to what it was intrinſically worth, in order to pay his troops. This, together with exorbitant taxes and ruinous expedients, were the reſources of his prepoſterous government. Whether James acted from himſelf, or from the advice of others, he ought to have foreſeen, that this abuſe of a tottering authority would by no means contribute to render it more permanent.

Deſirous of terminating, as ſoon as poſſible, the troubles in Ireland, king William ſent admiral Herbert with twelve ſhips of the line, one fire-ſhip, and four tenders, to intercept a ſquadron of French ſhips then fitting out for the aſſiſtance of James, under the command of Chateau Renaud. Soon after the Engliſh admiral arrived on the Iriſh coaſt, he diſcovered, on the firſt of May, the French fleet, conſiſting of twenty-eight ſhips of the line, moſt of them from ſixty to ſeventy guns, and five fire-ſhips, lying at anchor in Bantry-bay. The French admiral no ſooner ſaw the Engliſh, than he got under ſail, and ſtood out of the bay, to bring on an engagement, encouraged by having at once a ſuperior fleet, and the advantage of the wind. Herbert did every thing in his power to gain the weather-gage of the enemy; but finding his attempts were in vain, he prudently declined an engagement, which muſt have been fought under every diſadvantage. He therefore ſtood off to ſea, and maintained, for ſome time, a running fight with the enemy; but, on the approach of evening, Renaud tacked, and ſtood again into the bay.

Preparations were, in the mean time, making, for ſending an army over to Ireland; but, by ſome unaccountable neglect in thoſe to whom the management of military affairs was intruſted, James had been ſix months in Ireland before an Engliſh army was ready to embark for that kingdom. At laſt eighteen regiments of foot, five of dragoons, and a ſuitable train of artillery, being ready, the duke of Schomberg was appointed general, and the forces landed in the neighbourhood of Carrickfergus on the thirteenth of Auguſt. About ten thouſand foot and dragoons were detached to take poſſeſſion of Belfaſt, which was abandoned by the enemy at their approach. They, however, retired no farther than Carrickfergus, where they propoſed to make a ſtand againſt the Engliſh; but the latter attacked the place with ſo much intrepidity, that they were maſters of it in four days. Newry, Dundalk, and other places opened their gates at the firſt ſummons; and had not ſo many delays have been made in ſending the general the train of artillery he had left behind him in England, Schomberg would have made a much greater progreſs; but in conſequence of this ſtrange conduct he was obliged to continue inactive during the remainder of the campaign. On the approach of winter, both the Engliſh and Iriſh retired into quarters.

The ſame delays that had prevented Schomberg from purſuing his conqueſt, alſo rendered the deſigns of the naval armaments abortive. Admiral Herbert, now earl of Torrington, did not ſail again for Ireland till the ſeaſon was far advanced. His intention was to ſurprize the city of Cork, but was diverted from his purpoſe by falſe intelligence, that James with his whole army was encamped in the neighbourhood. It was therefore thought imprudent to attack the city, and the whole fleet, after a ſhort ſtay on the Iriſh coaſt, returned to England, and came to an anchor in Torbay.

The parliament meeting on the nineteenth of October, the king repaired to the houſe of peers, and in his ſpeech from the throne, explained the neceſſity of their granting an immediate ſupply for carrying on the war in Ireland; and that they would determine ſpeedily with regard to the meaſures they intended to purſue in reſpect to the grand alliance formed againſt France. After his majeſty's ſpeech had been taken into conſideration, they unanimouſly reſolved to aſſiſt him in reducing Ireland, and in joining his allies abroad, for a vigorous proſecution of the war againſt France. And to make good theſe reſolutions, they voted a ſupply of two millions, to be raiſed by a land-tax of three ſhillings in the pound, and additional duties upon coffee, tea, and chocolate.

Party diſputes between the Whigs and the Tories were now carried to the greateſt height. William was not calculated for joining in theſe conteſts; he ſaw them with regret and concern. Cold, reſerved, ſilent, generally ſhut up in his cloſet, without a taſte for any thing but the chace, moſt commonly at Hampton-court, becauſe the air of London did not agree with his conſtitution, he was by no means popular, and began to loſe the affections of the Engliſh. He ſaw his error, and policy for once prevailed over nature. He ſuddenly adopted the old popular cuſtoms, was preſent at horſe races, and ſhewed himſelf affable and complaiſant. He dined with the lord-mayor of London, accepted the title of citizen, and ſubmitted to be appointed maſter of the Grocers company, a condeſcenſion which would have been too great, had he known, at the ſame time, how to ſupport his dignity.

The church of England, which hated popery, was far from being fond of Calviniſm in the prince; and William, who was ſufficiently aware of the dangers attending religious diſputes, made another effort for uniting the church and preſbyterians. But his endeavours were ſoon rendered abortive. The lower houſe of convocation oppoſed the attempt with the utmoſt firmneſs. On this occaſion they had recourſe to the phraſe uſed by the ancient barons: "We will not have the laws of England changed." This increaſed the animoſity, already ſufficiently alarming, between the two parties. The Tories, perſuaded they ſhould gain the aſcendant by making their court to the king, made him the moſt pompous promiſes of ſupplies, provided he would paſs an act of oblivion and diſſolve the preſent parliament. The Whigs ſoon diſcovered the deſign of their antagoniſts, and in order to render their attempt abortive, they introduced a bill for reſtoring corporations to their ancient rights and privileges; to which a clauſe was added, denouncing the ſevereſt penalties againſt thoſe who had been any way concerned in delivering up the charters. The Tories oppoſed this clauſe with their utmoſt force, and it was at length rejected. The bill itſelf, however, paſſed both houſes; but the lords were ſo equally divided on this occaſion, that the majority conſiſted of a ſingle voice only. Both parties now made the ſtrongeſt applications to the king to bring him over to their reſpective intereſts. William was under the greateſt perplexity how to determine: the behaviour of the Whigs had given him ſufficient reaſon to think that they were tinctured with republican principles, and conſequently enemies to the regal power. He was therefore perſuaded, that by giving the royal aſſent to the bill, he muſt in a manner be dependent wholly on them, and therefore retain nothing more than the ſhadow of a king. On the other hand, he was no ſtranger to the attachment of the Tories to the divine indefeaſible right of kings, and therefore it would be higheſt imprudence to place in them an unlimited confidence. Theſe conſiderations, and the violent heats between the two parties ſo greatly affected him, that he was on the point of reſigning the Engliſh ſceptre, and retiring into Holland. The warmeſt of his friends interpoſed their influence, and by their perſuaſion William was prevailed upon to lay his plan aſide. Determined not to reſign the crown which had been ſo generouſly given him, he declared his intention of paſſing over into Ireland and heading his own army.

A. D. 1690. This declaration was agreeable to neither party. The friends of the revolution were fearful leaſt the fatigues of a campaign, and the bad climate of the country, excluſive of the chance of war, might have a fatal effect on the weak and tender conſtitution of the king, whoſe death, at this juncture, would probably involve the nation in all the horrors of a civil war. The Tories oppoſed it from a very different motive. They knew the military abilities of William, and therefore dreaded his taking the field againſt their old maſter. Both parties therefore for once agreed in their oppoſition, and determined to preſent an addreſs againſt his intended expedition. William, aware of their intention, came to the houſe on the ſeventeenth of January, and in a ſpeech which he made to both houſes, declared, in form, his intention of paſſing over into Ireland. He told them, that having already ventured his life to preſerve the laws and liberties of England, he was willing once more to expoſe it, in order to ſecure the enjoyment of theſe bleſſings. Having ended his ſpeech he prorogued the parliament till the twenty-ſecond of April; but on the ſixth of February it was diſſolved by proclamation, and the writs were iſſued for electing a new one to meet on the twentieth of March.

The election was ſo favourable to the Tories, that they had a conſiderable majority in the lower houſe, and the aſſembly was agitated with the moſt violent debates. Two bills in particular were violently oppoſed and as violently defended. The one for ratifying the acts of the preceding parliament; the other for requiring all perſons in office, on pain of impriſonment, to take an oath, abjuring king James. The firſt paſſed notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the moſt violent amongſt the Tories. The houſe was apprehenſive of the conſequences, if that parliament, by virtue of which the preſent government was eſtabliſhed, ſhould be declared illegal. The ſecond, which the Whigs ſupported in concert with the miniſtry, with all their power, was more obſtinately oppoſed. The king, apprehenſive that an open rupture between the two parties would be the conſequence, deſired the miniſtry to give up the point. This interpoſition of the king ſo highly diſguſted the earl of Shrewſbury, then ſecretary of ſtate, that he immediately reſigned his poſt; nor could all the remonſtrances of the king, who was no ſtranger to his great abilities, prevail upon him to keep the ſeals, till his return from Ireland. The Whigs had alſo the mortification to ſee an act of oblivion paſſed in favour of their antagoniſts.

After conſtituting the queen regent, during his abſence, William embarked for Ireland on the fourth of June, and on the fourteenth landed at Carrickfergus, attended by prince George of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, the earls of Oxford, Scarborough, and Mancheſter, and many other perſons of diſtinction. The gallant Schomberg, grown old in arms, had not fulfilled the expectations of the people. His troops had been ſickly and far inferior in number to thoſe of the enemy. He had therefore carefully avoided an engagement with the Iriſh; but this delay, though the effect of prudence, and which deſerved the higheſt applauſe, was the ſubject of complaint. So difficult is it to pleaſe a populace who have not the opportunity of judging equitably of the actions of great men!

The military affairs in Ireland put on a different aſpect on the king's arrival. His army was now ſuperior to that of the enemy, and William was at once more active and more ſucceſsful. James determined to venture the whole on the event of a battle: William was equally deſirous that one deciſive engagement ſhould put a final period to all competition for the ſovereignty of Ireland. Both therefore moved towards each other in order of battle; the river Boyne ſeparated the two armies, each of which conſiſted of near forty thouſand men.

Before the battle began, William, deſirous of reconnoitring the ſituation of the enemy, advanced to the bank of the river. His perſon was known by ſeveral of the officers in James's army, and two field pieces were brought down to the river's bank through a hidden pathway, and planted againſt his perſon. The firſt ſhot killed a man and two horſes cloſe to his ſide, and the ſecond, rebounding from the ground, grazed his right ſhoulder, and occaſioned a conſiderable contuſion. The enemy, believing he was ſlain, gave way to the moſt extravagant expreſſions of joy. The news flew like lightening to France. The partizans of James, ſtill blind and credulous in their prejudices, made public rejoicings, which certainly did honour to the prince they inſulted.

William to prevent any confuſion in his own army, rode through the ranks, and by that means effectually removed the impreſſions which this falſe rumour might otherwiſe have produced on the ſpirits of his troops. It was now determined in a council of war to croſs the river, and give the enemy battle the next day. The Engliſh accordingly forded the ſtream, ſtood the ſhock of the Iriſh cavalry, and broke in upon, and diſperſed the infantry. In this attack La Caillemont was killed at the head of the French refugees who ſerved in William's army. Schomberg, informed of the furious attack made upon the regiments that had forded the river, and that the French refugees were without a leader, paſſed the ſtream immediately to head them. He had no ſooner reached the oppoſite bank, than he rode full ſpeed to the French proteſtants, and putting himſelf at their head, he cried out, "Behold your perſecutors." Animated by his example, the refugees attacked the enemy with the utmoſt fury; but a party of James's guards, returning towards the main body of their army, ſurrounded Schomberg. Exaſperated at the attempt, and deſirous of revenging the inſult, the refugees fired upon them with too little caution, one of the balls ſtriking the general put an end to his life. Thus fell the famous Schomberg in the eighty-third year of his age, after a long life replete with military glory.

This misfortune was like to have been fatal to the whole army. The forces that had hitherto fought with ſuch remarkable intrepidity, ſeemed to have loſt their courage with their general: their arms remained inactive in their hands; they gazed at each other with ſilent aſtoniſhment, and gave ground apace. The enemy perceived it, and animated with ſo fortunate an incident, returned to the charge with ſuch ardour and intrepidity, as ſeemed to command ſucceſs. William, who might be ſaid to be every where during the whole action, perceived the advantage of the enemy, and brought up the left wing at the very moment when they were going to fall upon the center. Intimidated at his approach they halted, faced about and retreated to the village of Dunmore, about half a mile from the paſs. There they made ſo brave a ſtand, that the Dutch and Daniſh horſe, though headed by the king in perſon, unable to ſuſtain their fire, gave way: the Iniſkilleners themſelves ſeemed unwilling to advance. Alarmed at this backwardneſs, William rode up to the latter, and in a ſharp tone of voice aſked them, if this was the behaviour he was to expect from them? Stung with this reproach, they reſumed their uſual courage, and returned to the charge with irreſiſtible fury; and the enemy, after a very bloody conflict, was driven back with conſiderable loſs. General Hamilton, who had inſpired the Iriſh with courage and intrepidity during the whole action was now taken priſoner. This loſs was deciſive. William met with no farther oppoſition, but from the French and Swiſs guards, who retreated in good order.

In this battle James loſt about fifteen hundred men, among whom were the lords Dungan, and Carlingford, Sir Neile O'Neile, and the marquis of Hocquincourt. The Engliſh loſt about five hundred men, an inconſiderable number in gaining ſo important a battle; had not the duke of Scomberg, the moſt illuſtrious general in Europe, been one of the number.

In this memorable battle the contraſt between the two kings was remarkable. James, merely a ſpectator of an action in which he bore a principal part, was the foremoſt in the retreat. His former courage was ſhook by miſfortunes. He reproached the Iriſh with cowardice, and embarked for France, where he was ſure of living in quiet. William was every where in the thickeſt of the action, encouraging his troops with his preſence, and animating them by his example. They followed with ardor a prince who diſplayed ſuch admirable conduct, reſolution, and preſence of mind. The Iriſh themſelves were ſo ſenſible of this advantage, that they declared, if the Engliſh would change kings with them they would fight the battle over again.

William purſued the victory he had gained over James with great vigilance and ſucceſs. His generals took many places, and he himſelf laid ſiege to Limeric. But the badneſs of the ſeaſon, and the reſiſtance of the inhabitants obliged him to abandon the enterprize.

While the king was employed in the reducing of Ireland, his queen held the Engliſh reins of government with a ſteadineſs and reſolution that gained her the admiration of the whole kingdom. On receiving advice that a powerful fleet was fitted out at Breſt in order to make a deſcent on the weſt of England, the queen ordered the earl of Torrington, who then lay with his fleet in the Downs, to ſail immediately to Portſmouth, and collect a number of ſhips ſufficient to enable him to render the deſign of the enemy abortive. While the admiral lay at St. Helen's advice arrived from Weymouth, that the French fleet, conſiſting of ſeventy-eight ſhips of the line and two fireſhips, had entered the channel. The admiral had been lately joined by a ſquadron of Dutch men of war, but ſeveral ſhips expected from Plymouth had hitherto been prevented, by contrary winds, from joining him. A council of war was immediately called, and it ſeemed to be the general opinion that it would be imprudent to meet the enemy, as the whole combined fleet did not exceed fifty-ſix ſail; but before any reſolution was taken an expreſs arrived from the queen, with poſſitive orders to hazard an engagement at all events, rather than ſuffer the enemy to ſail up the channel, and inſult the Engliſh coaſts and harbours.

Purſuant to theſe orders Torrington ſtood out to ſea immediately, with the combined fleets of England and Holland. The enemy ſoon appeared in ſight, and on the thirtieth of June, the engagement began off Beachy-head about nine in the morning. The blue ſquadron engaged the French with the utmoſt bravery, but Torrington kept his diviſion in a line, and fought at too great a diſtance. The Dutch, deſirous of bringing on a cloſer engagement, advanced towards the enemy, and by that means were ſeparated from the Engliſh. Tourville, the French admiral, perceived the imprudent valour of the Dutch had carried them too far, and determined to take advantage of their error. He accordingly collected all his ſhips that were now engaged with the Engliſh, and ſurrounded the Dutch ſquadron. All retreat was now cut off, and the whole ſquadron muſt have been taken, had not Calembourgh the Dutch admiral fortunately ordered his ſhips to drop their anchors with all their ſails ſtanding. This ſaved his ſquadron. The tide ſet ſtrongly up the channel, and there being very little wind, the French, who were ignorant of the ſtratagem, were ſoon hurrried away by the tide, while the Dutch continued ſafe at anchor beyond the reach of their cannon. They had, however, received conſiderable damage; their two vice admirals were killed, and ſeveral of their ſhips ſo greatly ſhattered, that they were obliged to ſink them, in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. The Engliſh loſt two ſhips, two of their captains, and about four hundred men. The next day the Engliſh admiral called a council of war, in which he was reſolved to retreat without hazarding another engagement, and to deſtroy all the diſabled ſhips ſhould the enemy attempt a purſuit. Torrington accordingly retreated without much interruption to the mouth of the Thames, while Tourville, after continuing about five days in the channel returned to Breſt. The nation was at once exaſperated and alarmed at this incident. It was the common opinion, that if Torrington had followed the example of the blue ſquadron, and brought on a cloſe engagement, the enemy muſt have been defeated; the conſequence of which, would in all probability have been fatal to the French, as it was almoſt impoſſible for them to have returned to Breſt, a very conſiderable ſquadron then lying in Plymouth ſound. Torrington's conduct was cenſured by his own admirals, and on his arrival in London, he was ſent to the tower.

This defeat though attended with no alarming conſequences, furniſhed the jacobites with matter ſufficient for an ungenerous triumph. The people, who ſee only the ſurface of things, were ſeized with the moſt gloomy apprehenſions; a deſcent on the coaſt was every day expected; and a general panic was ſpread over the kingdom. The queen alone ſeemed unaffected with this unmanly fear; ſhe behaved with admirable ſpirit and diſcretion. She made uſe of every precaution to render any attempt of the enemy abortive. The principal ſea-ports were put into a good ſtate of defence: proper orders were iſſued for refitting the ſhips and augmenting the navy: the militia of the weſtern counties was embodied; and to ſtrike a greater terror into the domeſtic enemies of the government, a proclamation was iſſued for apprehending ſeveral diſaffected perſons, who were either ſuſpected or accuſed of holding a correſpondence with James and his party, for diſturbing the internal peace of the kingdom.

Pleaſed with this prudent and magnanimous conduct in the queen, ſhe received addreſſes from the city of London and moſt of the principal counties and corporations in the kingdom, who all declared their reſolution of ſupporting her, her royal conſort, and the preſent government, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. Theſe addreſſes were very grateful to the queen, who purſued her meaſures with ſuch prudence and ſucceſs, that the clamour gradually ſubſided, and the tongue of envy was huſhed to peace.

Soon after William had left Ireland, the celebrated earl of Marlborough landed at the head of five thouſand men in the neighbourhood of Corke, and being joined by nearly the ſame number under thecommand of the duke of Wirtemberg and general Scrivenmore, he undertook to reduce ſeveral of the places in Ireland. Succeſs attended all his meaſures; he took the towns of Corke and Kingſale, which were of the laſt importance to James on account of their maritime ſituation; and the count de Lauzun, who commanded the French troops in Ireland, deſpairing of James's cauſe, thought proper to evacuate the kingdom.

The greater part of Europe was now in arms againſt France; the treaty of Auſburgh, was not ſufficient to cruſh the power of Lewis XIV. The prince of Waldeck, general of the confederates, who had conquered d'Humieres at Valcour, was beaten at Fleurus by the marſhal de Luxembourgh, the pupil and imitator of the great Condé. There now ſeemed a neceſſity for all the powers engaged in the alliance to exert themſelves in the common cauſe, or ſubmit to receive a peace dictated by the moſt ambitious monarch in Europe.

William opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the ſecond of October with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he informed the aſſembly, that he had uſed his utmoſt endeavours for the reduction of Ireland, in which he had met with great ſucceſs, and doubted not but he ſhould have finiſhed the arduous taſk, if the neceſſary ſupplies had been granted him in time during the laſt ſeſſion. He put them in mind alſo, that he had aſked no revenue for himſelf, but what he had ſubjected to be charged for the uſe of the war; recommended to them the care of clearing his revenue, ſo as to enable him to ſubſiſt, and maintain the charge of the civil government. Then addreſſing himſelf to both houſes, told them, that he hoped they would proceed in their deliberations with ſpirit and concord; and that who ever ſhould endeavour to divert their attention from the important ſubjects he had recommended to them, could neither be his friends, nor the friends of the kingdom.

Both houſes of parliament addreſſed him ſeparately on this ſpeech, in which they congratulated him on his ſucceſs in Ireland, and on the queen's happy adminiſtration during his abſence. The commons particularly told him, "That he too freely expoſed his invaluable life, on which the whole proteſtant intereſt of Europe depended;" and concluded with aſſuring him, "that they ſhould always be ready to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power: and as the beſt and trueſt way of expreſſing their gratitude, they would endeavour effectually to ſupport his government againſt all his enemies."

Nor were they long before they carried theſe aſſurances into execution: for the very day their addreſs was preſented, they voted a ſupply of four millions for the ſervice of the enſuing year: a larger ſum than had ever before been granted by an Engliſh parliament to their prince. Among other taxes for raiſing this prodigious ſum, a land-tax of three ſhillings in the pound was impoſed; the exciſe upon beer and ale was doubled; a duty was laid on all India goods, foreign wrought ſilks, and ſeveral other commodities imported; and a duty was impoſed upon new wines and ſpirits of the firſt extraction. They alſo voted that one million ſhould be raiſed by the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, and that a bill ſhould be prepared for confiſcating theſe eſtates, with a clauſe empowering his majeſty to grant one third of them to thoſe who had ſerved in the war: but this bill failed in the houſe of lords.

A. D. 1691. On the fifth of January, the king, impatient of being in Holland where a congreſs was appointed to be held by the allies, came to the houſe of peers, and after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, he put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, wherein he aſſured both houſes, that he entertained the moſt grateful ſenſe of their liberality and diſpatch; that the ſupplies they had granted ſhould be faithfully employed in the ſervices for which they were allotted: that he would make no grant of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, till that affair ſhould be fully ſettled in parliament, to the ſatisfaction of all parties. That he hoped they would take care to propagate in their ſeveral counties, the ſame principles of zeal and attachment to his government, which they had ſo eminently diſplayed in parliament: and that he truſted the good underſtanding between him and his ſubjects, would be more than ſufficient to defeat the deſigns of their ſecret foes, and the attempts of their open and avowed enemies.

After putting an end to the ſeſſion of parliament, the king embarked for Holland on the ſixteenth of January, in order to aſſiſt at a congreſs of the confederate princes and ſtates, appointed to be held at the Hague, to concert meaſures for the defence of the liberties of Europe againſt the encroachments of France. On his arrival in the capital of the United Provinces, the ſtates general, the ſtates of Holland, the council of ſtate, and other colleges, waited on the king with congratulations on his ſafe arrival. On the twenty-ſixth of January, he made a public entry, and was received with great pomp, and the ſincereſt expreſſions of joy. Triumphal arches were erected in the principal ſtreets through which he paſſed, filled with inſcriptions expreſſing his great and generous actions in defence of public liberty.

The congreſs was opened ſoon after his arrival. It conſiſted of the imperial miniſters, thoſe from Spain, Denmark, Sweden, Poland, Brandenburgh, Saxony, Trieves, Mentz, Cologne, the Palatine, Savoy, Zell, Munſter, Heſſe-Caſſel, Wolfenbuttle, Hanover, Holſtein Gottorp, Liege, and thoſe from king William. The whole forming one of the moſt glorious aſſemblies mentioned in the annals of hiſtory, and convened for the nobleſt purpoſe, that of oppoſing the ambitious encroachments of an arbitrary prince, and ſecuring the peace, tranquillity, and liberties of a whole continent.

William opened the congreſs with a very pathetic ſpeech, in which he diſplayed, in the moſt forcible colours, "the imminent danger to which they were at preſent expoſed; plainly demonſtrated the impropriety of their former conduct, and the abſolute neceſſity of an immediate change of meaſures: that this was not the time to deliberate, but to act: that the enemy was already maſter of the principal fortreſſes which formed the barrier of the common liberty; and would ſoon be able to poſſeſs himſelf of all the inferior fortifications, if a ſpirit of diviſion, ſelfiſhneſs, and irreſolution, continued to influence them: that every one ought to conſider his own intereſt as involved in the good of the whole: that the forces of the enemy were numerous and powerful; and, if not prevented, would ſweep every thing before them like a torrent: that it was in vain to oppoſe the pretenſions of injuſtice by unavailing complaints, unprofitable clamour, or fruitleſs proteſtations: that not the reſolutions of a peaceable diet, nor the hopes of ſome men of fortune built on a ſandy foundation, would be ſufficient; but that of powerful armies, bold enterprizes, and a prompt and vigorous execution to accompliſh the glorious work: that all theſe muſt be inſtantly employed againſt the common enemy, if they meant to check his progreſs, and to ſnatch from his hands the liberties of Europe, which he was now ſubjecting to a cruel and heavy yoke." He concluded with aſſuring them, "That, for his own part, he would neither ſpare his forces, his credit, nor his own perſon, to effect ſo noble a deſign; but would appear in the ſpring at the head of his troops, to fulfil faithfully his royal promiſes."

This ſpeech was received with great applauſe by the whole aſſembly, and produced the moſt happy effect. A reſolution was immediately taken to employ two hundred and five thouſand men againſt France, of which the ſeveral princes and ſtates were to furniſh the following proportions: the king of England, twenty thouſand; the emperor, twenty thouſand; the king of Spain in Flanders, twenty thouſand; the ſtates-general, twenty-five thouſand; the duke of Savoy, and the troops of Milan, twenty thouſand; the elector of Bavaria, eighteen thouſand; the elector of Saxony, twelve thouſand; the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, eight thouſand; the circles of Suabia and Franconia, ten thouſand; the duke of Wirtemberg, ſix thouſand; the elector of Brandenburg, twenty thouſand; the elector Palatine, four thouſand; the prince of Liege, ſix thouſand; and the prince of Lunenburgh, ſixteen thouſand. Had theſe engagements been punctually fulfilled, a final ſtop would ſoon have been put to the conqueſts of France; but this was far from being the caſe. Few of the princes took any care to ſend their full quota of troops to the general rendezvous; ſo that England and Holland were obliged to bear almoſt the whole expence and burden of the war.

While William was thus nobly oppoſing the power of France in the Low Countries, his general in Ireland, baron Ginckle, ruined the remains of James's intereſt in that kingdom. Athlone was taken by ſtorm, and almoſt under the eye of the Iriſh army. A deciſive battle was fought at Agrim, where the catholic forces were totally routed; and Tyrconnel, the principal friend of James, was ſo affected with that fatal misfortune, that he died of grief. The taking of Limerick crowned the ſucceſs of Ginckle. He granted the inhabitants an honourable capitulation, in which all the other places that had not yet ſubmitted were comprehended. It was declared, that whoever ſhould acknowledge the authority of William and Mary, a few perſons only excepted, ſhould be reſtored to their fortunes, privileges and immunities, and enjoy the protection of the laws; that each perſon ſhould have liberty to retire, with his family and effects, into any other country except England or Scotland; that ſuch as choſe this alternative, ſhould be provided with carriages and tranſport veſſels; that the Roman catholics ſhould enjoy the free exerciſe of their religion, as far as was conſiſtent with the laws of Ireland, and in the ſame manner they had enjoyed it in the reign of Charles II. Whether the proteſtants were ſatisfied with this treaty is not abſolutely known; but Ginckle was ordered to put an end to the war; and his expedition was ſo much the more glorious, as Lewis XIV. had ſent a reinforcement of troops, and large quantities of ammunition and proviſions, to Limerick. But notwithſtanding the amneſty and liberty of conſcience, above twelve thouſand Iriſh choſe rather to baniſh themſelves, than ſubmit to the government. France was the kingdom they choſe for their retreat, and where they were thanked by James for their fidelity. It would have been more to his honour, and, perhaps, to his advantage, had he put himſelf at their head, and ſupported the declining ſtate of a kingdom ſo firmly attached to his ſervice.

William returned to England in the month of April, and exerted all his abilities in reſtoring peace to his kingdom, which had been greatly diſturbed during his abſence by the ſecret practices of the malecontents. A conſpiracy had been formed for reſtoring James, and ſeveral perſons apprehended juſt as they were going to ſail for France. This rendered the plot abortive. The king having thus put an end to a contrivance that ſeemed to threaten the peace of England, embarked for Holland on the ſecond of May, in order to put himſelf at the head of the confederate army.

The French had taken the field much ſooner than the allies. Luxemburgh, with an army of forty thouſand men, was advancing to beſiege Bruſſels; while the marquis de Boufflers, with another army, ſat down before Liege. William loſt no time in putting himſelf at the head of the allied army, and ſoon rendered both enterprizes abortive. The French were obliged to raiſe the ſiege of both places almoſt as ſoon as the trenches were opened. He endeavoured to bring Luxemburgh to an engagement; but in this he was diſappointed; that general was unwilling to engage an army greatly ſuperior to his own; and the campaign ended in Flanders without any conſiderable advantage being gained on either ſide.

On the nineteenth of October, William landed in England from the continent; and on the twenty-ſecond opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, wherein he informed both houſes, “That he hoped the ſucceſs his forces had met with in Ireland would be a powerful inducement to their aſſiſting him with freſh ſupplies. He recommended the keeping a ſtrong fleet at ſea, and an army of ſixty-five thouſand men aſhore, that they might annoy the enemy in the moſt ſenſible part: adding, that they had now an opportunity of eſtabliſhing their future quiet and proſperity on a firm foundation; an opportunity which, if now neglected, might never return.

The parliament congratulated William on his ſucceſs, and declared their readineſs to ſupport him in the neceſſary war in which he was engaged againſt France. They alſo thanked general Ginckle for his ſervices, and the king created him earl of Athlone. But in the promiſe given by the parliament, there was, in general, more flattery than ſincerity. A ſecret diſcontent was every day gaining ground in the kingdom. The idea of keeping on foot an army of ſixty thouſand men alarmed the people. It was thought very ſtrange, that a greater number of troops ſhould now be thought neceſſary than in times of the greateſt danger: it was even inſinuated, that ſo numerous an army might be employed to eſtabliſh the throne of deſpotiſm on the ruins of the people's liberties. They complained, that they bore the whole burden of the war without reaping any of the profits. The moſt mortifying reflections were thrown out on the conduct of the miniſtry and the character of the king. He was charged with ill-nature and ingratitude, chiefly on account of the earl of Marlborough, who, inſtead of being rewarded for his ſervices, was diſgraced. He was alſo accuſed of employing corruption in electing members to ſerve in parliament. The Jacobites exaggerated all theſe grievances; and the Whigs, who had ſufficient reaſon to complain, were not more tender with regard to the reputation of the miniſters. Theſe reflections, however, produced no alarming conſequences; the commons voted upwards of a million and a half for the ſervice of the navy and ordnance, and above two millions for the ſervice of the land forces.

A. D. 1692. The funds for the year being at laſt ſettled, the king came to the houſe of peers on the twenty-fourth of February; and, after giving the royal aſſent to the bills that were ready, cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſhort ſpeech, in which he thanked his parliament for the zeal and attachment they had ſhewn for his government, and the liberality and diſpatch with which they had provided for the neceſſities of the ſtate: adding, that he intended ſpeedily to paſs over to the continent, in order to head the allied army in perſon.

Scotland, during theſe tranſactions, was greatly agitated. William, ever ſince the commencement of his reign, had treated the preſbyterians with great reſpect; but that fiery ſect ſoon diſpleaſed him by their ſtrange conduct. He changed his opinion, and conferred his favours wholly on the friends of epiſcopacy. Theſe, in their turn, abuſed the credit they had obtained over a people whom they hated. Their behaviour enraged the preſbyterians, and the diſſolution of their aſſembly was conſidered as an act of tyranny. They, however, continued their meetings, though expreſs orders had been ſent from the king to the contrary, and became the implacable cenſors of government. William had, indeed, given them reaſon for complaint, by maſſacring a number of the Scots highlanders, though Macdonald, their chief, had taken the oaths to the government. An enemy of that leader had repreſented him at court as an obſtinate rebel. Poſſibly the king was a ſtranger to his ſubmiſſion, and a cruel order was as cruelly executed. Part of the inhabitants of the valley of Glencow was alſo put to the ſword, their houſes burnt, their cattle carried off, and their wives and children left without ſupport amidſt their native ſnow. Thus the few whom the ſword had ſpared fell victims to cold and hunger. This cruel execution occaſioned ſuch heavy complaints, that the king ordered the authors and abettors of it to be impeached. He declared he was ignorant of the contents of an order ſigned by his own hand. Terror only reſtrained the Scots highlanders from taking a ſevere revenge: they mourned in ſilence the loſs of their friends, who merited a much better fate, but were never thoroughly friends to William's government.

Soon after the king's departure for Holland, Lewis XIV. engaged with the Jacobites in England to make another effort for reſtoring James to his throne. An invaſion was projected, and it was agreed that the troops ſhould be landed on the coaſt of Suſſex. So much precaution had been taken in France in carrying on the neceſſary preparations, that every thing was ready for executing the deſign before it was ſo much as ſuſpected in England. The land forces conſiſted of four battalions of Engliſh and Iriſh troops, and about nine thouſand French, commanded by the marſhal de Belfondes; ſo that the whole amounted to twenty thouſand men. A fleet of three hundred tranſports was collected, and provided with every thing neceſſary for the invaſion. The troops were ready to embark, and waited only the arrival of the count d'Etrees with a ſquadron of twelve men of war, appointed to eſcort the tranſports; while Tourville cruized in the channel with the grand fleet.

James ſent over colonel Parker about the beginning of the year, to give his friends intelligence of his deſign. Parker, not content with executing his commiſſion, formed a plot with one Johnſon for aſſaſſinating king William; but before an opportunity offered for executing their barbarous deſign, the king embarked for Holland, which rendered the whole abortive.

Soon after the king's departure, James ſent over a printed declaration, dated at St. Germain's; in which he openly avowed his intentions of uſing all the means in his power to recover the throne of his anceſtors; and boaſted of having obtained aſſiſtance from France ſufficient, he hoped, to render the attempt ſucceſsful. At the ſame time he exhorted all his faithful ſubjects to continue in their fidelity. He offered pardon and rewards to all the prince of Orange's ſoldiers, and others who ſhould think proper to join him; and even proceeded ſo far as to except by name from this indemnity no leſs than thirteen noblemen, two biſhops, ſeven barons, and a great number of the clergy and gentry. This declaration was ordered to be publiſhed as ſoon as the troops were ready to be embarked.

Parker and his agents were, in the mean time, buſily employed in enliſting men privately in the northern counties; while Fountaine, as lieutenant-colonel to lord Montgomery and colonel Holman, employed themſelves in forming two regiments of horſe in London, ready to join James on his landing. But their zeal for the ſervice of their maſter carried them too far. Perſuaded that every perſon in the kingdom who was not a zealous friend to the eſtabliſhed government would readily join in an attempt to overturn it, they made no difficulty of applying to all who had ſhewn the leaſt diſſatisfaction at the public meaſures. Rear admiral Carter was known to have ſtrenuouſly defended the rights of the people, and on this foundation only they made application to him as a friend to the dethroned monarch. Their bigotted prejudices prevented them from reflecting, that he who was a true friend to liberty, muſt be an enemy to James, and every other prince who laboured to eſtabliſh his throne on the ruins of Engliſh freedom. Carter immediately informed the queen and council of the offers that had been made him by Fountaine and Holman. Alarmed at this diſcovery, and deſirous of procuring the neceſſary information, Carter was deſired to continue his correſpondence with the conſpirators, and pretend an inclination of joining them. He fully performed the requeſt of the council; and the conſpirators, who exulted in having gained over to their intereſt ſo able an officer, made him acquainted with all their ſecrets. They immediately diſpatched an expreſs to lord Melfort, James's ſecretary, informing him of their ſucceſs in corrupting Carter, who would take care to bring over all the officers of his ſquadron. At the ſame time, they deſired he would preſs the king of France to ſend peremptory orders to Tourville to ſail directly, without waiting for d'Etrees. This proved the deſtruction of the whole ſcheme. James repaired to La Hogue, on the coaſt of Normandy, where the troops were ready to embark, and Tourville was ordered to ſail immediately.

The manifeſto of James was now publiſhed, in which the ſeverities of the prince of Orange's government, the enormous expences to which he had put the nation, were enumerated, and the people invited to return to the allegiance of their native prince. He promiſed to protect the church of England, to eſtabliſh an entire liberty of conſcience, to make trade and navigation flouriſh, to redreſs all the grievances, and to confirm the happineſs of the nation. Theſe fine promiſes were not, however, ſufficient to efface the remembrance of the many grievances which had forced the people to drive him from the throne. Whatever diſcontents might prevail in England, the animoſity againſt James was much ſtronger than the murmurs againſt his rival.

This declaration was hardly publiſhed, before the Dutch fleet, conſiſting of thirty-ſix ſail of the line, under the command of admiral Allemonde, joined the Engliſh at St. Helen's; and admiral Ruſſel, who commanded in chief, received orders to put to ſea immediately. The trained bands of London and Weſtminſter, amounting to about ten thouſand men, were drawn up in Hyde-Park, and reviewed by the queen in perſon.

On the eighteenth of May, admiral Ruſſel left St. Helen's, and ſtood over towards the coaſt of France. About three the next morning, the ſcouts, to the weſtward of the fleet, made the ſignal for diſcovering the enemy, and orders were immediately given for forming the line of battle. This was ſoon effected, and the whole fleet ſtood towards the enemy in the following order. The Dutch ſquadron formed the van; the red ſquadron the center; and the blue ſquadron the rear. The French admiral was aſtoniſhed when he ſaw the combined fleets of England and Holland. He had received no advice of this junction, and flattered himſelf with being able to defeat the Engliſh, unaſſiſted by their ally. He might, however, have declined an engagement; but having received poſitive orders to fight the enemy, he reſolved to obey, and exert all his endeavours to execute the commands of his maſter, in the manner becoming a good officer and an intrepid ſeaman.

The combined fleet conſiſted of ninety-nine ſhips of the line, and the French only ſixty-three. About half an hour after eleven, Tourville, in the Royal Sun, a ſhip of one hundred and ten guns, brought to, began the fight with admiral Ruſſel, and continued the engagement about an hour and a half, when he began to tow off in great diſorder, his rigging, ſails and top-ſail yards being very much damaged.

Hitherto the wind had been weſterly, but it now flew about to the north-weſt; and ſoon after, five ſhips of the enemy poſted themſelves, three a-head, and two a-ſtern of their admiral, and continued firing very ſmartly till about three o'clock; ſo that Ruſſel and his two ſeconds, Churchill and Aylmer, had ſix or ſeven ſhips upon them at once. About four a thick fog came up, and the firing on both ſides ceaſed; but it clearing up in a little time, the French admiral was diſcovered towing away to the northward, and Ruſſel ordered all the ſhips of his diviſion to do the like. A ſmall breeze from the eaſtward now ſprung up, and the ſignal was immediately made for chacing. About this time a continued firing was heard to the weſtward; and it ſoon appeared that Sir Cloudeſly Shovel, rear-admiral of the red, having got to windward of Tourville's ſquadron, had attacked their admiral of the blue. After the engagement had continued for ſome time, the ſhips of both ſquadrons came to an anchor. In the mean time, admiral Ruſſel ordered all the ſhips of his diviſion to ſtand to the weſtward during the night, from a perſuaſion that the French would do all in their power to eſcape to Breſt. He was not miſtaken; for in the morning he found himſelf much nearer to the enemy than thoſe who had come to an anchor. About eight at night a firing was heard to the weſtward, and continued about half an hour; part of the Engliſh blue ſquadron having fallen in with ſome ſhips of the enemy during the fog; and in that diſpute rear-admiral Carter was ſlain. Finding his laſt moments were at hand, he begged his captain to fight his ſhip as long as ſhe would ſwim; a ſufficient proof that there was not the leaſt reaſon to ſuſpect his zeal for the ſervice of his country.

The fog continued during the whole night, with very little wind; and in the morning it was ſo hazy, that very few of the enemy's ſhips could be ſeen; but the weather clearing up about eight, the Dutch, who were at ſome diſtance to the ſouthward, made the ſignal for ſeeing the French fleet, and ſoon after, thirty-four ſail were diſcovered about two or three leagues diſtant to the ſouth-weſt, the wind being then at north-eaſt. The Engliſh now crowded all the ſail poſſible; and between eleven and twelve the wind came about to the ſouth-weſt, when the French ſtood away to the weſtward, and the Engliſh after them. About eleven the next day the Royal Sun ran aſhore, while two other large ſhips of the enemy ſtood as near her as poſſible. Sir Ralph Delaval, vice-admiral of the red, was now ordered to deſtroy the Royal Sun, while the reſt of the fleet continued their purſuit of the enemy. This ſervice he effectually performed, and the fineſt ſhip in the French navy was reduced to aſhes.

About four in the afternoon, eighteen of the French ſhips which had reached Cape Barfleur, haled in for La Hogue, and came to an anchor cloſe under the ſhore. The next day Ruſſel ordered Mr. Rooke, vice-admiral of the blue, with his ſquadron, the fire-ſhips, and all the boats of the fleet, to ſtand in and deſtroy thoſe ſhips. He obeyed his orders, and burnt thirteen men of war, ſeveral tranſports, and ſome ſmall veſſels, loaded with ammunition.

In this famous engagement two ſhips of one hundred and four guns, one of ninety, two of eighty, four of ſeventy-ſix, four of ſixty, and two of fifty-ſix guns, belonging to the enemy, were deſtroyed. James ſaw this deſtruction, and was ſo ſenſibly affected by the misfortune, that, in a letter he wrote to the king of France on this occaſion, he begged he would leave him to his fate. "I have hitherto (ſaid he) ſupported, with ſome conſtancy and reſolution, the weight of my misfortunes, while I myſelf was the only ſufferer; but this diſaſter has overwhelmed me with grief, and left me no room for comfort. I know too well that my own unlucky ſtar has drawn this misfortune upon your forces, always victorious but when they fought for my intereſt, and therefore I no longer merit the ſupport of ſo great a monarch. Let me therefore intreat your majeſty to concern yourſelf no longer for a prince ſo dreadfully unfortunate; but permit me to retire, with my family, to ſome corner of the world, where I may ceaſe to obſtruct the courſe of your majeſty's ſucceſſes and conqueſts, and where it will be the greateſt of my conſolations to hear of the quick return of your majeſty's wonted triumphs, both by ſea and land, over both your enemies and mine. This, I doubt not, will ſoon be the caſe, when my intereſt ſhall be no longer intermixed with your's." Lewis endeavoured to alleviate his afflictions by every method in his power. He wrote him an anſwer, filled with the kindeſt expreſſions, and promiſed never to forſake him in his misfortunes.

The queen was no ſooner informed of this victory, than ſhe ſent thirty thouſand pounds to Portſmouth, in order to its being diſtributed among the ſailors; ordered medals to be ſtruck for the officers; and cauſed the bodies of admiral Carter and colonel Haſtings, who had fallen in the engagement, to be honourably interred. The French, in their turn, were threatened with an invaſion, and about ſeven thouſand men embarked on board the fleet for that purpoſe. Great expectations were formed with regard to this expedition; but the advanced ſeaſon of the year was thought a ſufficient reaſon for laying it aſide, and the troops were ſent over to ſerve in Flanders.

But if Lewis was unfortunate at ſea, it was different with regard to his army in the Low Countries. He took Namur in perſon. The marſhal de Luxembourgh, who covered the ſiege, conducted the whole with ſuch addreſs, that William, at the head of a numerous and powerful army, could neither paſs the Maes, nor throw any ſuccours into that important place. Luxembourg, though then extremely ill, gained a victory over him, ſome time after, at Steinkirk; but William found inexhauſtible reſources in his genius. He kept the field as if he had not been conquered, and the joy which this victory occaſioned in France was a kind of triumph for him. It is often as glorious to repair the misfortunes of a defeat, as to gain a victory. About this time a conſpiracy, formed againſt the life of king William, was diſcovered. The whole was attributed to the French miniſter, and, indeed, with ſufficient reaſon.

The Engliſh malecontents were greatly diſſatisfied with the affairs on the continent. They thought not ſo much of the propriety of oppoſing a monarch who was the common diſturber of Europe, as of the conſequences of a war, which would at laſt beggar and depopulate the kingdom. The king (ſaid they) is ſacrificing the ſtate to foreigners. The intereſt and neceſſities of the Engliſh affect him much leſs than the advantages of the Dutch; impriſonments and illegal violences make the former feel all the weight of deſpotiſm; the miniſtry pay no regard to the laws, or to public liberty; each prefers his own intereſt to that of his country; and even thoſe evils will only prove a prelude to greater, unleſs a ſpeedy remedy be applied." It muſt, indeed, be acknowledged, that the principles of the nation were greatly altered. Meanneſs roſe to affluence, affluence led to luxury, and luxury to corruption. The ſcandalous practice of purchaſing votes in parliament had grown common, and the diſorder ſpread with rapidity. So that the ſpirit of party, which exaggerates every thing, had an ample field for the exerciſe of its malignancy. William accordingly, on his return from Holland, found the affairs of the kingdom in a greater ferment than ever. The moſt violent debates were carried on in the houſe of lords, on account of the impriſonment of certain peers; and it was reſolved that the judges, and others, who had cauſed the priſoners to be arreſted for high-treaſon, ought, according to the act of habeas corpus, to have admitted them to bail, unleſs two witneſſes were ready to declare upon oath, that they were really guilty; but theſe they could not produce. Alarmed at the ferment, and dreading the conſequences, William immediately ſet the priſoners at liberty. On the other hand, the commons entered into inquiries, why the victory at ſea had not been purſued? Why the intended deſcent had been laid aſide? and why proper care had not been taken to cover the trade, by having convoys ſtationed at proper places? They alſo deliberated on preſenting a remonſtrance to the king on different ſubjects; but the influence of the ordinary means of corruption ſoon put an end to the deſign, and induced them to grant large and extravagant ſupplies. Two millions were deſtined for the navy, and more than three for the army and the continental war. They voted fifty-four thouſand men, of whom twenty thouſand were to remain in the kingdom, for its defence. Eſtates real and perſonal, except the pay of military officers, were taxed at the rate of four ſhillings in the pound. The lords added a clauſe to the bill, implying, that they had taxed themſelves. This gave offence to the commons, who affirmed it to be a violation of the right they poſſeſſed in all regulations of parliamentary ſupplies. The lords gave up the diſpute, but declared they did it only in conſideration of the urgent neceſſities of the ſtate. But notwithſtanding the almoſt ſervile compliance of the parliament, ſome meaſures were attempted contrary to the views of the court. It was propoſed to annihilate the Eaſt-India Company, which was charged with great abuſes; and to paſs an act to render parliaments triennial, in order to prevent bribery and corruption at elections. But the miniſtry had ſufficient influence and addreſs to render theſe deſigns abortive.

A. D. 1693. On the thirty-firſt of March, the king embarked at Graveſend, and landed ſafely at the Maeſe on the ſecond of April. He ſoon after put himſelf at the head of the allied army, and advanced againſt the enemy. Luxembourg ſurprized and attacked him at Nerwind with a ſuperior army. The king loſt not a moment. He drew up his forces in order of battle, expoſed himſelf to every kind of danger, but was obliged at laſt to give way to the numbers of the enemy. Though vanquiſhed, he made a glorious retreat, and was ſtill reſpectable. Nor did the French reap any other advantage from their victory than that of making themſelves maſters of Charleroy. William was thought to have gained more real honour in the battle of Nerwind than when he triumphed at the Boyne. His very enemies were charmed with his conduct. It was a common ſaying in the French camp, that "they wanted only ſuch a king to make themſelves maſters of Chriſtendom." The prince of Conti, in a letter he wrote to his conſort, uſed the following expreſſion: "I ſaw the king expoſing himſelf to the greateſt dangers; and ſurely ſo much valour very well deſerves the peaceable poſſeſſion of the crown he wears." The king of France himſelf is reported to have ſaid, "That Luxembourg's behaviour was like that of the prince of Conti, but William's like that of marſhal Turenne."

Germany and Piedmont were alſo at the ſame time the theatres of war. The Palatinate was inhumanly ravaged by the duke of Lorges. The duke of Savoy, who, the preceding year, had ſpread deſolation through Dauphiny, was defeated near Marſeilles by Catinat. But Lewis XIV. notwithſtanding ſo many victories, found enemies in every quarter, capable of making the ſtrongeſt reſiſtance. The dreadful ſcourge of war, after ſtrewing the plains with the bodies of the dead, frequently leaves nothing more behind than vain exultations on the ſide of the victor. The more dreadful ſcourge of famine followed that of war. Two harveſts had failed, and the vintage had ſuffered greatly; ſo that the French had neither bread nor wine. The utmoſt diligence was uſed to import corn from other countries; and the famous Dubart ſeaſonably purchaſed large quantities both in Sweden and Denmark, conveying it ſafely into the harbours of France.

The affairs at ſea were not advantageous to England. The French had, in ſome meaſure, repaired their loſſes at La Hogue, and the commerce of the allies ſuffered greatly. The Engliſh and Dutch fleets were, indeed, very ſtrong, and ſailed early. The admirals were not at firſt reſtrained by any particular inſtructions, but ordered in general to deſtroy the ſhips of the enemy, and protect the trade; but they afterwards received particular inſtructions with regard to a large fleet of near four hundred ſail of merchant ſhips belonging to England, Holland, and Hamburgh. After ſeveral councils held on this occaſion, it was determined that the whole fleet, together with the Mediterranean ſquadron, ſhould proceed together thirty leagues weſt-ſouth-weſt from Uſhant; when Sir George Rooke, who was appointed to command the ſquadron deſtined to convoy them, was to proceed with them towards the ports to which they were bound. Accordingly Sir George, with all the Turkey ſhips, left the main body of the fleet on the ſixth of June; and ſteering for the Streights, left by the way the veſſels bound for Bilboa, Liſbon, St. Ubes, and other ports. When he was within ſixty leagues of Cape St. Vincent, he diſcovered part of the French fleet; on which he immediately called a council of war, where it was reſolved, that as the wind was northerly, and a freſh gale, the merchant ſhips ſhould make the beſt of their way to Cadiz. This reſolution was hardly taken, before the whole fleet of the enemy, conſiſting of eighty ſail, under the command of Tourville, was diſcovered. Rooke was perſuaded there was now no time to retreat; but Vandergoes, the Dutch vice-admiral, informed him, that he choſe to avoid an engagement, which he thought extremely hazardous. Rooke therefore followed his advice, and they both ſtood off with an eaſy ſail, that the heavy ſhips might work up to windward. At the ſame time, the Sheerneſs was diſpatched with orders to the ſmall ſhips, near the land, to endeavour to keep cloſe under the ſhore during the night, and take ſhelter in Faro, St. Lucar, or Cadiz. About ſix in the evening, the van of the enemy came up with the ſternmoſt of the confederate fleet, conſiſting of three Dutch men of war. Theſe bravely fought, firſt eleven, and then ſeven of the enemy's ſhips, for five hours together. They had the good fortune to clear themſelves from the former; but were obliged to ſubmit to the latter, after making a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance. The Dutch merchant ſhips immediately tacked and ſtood in for the ſhore, and the enemy after them. Rooke ſtood off to ſea during the night; and the next morning fifty-four of the merchant ſhips, and ſeveral men of war, were about him; but no more than two of the latter belonged to the Dutch. Five ſail of the enemy's ſhips were ſeen to leeward, and two to windward; the latter kept in ſight of him till it was night. The next day the admiral called a council of war, where it was determined to ſail directly to the Madeiras, in order to procure water, and thence either to Cork or Kingſale. This reſolution was accordingly executed, and Sir George conducted that part of the fleet back to Ireland in ſafety.

Had the enemy purſued their firſt advantage with the ſame conduct and reſolution, hardly a ſhip could have eſcaped; for when the Dutch tacked and ſtood in for the ſhore, the van of the French were within cannon-ſhot of the Engliſh admiral; but their tacking after the Dutch gave the other part of the fleet an opportunity of eſcaping. The loſs was, however, very conſiderable, and fell chiefly on the Hollanders, who loſt on this occaſion above eighty ſail of merchant ſhips, and three men of war. The Engliſh loſt only one man of war, and about five merchantmen.

About the latter end of October, the king returned to England; and on the ſeventh of November, opened the ſeſſion of parliament with the following ſpeech from the throne.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am always glad to meet you here; and I could heartily wiſh that our ſatisfaction were not leſſened at preſent by reflecting upon the diſadvantages we have received this year at land, and the miſcarriages in our affairs at ſea. I think it is evident, that the former were only occaſioned by the great number of our enemies, which exceeded ours in all places. For what relates to the latter, which reflects ſo great diſgrace upon the nation, I have reſented it extremely; and as I will take care that thoſe who have not done their duty ſhall be puniſhed, ſo I am reſolved to uſe my utmoſt endeavours, that our power at ſea may be rightly managed for the future: and it will well deſerve your conſideration, whether we are not defective, both in the number of our ſhipping, and in proper ports to the weſtward, for the better annoying our enemies, and protecting our trade, which is ſo eſſential to the welfare of theſe kingdoms.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am very ſenſible of the good affection wherewith you have always aſſiſted me to ſupport the charges of the war, which have been very great; and yet I am perſuaded that the experience of this ſummer is ſufficient to convince us all, that, to arrive at a good end of it, there will be a neceſſity of increaſing our forces, both by ſea and land, the next year. Our allies have reſolved to add to theirs; and I will not doubt, that you will have ſuch regard to the preſent exigence, as that you will give me a ſuitable ſupply to enable me to do the like. I muſt therefore earneſtly recommend it to you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, to take ſuch timely reſolutions, as that your ſupplies may be effectual, and our preparations ſo forward, as will be neceſſary both for the honour and ſecurity of the nation."

The commons in anſwer to this ſpeech, unanimouſly declared they would ſupport his majeſty and his government, and grant ſufficient ſupply for the vigorous proſecution of the war. But before they proceeded to take the ſupplies into conſideration, they began an enquiry into cauſes of the miſcarriage of the fleet during the laſt ſummer, and the beſt methods for ſecuring the trade of the nation. But the enquiring into the miſcarriage of the fleet was attended with no diſcoveries; a miſmanagement appeared ſome where; but it was found impoſſible to fix it on any individuals.

This enquiry being finiſhed, the commons proceeded to deliberate on the ſupplies, and voted, that five hundred thouſand pounds be raiſed towards diſcharging the wages due to the ſeamen; and that a farther ſum of two millions be granted to their majeſties for the maintenance of the fleet, including the ordnance: that the number of forces in their majeſties pay be increaſed to ſix new regiments of Engliſh dragoons, and fifteen new regiments of Engliſh foot: that eighty-three thouſand one hundred and twenty-one men, including commiſſion and non-commiſſion officers, were neceſſary for the ſervice of the enſuing year, to be employed in England and beyond the ſeas: and that the ſum of two millions, five hundred thirty-five thouſand, five hundred and ninety pounds be granted for the maintenance of the land forces. They alſo voted one hundred and eighteen thouſand pounds to make good the annuity deficiency, and two hundred ninety-ſix thouſand ſix hundred and ninety-two pounds to make good the deficiency of the poll-bill. Thus the ſupplies voted for the ſervice of the enſuing year, amounted to near five millions and a half, and were raiſed by a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound; by an increaſe of annuities; a farther exciſe on beer, and a duty on ſalt.

After finiſhing theſe votes, the commons paſſed a bill for rendering all members of their houſe incapable of truſt and profit. This bill alſo paſſed the upper houſe, and lay ready for the royal aſſent; but when the king came to the houſe of peers to paſs the land-tax bill, he thought proper to refuſe it. This refuſal alarmed the commons: the whole houſe was turned into a committee on the ſtate of the nation, and it was reſolved, "That whoever adviſed the king not to give the royal aſſent to the act which was to redreſs a grievance, and take off a ſcandal from the commons in parliament, is an enemy to their majeſties and the kingdom; and that a repreſentation be made to the king to lay before him how few inſtances have been, in former reigns, of denying the royal aſſent to bills for the redreſs of grievances; and the grief of the commons for his not having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral public bills, and in particular to this bill, which tends ſo much to clear the reputation of this houſe, after having voted ſo freely to ſupply the public occaſions."

Theſe reſolutions being formed into a repreſentation, it was preſented by the whole houſe to the king, who was pleaſed to make the following anſwer:

"Gentlemen,

"I am very ſenſible of the good offices you have expreſſed for me on many occaſions, and the zeal you have ſhewn for our common intereſt; I ſhall make uſe of this opportunity to tell you, that no prince ever had a higher eſteem for the conſtitution of the Engliſh government, than myſelf; and that I ſhall ever have a great regard for the advice of parliament.

"I am perſuaded that nothing can ſo much conduce to the welfare of this kingdom, as an entire confidence between the king and people, which I ſhall by all means endeavour to preſerve; and I aſſure you I ſhall look upon ſuch perſons as my enemies, who ſhall adviſe any thing that may leſſen it."

This anſwer, however kind, was not thought ſufficient by many of the members of the houſe of commons, and a motion was made, "that application be made to the king for a farther anſwer." This occaſioned a very warm debate; but the queſtion being put, it paſſed in the negative.

Another bill for naturalizing foreign proteſtants, engaged the attention of the public. It was repreſented on one hand, that the ravages of war, the depopulation of the kingdom, the decay of agriculture, the wealth and induſtry of the refugees, already eſtabliſhed in England, the proſpect of increaſing their numbers, and thereby giving ſubjects to the ſtate, and freſh reſources to commerce and manufactures, were conſidered as objects of the laſt importance, and urged in behalf of the bill. On the other hand it was alledged, that foreigners engaged in the manufactures of the Engliſh, would infallibly be of great prejudice to them; that after amaſſing fortunes at their expence, they would leave the kingdom, and return with their riches to their native country; that numbers of artificers were ſtarving for want of employment, and that the evil inſtead of being leſſened would be increaſed by this meaſure. In ſhort, to admit ſo many non-conformiſts into the number of natural born ſubjects, was to expoſe the church of England to danger which ſhould be avoided. The laſt obſervation was urged with great warmth; and prevailed with many who conſidered the church and ſtate as a prey to foreigners. Popular prejudices are often formidable. The court party ſaw the difficulty, and deſpairing of ſucceſs, withdrew the bill till a more favourable opportunity.

While the parliament were employed in ſettling the ſupplies, captain Bembow bombarded St. Maloes four days together, but with no remarkable ſucceſs. The engineer in this expedition had prepared a fire-ſhip of a new conſtruction, which was intended to be laid as cloſe to the walls as poſſible, and there ſet on fire, the exploſion of which it was imagined would have produced very great effects. But in conducting her to the place intended, ſhe ran on a rock; and the engineer perceiving it would now be impoſſible to execute the deſign, ſet her on fire. The exploſion was prodigious; all the windows in St. Maloes were broken, the roofs of ſeveral houſes torn off, and the earth trembled for three miles round. Had ſhe been carried cloſe to the walls as intended, and there ſet on fire, great part of the town muſt have been deſtroyed.

A. D. 1694. About the latter end of February advice arrived, that a fleet of merchant ſhips, under a convoy of men of war, commanded by Sir Francis Wheeler, having ſailed from Gibraltar up the Streights, met with a moſt violent ſtorm, which continued the whole day and the ſucceeding night, and occaſioned the moſt melancholy misfortune. The Suſſex, the ſhip on board of which Sir Francis carried his flag, foundered, and he himſelf with his whole crew, except two Moors, periſhed; the Cambridge and Lumley-caſtle men of war, the Serpent bomb-ketch, and the Mary ketch, together with ſix merchantmen, were driven aſhore, to the eaſtward of Gibraltar, and moſt of their men loſt. The ſame fate attended three Dutch ſhips richly laden; but rear-admiral Nevill, and three Dutch men of war, had the good fortune to eſcape into Cadiz.

On the twenty-fifth of April, the money bills being all paſſed, and the king deſirous of opening the campaign early, came to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty thanked them for the zeal they had expreſſed for the government, and for the large ſupplies they had granted; promiſed to do his part towards rendering the efforts againſt the common enemy ſucceſsful, and intreated them to be careful to preſerve the public peace during his abſence.

The confederate fleet ſailed early in the ſpring; but they were neither able to block up the French in Breſt, nor to bring them to a general engagement at ſea. They induſtriouſly avoided a battle: the defeat at La Hogue was not yet forgotten; another ſuch misfortune would have almoſt annihilated their maritime power. They ſailed from Breſt before the Engliſh appeared, and continued their courſe to the Mediterranean; Lewis having formed very dangerous deſigns againſt Spain. William knew this, and gave orders to admiral Ruſſel to follow them; but being informed that a fleet of French merchantmen was lying in Bertram-bay bound to the weſtward, the admiral detached captain Pickard and the Roebuck fire-ſhip to take or deſtroy them. He executed his orders with ſucceſs: the fleet conſiſted of fifty-five ſail, of which he burnt or ſunk thirty-five, and drove their convoy among the rocks, where ſhe was ſet on fire, and ſoon after blew up. Two armed ſloops that attended her were alſo deſtroyed.

A project for deſtroying Breſt had been for ſome time concerted, and an attempt was now made for carrying it into execution. The land forces were commanded by lieutenant-general Talmaſh; and on the fifth of June, lord Berkeley, admiral of the blue ſquadron, parted from admiral Ruſſel, with twenty-nine men of war of the line, beſides ſmall frigates, bomb-ketches, fire-ſhips and tranſports. On the ſeventh he came to an anchor between Bertram-bay and Camaret, a ſmall neck of land in the mouth of the river of Breſt.

On the eighth it was reſolved that eight ſhips of the line ſhould enter the bay in order to cover the landing of the troops, and, if poſſible, to ſilence the batteries of the enemy. The marquis of Carmarthen, who commanded this ſquadron, was no ſooner within reach of the enemy's mortars, than they began to play upon them with the utmoſt fury from the point de Filettes and the weſtern point of Camaret. Three batteries more were now opened upon them, ſituated in different parts of the bay. But notwithſtanding all this oppoſition, the marquis poſted the ſhips in ſuch a manner, that they gave great aſſiſtance to the land forces, and ſilenced ſome of the batteries.

While the ſhips were thus playing upon the enemy, Talmaſh landed at the head of about nine hundred men, under a little rock on the ſouth ſide of a ſmall bay, where they were immediately charged with ſo much vigour by the French marines, that they were obliged to retire to their boats in great confuſion. But it happening to be ebb tide, moſt of their boats were faſt aground, ſo that the greater part of the men were either killed or taken priſoners. Among the reſt the brave Talmaſh was mortally wounded. The reſt of the boats eſcaped to the ſhips; and the marquis, perceiving it was impoſſible to ſucceed, ſtood out of the bay, with the loſs of the Weſep, a ſmall Duch man of war, and four hundred men. Of the forces that landed near four hundred were either killed or taken priſoners, and about the ſame number deſperately wounded. Such was the conſequence of an expedition which had no chance of ſucceeding. The ſecret had not been kept, and the French had time ſufficient to take meaſures abundantly ſufficient to render the attempt abortive had nine thouſand inſtead of nine hundred men been landed.

The campaign in Flanders was marked with no event of conſequence. The allies endeavoured to penetrate into the French territories but were prevented by Luxembourgh, who poſted his army in ſuch a manner, that William, deſpairing of ſucceſs, inveſted Huy, which ſoon ſurrendered. The advantage was, however, on the ſide of the allies, and many entertained thoughts that the French would now be willing to make a peace upon equitable terms. They were miſtaken; Lewis was not yet ſufficiently humbled to give peace to Europe.

The king being returned to England, he opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he informed them, that though no great advantage had been gained, a ſtop had been put to the progreſs of the French arms; that having had ſo much experience of their affections and their zeal for the public, he could not doubt of their being willing to aſſiſt him with ſupplies ſufficient for carrying on the war with vigour, the only means of obtaining a ſafe and honourable peace. He concluded with earneſtly recommending a bill for the encouragement of ſeamen. "You muſt be ſenſible," ſaid he, "how much a law of this nature would tend to the advancement of trade, and of the naval ſtrength of this kingdom; which is our great intereſt, and ought to be our principal care."

The parliament made no difficulty of complying with the king's requeſt. The ſupplies, which amounted to near five millions were readily granted. But at the ſame time the commons brought in a bill for the more frequent calling of parliaments. This bill went hand in hand with thoſe for the ſupply, and having paſſed both houſes, received the royal aſſent on the twenty-ſecond of December. By this bill it was enacted that a new parliament ſhould be called every third year, and that the preſent parliament ſhould be diſſolved before the end of the ſucceeding year. The paſſing of this bill gave great joy to the people. They were perſuaded that the manner of procuring votes at elections by bribery and corruption would now be laid aſide; and that the commons would recover at once their ſtrength and reputation.

The very day this bill was brought into parliament, Dr. John Tillotſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, paid the debt of nature, ſincerely lamented by all who eſteemed piety and virtue. He was a perſon of great judgment, clear underſtanding, and a tender and compaſſionate heart: a faithful and zealous friend, but a gentle and forgiving enemy. Without affectation, bigotry, or ſuperſtition, he was truly religious. His notions of morality were at once excellent and ſublime. His reaſoning was clear, eaſy and ſolid. He enforced the precepts of the goſpel, in pure and elegant language. His ſermons were ſo greatly admired that they were eſteemed the beſt examples of ſacred declamation in any language; nor have they yet loſt their eſteem.

Both the king and queen were greatly affected at the death of this pious prelate. The queen for ſeveral days mentioned him in the tendereſt manner, and never without tears. He died ſo poor, that if the king had not given up his firſt-fruits, his debts could not have been paid. He was too charitable to acquire riches, and the only legacy he left to his family was his works. Dr. Tenniſon, biſhop of Lincoln, was judged the moſt proper to ſupply his place, and he was accordingly tranſlated to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury.

The queen herſelf did not long ſurvive her favourite prelate. She was taken ill about a month after his death. She was ſeized with the ſmall-pox on the twenty-firſt of December, and died on the twenty-eighth, in the thirty-third year of her age, and the ſixth of her reign. She was an excellent princeſs, and adorned with moſt of the virtues that render the ſex amiable. Her charity was very extenſive, but entirely void of oſtentation; and her example of conjugal fondneſs was greatly ſuperior to what is generally found in her exalted ſtation. The nation teſtified their loſs by their tears; for the queen was univerſally lamented.

Senſible that his majeſty's intereſt was greatly weakened by the death of the queen, both houſes of parliament attended on his majeſty with their addreſs of condoleance, on the thirty-firſt of December: that of the lords was as follows:

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, do with inexpreſſible grief humbly aſſure your majeſty of the deep ſenſe we have of the loſs your majeſty, and the whole kingdom, doth ſuſtain, by the death of that excellent princeſs, our ſovereign lady the queen; moſt humbly beſeeching your majeſty that you would not indulge your grief upon this ſad occaſion, to the prejudice of the health of your royal perſon; in whoſe preſervation, not only the welfare of your own ſubjects, but of all chriſtendom, is ſo much concerned. We farther beg leave on this ſad occaſion, humbly to renew to your majeſty the hearty and ſincere aſſurances of our utmoſt aſſiſtance againſt all our enemies both at home and abroad, and of all other demonſtrations of the greateſt duty and affection, that can poſſibly be paid by the moſt faithful ſubjects."

The king returned a very gracious anſwer, which was couched in the following terms: "I heartily thank you for your kindneſs to me, but much more for the ſenſe you ſhew of our great loſs, which is above what I can expreſs." The whole nation followed the example of the two houſes of parliament, and conſolatory addreſſes were preſented to the king from all quarters of the kingdom. The princeſs of Denmark, who had for ſome time been refuſed admittance to her ſiſter, wrote the following letter to the king on this mournful occaſion.

"Sir,

"I beg your majeſty's favourable acceptance of my ſincere and hearty ſorrow for your great affliction in the loſs of the queen; and I do aſſure your majeſty I am as ſenſibly touched with this ſad misfortune, as if I had never been ſo unfortunate as to have fallen under her diſpleaſure.

"It is my earneſt deſire your majeſty would give me leave to wait upon you, as ſoon as it can be without inconveniency to you, and without danger of increaſing your affliction, that I may have an opportunity myſelf, not only of repeating this, but of aſſuring your majeſty of my real intentions to omit no occaſion of giving you conſtant proofs of my ſincere reſpect and concern for your perſon and intereſt, as becomes

Sir,

Your majeſty's ſiſter,

ANNE."

This letter produced the deſired effect. Pleaſed with diſcovering that the princeſs was forming no party againſt him, he liſtened to the inſtances of the earl of Sunderland, who brought about a reconciliation between them. The princeſs waited upon the king at Kenſington, and was received with the ſtrongeſt marks of eſteem. St. James's palace was appointed for her reſidence, and the king made her a preſent of the greateſt part of the late queen's jewels. But though a reconciliation took place, it was without friendſhip; a political regard only ſubſiſted between them.

A. D. 1685. The queen, after lying in ſtate at Whitehall, was interred with great ſolemnity in Weſtminſter-abbey. Not only her majeſty's houſhold, but all the judges, ſerjeants at law, the lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, and, which raiſed the mournful pomp to the higheſt pitch of ſplendor, both houſes of parliament attended the royal corpſe to the abbey, where a funeral ſermon was preached by Dr. Tenniſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury.
